The countess smiled on Balsamo. "You hear what the count says, my dear Sartines? Well, it is the simple truth! The count is an excellent friend of mine, and I should be mortally angry with you if you offended him in any way whatsoever. Adieu, Sartines!" and placing her hand in Balsamo's, who carried the coffer, Madame Dubarry left the cabinet of the lieutenant of police.

Monsieur de Sartines saw them depart without displaying that fury which Balsamo expected him to manifest. "Go!" said the conquered magistrate; "go, you have the box, but I have the woman!" and to compensate himself for his disappointment, he rang in a way to break all the bells in the house.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SARTINES BEGINS TO THINK BALSAMO A SORCERER.

At the violent ringing of Monsieur de Sartines' bell, an usher entered.

"Well," asked the magistrate, "that woman?"

"What woman, Monseigneur?"

"The woman who fainted here just now, and whom I confided to your care."

"Monseigneur, she is quite well," replied the usher.

"Very good; bring her to me."

"Where shall I find her, Monseigneur?"

"What do you mean? In that room, of course."

"But she is no longer there, Monseigneur."

"Not there! Then where is she?"

"I do not know."

"She has gone?"

"Yes."

"Alone?"

"Yes."

"But she could not stand!"

"Monseigneur, it is true that for some moments she remained in a swoon; but five minutes after the Comte de Fenix entered Monseigneur's cabinet, she awoke from this strange fit, which neither essences nor salts affected in the least. Then she opened her eyes, rose, and breathed with an air of satisfaction."

"Well, what then?"

"She proceeded toward the door; and as Monseigneur had not ordered that she should be detained, she was allowed to depart."

"Gone!" cried Monsieur de Sartines. "Ah, wretch that you are! I shall send you all to rot at Bicêtre! Quick, quick! send me my head-clerk!"

The usher retired hastily to obey the order he had received.

"The scoundrel is a sorcerer!" muttered the unfortunate magistrate. "I am lieutenant of police to the king, but he is lieutenant of police to the devil!"

The reader has no doubt understood what Monsieur de Sartines could not explain to himself. Immediately after the incident of the pistol, and while the lieutenant of police was endeavoring to regain his equanimity, Balsamo, profiting by the momentary respite, had turned successively to the four cardinal points, quite sure of finding Lorenza in the direction of one of them, and had ordered her to rise, to go out, and to return, by the way she had come, to the Rue Saint Claude. The moment this wish had been formed in Balsamo's mind, a magnetic current was established between him and the young woman, and the latter, obeying the order she had received by intuition, rose and went away without meeting any opposition.

Monsieur de Sartines that same evening took to his bed, and caused himself to be bled, — the revulsion had been too strong for him to bear it with impunity; and the doctor assured him that a quarter of an hour more would have brought on an attack of apoplexy.

Meanwhile Balsamo had accompanied the countess to her carriage, and had attempted to take his leave of her; but she was not a woman to let him go thus without knowing, or at least without endeavoring to discover, the solution of the strange event which had taken place before her. She begged the count to enter her carriage. The count obeyed, and a groom led Djerid behind.

"You see now, Count," said she, "whether I am true or not, and whether, when I have called any one my friend, I have spoken with the lips merely, or from the heart. I was just setting out for Luciennes, where the king had said he would pay me a visit to-morrow morning; but your letter arrived, and I left everything for you. Many would have been frightened at the words 'conspiracies' and 'conspirators' which Monsieur de Sartines threw in your teeth; but I looked at your countenance before I acted, and did as you wished me."

"Madame," replied Balsamo, "you have amply repaid the slight service I was able to render you; but with me nothing is lost, — you will find that I can be grateful. Do not imagine, however, that I am a criminal, — a conspirator, as Monsieur de Sartines said. That worthy magistrate had received, from some person who betrayed me, this coffer, containing some chemical and hermetical secrets, — which I shall share with you, that you may preserve your wonderful, your splendid beauty, and your dazzling youth. Now, seeing the ciphers of my formulas, this excellent Monsieur de Sartines called the chancery clerk to assist him, who, in order not to be found wanting, interpreted them after his own fashion. I think I have already told you, Madame, that the profession is not yet entirely freed from the dangers which were attendant on it in the Middle Ages. Only young and intelligent minds like yours favor it. In short, Madame, you have saved me from a great embarrassment; I thank you for it, and shall prove my gratitude."

"But what would he have done with you if I had not come to your assistance?"

"To annoy King Frederick, whom his Majesty hates, he would have imprisoned me in Vincennes or the Bastille. I should have escaped from it, I know, — thanks to my process for melting stone with a breath, — but I should have lost my coffer, which contains, as I have had the honor of telling you, many curious and invaluable formulas, wrested by a happy venture of science from the eternal shades."

"Ah, Count! you at once delight and reassure me. Then you promise me a philtre to make me young again?"

"Yes."

"And when will you give it me?"

"Oh! you need be in no hurry. You may ask for it twenty years hence, beautiful countess. In the mean time I think you do not wish to become quite a child again."

"You are, in truth, a charming man. One question more, and I will let you go, for you seem in haste."

"Speak, Countess."

"You said that some one had betrayed you. Is it a man, or a woman?"

"A woman."

"Ah, ah! Count, — a love affair?"

"Alas! yes, complicated by an almost frantic jealousy, which has produced the pleasant effect you have seen. It is a woman who, not daring to stab me with a knife because she knows I cannot be killed, wanted to imprison and ruin me."

"What, ruin you?"

"She endeavored to do so, at least."

"Count, I will stop here," said the countess, laughing. "Is it the quicksilver in your veins that gives you that immortality which makes people betray you, instead of killing you? Shall I set you down here, or drive you to your own house?"

"No, Madame, I cannot allow you to inconvenience yourself on my account. I have my horse Djerid."

"Ah! that wonderful animal which, it is said, outstrips the wind?"

"He seems to please you, Madame."

"He is in truth a magnificent steed."

"Allow me to offer him to you, on the condition that you alone ride him."

"Oh! no, thank you; I do not ride on horseback, — or, at least, I am a very timid horsewoman. I am as much obliged to you, however, as if I accepted your offer. Adieu! my dear Count; do not forget my philtre, — in ten years."

"I said twenty."

"Count, you know the proverb, — 'a bird in the hand—;' and if you could even give it me in five years — There is no knowing what may happen."

"Whenever you please, Countess. Are you not aware that I am entirely at your command?"

"Only one word more, Count."

"I listen, Madame."

"It proves that I have great confidence in you to speak of it."

Balsamo, who had already alighted from the carriage, suppressed his impatience, and approached the countess.

"It is reported everywhere," continued Madame Dubarry, "that the king is rather taken with that little Taverney."

"Ah! Madame," said Balsamo, "is it possible?"

"A very great partiality, it is said. You must tell me if it is true. Count, do not deceive me; I beseech you to treat me as a friend. Tell me the truth, Count."

"Madame," replied Balsamo, "I will do more; I will promise you that Mademoiselle Andrée shall never be the king's mistress."

"And why not?" cried Madame Dubarry.

"Because I do not wish it," said Balsamo.

"Oh!" said Madame Dubarry, incredulously.

"You doubt."

"Is it not allowed?"

"Never doubt the truths of science, Madame. You have believed me when I said yes; believe me when I say no."

"But, in short, have you the means—?" she paused, smiling.

"Well?"

"Means capable of destroying the king's will, or conquering his whims?"

Balsamo smiled. "I create sympathies," said he.

"Yes, I know that."

"You believe it, even."

"I believe it."

"Well, I can create aversions also, and if needful, impossibilities. Therefore, Countess, make your mind easy; I am on guard."

Balsamo uttered all these fragments of sentences with an absence of mind which Madame Dubarry would not have taken as she did for inspiration, had she known the feverish anxiety which Balsamo felt to be with Lorenza as quickly as possible.

"Well, Count," said she, "assuredly you are not only my prophet of happiness, but also my guardian angel. Count, mark my words; defend me, and I will defend you. Alliance, alliance!"

"Agreed, Madame," replied Balsamo, kissing the countess's hand. Then closing the door of the carriage, which the countess had stopped upon the Champs Élysées, he mounted his horse, who neighed joyously, and was soon lost to view in the shadows of night.

"To Luciennes!" said the countess, consoled.

Balsamo whistled softly, and gently pressed his knees against Djerid's side, who started off at a gallop. Five minutes afterward he was in the vestibule of the Rue Saint Claude looking at Fritz. "Well?" asked he, anxiously.

"Yes, Master," replied the domestic, who was accustomed to read his looks.

"She has returned?"

"She is upstairs."

"In which room?"

"In the chamber of furs."

"In what state is she?"

"Oh! very much exhausted. She ran so quickly that although I saw her coming, for I was watching for her, I had scarcely time to hasten to meet her."

"Indeed!"

"Oh! I was quite alarmed. She swept on like a tempest; rushed upstairs without taking breath; and when she entered the room, she fell upon the large black lion's skin. You will find her there."

Balsamo hastily ascended, and found Lorenza where Fritz had said. She was struggling in vain against the first convulsions of a nervous crisis. The fluid had weighed upon her too long already, and forced her to violent efforts. She suffered, she moaned; it seemed as if a mountain weighed upon her breast, and that she endeavored with both hands to remove it.

Balsamo looked at her with eyes angrily flashing; and taking her in his arms, he carried her into her apartment, the mysterious door of which closed behind him.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE.

Balsamo had just entered Lorenza's apartment, and was preparing to awake her and overwhelm her with all the reproaches which his gloomy anger prompted, fully determined to punish her according to the dictates of that anger, when a triple knock upon the ceiling announced that Althotas had watched for his return, and wished to speak to him.

Nevertheless Balsamo waited; he was hoping either that he had been mistaken, or that the signal had been accidental, when the impatient old man repeated his blows. Balsamo, therefore, — fearing, no doubt, to see him descend, as he had done before, or that Lorenza, awakened by an influence opposed to his own, might acquire the knowledge of some new matter no less dangerous for him than that of his political secrets, — Balsamo, therefore, after having, if we may so express it, charged Lorenza with an additional quantity of the electric fluid, left the room to visit Althotas.

It was high time; the trap-door was already half-way from the ceiling. Althotas had left his wheeled armchair, and was seen squatting down upon the movable part of the ceiling, which rose and fell. He saw Balsamo leave Lorenza's room.

Squatting thus, the old man was at once hideous and terrible to behold. His white face, or rather some parts of that face, which still seemed to be alive, were purple with the violence of his rage. His meagre and bony hands, like those of a human skeleton, trembled and shook; his hollow eyes seemed to vacillate in their deep caverns; and in a language unknown even to his disciple, he was loading him with the most violent invectives.

Having left his armchair to touch the spring, Althotas seemed to live and move only by the aid of his long arms, lean and angular as those of a spider; and issuing, as we have said, from his chamber, inaccessible to all but Balsamo, he was about to descend to the lower apartment. In order that this feeble old man, indolent as he was, should leave his armchair, that cleverly constructed machine which spared him all fatigue, and consent to perform one of the actions of common life, — in order that he should undergo the care and fatigue of such a change in his usual habits, it was necessary that some extraordinary excitement should have withdrawn him from his meditative life, and compelled him to enter again reality.

Balsamo, taken as it were in the fact, seemed at first astonished, then uneasy.

"Ah!" exclaimed Althotas, "there you are, you good-for-nothing, you ingrate! There you are, coward, who desert your master!"

Balsamo called all his patience to his aid, as he invariably did when he spoke to the old man. "But," he replied, quietly, "I think, my friend, you have only just called me."

"Your friend?" exclaimed Althotas; "your friend? you vile human creature! You dare to speak the language of equality to me! I have been a friend to you, — more than a friend, a father, — a father who has educated, instructed, and enriched you. But you my friend? Oh, no! for you abandon me; you assassinate me!"

"Come, Master, you disturb your bile; you irritate your blood; you will make yourself ill."

"Ill? Nonsense! Have I ever been ill, except when you made me a sharer, in spite of myself, in some of the miseries of your impure human-kind? Ill! Have you forgotten that it is I who heal others?"

"Well, Master," replied Balsamo, coldly, "I am here. Let us not lose time in vain."

"Yes, I advise you to remind me of that. Time, time! which you oblige me to economize, — me, for whom this element, circumscribed to all the world, should be endless, unlimited! Yes, my time flies; yes, my time is lost, — my time, like the time of other people, falls minute by minute into the gulf of eternity, when for me it ought to be eternity itself!"

"Come, Master," said Balsamo, with unalterable patience, lowering the trap to the ground as he spoke, placing himself upon it, and causing it to rise again to its place in the room; "come, what is it you want? You say I starve you; but are you not in your forty days of fasting?"

"Yes, yes, doubtless; the work of regeneration began thirty-two days ago."

"Then tell me, of what do you complain? I see two or three bottles of rain-water, the only kind you drink, still remaining."

"Of course; but do you imagine I am a silkworm to complete the grand work of renovation of youth and of transformation alone? Do you imagine that, powerless as I am, I can compose alone the elixir of life? Or think you that, sitting here in my chair, enervated by cooling drinks, my sole nourishment, I could have power of mind enough, when left to my own resources, without your assistance, to complete the minute work of my regeneration, in which, as you, unhappy man, well know, I must be aided and supported by a friend?"

"I am here, Master, I am here. Answer me now," said Balsamo, replacing the old man in his chair almost in spite of himself, as he would have handled a hideous infant; "answer me, — you have not been in want of distilled water, for, as I said before, there are three bottles still remaining. This water, as you know, was all collected in the month of May; there are your biscuits of barley and of sesamum, and I myself administered to you the white drops you prescribed."

"Yes, but the elixir! The elixir is not made! You do not remember it, for you were not there; it was your father, — your father, who was far more faithful than you are; but at the last fiftieth I had the elixir ready a month beforehand. I had my retreat on Mount Ararat. A Jew provided me with a Christian child still at its mother's breast, for its weight in gold. I bled it according to the rule; I took the last three drops of its arterial blood, and in an hour my elixir, which wanted only this ingredient, was composed. Therefore my first regeneration succeeded wonderfully well. My hair and teeth fell out during the convulsions which succeeded the absorption of that wondrous elixir, but they grew again, — the latter badly enough, I know, because I neglected the precaution of letting the elixir flow into my throat through a golden conduit. But my hair and my nails grew again in this second youth, and I began again to live as if I were only fifteen years of age. Now I am old again; I am bordering on the extreme limit; and if the elixir is not ready, if it is not safely enclosed in this bottle, if I do not bestow all possible care upon this work, the science of a century will be annihilated with me, and the admirable, the sublime secret I possess will be lost for man, who in me and through me approaches divineness! Oh! if I fail, if I am mistaken, if I miss it, Acharat, it will be your fault; and take care, for my anger will be terrible, — terrible!" and as he uttered these last words, a livid glare shot from his dying eyeball, and the old man fell into a brief convulsion, which ended in a violent fit of coughing.

Balsamo instantly lavished the most eager attentions on him, and the old man recovered. His complexion had become death-like instead of pale. This feeble attack had weakened his strength so much that one would have thought he was dying.

"Come, Master," said Balsamo, "tell me plainly what you want."

"What I want!" said he, looking fixedly at Balsamo.

"Yes."

"What I want is this —"

"Speak; I hear you, and I will obey, if what you ask is possible."

"Possible, possible!" muttered the old man, contemptuously. "You know that everything is possible."

"Yes, with time and science."

"Science I have, and I am on the point of conquering time. My dose has succeeded. My strength has almost entirely left me. The white drops have caused the expulsion of all the remaining portion of my former nature. Youth, like the sap of the trees in May, rises under the old bark, and buds, so to speak, through the old wood. You may remark, Acharat, that the symptoms are excellent, — my voice is weak, my sight is three-quarters gone; sometimes I feel my mind wander; I have become insensible to the transition from heat to cold. I must therefore hasten to finish my elixir, in order that, on the completion of my second fifty years, I may at once pass from a hundred years old to twenty. The ingredients for the elixir are all made, the conduit is ready ; I want nothing but the three drops of blood I told you of."

Balsamo made a gesture of repugnance.

"Very well," said Althotas, "let us abandon the child, since it is so difficult, and since you prefer to shut yourself up the whole day with your mistress, to seeking it for me."

"You know, Master, that Lorenza is not my mistress," replied Balsamo.

"Oh ! oh ! oh ! " exclaimed Althotas ; "you say that ! You think to impose on me as on the mass ; you would make me believe in an immaculate creature, — and yet you are a man ! "

"I swear to you, Master, that Lorenza is as pure as an angel ; I swear to you that love, earthly felicity, domestic happiness, — I have sacrificed all to my project. For I also have my regenerating work ; only, instead of applying it to myself alone, I shall apply it to all the world."

"Fool ! poor fool ! " cried Althotas ; "I verily believe he is going to speak to me of his cataclysm of fleshworms, his revolutions of ant-hills, when I speak to him of life and eternal youth ! "

"Which can be acquired only at the price of a fearful crime ; and besides — "

"You doubt ; I see you doubt, unhappy man ! "

"No, Master ; but since you give up the idea of procuring a child, tell me what do you want ? "

"I must have the first virginal creature you can find, — man or woman ; but a woman would be better, by reason of the affinity of the sexes, as I have discovered. Find me that, and quickly, for I have only eight days longer."

"Very well, Master, I will see, — I will search."

Another lightning flash, more terrible than the first, sparkled in the old man's eyes. "You will see! you will search!" he cried. "Oh! is that your reply? I expected it, and I don't know why I am surprised. And since when, thou worm of the earth, was the creature entitled to speak thus to its master? Ah! you see me powerless, disabled, supplicating, and you are fool enough to think me at your mercy! Yes or no, Acharat? And answer me without embarrassment or falsehood, for I can see and read your heart; for I can judge you, and shall punish you."

"Master," replied Balsamo, "take care; your anger will do you an injury."

"Answer me! answer!"

"I can say to my master only what is true; I will see if I can procure what you desire, without injuring ourselves. I will endeavor to find a man who will sell you what you want; but I will not take the crime upon myself. That is all I can say."

"That is very delicate," said Althotas, with a bitter smile.

"It is so, Master," said Balsamo.

Althotas made so violent an effort that with the help of his two arms resting on the arms of the chair, he raised himself to his feet. "Yes, or no?" said he.

"Master, yes, if I find it; no, if I do not."

"Then you will expose me to death, wretch! you will save three drops of the blood of an insignificant, worthless creature such as I require, and let a perfect creature such as I am fall into the eternal gulf! Listen, Acharat!" said the old man, with a smile fearful to behold, "I no longer ask you for anything; I ask absolutely nothing; I will wait. But if you do not obey, I will serve myself; if you desert me, I will help myself! You have heard me, have you not? Now go!"

Balsamo, without replying to this threat, prepared everything the old man might want. He placed the drinks and the food within his reach, and performed all the services a watchful servant would perform for his master, a devoted son for his father; then, absorbed by a thought very different from that which tormented Althotas, he lowered the trap to descend, without remarking that the old man followed him with a sardonic and ominous grin.

Althotas was still grinning like an evil genius when Balsamo stood before the still sleeping Lorenza.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE STRUGGLE.

Balsamo stood before Lorenza, his heart swelling with sad emotion; his wrath had given place to sorrow. His interview with Althotas had led him to reflect on the vanity of all human affairs, and had driven anger from his heart. He remembered the practice of the Greek philosopher who repeated the entire alphabet before listening to the voice of that black divinity, the counsellor of Achilles. After a moment of mute and cold contemplation before the couch on which Lorenza was lying, "I am sad," said he to himself, "but resolved, and I can look my situation fair in the face. Lorenza hates me; Lorenza has threatened to betray me, and has betrayed me. My secret is no longer my own; I have given it into this woman's power, and she casts it to the winds. I am like the fox who has withdrawn from the steel trap only the bone of his leg, but who has left behind his flesh and his skin, so that the huntsman can say on the morrow, 'The fox has been taken here; I shall know him again, living or dead.'

"And this dreadful misfortune, which Althotas cannot comprehend, and which therefore I have not even mentioned to him, — this misfortune, which destroys all my hopes in this country, and consequently in this world, of which France is the soul, I owe to the creature sleeping before me, to this beautiful statue with her entrancing smile. To this tempting angel I owe dishonor and ruin, and shall owe to her, captivity, exile, and death.

"Therefore," continued he, becoming more animated, "the sum of evil has exceeded that of good, and Lorenza is dangerous to me. Oh, serpent! with thy graceful folds, which nevertheless strangle, with thy golden throat, which is nevertheless full of venom, sleep; on for when thou awakest I shall be obliged to kill thee!"

And with a gloomy smile Balsamo slowly approached the young woman, whose languid eyes were turned toward him as he approached, as the sunflower and volubilis open to the first rays of the rising sun.

"Oh!" said Balsamo, "and yet I must forever close those eyes which now beam so tenderly on me, — those beautiful eyes which are filled with lightning as soon as they cease to glow with love."

Lorenza smiled sweetly, and, smiling, she displayed the double row of her pearly teeth.

"But if I kill her who hates me," said Balsamo, wringing his hands, "I shall also kill her who loves me;" and his heart was filled with the deepest grief, strangely mingled with a vague desire. "No, no!" he murmured. "I have sworn in vain; I have threatened in vain, — no, I shall never have the courage to kill her! She shall live, but she shall live without ever being awakened again! She shall live this factitious life, which is happiness for her, while the other is despair. Would that I could make her happy! What matters to me the rest? She shall have but one existence, that which I create, that in which she loves me, that in which she lives at this moment;" and he returned Lorenza's tender look by a look as tender as her own, placing his hand as he did so gently on her head.

Lorenza, who seemed to read Balsamo's thoughts as if they were an open book, gave a long sigh, rose gradually with the graceful languor of sleep, and placed her two white arms upon Balsamo's shoulders, who felt her perfumed breath upon his cheek.

"Oh, no, no!" exclaimed Balsamo, passing his hand over his burning forehead and his dazzled eyes; "no, this intoxicating life will make me mad, and with this siren, glory, power, immortality, will all vanish from my thoughts. No, no, she must awake! I wish it; it is necessary."

Distracted, beside himself, Balsamo suddenly shook off Lorenza, who loosened her hold upon him, and, like a floating veil, like a shadow, like a flake of snow, she fell on the sofa. The most finished coquette would not have chosen an attitude more seductive in which to present herself to her lover's view. Balsamo still had the strength to take a few steps in retreat; but, like Orpheus, he looked back, — like Orpheus, he was lost. "Oh, if I awake her," he thought, "the struggle will begin again! If I awake her, she will kill herself, or she will kill me, or force me to destroy her. Oh, what an abyss! Yes, this woman's destiny is written; it stands before me in letters of fire, — love, death! Lorenza, Lorenza! thou art doomed to love and to die! Lorenza, Lorenza! I hold thy life and thy love in my hands!"

Instead of a reply, the enchantress rose, advanced toward Balsamo, fell at his feet, and gazed into his eyes with a tender smile. Then she took one of his hands and placed it on her heart. "Death!" said she, in a low voice, with lips moist and brilliant as coral when it issues from the caverns of the deep; "death, but love!"

Balsamo took two steps backward, his head thrown back, his hand over his eyes. Lorenza, breathless, followed him on her knees. "Death!" she repeated, with her intoxicating voice, "but love, love, love!"

Balsamo could resist no longer; a cloud of flame enveloped him. "Oh!" he said, "it is too much; I have struggled as long as a human being could struggle. Demon, or angel of futurity, whichever thou art, thou must be content. I have long enough sacrificed all the generous passions in my heart to egotism and pride. Oh, no, no! I have no right thus to rebel against the only human sentiment which lives in my heart. I love this woman; I love her, and this passionate love injures her more than the most terrible hatred could do. This love kills her. Oh, coward! oh, ferocious fool that I am! I cannot even compromise with my desires. What! when I breathe my last sigh, when I appear before God, — I, the deceiver, the false prophet, — when I throw off my mantle of hypocrisy before the Sovereign Judge, shall I not have one generous action to confess, the recollection of a single happiness to console me in the midst of my eternal sufferings? Oh, no, no, Lorenza! I know that in loving thee I lose the future; I know that my revealing angel will wing its flight to heaven when once the woman shall descend into my arms. But, Lorenza, you wish it, do you not?"

"My beloved!" she sighed.

"Then you accept this life instead of the real life?"

"I ask for it on my knees, — I pray for it, I implore it. This life is love and happiness."

"And will it suffice for you when you are my wife? For you know that I love you passionately."

"Oh! I know it, — I can read your heart."

"And you will never accuse me, before men or before God, of having taken you by surprise, or of having deceived you?"

"Never! Oh! before men, before God, on the contrary, I will bless you for giving me love, — the only good, the only pearl, the only diamond in the world!"

"You will never regret your wings, poor dove? For you must know that you will never again roam through radiant space for me to seek the ray of light Jehovah once deigned to bestow upon his prophets. When I would know the future, when I would command men, alas! alas! your voice will no longer reply to me. I have had in you the beloved woman and the helping spirit; I shall have only one of the two now; and yet —"

"Ah! you doubt, you doubt," cried Lorenza; "I see doubt like a dark stain upon your heart."

"You will always love me, Lorenza?"

"Always! always!"

Balsamo passed his hand over his forehead.

"Well! so be it," said he. "Besides —" He remained a moment buried in thought. "Besides, am I in absolute need of her?" he continued. "Is she the only one in the world? No, no; while this one will make me happy, the other will continue my riches and my power. Andrée is as prophetic, as clairvoyant as you are. Andrée is young, pure, virginal, and I do not love her; and yet in her sleep Andrée is obedient to me, like you. I have in Andrée a subject ready to replace you; and to me she is the physician's corpus vile which may serve for experiments. She flies as far as you do — farther, perhaps — into the shadows of the unknown. Andrée, Andrée! I take you for my kingdom. Lorenza, come to my arms; I keep you for my love and my mistress. With Andrée I am powerful; with Lorenza I am happy. From this moment, only, my life is complete, and, except for immortality, I have realized the dream of Althotas, — except for immortality, I am equal to the gods!" and raising Lorenza, he opened his panting bosom, to which she clung as the ivy clings to the oak.

CHAPTER XXIX.

LOVE.

For Balsamo another life had begun, — a life hitherto unknown in his active, troubled, multifarious experience. For three days there had been for him no more anger, no more apprehension, no more jealousy; for three days he had not heard the subject of politics, conspirators, or conspiracies as much as whispered. By Lorenza's side — and he had not left her for an instant — he had forgotten the whole world. This strange, wonderful love, which, as it were, soared above humanity, this intoxicating and mysterious love, this love of a shadow, — for he could not conceal from himself that with a word he could change his gentle bride into an implacable enemy, — this love snatched from hatred, thanks to an inexplicable caprice of nature or of science, plunged Balsamo into happiness which bordered on madness.

More than once during these three days, rousing himself from the opiate torpor of love, Balsamo looked at his ever-smiling, ever-ecstatic companion, — for thenceforth, in the existence he had created for her, she rested from her life of factitious ecstasy by a sleep equally factitious; and when he saw her calm, gentle, happy, when she called him by the most affectionate names, and dreamed aloud her mysterious love, he more than once asked himself if God were not angry with the modern Titan who had attempted to wrest from him his secrets; if he had not inspired Lorenza with the idea of deceiving him with a falsehood in order to lull his vigilance, and when it was lulled, of escaping, to appear again as an avenging fury.

In such moments Balsamo doubted of the truth of a science received by tradition from antiquity, but of which he had no evidence but examples. Immediately, however, that perpetual flame, that thirst for caresses, reassured him. "If Lorenza was feigning," he argued with himself, "if she intended to fly from me, she would seek opportunities for sending me away, she would invent excuses for occasional solitude; but far from that, her arms are always embracing me, her ardent look says to me, 'Do not go away;' her gentle voice ever whispers, 'Stay!'"

Then Balsamo's confidence in himself and in science returned. Why, indeed, should the magic secret to which alone he owned his power have become all at once, and without any transition, a chimera fit only to throw to the winds as a vanished recollection, as the smoke of an extinguished fire? Never with relation to him had Lorenza been more lucid, more clear-sighted. All the thoughts which sprang up in his mind, all the feelings which made his heart bound, were instantly reproduced in hers. It remained to be seen if this lucidity were not sympathy; if, beyond himself and the young girl, beyond the circle which their love had traced, and which their love illuminated with its light, the eyes of her soul, so clear-sighted before the fall of this new Eve, could yet pierce the surrounding darkness. Balsamo dared not make the decisive trial; he hoped still, and this hope was the resplendent crown of his happiness.

Sometimes Lorenza said to him, with gentle melancholy: "Acharat, you think of another than me, of a woman of the North, with fair hair and blue eyes. Acharat, Acharat, this woman always moves beside me in your thoughts!"

Balsamo looked tenderly at Lorenza. "You see that in me?" said he.

"Oh, yes! as clearly as I read the surface of a mirror."

"Then you know it is not love which makes me think of that woman," replied Balsamo. "Read in my heart, dear Lorenza!"

"No," she replied, bending her head; "no, I know it well. But yet your thoughts are divided between us two, as in the days when Lorenza Feliciani tormented you, — the naughty Lorenza, who sleeps, and whom you will not again awake."

"No, my love, no," exclaimed Balsamo; "I think only of you, — at least with the heart. Have I not forgotten all, neglected everything, — study, politics, work, — since our happiness?"

"And you are wrong," said Lorenza; "for I can help you in your work."

"How?"

"Yes; did you not formerly spend whole hours in your laboratory?"

"Certainly. But I renounce all these vain endeavors. They would be so many hours taken from my life; for during that time I should not see you."

"And why should I not be with you in your labors as in your love? Why should I not make you powerful as I make you happy?"

"Because my Lorenza, it is true, is beautiful, but she has not studied. God gives beauty and love, but study alone gives knowledge."

"The soul knows everything."

"Then you can really see with the eyes of your soul?"

"Yes."

"And you can guide me in the grand search after the philosopher's stone?"

"I think so."

"Come, then;" and Balsamo, encircling her waist with his arm, led her into his laboratory. The fire in the gigantic furnace, which no one had replenished for four days, was extinguished, and the crucibles had grown cold upon their chafing-dishes.

Lorenza looked around on all these strange instruments, the last combinations of expiring alchemy, without surprise. She seemed to know the purpose which each was intended to fulfil. "You are attempting to make gold?" said she, smiling.

"Yes."

"All these crucibles contain preparations in different stages of progress."

"All stopped, — all lost; but I do not regret it."

"You are right, for your gold would never be anything but colored mercury; you can render it solid, perhaps, but you cannot transform it."

"But gold can be made?"

"No."

"And yet Daniel of Transylvania sold the receipt for the transmutation of metals to Cosmo the First for twenty thousand ducats."

"Daniel of Transylvania deceived Cosmo the First."

"And yet the Saxon Payken, who was condemned to death by Charles the Second, ransomed his life by changing a leaden ingot into a golden one, from which forty ducats were coined, and gold enough was taken to make a medal, which was struck in honor of the clever alchemist."

"The clever alchemist was nothing but a clever juggler. He merely substituted the golden ingot for the leaden one, — nothing more. Your surest way of making gold, Acharat, is to melt into ingots, as you do already, the riches which your slaves bring you from the four quarters of the world."

Balsamo remained pensive. "Then the transmutation of metals is impossible?" said he.

"Impossible."

"And the diamond, — is that, too, impossible?"

"Oh! the diamond is another matter," said Lorenza.

"The diamond can be made, then?"

"Yes; for to make the diamond, you have not to transmute one body into another, — to make the diamond is merely to attempt the simple modification of a known element."

"Then you know the element of which the diamond is formed?"

"To be sure; the diamond is pure carbon crystallized."

Balsamo was almost stunned. A dazzling, unexpected, unheard-of light flashed before his eyes; he covered them with both hands, as if the flame had blinded him.

"Oh! my God," said he, "my God, thou dost for me too much; some danger threatens me! What precious ring must I throw into the sea to appease thy jealousy? Enough, Lorenza, for to-day!"

"Am I not yours? Order, command me!"

"Yes, you are mine. Come, come!"

And he drew her out of the laboratory, crossed the chamber of furs, and without paying any attention to a light, creaking noise he heard overhead, he once more entered the barred room with Lorenza.

"So you are pleased with your Lorenza, my beloved Balsamo?"

"Oh!" he exclaimed.

"What did you fear, then? Speak, — tell me all."

Balsamo clasped his hands, and looked at Lorenza with an expression of such terror that a spectator ignorant of what was in his heart would have been totally at a loss to account for it.

"Oh!" he murmured, "and I was near killing this angel; I was near dying of despair before resolving the problem of being at once powerful and happy! I forgot that the limits of the possible always exceed the horizon traced by the existing state of science, and that the majority of truths which have become facts have always in their infancy been looked upon as dreams. I thought I knew everything, and I knew nothing!"

The young Italian smiled divinely.

"Lorenza, Lorenza!" continued Balsamo, "the mysterious design of the Creator is, then, accomplished, which makes woman to be born of the substance of the man, and which commands them to have only one heart in common! Eve is revived for me, — an Eve who will not have a thought that is not mine, and whose life hangs by the thread which I hold. It is too much, my God, for a creature to possess! I sink under the weight of thy gift!" and he fell upon his knees, embracing with adoration the gentle beauty, who smiled on him as none smile on earth.

"Oh, no!" he continued; "no, you shall never leave me more! I shall live in all safety under the protection of your clairvoyance, which can pierce into the future. You will assist me in those laborious researches which you alone, as you have said, can complete, and which one word from you will render easy and successful. You will show me, — since I cannot make gold, gold being a homogeneous substance, a primitive element, — you will show me in what corner of the world the Creator has concealed it; you will tell me where the rich treasures lie which have been swallowed up in the vast depths of the ocean. With your eyes I shall see the pearl grow in the veined shell, and man's thoughts spring up under the thick layers of his flesh. With your ears I shall hear the dull sound of the worm beneath the ground, and the footsteps of my enemy as he approaches! I shall be great as God, and happier than God, my Lorenza; for God has not in heaven his equal and companion, — for God is almighty, but he is alone in his divine majesty, and does not share with any other divine being that almightiness which makes him God."

Lorenza still smiled upon him, and as she smiled she replied to his words by affectionate caresses. "And yet," she whispered, as if she could see each thought which whirled through his restless brain, "and yet you doubt still, Acharat, as you have said, if I can cross the circle of our love, — you doubt if I can see into the distance; but you console yourself by thinking that if I cannot see, she can."

"She! Who?"

"The fair-haired beauty. Shall I tell you her name?"

"Yes."

"Stay, — Andrée!"

"Ah, yes; you can read my thoughts! Yes, a last fear still troubles me. Can you still see through space, though material obstacles intervene?"

"Try me."

"Give me your hand, Lorenza."

The young girl passionately seized Balsamo's hand.

"Can you follow me?"

"Anywhere?"

"Come!" and Balsamo, leaving in thought the Rue Saint Claude, drew Lorenza's thoughts along with him.

"Where are we?" he asked.

"We are upon a hill," replied the young woman.

"Yes, you are right," said Balsamo, trembling with delight. "But what do you see?"

"Before me?—to the right, or to the left?"

"Before you."

"I see a long alley, with a wood on one side, a town on the other, and a river which separates them and loses itself in the horizon, after flowing under the walls of a large chateau."

"That is right, Lorenza. The forest is that of Vésinet; the town St. Germain; the chateau is the Château de Maisons. Let us enter the pavilion behind us. What do you see there?"

"Ah! in the first place, in the antechamber, a little negro, fantastically dressed, eating sugar-plums."

"Yes, Zamore. Proceed, proceed!"

"An empty salon, splendidly furnished; the spaces above the doors painted with goddesses and cupids."

"The salon is empty, you say?"

"Yes."

"Let us go still farther."

"Ah! we are in a splendid boudoir, lined with blue satin embroidered with flowers of natural colors."

"Is that empty also?"

"No; a woman is reclining upon a sofa."

"What woman? Do you not remember to have seen her before?"

"Yes; it is the Comtesse Dubarry."

"Right, Lorenza! I shall go frantic with delight! What does the woman do?"

"She is thinking of you, Balsamo."

"Of me?"

"Yes."

"Then you can read her thoughts?"

"Yes, for I repeat it, she is thinking of you."

"And what is she thinking?"

"You have made her a promise."

"Yes."

"You promised her that water of beauty which Venus, to revenge herself on Sappho, gave to Phaon."

"Yes, yes, you are right again! And what does she do while thinking?"

"She comes to a decision."

"What decision?"

"She reaches out her hand toward the bell; she rings; another young woman enters."

"Dark or light haired?"

"Dark."

"Tall or short?"

"Short."

"Her sister. Listen to what she says to her."

"She orders the horses to be harnessed to her carriage."

"To go whither?"

"To come here."

"Are you sure?"

"She is giving the order. Stay,—she is obeyed; I see the horses and the carriage. In two hours she will be here."

Balsamo fell upon his knees. "Oh!" he exclaimed, "if in two hours she should really be here, I shall have nothing left to ask of thee, my God, except to have mercy on my happiness."

"My poor friend! then you still feared?"

"Yes, yes!"

"And why did you fear? Love, which completes the material existence, increases also our mental powers. Love, like every generous emotion, brings us nearer to God, and all wisdom comes from God."

"Lorenza, Lorenza, you will drive me mad with joy!" said Balsamo, letting his head fall on Lorenza's knees.

Balsamo now waited for but one more proof to be completely happy.

This proof was the arrival of Madame Dubarry. The two hours of suspense were short. All measure of time had completely ceased for Balsamo. Suddenly the young woman started, and took Balsamo's hand. "You are doubting yet," said she, "and you wish to know where she is at this moment."

"Yes," said Balsamo, "you are right."

"Well," replied Lorenza, "she is thundering along the Boulevards at the full speed of her horses; she approaches; she turns into the Rue Saint Claude; she stops before the door and knocks."

The apartment in which they were, was so retired and so quiet that the noise of the iron knocker could not penetrate its recesses; but Balsamo, rising on one knee, was anxiously listening. At this moment two knocks struck by Fritz made him bound to his feet; for, as the reader will remember, two knocks were the signal of an important visit.

"Oh!" said he, "then it is true?"

"Go and convince yourself, Balsamo; but return quickly."

Balsamo advanced toward the fireplace.

"Let me accompany you," said Lorenza, "as far as the door of the staircase."

"Come!" and they both passed together into the chamber of furs.

"You will not leave this room?" asked Balsamo.

"No; I will await you here. Oh! do not fear; you know the Lorenza who loves you is not the Lorenza whom you fear. Besides—" She stopped, and smiled.

"What?" asked Balsamo.

"Can you not read in my soul as I read yours?"

"Alas! no."

"Besides, you can command me to sleep until you return. Command me to remain immovable upon this sofa, and I shall sleep, and be motionless."

"Well, my Lorenza, it shall be so. Sleep, and await my return here!"

Lorenza, already struggling with sleep, pressed her lips to Balsamo's in a last kiss, and fell back upon the sofa, murmuring: "You will return soon, my Balsamo, will you not?"

Balsamo waved his hand. Lorenza was already asleep; but so beautiful, so pure, with her long, flowing hair, the feverish glow upon her cheeks, her half-opened and swimming eyes, so little like a mortal, that Balsamo came back to her, took her hand, kissed her arms and her neck, but dared not kiss her lips.

Two knocks were heard a second time. The lady was becoming impatient, or Fritz feared that his master had not heard him. Balsamo hastened to the door. As he closed it behind him, he thought he heard a second creaking noise like the former one. He opened the door again, looked round, and saw nothing, — nothing but Lorenza lying down, and breathing quickly under the pressure of her love. He closed the door, and hastened toward the salon without uneasiness, without fear, without foreboding, — all heaven in his heart!

Balsamo was mistaken; it was not love alone which oppressed Lorenza's bosom and made her breathe so heavily. It was a kind of dream which seemed to belong to the lethargy in which she was plunged, — a lethargy which so nearly resembled death.

Lorenza dreamed, and in the hideous mirror of her gloomy dreams she fancied she saw, through the darkness which began to close around her, the oaken ceiling open, and something like a large circular platform descend slowly, with a regular, slow, measured movement, accompanied by a disagreeable hissing noise. It seemed to her as if she breathed with difficulty, as if she were almost suffocated by the pressure of this moving circle. It seemed to her as if upon this moving trap something moved, — some misshapen being like Caliban in "The Tempest," — a monster with a human face, an old man whose eyes and arms alone were living, and who looked at her with his frightful eyes, and stretched his fleshless arms toward her. And she — she, poor child! — writhed in vain, without power to escape, without understanding the danger which threatened her, without consciouness of anything but the grasp of two living flesh-hooks seizing upon her white dress, lifting her from her sofa, and placing her upon the trap, which reascended slowly toward the ceiling with the grating noise of iron scraping against iron, and with a hideous, mocking laugh from the monster with the human face, who was raising her aloft without shock and without pain.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE PHILTRE.

As Lorenza had foretold, it was Madame Dubarry who had just knocked at the gate. The beautiful countess had been ushered into the salon. While awaiting Balsamo's arrival, she was looking over that curious "Book of Death," engraved at Mayence, the plates of which, designed with marvellous skill, show death presiding over all the acts of man's life, — waiting for him at the door of the ball-room after he has pressed the hand of the woman he loves, dragging him to the bottom of the water in which he is bathing, or hiding in the barrel of the gun he carries to the chase.

Madame Dubarry was contemplating the plate which represents a beautiful woman daubing her face with rouge and looking at herself in the glass, when Balsamo opened the door and bowed to her, with the smile of happiness still beaming upon his face. "Excuse me, Madame," said he, "for having made you wait; but I had not well calculated the distance, or was ignorant of the speed of your horses. I thought you still at the Place Louis XV."

"What do you mean?" asked the countess. "You knew I was coming, then?"

"Yes, Madame; it is about two hours ago that I saw you, in your boudoir lined with blue satin, giving orders for your horses to be put to the carriage."

"And you say I was in my blue satin boudoir?"

"Embroidered with flowers colored after nature. Yes, Countess, you were reclining upon a sofa; a pleasing thought passed through your mind. You said to yourself, 'I will go and visit the Comte de Fenix;' then you rang the bell."

"And who entered?"

"Your sister, Countess. Am I right? You requested her to transmit your orders, which were instantly executed."

"Truly, Count, you are a sorcerer! Can you look into my boudoir like that every moment of the day? If so, you should have warned me, do you see?"

"Ah! be assured, Countess, I can look only through open doors."

"And looking through open doors, you saw that I was thinking of you?"

"Yes; and even that you thought of me with benevolent intentions."

"Ah, you are right, my dear Count! I have the best possible intentions toward you; but confess that you deserve more than intentions, — you who are so kind and so useful, and who seem destined to play in my life the part of tutor, which is the most difficult part, I know."

"In truth, Madame, you make me very happy! Then I have been of use to you?"

"What! you are a sorcerer, and you do not know?"

"Allow me at least the merit of being modest."

"As you please, my dear Count; then I will first speak of what I have done for you."

"I cannot permit it, Madame; on the contrary, speak of yourself, I beseech you!"

"Well, my dear Count, in the first place, give me that talisman which renders one invisible; for on my journey hither, rapid as it was, I thought I recognized one of Monsieur de Richelieu's grays."

"And this gray?"

"Followed my carriage, carrying on his back a courier."

"What do you think of this circumstance, and for what purpose could the duke have caused you to be followed?"

"With the intention of playing me some scurvy trick. Modest as you are, my dear Comte de Fenix, you must be aware that Nature has gifted you with personal advantages enough to make a king jealous of my visits to you, or of yours to me."

"Monsieur de Richelieu cannot be dangerous to you in any way, Madame," replied Balsamo.

"But he was so, my dear Count; he was dangerous before this last event."

Balsamo comprehended that there was a secret concealed beneath these words which Lorenza had not yet revealed to him. He did not therefore venture on the unknown ground, and replied merely by a smile.

"He was indeed," repeated the countess; "and I was near falling a victim to a most skilfully constructed plot, — a plot in which you also had some share, Count."

"I, engaged in a plot against you? Never, Madame!"

"Was it not you who gave the Duc de Richelieu the philtre?"

"What philtre?"

"A draught which causes the most ardent love."

"No, Madame; Monsieur de Richelieu composes those draughts himself, for he has long known the receipt. I merely gave him a simple narcotic."

"Ah! really?"

"Upon my honor!"

"And on what day did Monsieur de Richelieu ask for this narcotic? Remember the date, Count; it is of importance."

"Madame, it was last Saturday, — the day previous to that on which I had the honor of sending you, through Fritz, the note requesting you to meet me at the house of Monsieur de Sartines."

"The eve of that day!" exclaimed the countess. "The eve of the day on which the king was seen going to the little Trianon? Oh! now everything is explained."

"Then, if all is explained, you see I gave only the narcotic."

"Yes, it is the narcotic which saved us."

This time Balsamo waited; he was profoundly ignorant of the subject.

"I am delighted, Madame," he replied, "to have been useful to you, even unintentionally."

"Oh! you are always kindness itself. But you can do more for me than you have ever yet done. Oh, doctor! I have been very ill, politically speaking, and even now I can scarcely believe in my recovery."

"Madame," said Balsamo, "the doctor, since there is a doctor in the case, always requires the details of the illness he is to cure. Will you give me the exact particulars of what you have experienced? — and if possible, do not forget a single symptom."

"Nothing can be more simple, my dear doctor, or dear sorcerer, whichever you prefer. The eve of the day on which this narcotic was used, his Majesty refused to accompany me to Luciennes. He remained, like a deceiver as he is, at Trianon, pretending fatigue; and yet, as I have since learned, he supped at Trianon with the Duc de Richelieu and the Baron de Taverney."

"Ha!"

"Now you understand. At supper the love-draught was given to the king. He was already captivated by Mademoiselle Andrée; it was known that he would not see me the next day; it was therefore with reference to that young lady that the philtre was to operate."

"Well, what happened?"

"Oh! that is difficult to discover positively. The king was seen going in the direction of the offices of Trianon, — that is to say, toward Mademoiselle Andrée's apartment."

"I know where she lives; but what followed?"

"Ah! 'What followed?' Peste, how fast you are, Count. The king cannot be followed without risk when he wishes to conceal himself."

"But, in short?"

"In short, all I can tell you is that his Majesty returned to Trianon through a fearful storm, pale, trembling, and feverish, — almost on the verge of delirium."

"And you think," said Balsamo, smiling, "that it was not the storm alone which alarmed his Majesty?"

"No, for the valet heard him cry several times, 'Dead, dead, dead!'"

"Oh!" said Balsamo.

"It was the narcotic," continued Madame Dubarry. "Nothing alarms the king so much as death, and next to death its semblance. He had found Mademoiselle de Taverney sleeping a strange sleep, and must have thought her dead."

"Yes, yes; dead indeed," said Balsamo, who remembered having fled without awakening Andrée, —"dead, or at least presenting all the appearance of death. Yes, yes, — it must be so. Well, Madame, and what then?"

"No one knows, then, what happened that night, or rather, in the first part of the night. The king, on his return, was attacked by a violent fever and a nervous trembling, which did not leave him until the morning, when it occurred to the dauphiness to open the shutters and show his Majesty a lovely morning, with the sun shining upon merry faces. Then all these unknown visions disappeared with the night which had produced them. At noon the king was better, took some broth, and ate a partridge's wing; and in the evening — "

"And in the evening —?" repeated Balsamo.

"In the evening," continued Madame Dubarry, "his Majesty, who no doubt would not stay at Trianon after his fright, came to see me at Luciennes, where, dear Count, I discovered, upon my word, that Monsieur de Richelieu was almost as great a sorcerer as you are."

The triumphant countenance and graceful but roguish look of the countess reassured Balsamo as to the power the favorite yet exercised over the king. "Then you are satisfied with me, Madame?" he asked.

"Delighted, Count! and when you spoke of impossibilities you could create, you told the exact truth;" and in token of thanks she gave him her soft, white, perfumed hand, which was not so fresh as Lorenza's, but whose warmth had also its own eloquence.

"And now, Count, let us speak of yourself."

Balsamo bowed like a man ready to listen.

"If you have preserved me from a great danger," continued Madame Dubarry, "I think I have also saved you from no inconsiderable peril."

"Me!" said Balsamo, concealing his emotion. "I do not require that to feel grateful to you; but yet, be good enough to inform me what — "

"Yes. The coffer in question — "

"Well, Madame?"

"Contained a multitude of ciphers, which Monsieur de Sartines caused all his clerks to translate. All signed their several translations, executed apart, and all gave the same result. In consequence of this, Monsieur de Sartines arrived at Versailles this morning while I was there, bringing with him all these translations and the dictionary of diplomatic ciphers."

"Ha! — and what did the king say?"

"The king seemed surprised at first, then alarmed. His Majesty easily listens to those who speak to him of danger. Since the stab of Damiens' penknife, there is one word which is ever eagerly hearkened to by Louis XV., — it is, 'Take care!'"

"Then you say that Monsieur de Sartines accused me of plotting?"

"At first Monsieur de Sartines endeavored to make me leave the room; but I refused, declaring that as no one was more attached to his Majesty than myself, no one had a right to make me leave him when danger was in question. Monsieur de Sartines insisted, but I resisted; and the king, smiling and looking at me in a manner I know well, said, 'Let her remain, Sartines; I can refuse her nothing to-day.'

"Then you understand, Count, that as I was present, Monsieur de Sartines, remembering our adieu, so clearly expressed, feared to displease me by attacking you. He therefore spoke of the evil designs of the King of Prussia toward France; of the disposition prevalent to facilitate the march of rebellion by supernatural means. In a word, he accused a great many people, proving always by the papers he held that these persons were guilty."

"Guilty of what?"

"Of what! Count, ought I to disclose secrets of State?"

"Which are our secrets, Madame. Oh, you risk nothing! I think it is my interest not to speak."

"Yes, Count, I know that Monsieur de Sartines wished to prove that a numerous and powerful sect, composed of bold, skilful, resolute agents, were silently undermining the respect due to the king, by spreading certain reports concerning his Majesty."

"What reports?"

"Saying, for instance, that his Majesty was accused of starving his people."

"To which the king replied —"

"As the king always replies, by a joke."

Balsamo breathed again.

"And what was the joke?" he asked.

"'Since I am accused of starving the people,' said he, 'there is only one reply to make to the accusation, — let us feed them.' 'How so, Sire?' said Monsieur de Sartines. 'I will take the charge of feeding all those who spread this report, and moreover will give them safe lodging in my chateau of the Bastille.'"

A slight shudder passed through Balsamo's limbs, but he retained his smiling countenance. "What followed?" he asked.

"Then the king seemed to consult me by a smile. 'Sire,' said I, 'I can never believe that those little black characters which Monsieur de Sartines has brought to you mean that you are a bad king.' Then the lieutenant of police exclaimed loudly. 'Any more,' I added, 'than they prove that your clerks can read.'"

"And what did the king say, Countess?" asked Balsamo.

"That I might be right, but that Monsieur de Sartines was not wrong."

"Well, and then?"

"Then a great many lettres-de-cachet were made out, and I saw that Monsieur de Sartines tried to slip among them one for you; but I stood firm, and arrested him by a single word. 'Monsieur,' I said aloud, and before the king, 'arrest all Paris, if you like, — that is your business; but you had better reflect a little before you lay a finger on one of my friends. If not — ' 'Oh, ho!' said the king, 'she is getting angry; take care, Sartines!' 'But, Sire, the interest of the kingdom — ' 'Oh, you are not a Sully!' said I, crimson with rage; 'and I am not a Gabrielle.' 'Madame, they intend to assassinate the king, as Henri IV. was assassinated!' For the first time the king turned pale, trembled, and put his hand to his head. I feared I was vanquished. 'Sire,' said I, 'you must let Monsieur de Sartines have his own way; for his clerks have no doubt read in these ciphers that I also am conspiring against you;' and I left the room. But, bless me, it was the morning after the philtre, my dear Count! The king preferred my company to that of Monsieur de Sartines, and ran after me. 'Ah, for pity's sake, my dear Countess,' said he, 'pray do not get angry!' 'Then send away that horrid man, Sire; he smells of dungeons.' 'Go, Sartines; off with you!' said the king, shrugging his shoulders. 'And for the future I forbid you, not only to visit me, but even to bow to me,' added I. At this blow our magistrate became alarmed; he approached me, and humbly kissed my hand. 'Well,' said he, 'so be it; let us speak no more of it, fair lady. But you will ruin the State. Since you absolutely insist upon it, your protégé shall be respected by my agents.'"

Balsamo seemed plunged in a deep revery.

"Well," said the countess, "so you do not even thank me for having saved you from the pleasure of lodging in the Bastille, which perhaps might have been unjust, but assuredly no less disagreeable on that account?"

Balsamo made no reply. He drew a small phial, filled with a fluid red as blood, from his pocket. "Hold, Madame!" said he; "for the liberty you have procured for me, I give you twenty years' additional youth!"

The countess slipped the phial into her bosom, and took her leave joyous and triumphant. Balsamo still remained thinking. "They might perhaps have been saved," said he, "but for the coquetry of a woman. This courtesan's little foot dashes them down into the depths of the abyss. Decidedly, God is with us!"

CHAPTER XXXI.

BLOOD.

THE door had no sooner closed upon Madame Dubarry than Balsamo ascended the secret staircase and entered the chamber of furs. The conversation with the countess had been long, and for two reasons he was impatient. The first was the desire to see Lorenza; the second, the fear that she might be fatigued, for in the new life he had given her there was no room for ennui. She might be fatigued, inasmuch as she might pass, as she sometimes did, from the magnetic sleep to ecstasy; and to this ecstatic state always succeeded those nervous crises which prostrated Lorenza's strength, if a new supply of the regenerating fluid did not restore the necessary equilibrium among the various functions of her organization.

Balsamo, then, having entered and closed the door, immediately glanced at the couch where he had left Lorenza. She was no longer there. Only the fine shawl of cashmere embroidered with golden flowers, which had enveloped her like a scarf, was still lying upon the cushions, as an evidence that she had been in the room and had been reclining on them.

Balsamo stood motionless, gazing at the empty sofa. Perhaps Lorenza had felt herself incommoded by a strange odor which seemed to have filled the room since he left it; perhaps, by a mechanical movement, she had usurped some of the functions of actual life, and instinctively changed her place.

Balsamo's first idea was that Lorenza had returned to the laboratory, whither she had accompanied him a short time previously. He entered the laboratory. At the first glance it seemed empty; but in the shadow of the gigantic furnace, or behind the Oriental tapestry, a woman could easily conceal herself. He raised the tapestry, therefore; he made the circuit of the furnace; nowhere could he discover even a trace of Lorenza. There remained only the young girl's chamber, to which she had, no doubt, returned; for this chamber was a prison to her only in her waking state. He hastened to the chamber, and found the secret door closed. This was no proof that Lorenza had not entered. Nothing was more probable, in fact, than that Lorenza, in her lucid sleep, had remembered the mechanism, and remembering it, had obeyed the hallucination of a dream barely effaced from her mind. Balsamo pressed the spring. The chamber was empty, like the laboratory; it did not appear as if Lorenza had even entered it.

Then a heart-rending thought — a thought which, it will be remembered, had already stung his heart — chased away all the suppositions, all the hopes of the happy lover. Lorenza had been playing a part; she must have feigned to sleep in order to banish all distrust, all uneasiness, all watchfulness from her husband's mind; and at the first opportunity had fled again, this time with surer precautions, warned as she had been by a first, or rather by two former experiences.

At this idea Balsamo started up and rang for Fritz. Then, as Fritz, to his impatient mind, seemed to delay, he hastened to meet him, and found him on the secret staircase. "The signora?" said he.

"Well, Master?" said Fritz, seeing by Balsamo's agitation that something extraordinary had taken place.

"Have you seen her?"

"No, Master."

"She has not gone?"

"From where?"

"From this house, to be sure!"

"No one has left the house but the countess, behind whom I have just closed the gate."

Balsamo rushed up the stairs again like a madman. Then he fancied that the giddy young creature, so different in her sleep from what she was when waking, had concealed herself in a moment of childish playfulness; that from the corner where she was hid she was now reading his heart, and amusing herself by terrifying him, in order to reassure him afterward. Then he began a minute search. Not a nook was omitted, not a closet forgotten, not a screen left in its proper place. There was something in this search of Balsamo's like the frantic efforts of a man blinded by passion, alternating with the feeble and tottering gait of a drunkard. He could then only stretch out his arms and cry, "Lorenza, Lorenza!" hoping that the adored creature would rush forth suddenly, and throw herself into his arms with an exclamation of joy. But silence alone, a gloomy and uninterrupted silence, replied to his extravagant thoughts and mad appeals.

In running wildly about, dashing aside the furniture, shouting to the naked walls, calling Lorenza, staring without seeing any object or forming a single coherent thought, Balsamo passed three minutes — that is to say, three centuries — of agony.

He recovered by degrees from this half-insane hallucination, dipped his hand in a vase of iced water, moistened his temples, and pressing one hand in the other, as if to force himself to be cool, he chased back by his iron will the blood which was beating wildly against his brain, with that fatal, incessant, monotonous movement which indicates life when there is merely motion and silence, but which is a sign of death or madness when it becomes tumultuous and perceptible.

"Come!" said he, "let me reason. Lorenza is not here, — no more false pretences with myself. Lorenza is not here; she must be gone, — yes, gone, quite gone!" And he looked around once more, and once more shouted her name. "Gone!" he continued. "In vain Fritz asserts that he has not seen her. She is gone, — gone! Two cases present themselves: Either he has not seen Lorenza, — and, after all, that is possible, for man is liable to error, — or he has seen her, and has been bribed by her. Fritz bribed! Why not? In vain does his past fidelity plead against this supposition. If Lorenza, if love, if science, could so deeply deceive and lie, why should the frail nature of a fallible human being not deceive also? Oh, I will know all! I will know all! Is there not Mademoiselle de Taverney left? Yes, through Andrée I shall know if Fritz has betrayed me, if Lorenza is false! And this time, — oh! this time as love has proved false, as science has proved an error, as fidelity has become a snare, — oh! this time Balsamo will punish without pity, without sparing, like a strong man who revenges himself, who chases pity from his heart, and keeps only pride. Let me see; the first step is to leave this as quickly as possible, not to let Fritz suspect anything, and to fly to Trianon."

Balsamo, seizing his hat, which had rolled on the floor, rushed toward the door. But suddenly he stopped. "Oh!" said he, "before anything else — my God! poor old man, I had forgotten him — I must see Althotas. During my delirium, during this spasm of forced and unnatural love, I have neglected the unfortunate old man; I have been ungrateful and inhuman!"

And, with the feverishness which now animated all his movements, Balsamo approached the spring which put in motion the trap in the ceiling, and the movable scaffold quickly descended. He placed himself upon it, and, aided by the counterpoise, mounted again, still overwhelmed by the anguish of his mind and heart, and without thinking of anything but Lorenza. Scarcely had he attained the level of the floor, when the voice of Althotas struck upon his ear, and roused him from his gloomy revery.

But, to Balsamo's great astonishment, the old man's first words were not reproaches, as he had expected; he was received with an outburst of simple and natural gayety. The pupil looked with an astonished gaze upon his master.

The old man was reclining upon his spring-chair. He breathed noisily and with delight, as if at each inspiration he added a day to his life; his eyes, full of a gloomy fire, but the expression of which was enlivened by the smile upon his lips, were fixed eagerly upon his visitor.

Balsamo summoned up all his strength and collected his ideas, in order to conceal his grief from his master, who had so little indulgence for human weaknesses. During this moment of reflection he felt a strange oppression weigh upon his breast. No doubt the air was vitiated by being too constantly breathed, for a heavy, dull, close, nauseous odor, like the one he had already noticed below, but there in a slighter degree, floated in the air, and like the vapors which rise from lakes and marshes in autumn at sunrise and sunset, had taken substance and rested on the windows.

In this dense and acrid atmosphere Balsamo's heart throbbed, his head felt confused, a vertigo seized upon him, and he felt that respiration and strength were fast failing him. "Master," said he, seeking some object on which to support himself, and endeavoring to dilate his lungs, — "Master, you cannot live here; there is no air."

"You think so?"

"Oh!"

"Nevertheless, I breathe very well in it," replied Althotas, gayly, "and I live as you see!"

"Master, Master!" replied Balsamo, growing more and more giddy, "let me open a window! It rises from the floor like an exhalation of blood!"

"Of blood! Ah! you think so? Of blood?" cried Althotas, bursting into a laugh.

"Oh, yes, yes; I feel the miasma which is exhaled from a newly killed body. I could weigh it, so heavily does it press upon my brain and heart."

"That is it;" said Althotas, with his sardonic laugh, — "that is it; I also perceived it. You have a tender heart and a weak brain, Acharat."

"Master," said Balsamo, pointing with his finger at the old man, — "Master, you have blood upon your hands; Master, there is blood upon this table; there is blood everywhere, even in your eyes, which shine like two torches; Master, the smell which I breathe, and which makes me giddy, which is suffocating me, is the smell of blood!"

"Well, what then?" said Althotas, quickly; "is this the first time in your life that you have smelt it?"

"No."

"Have you never seen me make experiments? Have you never made any yourself?"

"But human blood!" said Balsamo, pressing his hand upon his burning forehead.

"Ah! you have a subtle sense of smell," said Althotas.

"Well, I did not think human blood could be distinguished from that of any other animal."

"Human blood!" muttered Balsamo. And as he reeled backward and felt for some projecting point to support him, he perceived with horror a vast copper basin, the shining sides of which reflected the purple color of the freshly spilled blood. The enormous vase was half-filled.

Balsamo started back, terrified. "Oh, this blood!" he exclaimed; "whence comes this blood?"

Althotas made no reply, but his watchful eyes lost nothing of Balsamo's suspicion, bewilderment, and terror. Suddenly the latter uttered a terrible roar. Then, stooping like some wild beast darting upon its prey, he rushed to a corner of the room and picked up from the floor a silken ribbon embroidered with silver, to which was hanging a long tress of black hair.

After that wild, mournful, terrible cry, a deathlike silence reigned for a moment in the old man's apartment. Balsamo slowly raised the ribbon, shuddered as he examined the tresses which a golden pin fastened to the silk at one end, while, cut off sharply at the other, they seemed like a fringe the end of which had been dipped in a wave of blood, the red and sparkling drops of which were still apparent on the edge.

In proportion as Balsamo raised his hand, it trembled still more. As he looked more intently at the ribbon, his cheeks became more livid. "Whence does this come?" murmured he, in a hollow voice, loud enough, however, for another to hear and to reply to his question.

"That?" asked Althotas.

"Yes, that."

"Well! it is a silken ribbon tying some hair."

"But the hair, — in what is it steeped?"

"You can see, — in blood."

"In what blood?"

"Parbleu! in the blood I wanted for my elixir, — in the blood which you refused me, and which, therefore, I was forced to procure for myself."

"But this hair, these tresses, this ribbon, — from whom did you take them? This is not a child's hair."

"And who told you it was a child I had killed?" asked Althotas, quietly.

"Did you not want the blood of a child for your elixir?" said Balsamo. "Did you not tell me so?"

"Or of a virgin, Acharat, — or of a virgin." And Althotas stretched his long, bony hand from the chair, and took a phial, the contents of which he tasted with delight. Then, in his most natural tone and with his most affectionate smile, "I have to thank you, Acharat," said he; "you were wise and far-sighted in placing that woman beneath my trap, almost within reach of my hand. Humanity has no cause for complaint. The law has nothing to lay hold upon. He, he! — it was not you who gave me the young creature without whom I should have perished. No! I took her. He, he! — thanks, my dear pupil! thanks, my dear Acharat!" And he once more put the phial to his lips.

Balsamo let fall the tress of hair which he held; a horrible light dazzled his eyes. Opposite to him was the old man's table, — a large marble slab always heaped with plants, books, and phials. This table was covered with a long cloth of white damask with dark flowers, on which the lamp of Althotas shed a reddish light, and which displayed an ominous outline which Balsamo had not before remarked. He seized a corner of the cloth and hastily pulled it away. But instantly his hair stood on end; his gaping mouth could not utter the horrible cry which almost suffocated him.

Under this shroud Balsamo had perceived Lorenza's corpse stretched upon the table, her face livid and yet smiling, and her head hanging backward as if dragged down by the weight of her long hair.

A large wound gaped underneath the collar-bone, from which not a single drop of blood escaped. Her hands were rigid, and her eyes closed beneath their purple eyelids.

"Yes, blood! the last three drops of a virgin's blood, — that is what I wanted," said the old man, putting the phial to his lips for the third time.

"Wretch!" thundered Balsamo, whose cry of despair at last burst from each pore, "die, then, for in the last four days she has been my mistress, my love, my wife! You have murdered her in vain! She was not a virgin."

The eyes of Althotas quivered at these words as if an electric shock had made them dance in their orbits; his pupils were fearfully dilated, his toothless gums chattered, the phial fell from his hand upon the floor and broke into a thousand pieces, while he, stupefied, annihilated, struck at once in heart and brain, fell back heavily upon his chair.

Balsamo bent with a sob over Lorenza's body, and pressing his lips to her blood-stained hair, sank senseless on the floor.

CHAPTER XXXII.

DESPAIR.

THE Hours, those mysterious sisters, who cleave the air hand-in-hand with a flight so slow for the wretched, so rapid for the happy, paused in their onward motion, folding their heavy wings over this chamber filled with sighs and groans. Death on one side, agony on the other, and between them despair, — grievous as agony, deep as death.

Balsamo had not uttered a word since the terrible cry which had been wrung from his breast. Since the terrible revelation which had cast down the ferocious joy of Althotas, he had not moved.

As for the hideous old man, thus violently thrown back into life such as God grants to man, he seemed as much bewildered in this new element as the bird struck by a leaden bullet and fallen from the skies into a lake, on whose surface it flutters, unable to employ its wings. The horror expressed in his pale and agonized features revealed the immeasurable extent of his disappointment.

In fact, Althotas no longer even took the trouble to think, since he had seen the goal at which his spirit aimed, and which he had thought firm as a rock, vanish like empty vapor. His deep and silent despair seemed almost like insensibility. To a mind unaccustomed to measure his, it might have seemed an indication of reflection; to Balsamo, who however did not even look upon him, it marked the death-agony of power, of reason, and of life.

Althotas fixed his gaze upon the broken phial, — the image of the nothingness of his hopes. One would have said he counted the thousand scattered fragments, which, in falling, had diminished his life by so many days. One would have said he wished to drink in with his look the precious fluid which was spilled upon the floor, and which for a moment he had believed to be immortality.

At times, also, when the grief of this disenchantment was too poignant, the old man raised his dull eyes to Balsamo, then from Balsamo his glance wandered to Lorenza's corpse. He resembled at these moments those savage animals which the huntsman finds in the morning caught in the trap by the leg, and which he stirs for a long time with his foot without making them turn their heads, but which, when he pricks them with his hunting-knife, or with the bayonet of his fowling-piece, obliquely raise their bloodshot eyes, throwing on him a look of hatred, vengeance, reproach, and surprise.

"Is it possible," said this look, so expressive even in its atony, — "is it credible, that so many misfortunes, so many shocks, should overwhelm me, caused by such an insignificant being as the man I see kneeling there a few yards from me, at the feet of such a vulgar object as that dead woman? Is it not a reversion of Nature, an overturning of science, a cataclysm of reason, that the pupil so gross should have deceived the master so sublime? Is it not monstrous that the grain of sand should have arrested the wheel of the superb chariot, so rapid in its all-powerful, its immortal flight?"

As for Balsamo, stunned, heart-broken, without voice or motion, almost without life, no human thought had yet dawned amid the dark vapors of his brain.

Lorenza, his Lorenza! His wife, his idol, doubly precious to him as his revealing angel and his love, — Lorenza, his delight and his glory, the present and the future, his strength and faith; Lorenza, all he loved, all he wished for, all he looked forward to in this world, — Lorenza was lost to him forever!

He did not weep, he did not groan, he did not even sigh. He hardly had time as yet for astonishment that so frightful a calamity had fallen upon him. He was like those unfortunates whom an inundation seizes in their bed, in the midst of darkness. They dream that the water gains upon them; they awake, they open their eyes and see a roaring billow breaking over their heads, and have not even time to utter a cry in their passage from life to death.

For a long time Balsamo felt himself buried in the deepest abyss of the tomb. In his overwhelming grief, he looked upon what had happened to him as one of the dark dreams which torment the dead in the eternal silent night of the sepulchre. For him there was no more Althotas, — that is to say, no more hate, no more revenge. For him there was no more Lorenza, — that is to say, no more life, no more love. All was sleep, night, nothingness! Thus the minutes glided past, gloomily, silently, heavily, in this chamber where the blood congealed and the lifeless form grew rigid.

Suddenly, amid the death-like silence, a bell sounded three times. Fritz, doubtless, was aware that his master was with Althotas, for the bell sounded in the room itself. But in vain it sounded three time, with an insolently strange noise; the sound died away in space. Balsamo did not raise his head.

In a few moments the same ringing, only louder this time, sounded again; but, like the first, it could not rouse Balsamo from his torpor. Then, at a measured interval, but not so far from the second as that had been from the first, the angry bell a third time made the room resound with multiplied echoes of its wailing and impatient sounds.

Balsamo did not start, but slowly raised his head and interrogated the empty space before him with the cold solemnity of a corpse rising from the tomb. So must Lazarus have looked when the voice of Christ called him three times. The bell continued ringing. Its increasing energy aroused at last the intelligence of Lorenza's lover. He withdrew his hand from that of the corpse. All the heat had left his body, without passing into that of Lorenza.

"Some important news or some great danger," muttered Balsamo to himself. "May it prove a great danger!" And he rose to his feet. "But why should I reply to this summons?" he continued aloud, without heeding the gloomy sound of his words echoing beneath the sombre vault of this funereal chamber; "can anything in this world henceforth interest or alarm me?"

Then, as if in reply, the bell struck its iron tongue so rudely against its brazen sides that the clapper broke and fell upon a glass retort, which flew in pieces with a metallic sound, and scattered its fragments upon the floor. Balsamo resisted no longer; besides, it was important that none, not even Fritz, should come to seek him where he was. He walked, therefore, with steady step to the spring, pressed it, and placed himself upon the trap, which descended slowly and deposited him in the chamber of furs. As he passed the sofa, he brushed against the scarf which had fallen from Lorenza's shoulders when the pitiless old man, impassive as death itself, had carried her off in his arms.

This contact, more living seemingly than Lorenza herself, sent an icy shudder through Balsamo's veins. He took the scarf and kissed it, using it to stifle the cries which burst from his heaving breast. Then he proceeded to open the door of the staircase.

On the topmost steps stood Fritz, all pale and breathless, holding a torch in one hand, and in the other the cord of the bell, which, in his terror and impatience, he continued to pull convulsively. On seeing his master, he uttered a cry of satisfaction, and then a cry of surprise and fear. But Balsamo, ignorant of the cause of this double cry, replied only by a mute interrogation.

Fritz did not speak, but he ventured — he, usually so respectful — to take his master's hand, and led him to the large Venetian mirror that ornamented the mantelpiece at the back of which was the passage into Lorenza's apartment. "Oh, look, your Excellency!" said he, showing him his own image in the glass.

Balsamo shuddered. Then a smile — one of those smiles which spring from infinite and incurable grief, a deathly smile — flitted over his lips. He had understood the cause of Fritz's alarm. Balsamo had grown twenty years older in an hour. There was no more brightness in his eyes, no more color in his cheek; an expression of dulness and stupefaction overspread his features; a bloody foam fringed his lips; a large spot of blood stained the whiteness of his cambric shirt.

Balsamo looked at himself in the glass for a moment without being able to recognize himself, then he determinedly fixed his eyes upon the strange person reflected in the mirror. "Yes, Fritz," said he, "you are right." Then, remarking the anxious look of his faithful servant, "But why did you call me?" he asked.

"Oh! Master, for them."

"For them?"

"Yes."

"Whom do you mean by them?"

"Excellency," whispered Fritz, putting his mouth close to his master's ear, "the Five Masters."

Balsamo shuddered. "All?" he asked.

"Yes, all."

"And they are here?"

"Here."

"Alone?"

"No; each has an armed servant waiting in the court-yard."

"They came together?"

"Yes, Master, together, and they are impatient; that is why I rang so many times and so violently."

Balsamo, without even concealing the spot of blood beneath the folds of his frill, without attempting to repair the disorder of his dress, began to descend the stairs, after having asked Fritz if his guests had installed themselves in the salon or in the great cabinet.

"In the salon, Excellency," replied Fritz, following his master. Then at the foot of the stairs, venturing to stop Balsamo, he asked: "Has your Excellency no orders to give me?"

"None, Fritz."

"Excellency —" stammered Fritz.

"Well?" asked Balsamo, with infinite gentleness.

"Will your Excellency go unarmed?"

"Unarmed? yes."

"Even without your sword?"

"And why should I take my sword, Fritz?"

"I do not know," said the faithful servant, casting down his eyes, "but I thought — I believed — I feared —"

"It is well, Fritz; you may go."

Fritz moved away a few steps in obedience to the order he had received, but returned.

"Did you not hear?" asked Balsamo.

"Excellency, I merely wished to tell you that your double-barrelled pistols are in the ebony case upon the gilt stand."

"Go, I tell you!" replied Balsamo. And he entered the salon.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE JUDGMENT.

Fritz was quite right; Balsamo's guests had not entered the Rue Saint Claude with a pacific display nor with a benevolent exterior. Five horsemen escorted the travelling carriage in which the Masters had come; five men with a haughty and sombre mien, armed to the teeth, had closed the outer gate and were guarding it while appearing to await their masters' return.

A coachman and two footmen on the carriage seat concealed under their overcoats each a small hanger and a musket. It was rather on an expedition than on a visit that so many persons had come to the Rue Saint Claude. And therefore the nocturnal invasion of these terrible men, whom Fritz had recognized, the forcible taking possession of the hôtel, had inspired the German with an unspeakable terror. He had at first attempted to refuse entrance to the whole party, when he had seen the escort through the wicket, and had suspected them to be armed; but the all-powerful signals they had used — that irresistible testimony of the right of the new-comers — had left him no option.

As soon as they were masters of the place, the strangers, like skilful generals, posted themselves at each outlet of the house, taking no pains to dissemble their hostile intentions. The pretended valets in the courtyard and in the passages, the pretended masters in the salon, seemed to Fritz to bode no good; and that was why he had broken the bell.

Balsamo, without displaying any astonishment, without making any preparation, entered the room, which Fritz, to do proper honor to all visitors, had lighted up as usual. He saw, seated in armchairs, the five visitors, of whom not one rose when he entered. He, as master of the house, having looked at them, bowed politely; then only did they rise and gravely return his salute.

Balsamo took a chair in front of them, without noticing or seeming to notice the strange order of their position. In fact, the five armchairs formed a semicircle like those of the ancient tribunals, with a president, supported by two assistants, and with Balsamo's chair placed in front of that of the president, and occupying the place accorded to the accused in a council or prætorium.

Balsamo did not speak first, as in other circumstances he would have done; he looked around without seeing any object clearly, — still affected by a kind of painful drowsiness, which had remained after the shock.

"It seems, Brother, that you have understood our errand," said the president, or rather he who occupied the centre seat; "yet you delayed to come, and we were already deliberating if we should send to seek you."

"I do not understand your errand," said Balsamo, calmly.

"I should not have imagined so, from seeing you take the position and attitude of an accused before us."

"An accused?" stammered Balsamo, vacantly, shrugging his shoulders. "I do not understand you."

"We will soon make you understand us. Not a difficult task, if I may believe your pale cheeks, your vacant eyes, and trembling voice. One would think you did not hear."

"Oh, yes; I hear," replied Balsamo, shaking his head, as if to banish the thoughts which oppressed it.

"Do you remember, Brother," continued the president,

"that in its last communication the superior committee warned you against a treasonable attempt meditated by one of the great ones of the order?"

"Perhaps so — yes — I do not deny it."

"You reply as a disordered and troubled conscience might be expected to do; but rouse yourself. Be not cast down; reply with that clearness and precision which your terrible position requires. Reply to my questions with the certainty that we are open to conviction, for we have neither prejudice nor hatred in this matter. We are the law; it does not pronounce a verdict until the evidence is heard."

Balsamo made no reply.

"I repeat it, Balsamo, and my warning once given, let it be to you like the warning which combatants give to each other before beginning their struggle. I will attack you with just but powerful weapons; defend yourself!"

The assistants, seeing Balsamo's indifference and imperturbable demeanor, looked at each other with astonishment, and then again turned their eyes upon the president.

"You have heard me, Balsamo, have you not?" repeated the latter.

Balsamo made a sign of the head in the affirmative.

"Like a well-meaning and loyal brother, I have warned you, and given you a hint of the aim of my questionings. You are warned, guard yourself; I am about to begin again."

"After this announcement," continued the president, "the association appointed five of its members to watch in Paris the proceedings of the man who was pointed out to us as a traitor. Now our revelations are not subject to error. We gather them, as you yourself know, either from devoted agents, from the aspect of events, or from infallible indications and signs among the mysterious combinations which Nature has as yet revealed to us alone. Now one of us had a vision respecting you; we know that he has never been deceived, we were upon our guard, and watched you."

Balsamo listened without giving the least sign of impatience or even of intelligence. The president continued:

"It was not an easy task to watch a man such as you. You enter everywhere; your mission is to have a footing wherever our enemies have a residence or any power whatever. You have at your disposal all your natural resources — which are immense — and those which the association intrusts to you to make its cause triumphant. For a long time we hovered in a sea of doubt when we saw enemies visit you, such as a Richelieu, a Dubarry, a Rohan. Moreover, at the last assembly in the Rue Plastrière, you made a long speech full of clever paradoxes, which led us to imagine that you were playing a part in flattering and associating with this incorrigible race, which it is our duty to exterminate from the face of the earth. For a long time we respected the mystery of your behavior, hoping for a happy result; but at last the illusion was dispelled."

Balsamo retained his motionless, impassive demeanor, insomuch that the president became impatient.

"Three days ago," said he, "five lettres-de-cachet were issued. They had been demanded from the king by Monsieur de Sartines; they were filled as soon as signed, and the same day were presented to five of our principal agents, our most faithful and devoted brothers, residing in Paris. All five were arrested: two were taken to the Bastille, where they are kept in the most profound secrecy; two are at Vincennes, in the dungeon; one in the most noisome cell in Bicêtre. Did you know this circumstance?"

"No," said Balsamo.

"That is strange, after what we know of your relations with those in power in the kingdom; but there is something stranger still."

Balsamo listened.

"To enable Monsieur de Sartines to arrest these five faithful friends, he must have had the only paper which contains the names of the victims in his possession. This paper was sent to you by the supreme council in 1769; and to you it was assigned to receive the new members, and immediately invest them with the rank which the supreme council assigned them."

Balsamo expressed by a gesture that he did not recollect the circumstance.

"I shall assist your memory. The five persons in question were represented by five Arabic characters; and these characters, in the paper you received, corresponded with the names and ciphers of the new brothers."

"Be it so," said Balsamo.

"You acknowledge it?"

"I acknowledge whatever you please."

The president looked at his assistants, as if to order them to take a note of this confession.

"Well," continued he, "on this paper — the only one, remember, which could have compromised the brothers — there was a sixth name. Do you remember it?"

Balsamo made no reply.

"The name was — the Comte de Fenix."

"Agreed," said Balsamo.

"Then why, — if the names of the five brothers figured in five lettres-de-cachet, — why was yours respected, caressed, and favorably received at court and in the antechambers of ministers? If our brothers merited prison, you merited it also. What have you to reply?"

"Nothing."

"Ah! I can divine your answer. You may say that the police had by private means discovered the names of the obscurer brethren, but that they were obliged to respect yours as an ambassador and a powerful man. You may even say that they did not suspect this name."

"I shall say nothing."

"Your pride outlives your honor. These names the police could have discovered only by reading the confidential note which the supreme council had sent you; and this is the way it was seen. You kept it in a coffer. Is that true?"

"It is."

"One day a woman left your house carrying the coffer under her arm. She was seen by our agents, and followed to the hôtel of the lieutenant of police, in the Faubourg St. Germain. We might have arrested the evil at its source; for if we had stopped the woman and taken the coffer from her, everything would have been safe and sure. But we obeyed the rules of our constitution, which command us to respect the secret means by which some members serve the cause, even when these means have the appearance of treason or imprudence."

Balsamo seemed to approve of this assertion, but with a gesture so little marked, that, had it not been for his previous immobility, it would have been unnoticed.

"This woman reached the lieutenant of police," said the president; "she gave him the coffer, and all was discovered. Is this true?"

"Perfectly true."

The president rose.

"Who was this woman?" he exclaimed, — "beautiful, impassioned, devotedly attached to you body and soul, tenderly loved by you, as spiritual, as subtle, as cunning as one of the angels of darkness who assist man to commit evil! Lorenza Feliciani is your wife, Balsamo!"

Balsamo uttered a groan of despair.

"You are convinced?" said the president.

"Conclude," replied Balsamo.

"I have not yet finished. A quarter of an hour after she had entered the hôtel of the lieutenant of police, you arrived. She had sown the treason; you came to reap the reward. The obedient servant had taken upon herself the perpetration of the crime; you came to add the finishing stroke to the infamous work. Lorenza departed alone. You renounced her, doubtless, and would not compromise yourself by accompanying her; you left triumphantly along with Madame Dubarry, summoned there to receive from your own lips the information you sold her. You entered the carriage with that prostitute, as the boatman entered the boat with the sinner, Mary the Egyptian. You left behind the papers which ruined us with Monsieur de Sartines, but you brought away the coffer which might have ruined you with us. Fortunately we saw you, — God's light is with us when we need it most."

Balsamo bowed without speaking.

"I now conclude," added the president. "Two criminals have been pointed out to the order; a woman, your accomplice, who may be innocent, perhaps, but who, in point of fact, has injured our cause by revealing one of our secrets; and you, the Master, the Great Copt, the enlightened mind, who have had the cowardice to shelter yourself behind this woman, that your treason may be less clearly seen."

Balsamo raised his head, and fixed a look upon the commissioners, burning with all the rage which had smouldered in his breast since the beginning of the interrogation.

"Why do you accuse this woman?" he asked.

"Ah! we know that you will endeavor to defend her;

we know that you love her almost to idolatry, that you prefer her to everything in the world. We know that she is your treasure of science, of happiness, and of fortune; we know that she is more precious to you than all the world beside."

"You know all this?" said Balsamo.

"Yes, we know it; and we shall punish you through her more than through yourself."

"Finish!"

The president rose.

"This is the sentence: Joseph Balsamo is a traitor,—he has broken his oath; but his knowledge is immense, and he is useful to the order. Balsamo must live for the cause he has betrayed. He belongs to his brothers, though he has cast them off."

"Ah, ah!" said Balsamo, gloomily, almost savagely.

"A perpetual prison will protect the association against any renewal of his treachery, at the same time that it will permit the brothers to receive the service from him which it has a right to expect from all its members. As to Lorenza Feliciani, a terrible punishment—"

"Hold!" said Balsamo, with perfect calmness in his voice, "you forget that I did not defend myself; the accused must be heard in his own justification. A word, a single proof, will suffice; wait one moment, and I will bring you the proof I have promised."

The commissioners seemed to deliberate for a moment.

"Ah, you fear lest I should kill myself!" said Balsamo, with a bitter smile. "If that had been my wish, it would have been already done. There is that in this ring which would have killed you all five times over had I opened it. You fear I should escape; let me be guarded if you wish it."

"Go!" said the president.

Balsamo disappeared for a short time. Then he was heard heavily descending the staircase. He entered, bearing the cold, rigid, and discolored body of Lorenza upon his shoulder, her white hand hanging to the ground.

"Here is the woman I adored, who was my treasure, my only happiness, my life! — the woman who, as you say, has betrayed you. Here, take her! God did not wait for you to punish, gentlemen!"

And with a movement quick as lightning he let the corpse glide from his arms, and sent it rolling on the carpet to the feet of the judges, whom her cold hair and the dead and motionless hands touched, to their great horror, while by the light of the lamps they saw the wide gash gaping in her neck, white as a swan's.

"Now pronounce the sentence!" added Balsamo.

The horrified judges uttered a cry, and seized with maddening terror fled in indescribable confusion. Soon their horses were heard neighing and trampling in the courtyard, the outer gate grated on its hinges, and then silence, the solemn silence of the tomb, returned to seat itself beside despair and death.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

DOOM.

WHILE the terrible scene, which we have just described, was taking place between Balsamo and the Five Masters, nothing apparently had changed in the rest of the house. The old man had seen Balsamo enter his apartment and bear away Lorenza's corpse; and this new incident had recalled him to what was passing around him. But when he saw Balsamo take up the dead body and descend with it into the lower rooms, he fancied it was the last and eternal adieu of this man whose heart he had broken, and fear descended on his soul with an overwhelming force, which for him who had done all to avoid death doubled the horror of the grave. Not knowing for what purpose Balsamo had left him, nor whither he was going, he began to call out, "Acharat! Acharat!" It was the name his pupil had borne in childhood, and he hoped it would have retained its influence over the man.

But Balsamo continued to descend. Having touched the floor, he even forgot to make the trap reascend, and disappeared in the corridor.

"Ah!" cried Althotas, "see what man is, — a blind, ungrateful animal! Return, Acharat, return! Ah, you prefer the ridiculous object called a woman to the perfection of humanity which I represent! You prefer a fragment of life to immortality!

"But no!" he exclaimed, after a moment's pause, "the wretch has deceived his master! He has betrayed my confidence like a vile robber; he feared that I should live because I surpass him so much in science; he wanted to inherit the laborious work I had nearly concluded; he laid a trap for me, his master and benefactor! Oh, Acharat!"

And gradually the old man's anger was aroused, his cheeks were dyed with a hectic tinge, his half-closed eyes seemed to glow with the gloomy brightness of those phosphorescent lights which sacrilegious children place in the cavities of a human skull. Then he cried: "Return, Acharat, return! Look to yourself! You know that I have conjurations which evoke fire and raise up supernatural spirits! I have evoked Satan, — him whom the magi called Phegor, in the mountains of Gad, — and Satan was forced to leave his bottomless pit and appear before me! I have conferred with the seven angels who were ministers of God's anger upon the same mountain where Moses received the ten commandments! By my will alone I have kindled the great tripod with its seven flames which Trajan stole from the Jews! Take care, Acharat, take care!"

But there was no reply. Then his brain became more and more clouded. "Do you not see, wretch," said he, in a choking voice, "that death is about to seize me as it would the meanest mortal? Listen, Acharat! you may return; I will do you no harm. Return! I renounce the fire; you need not fear the evil spirit, nor the seven avenging angels. I renounce vengeance, and yet I could strike you with such terror that you would become an idiot and as cold as marble, for I can stop the circulation of the blood. Come back, then, Acharat! I will do you no harm, but on the contrary I can do you much good. Acharat, instead of abandoning me, watch over my life, and you shall have all my treasures and all my secrets. Make me live, Acharat, that I may teach them to you.

See, see!" and with gleaming eyes and trembling fingers he pointed to the numerous objects, papers, and rolls scattered through the vast apartment. Then he waited, collecting all his fast-failing faculties to listen.

"Ah, you come not!" he cried. "You think I shall die thus, and through this murder — for you are murdering me — everything will belong to you. Madman! were you even capable of reading the manuscripts which I alone am able to decipher; were the spirit even to grant you my wisdom for a lifetime of one, two, or three centuries, to make use of the materials I have gathered, — you should not inherit them! No, no, a thousand times no! Return, Acharat, return for a moment, were it only to behold the ruin of this whole house, — were it only to contemplate the beautiful spectacle I am preparing for you! Acharat! Acharat! Acharat!"

There was no answer, for Balsamo was during this time replying to the accusation of the Five Masters by showing them the mutilated body of Lorenza. The cries of the deserted old man grew louder and louder; despair redoubled his strength, and his hoarse yellings, reverberating in the long corridors, spread terror afar, like the roaring of a tiger who has broken his chain or forced the bars of his cage.

"Ah, you do not come!" shrieked Althotas; "you despise me; you calculate upon my weakness! Well, you shall see! Fire! fire! fire!"

He articulated these cries with such vehemence that Balsamo, now freed from his terrified visitors, was roused by them from the depth of his despair. He took Lorenza's corpse in his arms, reascended the staircase, laid the dead body upon the sofa where two hours previously it had reposed in sleep, and mounting upon the trap, he suddenly appeared before Althotas.

"Ah, at last!" cried the old man, with savage joy. "You were afraid; you saw I could revenge myself, and you came! You did well to come, for in another moment I should have set this chamber on fire!"

Balsamo looked at him, shrugged his shoulders slightly, but did not deign to reply.

"I am athirst!" cried Althotas, — "I am athirst! Give me drink, Acharat!"

Balsamo made no reply; he did not move; he looked at the dying man as if he would not lose an atom of his agony.

"Do you hear me?" howled Althotas, — "do you hear me?"

The same silence, the same immobility on the part of the gloomy spectator.

"Do you hear me, Acharat?" vociferated the old man, almost tearing his throat in his efforts to give emphasis to this last burst of rage; "water! give me water!"

Althotas's features were rapidly decomposing. There was no longer fire in his looks, but only an unearthly glare; the blood no longer coursed beneath his sunken and cadaverous cheek; motion and life were almost dead within him. His long sinewy arms, in which he had carried Lorenza like a child, were raised, but inert and powerless as the membranes of a polypus. His fury had worn out the feeble spark which despair had for a moment revived in him.

"Ah!" said he, "ah! you think I do not die quickly enough! You mean to make me die of thirst! You gloat over my treasures and my manuscripts with longing eyes! Ah, you think you have them already! Wait, wait!" And with an expiring effort, Althotas took a small bottle from beneath the cushions of the armchair and uncorked it. At the contact with the air, a liquid flame burst from the glass vessel, and Althotas, like some potent magician, shook this flame around him.

Instantly the manuscripts piled round the old man's armchair, the books scattered over the room, the rolls of paper disinterred with so much trouble from the pyramid of Cheops and the subterranean depths of Herculaneum, took fire with the rapidity of gunpowder. A sheet of flame overspread the marble slab, and seemed to Balsamo's eyes like one of those flaming circles of hell of which Dante sings.

Althotas no doubt expected that Balsamo would rush into the flames to save this valuable inheritance which the old man was annihilating along with himself, but he was mistaken. Balsamo did not stir, but stood calm and isolated upon the trap-door, where the fire could not reach him.

The flames wrapped Althotas in their embrace, but instead of terrifying him, it seemed as if the old man found himself once more in his proper element, and that, as with the salamanders sculptured on our ancient castles, the fire caressed instead of consuming him.

Balsamo still stood gazing at him. The fire had seized upon the woodwork, and completely surrounded the old man; it roared around the feet of the massive oaken chair on which he was seated, and what was most strange, though it was already consuming the lower part of his body he did not seem to feel it.

On the contrary, at the contact with the seemingly purifying element, the dying man's muscles seemed gradually to distend, and an indescribable serenity overspread his features like a mask. Isolated from his body at this last hour, the old prophet on his car of fire seemed ready to wing his way aloft. The mind, all-powerful in its last moments, forgot its attendant matter, and sure of having nothing more to expect below, it stretched ardently upward to those higher spheres to which the fire seemed to bear it.

From this moment the eyes of Althotas, which at the first reflection of the flames seemed to have been reendowed with life, gazed vaguely and abstractedly at some point in space which was neither heaven nor earth; they seemed trying to pierce the horizon. Calm and resigned, analyzing all sensation, listening to all pain, with his last breath on earth the old magician muttered, in a hollow voice, his adieus to power, to life, and hope. "Ah!" said he, "I die without regret. I have possessed everything on earth, and have known all; I have had all power which is granted to a human creature; I had almost reached immortality!"

Balsamo uttered a sardonic laugh, whose gloomy echo arrested the old man's attention. Through the flames which surrounded him as with a veil, he cast a look of savage majesty upon his pupil. "You are right," said he; "one thing I had not foreseen, — God!"

Then, as if this mighty word had uprooted his whole soul, Althotas fell back upon his chair. He had given up to God that last breath which he had hoped to withhold from him.

Balsamo heaved a sigh, and without endeavoring to save anything from the precious pile upon which this second Zoroaster had stretched himself to die, he again descended to Lorenza, and touched the spring of the trap, which readjusted itself in the ceiling, veiling from his sight the immense furnace, which roared like the crater of a volcano.

During the whole night the fire roared above Balsamo's head like a whirlwind, without his making an effort either to extinguish it or to escape. Stretched beside Lorenza's body, he was insensible to all danger. But contrary to his expectations, when the fire had devoured all, and laid bare the vaulted walls of stone, annihilating all the valuable contents, it extinguished itself; and Balsamo heard its last roarings, which, like those of Althotas, gradually died away in plaints and sighs.

CHAPTER XXXV.

PERPLEXITIES.

THE Duc de Richelieu was in his bed-chamber at his house in Versailles, taking his vanilla chocolate in company with Monsieur Rafté who was going over his accounts. The duke, deeply engaged in looking at his face reflected in a mirror a short distance from him, was giving very little attention to the calculations, more or less exact, of his secretary.

Suddenly a noise of creaking shoes in the antechamber gave notice of a visit, and the duke hastily finished his chocolate, looking uneasily toward the door. There were times when Monsieur de Richelieu, like coquettes of advanced age, did not like to receive visitors.

The valet announced Monsieur de Taverney. The duke doubtless was about to send some excuse, which would have put off until another day, or at least until another hour, his friend's visit, but as soon as the door was opened the petulant old man darted into the room, offered while passing by him the end of his finger to the marshal, and hastened to bury himself in an immense easy-chair which groaned under the shock rather than under his weight.

Richelieu saw his friend go by him like one of those fantastic men in whose existence Hoffman has since persuaded us to believe. He heard the creaking of the chair, he heard a heavy sigh, and turning to his guest, "Eh!

Baron," said he, "what is the news? You seem as sad as death."

"Sad," said Taverney, — "sad!"

"Pardieu! that did not seem to me a sigh of joy."

The baron looked at the marshal in a manner which said that while Rafté was present there would be no explanation of the sigh. Rafté understood without taking the trouble to turn around; for he, as well as his master, sometimes looked in mirrors. And he discreetly withdrew. The baron looked after him, and as the door closed behind him, said, "Do not say 'sad,' Duke; say 'anxious,' and mortally anxious."

"Bah!"

"Indeed," cried Taverney, clasping his hands, "I advise you to pretend surprise. For more than a month you have put me off with vague words, such as, 'I have not seen the king,' or again, 'The king has not seen me,' or perhaps, 'The king treats me coolly.' Cordieu! Duke, that is not the way to answer an old friend. A month, — why, that is eternity!"

Richelieu shrugged his shoulders. "What the devil do you want me to say, Baron?" he replied.

"Eh! the truth!"

"Mordieu! I have told you the truth; mordieu! I drum it into your ears, but you will not believe it, that is all."

"What! you would like me to believe that you, duke and peer, a marshal of France, a gentleman of the bed-chamber, do not see the king, — you who go to the levée every morning? Nonsense!"

"I have said so, and I repeat it, although it may not be credible; for three weeks I have been present every day at the levée, — I, duke and peer, marshal of France, gentleman of the bed-chamber!"

"And the king does not speak to you, and you do not speak to the king? And you expect me to swallow such a fib as that?" said Taverney.

"Eh! Baron, my friend, you are getting impertinent; you give me the lie as if we were at least forty years younger and still skilful with the small-sword."

"But I am enraged, Duke."

"Ah, that is another thing; be enraged my dear friend, — I am enraged myself."

"You are enraged?"

"And with reason, as you must admit when I tell you that since that day the king has not looked at me; when I tell you that his Majesty has constantly turned his back on me; that whenever I have smiled pleasantly upon him, the king has responded with a frightful grimace. In short, I am weary of going to Versailles to be mocked at! Come! What would you have me do about it?"

Taverney was fiercely biting his finger-nails during this reply of the marshal. "I do not understand it at all," said he, at last.

"Nor I, Baron."

"Indeed, I suppose the king laughs at these anxieties; for in short — "

"Yes; that is just what I say, Baron, in short — "

"Come, Duke, we must find some way out of this perplexity; we must contrive some skilful plan by which we can reach an explanation of all this."

"Baron, Baron," replied Richelieu; "there is danger in provoking explanations from kings."

"You think so?"

"Yes. Do you want me to tell you something?"

"Speak."

"Well, I suspect something."

"And what?" asked the baron, haughtily.

"Ah! now you are getting angry."

"With reason, it seems to me."

"Then, let us stop talking."

"On the contrary, let us go on; but explain yourself."

"The devil is in you with your explanations. Indeed, it is a monomania; beware of it."

"You are charming, Duke; you see all our plans obstructed, you see an unaccountable delay in the progress of my affairs, and you advise me to wait!"

"What delay? Tell me."

"In the first place, see this."

"A letter?"

"Yes, from my son."

"Ah! The colonel."

"Fine colonel!"

"Good! and what is there new down there?"

"That for nearly a month Philippe has been awaiting at Rheims the appointment promised him by the king; that he has not received this appointment; and that the regiment sets out in two days."

"The devil! The regiment sets out?"

"Yes, for Strasburg."

"So that if Philippe does not receive this commission within two days —"

"Well, in two days Philippe will be here."

"Yes, I understand, — they have forgotten the poor boy; it is often so in the bureaus organized like those of the new minister. Ah! if I had been minister, the appointment would have been sent!"

"Ahem!" said Taverney.

"What do you say?"

"I say that I do not believe a word of it."

"What!"

"If you had been minister, you would have sent Philippe to the five hundred devils."

"Oh!"

"And his father too."

"Oh, oh!"

"And his sister farther still."

"It is pleasant to talk with you, Taverney; you are full of spirit. But let us say no more about it."

"I ask nothing better for my own part; but it will not do for my son, — his position is intolerable. Duke, it is absolutely necessary to see the king."

"Eh! that is all I do, I tell you."

"To speak to him, then."

"Eh! my dear friend, you cannot speak to the king if he will not speak to you."

"Force him."

"Ah! I am not the pope."

"Then," said Taverney, "I am determined to speak to my daughter; for there is something equivocal in all this, Monsieur le Duc."

This word had a magical effect. Richelieu had studied Taverney; he knew him for a roué like Monsieur Lafare or Monsieur de Nocé, friends of his youth, whose reputation was unblemished. He feared the alliance of father and daughter; he feared something, he knew not what, which might disgrace him. "Well, do not be angry," said he; "I will try one more plan. But I must have a pretext."

"You have a pretext."

"What is it?"

"The king has made a promise."

"To whom?"

"To my son. And this promise —"

"Well?"

"He must be reminded of it."

"Indeed, that is an expedient. Have you that letter?"

"Yes."

"Let me have it."

Taverney drew it from his vest pocket and handed it to the duke, urging him to the exercise both of caution and of boldness.

"Fire and water," said Richelieu. "Come, we are talking extravagantly. No matter, the wine is drawn, we must drink."

He rang the bell.

"Bring my clothes and see that the carriage is ready," said the duke. Then turning to Taverney, he said with an uneasy manner, "Will you assist at my toilet, Baron?"

Taverney knew that he would trouble his friend by accepting, and replied, "No, my friend, it is impossible; I must take a turn about the city. Where will you meet me?"

"Why, at the château. It is important that you too should see his Majesty."

"You think so?" said Taverney, delighted.

"I insist upon it; I wish you to see for yourself that what I said is true."

"I do not doubt it; but since you wish —"

"You are very glad to, eh?"

"To be frank, yes."

"Well, in the Glass Gallery at eleven o'clock, while I go in to see his Majesty."

"I will be there; adieu."

"Without ill-will, dear Baron," said Richelieu, who even up to the last moment sought to avoid making an enemy of a man the extent of whose power he did not know.

Taverney got into his carriage and went off, solitary and thoughtful, to take a long drive in the gardens, while Richelieu, left to the care of his valet, made himself young again at his ease, which important business occupied the illustrious hero of Mahon not less than two hours. It was, however, much less time than Taverney in his own mind had allowed him for it; and the baron, on the lookout, saw, at eleven o'clock precisely, the marshal's carriage stop before the entrance of the palace, where the officers in waiting saluted Richelieu, and the ushers conducted him forward.

Taverney's heart beat violently. More slowly than his eager spirit would have urged he repaired to the Glass Gallery, where numerous courtiers, officers bearing petitions, and ambitious lordlings, stood like statues on the slippery floor, — appropriate support for the courtiers of Fortune.

Taverney mingled with the crowd, taking the precaution to place himself in a corner within reach of the marshal when the latter should leave the presence of his Majesty.

"Oh!" muttered he, between his teeth, "that I should be excluded with these country squires and dirty soldiers, — I, who a month ago took supper in private with his Majesty!" And his frowning brow gave expression to more than one infamous suspicion which would have made poor Andrée blush.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE MEMORY OF KINGS.

Richelieu, in fulfilment of his promise, went bravely and placed himself in view of his Majesty just when Monsieur de Condé was handing him his shirt.

The king, on seeing the marshal, turned away with so sudden a movement that the shirt fell to the floor, and the prince drew back in surprise.

"Pardon, my cousin," said Louis XV., to show the prince that there was nothing personal to him in this quick movement. Richelieu was thus apprised that this expression of anger was directed against him. But as if he had come determined to provoke this anger, if it should be necessary, with a view to a serious explanation, he faced about, as at Fontenoy, and placed himself where the king would pass him in going into his cabinet.

The king, no longer seeing the marshal, began to speak freely and graciously; he finished dressing, arranged for a hunt at Marly, and held a long consultation with his cousin about it, — for Messieurs de Condé have always had the reputation of being great sportsmen. But when he was passing into his cabinet after everybody else had gone away, he perceived Richelieu posing with all his grace for the most charming reverence which had been made since that of Lauzun, who, it will be remembered, bowed so finely.

Louis XV. stopped, almost abashed. "Still here, Monsieur de Richelieu?" said he.

"At your Majesty's service; yes, Sire."

"You have not, then, left Versailles?"

"For forty years, Sire, I have seldom gone away, except when in your Majesty's service."

The king stopped in front of the marshal and said, "You want something of me, do you not?"

"I, Sire?" said Richelieu, smiling. "Eh, what should I want?"

"But you pursue me, Duke, morbleu! I perceive it clearly enough."

"Yes, Sire, with my love and my respect. Thanks, Sire."

"Oh! you pretend not to understand me; but you understand me wonderfully well. And I, believe me, Monsieur le Maréchal, have nothing to say to you."

"Nothing, Sire?"

"Absolutely nothing."

Richelieu armed himself with a profound indifference. "Sire," said he, "I have always had the pleasure of believing, in my soul and conscience, that my diligence in the service of the king was disinterested. A great thing to say, Sire, of these forty years of which I have spoken to your Majesty; also, the envious will not say that the king has ever granted me a favor. On that point, fortunately, my reputation is secure."

"Eh, Duke, if you want anything, ask, — but ask quickly."

"Sire, I want absolutely nothing; and for the present I confine myself to begging your Majesty —"

"What?"

"That you will admit to your presence to express his gratitude — "

"Who is it?"

"Sire, one who is under great obligation to the king."

"What do you mean?"

"One, Sire, on whom your Majesty has bestowed a signal honor. Ah! when one has had the honor of sitting at your Majesty's table, when one has enjoyed that graceful conversation, that charming humor which makes your Majesty the most admirable companion, — then, Sire, one never forgets, and he eagerly seeks to continue a custom so delightful."

"Your language is very extravagant, Monsieur de Richelieu."

"Oh, Sire — "

"In short, of whom do you speak?"

"Of my friend Taverney."

"Of your friend?" cried the king.

"Pardon, Sire!"

"Taverney!" replied the king, with an accent of terror which to the duke was very surprising.

"What could you expect, Sire? An old comrade — " he stopped a moment — "a man who served under Villars with me — " He stopped again. "You know, Sire, that in this world we call friends all whom we know; those whom we do not know are our enemies. It is a polite word, which often does not mean anything."

"It is a compromising word, Duke," replied the king, sharply; "it is a word to be used with reserve."

"The utterances of your Majesty are precepts of wisdom. Monsieur de Taverney, then — "

"Monsieur de Taverney is an immoral man."

"Indeed, Sire, on the word of a gentleman, I had mistrusted it myself."

"A man without delicacy, Monsieur le Maréchal."

"As for his delicacy, I will not speak of it before your Majesty. I vouch only for what I know."

"What! you do not vouch for the delicacy of your friend, of an old comrade, of a man who has served with you under Villars, of a man whom you have presented to me, — in short — You know him, however!"

"Him, certainly, Sire; but not his delicacy. Sully told your ancestor, Henri IV., that he had seen his fever go off dressed in a green robe; but I humbly confess, Sire, that I have never known how the delicacy of Taverney was dressed."

"Indeed, Marshal, — it is I who say it, — he is a bad man, who has played a villanous rôle."

"Oh! if your Majesty says so —"

"Yes, Monsieur, I say it."

"Your Majesty relieves my mind by speaking in this way. No, I confess Taverney is not a flower of delicacy; and I have perceived it already. But, Sire, while your Majesty did not deign to tell me your opinion —"

"This is it, Monsieur, I detest him."

"Ah! the judgment is pronounced, Sire. Happily for this unfortunate," continued Richelieu, "a powerful intercessor pleads for him with your Majesty."

"What do you mean?"

"If the father has had the misfortune to displease the king —"

"And very much."

"I do not deny it, Sire."

"What do you say, then?"

"I say that an angel with blue eyes and blond hair —"

"I do not understand you, Duke."

"That may be, Sire."

"I wish to understand you, however, I confess."

"An ordinary person like me, Sire, trembles at the idea of lifting even a corner of the veil which shelters so many charming mysteries of love; but I repeat it, how much indulgence Taverney must owe to the one who mitigates in his favor the royal indignation. Oh, yes; Mademoiselle Andrée must be an angel!"

"Mademoiselle is a little monster physically, as her father is a monster morally!" cried the king.

"Oh!" cried Richelieu, astounded; "are we all mistaken, and this beautiful appearance —"

"Never speak to me of that girl, Duke; it makes me shudder only to think of her."

Richelieu clasped his hands affectedly. "Oh, my God!" said he, "appearances have turned out — Had not your Majesty, the best judge in the kingdom, infallibility itself, assured me of that, how could I believe it? What, Sire, so deformed?"

"More than that, Monsieur; affected with a malady, — a dreadful, lurking malady, Duke. But, for God's sake, not a word more about her, or you will kill me!"

"Oh, Heaven!" cried Richelieu, "I will not open my mouth again on the subject, Sire. To kill your Majesty! — oh, what a sorrow! What a family it is! He must be unhappy, the poor boy!"

"Of whom do you speak to me now?"

"Oh, this time of a faithful, sincere, devoted servant of your Majesty. Oh, Sire, he is a model, and you have judged him correctly. This time, I vouch for it, your favor has been bestowed upon the right person."

"But whom are you talking about, Duke? Finish what you have to say, for I am in a hurry."

"I speak," replied Richelieu, gently, "of the son of the one, and the brother of the other. I speak of Philippe de Taverney, that gallant young man to whom your Majesty has given a regiment."

"I! I have given a regiment to some one?"

"Yes, Sire; a regiment which Philippe de Taverney is still waiting for, it is true, but which you have really given him."

"I?"

"Bless me, I believe so, Sire!"

"You are mad!"

"Oh!"

"I have given nothing at all, Marshal."

"Truly?"

"But what the devil is that to you?"

"But, Sire —"

"Does this affair concern you?"

"Not the least in the world."

"You have perhaps sworn to burn me by a slow fire with this fagot of thorns?"

"What do you mean, Sire? I thought — I see now that I was mistaken — I thought that you had promised — "

"But it is not my business, Duke; I have a minister of war. I never give regiments. A regiment! — a pretty story they have told you! Ah! you are the advocate of this brood? I told you that you did wrong to speak to me; see how you have set all my blood flowing the wrong way."

"Oh, Sire!"

"Yes, the wrong way. Though the Devil be the advocate, I will not submit to this any longer;" and with these words the king turned his back upon the duke, and quite furious, took refuge in his cabinet, leaving Richelieu in the deepest misery.

"Ah! now," muttered the old marshal, "I know where I stand."

And dusting off with his handkerchief the powder which in the heat of the encounter had fallen upon his clothes, Richelieu directed his steps toward the gallery in the corner of which his friend was waiting with burning impatience.

No sooner did the marshal appear than, like a spider pouncing on his prey, the baron ran to get the latest intelligence. With eager eye, his heart in his mouth, his arms extended, he presented himself. "Well! what news?" he asked.

"There is something new, Monsieur," replied Richelieu, straightening himself up, with a scornful curl of the lips and a gesture of contempt; "it is that I beg you never to address me another word."

Taverney looked at the duke with wondering eyes.

"Yes; you have greatly displeased the king," continued Richelieu, "and in displeasing the king, you offend me."

Taverney in his stupefaction stood riveted to the marble floor as if his feet had taken root there.

Richelieu meantime continued on his way. Then arriving at the Glass Gallery, where his valet was in waiting, "To Luciennes!" cried he. And he disappeared.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

ANDRÉE'S SWOONS.

TAVERNEY, when he had come to himself and examined thoroughly this misfortune, as he called it, knew that the moment had come for a serious explanation with the first cause of these great alarms. Consequently, boiling with anger, he directed his steps to the residence of Andrée.

The young girl was giving the last touch to her toilet, raising her rounded arms to fasten behind her ear two rebellious tresses of hair. She heard the step of her father in the antechamber just as, with book under her arm, she was leaving her apartment.

"Ah! good-day, Andrée," said Monsieur de Taverney, "are you going out?"

"Yes, father."

"Alone?"

"As you see."

"Are you, then, still alone?"

"Since the disappearance of Nicole, I have not procured a maid."

"But you cannot dress yourself, Andrée, that will be injurious to you; a woman carelessly dressed has no success at court. I should recommend to you quite another course, Andrée."

"Excuse me, father, but Madame la Dauphine is waiting for me."

"I assure you, Andrée," replied Taverney, getting excited as he went on, "I assure you, Mademoiselle, that with this simplicity you will be ridiculous."

"Father —"

"Ridicule kills everywhere, and especially at court."

"Monsieur, I will think of it. But just now Madame la Dauphine will be pleased to have me dressed less elegantly that I may be more prompt in responding to her summons."

"Go, then, and return, I beg, as soon as you are free; for I wish to talk with you of a serious matter."

"Yes, father," said Andrée, and she tried to go on her way.

The baron gave her a searching look. "Stop, stop," he cried, "you cannot go out so; you have forgotten your rouge, Mademoiselle, you are so pale as to be repulsive."

"I, father?" said Andrée, stopping.

"Why, when you look at yourself in the mirror what do you think? Your cheeks are as white as wax, and you have circles under your eyes. You will frighten people if you go out in that condition, Mademoiselle."

"I have not time to make any change in my toilet, father."

"It is provoking; indeed, it is disgusting!" cried Taverney, shrugging his shoulders; "there is only one such woman in the world, and I have her for a daughter. What a cruel fate! Andrée! Andrée!"

But Andrée was already at the bottom of the stairs. She came back.

"At least," cried Taverney, "say that you are sick; make yourself interesting, mordieu! if you cannot make yourself beautiful!"

"That will be very easy to do, father, and I can truthfully say that I am sick; for I am really suffering at this moment."

"Well," grumbled the baron; "we needed only that, — sick!" Then between his teeth, "Plague take the haughty prudes!" And he returned to his daughter's chamber where he occupied himself in looking carefully for anything which might aid his conjectures and help him form an opinion.

Meantime Andrée crossed the square and walked along by the flower-beds. From time to time she raised her head to breathe more deeply; for the perfume of the newly opened flowers went to her head and made her dizzy. Thus disturbed, almost staggering under the heat of the sun, the young girl arrived, struggling with an unfamiliar sickness, at the antechambers of Trianon, when Madame de Noailles, standing upon the threshold of the cabinet of the dauphiness, gave Andrée to understand with the first words she spoke that it was time for her to arrive and that they were expecting her.

The abbé, reader by appointment to the princess, was taking breakfast with her Royal Highness, who often admitted to such privileges those persons with whom she was intimate. The abbé was praising the excellence of those French rolls which German housekeepers pile up so carefully around a cup of coffee and cream. The abbé was talking instead of reading, and was relating to the dauphiness all the news from Vienna which he had received at the houses of the journalists and diplomatists; for at this period politics were openly discussed, — as freely indeed as in the most secret recesses of government offices; and it was not unusual for the ministry to acquire information which these gentlemen of the Palais-Royal or of the parks of Versailles had divined or perhaps fabricated.

The abbé spoke especially of the recent rumors of a threatened outbreak, occasioned by the high price of grain, which Monsieur de Sartines had quickly suppressed by sending to the Bastille five of the heaviest monopolizers.

Andrée came in. The dauphiness too had her days of caprice and headache; the abbé had interested her; the thought of Andrée's book following his conversation vexed her. Consequently she warned her second reader not to be late again, adding that punctuality, good in itself, was especially so when the occasion called for it.

Andrée, confounded by the reproach and wounded by its injustice, made no reply, although she might have said that she had been detained by her father and forced to come slowly because she was suffering so much. No; troubled and oppressed, she bent her head, and as if she were going to die, closed her eyes and lost her balance. But for the support of Madame de Noailles she would have fallen.

"How awkward your bearing is, Mademoiselle!" muttered Madame Etiquette.

Andrée did not answer.

"But, Duchess, she is sick!" cried the dauphiness, rising to go to Andrée.

"No, no," said Andrée, quickly, her eyes full of tears; "no, your Highness, I am well; or rather I am better."

"But see, she is as white as her handkerchief, Duchess. It is my fault, I scolded her. Poor child, sit down, I wish it."

"Madame —"

"Come, when I command! Give her your folding chair, Abbé."

Andrée sat down, and gradually, under the gentle influence of this kindness, her mind became composed and the color returned to her cheeks.

"Well, Mademoiselle, can you read now?" asked the dauphiness.

"Oh, yes, indeed; I hope so, at least."

And Andrée opened the book at the place where she had left off reading the evening before, and with a voice which she tried to steady, to make her reading as intelligible and agreeable as possible, she began. But she had read hardly two or three pages when the little black letters dancing before her eyes began to go round and round, and finally became illegible.

Andrée grew pale again; cold perspiration rose from her breast to her forehead, and that black circle around the eyes with which Taverney had reproached his daughter so bitterly increased to such a degree that the dauphiness, who had looked up when Andrée stopped reading, cried out, "See, Duchess, indeed this child is very sick; she is fainting."

And the dauphiness herself ran to get a bottle of salts which she made her reader inhale. Thus revived, Andére tried to pick up the book, but the effort was in vain; her hands kept up a nervous trembling which for some time nothing could quiet.

"Most assuredly, Duchess," said the dauphiness, "Andrée is suffering, and she must not aggravate her trouble by staying here."

"Then Mademoiselle must return directly home," said the duchess.

"And why so, Madame?" asked the dauphiness.

"Because," replied the lady of honor, with a low bow, "because the small-pox begins in this way."

"The small-pox?"

"Yes, fainting-fits, swoons, chills."

The abbé thought himself materially concerned in the danger indicated by Madame de Noailles, for he got up, and thanks to the liberty which this indisposition of a woman gave him, he slipped away on tip-toe so quietly that no one noticed his departure.

When Andrée saw herself, so to speak, in the arms of the dauphiness, the shame of having annoyed to this degree so great a princess renewed her strength, or rather her courage. She went to the window to breathe more freely.

"There is no need of going to the window for fresh air, my dear Demoiselle," said Madame la Dauphine; "return home, I will go with you."

"Oh, I assure you, Madame," said Andrée, "that I am quite recovered; I can go alone very well if your Highness will give me permission to retire."

"Yes, yes; and be calm," replied the dauphiness; "you shall not be scolded any more since you are so sensitive, little rogue."

Andrée, touched by this kindness, which seemed like a sister's friendship, kissed the hand of her protectress and left the apartment, while the dauphiness looked after her anxiously. When she was at the foot of the steps, the dauphiness called to her from the window, "Do not go in immediately, Mademoiselle. Walk a little while in the garden; this sunshine will do you good."

"Oh, mon Dieu, Madame! Thanks!" murmured Andrée.

"And please ask the abbé to return; he is taking his botanical course down there in that bed of Holland tulips."

Andrée was obliged to make a detour in order to meet the abbé. She crossed the flower-garden, and went on with bowed head, a little dull still from the effect of the strange dizziness she had suffered with all the morning; she paid no attention to the birds which, startled, flew over the hedges and flower-beds, nor to the bees humming over the thyme and lilacs. She did not even notice, twenty feet from her, two men who were talking together, one of whom followed her with a troubled and anxious gaze.

These two men were Gilbert and Monsieur de Jussieu. The former, leaning upon his spade, was listening to the learned professor, who was explaining the manner of watering delicate plants so that the water would pass into the ground and not remain on the surface. Gilbert seemed to be listening eagerly, and Monsieur de Jussieu saw nothing but what was natural in this ardor for science; for the demonstration was one which drew applause from the benches of students in the public course. Now, for a poor young gardener, was it not an unusual good fortune to receive this lesson of so great a master, given in the very presence of Nature?

"There are here, you see, my child, four kinds of earth," said Monsieur de Jussieu; "and if I chose, I could discover ten others mixed with these four primary ones. But for the inexperienced gardener, the distinction would be a little too fine. The florist must always taste the earth, as the gardener his fruits. You understand me, Gilbert?"

"Yes, Monsieur," answered Gilbert, his eyes staring, his mouth open; for he had seen Andrée, and from the place where he stood he could watch her without letting the professor suspect that he was not religiously listening to and comprehending the demonstration.

"In order to get the taste of the earth," said Monsieur de Jussieu, all the time deceived by the absent-mindedness of Gilbert, "shut up a handful in a sieve, pour some drops of water gently over it, and taste this water when it shall have filtered through the earth into a vessel underneath the sieve. The saline savors, whether acrid or insipid or flavored with certain natural essences, suit wonderfully the juices of the plants which you wish to place in it; for in Nature, says Monsieur Rousseau, your old patron, all is analogy, assimilation, a tendency to homogeneity."

"Oh, my God!" cried Gilbert, extending his arms before him.

"What is the matter?"

"She has fainted, Monsieur, she has fainted!"

"Who, then? Are you mad?"

"She, she!"

"She?"

"Yes," replied Gilbert, eagerly, "a lady;" and his fright and paleness would have betrayed him, as well as the word "she," if Monsieur de Jussieu had not looked up to follow the direction of his hand. In doing this, Monsieur de Jussieu saw, indeed, Andrée, who had dragged herself behind a hedge and fallen prostrate on a bench. There she lay motionless, and at the point of losing consciousness.

It was the hour at which the king made his daily visit to the dauphiness, and crossed the orchard in passing from the great to the little Trianon. He now suddenly appeared. He held a vermilion peach (marvel of precocity), and was asking himself — royal egotist that he was — if it would not tend more to the happiness of France if this peach were enjoyed by him rather than by Madame la Dauphine.

The haste of Monsieur de Jussieu in running to Andrée, whom the king with his feeble sight scarcely saw and did not recognize at all, and the stifled cries of Gilbert which indicated the most profound terror, quickened the step of his Majesty.

"What is the matter? What is it?" demanded Louis XV., approaching the hedge from which only the width of a path separated him.

"The king!" cried Monsieur de Jussieu, supporting the young girl in his arms.

"The king?" murmured Mademoiselle Andrée, fainting away completely.

"But who is it?" repeated Louis XV., — "a woman? What has happened to this woman?"

"Sire, a swoon."

"Ah! let us see," said Louis XV.

"She is unconscious, Sire," added Monsieur de Jussieu, pointing to the young girl lying rigid and motionless upon the bench where he had just placed her.

The king approached, recognized Andrée, and exclaimed, shuddering, "Again! Oh, that is frightful! Those who have such maladies should stay at home. It is not proper to be dying like this all day long in public;" and Louis XV. retraced his steps toward the pavilion of the little Trianon, muttering a thousand things hostile to poor Andrée.

Monsieur de Jussieu, who was ignorant of the antecedents, stood a moment stupefied; then, turning round and seeing Gilbert ten steps off in an attitude of fear and anxiety, "Come here, Gilbert," cried he. "You are strong; you can carry Mademoiselle de Taverney to her apartments."

"I!" cried Gilbert, trembling; "I carry her, — touch her? No, no; she would never pardon me, — no, never!" and he fled distracted, calling for aid.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

DOCTOR LOUIS.

At a short distance from the place where Andrée had fainted two gardeners were working, who ran up on hearing Gilbert's cries, and obedient to the order of Monsieur de Jussieu, bore Andrée to her apartment. Gilbert followed at a distance, with head bowed, and shambling in his gait, like an assassin marching behind the body of his victim.

Monsieur de Jussieu, having reached the principal entrance, relieved the gardeners of their burden. Andrée had just opened her eyes.

The sound of voices and that significant commotion which accompanies every accident, drew Monsieur de Taverney from the apartment; he saw his daughter, tottering still, try to hold herself erect so as to ascend the steps with the help of Monsieur de Jussieu. He ran up, asking like the king, "What is the matter? what is it?"

"Nothing, father," replied Andrée, feebly, — "an ill-turn, a headache."

"Mademoiselle is your daughter?" said Monsieur de Jussieu, saluting the baron.

"Yes, Monsieur."

"I cannot leave her in better hands, then; but in the name of Heaven consult a doctor."

"Oh! it is nothing," said Andrée.

And Taverney repeated, "Certainly, it is nothing."

"I hope so," said Monsieur de Jussieu; "but indeed, Mademoiselle was very pale." And then, having assisted Andrée to the top of the stairs, he took leave. The father and daughter were left alone.

Taverney, who during the absence of Andrée had spent his time profitably in good reflections, took the hand of Andrée, who was still standing, led her to a seat on the sofa, and sat down by her.

"Pardon, Monsieur," said Andrée; "but be so good as to open the window. I need air."

"I wished to talk seriously with you, Andrée, and in this cage they have given you for a dwelling, a breath can be heard on all sides; but no matter, I will speak low." And he opened the window.

Then, reseating himself by the side of his daughter, he said, shaking his head, "It must be confessed that the king who at first displayed so much interest in us does not show much consideration in letting you live in such a den."

"Father," replied Andrée, "there are no accommodations at Trianon; you know that is the great defect of that residence."

"That there should be no accommodations for others," said Taverney, with an insinuating smile, "I can thoroughly understand, my daughter; but as regards yourself, I do not understand it."

"You have too good an opinion of me, Monsieur," replied Andrée, smiling; "and unfortunately everybody does not think as you do."

"All who know you, my daughter, on the contrary, think as I do."

Andrée bowed as she would have done in thanking a stranger; for she began to be uneasy at these compliments from her father.

"And," continued Taverney, in the same insinuating manner, "and — the king knows you, I suppose?" And while speaking, he cast a look upon the young girl of intolerable inquisitiveness.

"Indeed, the king hardly knows me," replied Andrée, very naturally, "and I am of slight importance to him, as I suppose."

These words made the baron start. "Of slight importance!" he cried; "indeed, I do not understand your words, Mademoiselle. Of slight importance! indeed, you set a low value on your person."

Andrée looked at her father in astonishment.

"Yes, yes," continued the baron; "I say it, and I repeat it, you are so modest as to forget personal dignity."

"Oh, Monsieur, you exaggerate; the king has been interested by the misfortunes of our family, it is true; the king has deigned to do something for us; but there are so many unfortunates about his Majesty's throne, so many gifts fall from the royal hand that he would naturally forget us after the bestowal of his favor."

Taverney looked steadily at his daughter, not without a certain admiration of her reserve and impenetrable discretion. "Come," said he, drawing nearer to her, "come, my dear Andrée; your father shall be the first solicitor who addresses you, and in this character I hope that you will not repulse him."

Andrée in her turn looked at her father like a woman asking an explanation.

"Come," continued he, "we beg you, intercede for us, do something for your family —"

"What do you mean? what do you want me to do?" cried Andrée, stupefied by his tone and the import of his word.

"Are you willing, or not, to ask something for me and for your brother? Speak!"

"Monsieur," replied Andrée, "I will do all that you tell me to do; but indeed, do you not fear that we shall seem too avaricious? The king has already given me a necklace worth, you say, more than one hundred thousand francs; his Majesty has besides promised a regiment to my brother. We take you see a considerable part of the gifts of the court."

Taverney could not restrain a burst of harsh and scornful laughter. "So," said he, "you think that is sufficient compensation, Mademoiselle?"

"I know, Monsieur, that your services are of great value," replied Andrée.

"Eh!" cried Taverney, impatient; "who the devil is talking of my services?"

"What are you talking about, then?"

"Indeed, you are playing with me a game of foolish dissembling!"

"Why should I dissemble, mon Dieu?" asked Andrée.

"But I know all, my daughter!"

"You know?"

"All, I tell you."

"All what, Monsieur?" An instinctive blush, born of this gross attack upon the most modest of consciences, mantled the cheeks of Andrée.

The respect of the father for the child arrested Taverney in the rapid flow of his questions. "Well!" said he, "as you please; you wish to play the coy, it appears, the mysterious! So be it. You leave your father and your brother to the obscurity of oblivion. Very well, but mark my words; when one does not have power from the outset, one is liable never to have it at all." And Taverney turned about on his heel.

"I do not understand you, Monsieur," said Andrée.

"Very well, I understand myself," replied Taverney.

"That is not enough when two are talking together."

"Well, I will be more clear. Make use of all the diplomacy with which you are endowed, and which is a virtue of our family, in making, while there is an opportunity, the fortune of your family and your own; and the first time you see the king tell him that your brother is waiting for his appointment, and that you are growing thin in an apartment without air and light, — in a word, do not be so ridiculous as to have too much love or too much disinterestedness."

"But, Monsieur — "

"Say that to the king, this evening, even."

"But where do you wish me to see the king?"

"And add that it is not even suitable for his Majesty to come — "

Just when Taverney, doubtless, by using more explicit terms, was about to rouse the tempest which was quietly gathering in Andrée's breast, and to provoke the explanation which would have solved the mystery, steps were heard on the stairs.

The baron stopped immediately and ran to the baluster to see who was coming to visit his daughter. Andrée was astonished to see her father step aside against the wall. Almost at the same moment the dauphiness, followed by a man dressed in black and leaning on a cane, entered the little apartment.

"Your Highness!" cried Andrée, mustering all her strength to go to meet the dauphiness.

"Yes, little invalid," replied the princess; "I bring you consolation and the doctor. Come, Doctor. Ah! Monsieur de Taverney," continued the princess, recognizing the baron, "your daughter is ill, and you take no care of this child."

"Madame —" stammered Taverney.

"Come, Doctor," said the dauphiness, with that charming kindliness which belonged only to her, — "come, feel this pulse, question these heavy eyes, and tell me what is the matter with my protegée."

"Oh, Madame, Madame, what goodness!" murmured the young girl, "how shall I have courage to receive your Royal Highness?"

"In this poor place, you mean, dear child; so much the worse for me who have given you so wretched an apartment. I will attend to that. Come, my child, give your hand to Monsieur Louis, my physician, and take care; he is a philosopher who divines, as well as a scholar who sees clearly."

Andrée, smiling, held out her hand to the doctor. The latter, a young man still, whose intelligent face expressed all that the dauphiness had said of him, had occupied himself since coming into the room in observing, first the invalid, then the locality, afterward the strange appearance of the father, which indicated annoyance but no anxiety. The scholar was about to see clearly; the philosopher had perhaps already divined.

Doctor Louis studied for a long time the pulse of the young girl and questioned her as to her symptoms.

"Complete distaste for all food," answered Andrée; "sudden twinges of pain, flushes of heat rushing suddenly to the head, spasms, palpitations, fainting-fits."

The doctor grew more and more sober as Andrée went on speaking. He finally relinquished the young girl's hand and looked away.

"Well, Doctor," said the princess to the physician, "quid? as the consulting physicians say. Is the child in danger, and do you condemn her to death?"

The doctor looked at Andrée and watched her a little while longer in silence. "Madame," said he, "this sickness of Mademoiselle is a very natural one."

"And dangerous?"

"No, not usually," replied the doctor, smiling.

"Ah! very well," said the princess, breathing more freely; "do not make her suffer too much."

"Oh, I shall not make her suffer at all, Madame."

"What! you order no prescription?"

"There is absolutely nothing to be done for the sickness of Mademoiselle."

"Really?"

"Nothing, Madame." And the doctor, as if to avoid an explanation, took leave of the princess under the pretext that his patients needed his attention.

"Doctor, Doctor," said the dauphiness, "if what you say is true, I am much more sick than Mademoiselle de Taverney; bring me, then, without fail, when you visit me this evening, the pills you promised me to make me sleep."

"Madame, I will prepare them myself as soon as I reach home." And he went away.

The dauphiness remained with her reader. "Do not be uneasy, my dear Andrée," said she, with a friendly smile; "your sickness need not cause any anxiety, for Doctor Louis goes away without prescribing for you."

"So much the better, Madame," replied Andrée; "for then my service with your Royal Highness need not be interrupted; and I feared that above everything. However, with all due deference to the learned doctor, I am quite ill, Madame, I assure you."

"It cannot, however, be a serious illness, since the doctor makes light of it. Go to sleep then, my child; I will send some one to wait on you, for I see that you are alone. Be so kind as to attend me, Monsieur de Taverney." She gave her hand to Andrée, and went away, having brought consolation to her as she had promised.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

MONSIEUR DE RICHELIEU'S WORD-PLAY.

Monsieur le Duc de Richelieu, as we have seen, proceeded to Luciennes with that rapidity of decision and that sure intelligence which characterized the ambassador at Vienna and the conqueror of Mahon.

He arrived joyous and unconstrained, ascended the stairs like a young man, pulled the ears of Zamore as in the pleasant days of their friendship, and forced, so to speak, the door of that famous boudoir of blue satin where poor Lorenza had seen Madame Dubarry preparing for her journey to the Rue Saint Claude.

The countess, lying upon her sofa, was giving Monsieur d'Aiguillon her orders for the morning. Both turned round on hearing the noise, and were astounded at seeing the marshal.

"Ah, Monsieur le Duc!" cried the countess.

"Ah, my uncle!" said Monsieur d'Aiguillon.

"Eh! yes, Madame; eh! yes, nephew."

"What, it is you?"

"It is I, myself, in person."

"Better late than never," said the countess.

"Madame," said the marshal, "when we grow old we become capricious."

"Which means that you have recovered for Luciennes—"

"A great love which I should not have lost except through caprice. It is just that, and you complete my thought admirably."

"So that you return —"

"So that I return, yes;" said Richelieu, seating himself in the best chair, which he had recognized at the first glance.

"Oh, oh!" said the countess, "there is perhaps some other reason, which you do not give; caprice, — that is not enough for a man like you."

"Countess, it would be wrong in you to press me; I am better than my reputation, and if I return, do you see, it is —"

"It is?" asked the countess.

"With all my heart."

Monsieur d'Aiguillon and the countess burst out laughing.

"How fortunate we are in having a little sense with which to comprehend the sense of which you have so much!" said the countess.

"Why?"

"Yes; I assure you that fools would not understand, would wonder at, and would seek everywhere the reason for your return. Indeed, on the word of a Dubarry, you alone, dear Duke, can make entrances and exits; Molé himself is a wooden actor in comparison with you."

"Then you do not believe that it is the heart which brings me back?" cried Richelieu. "Countess, Countess, take care! you will give me a bad opinion of yourself; oh, do not laugh, nephew, or I shall call you Pierre, and shall not build anything upon you."

"Not even a little ministry?" asked the countess, and for the second time she burst out laughing, with a freedom which she did not try to conceal.

"Good! strike, strike!" said Richelieu, with affected anger, "I will not return the blows; alas, I am too old, I can only defend myself; abuse me, Countess, abuse me!" it is now a pleasure without danger."

"On the contrary, take care, Countess," said D'Aiguillon; "if my uncle talks of his weakness, we are lost. No, Monsieur le Duc, we will not strike you; for feeble as you are, or rather pretend to be, you would return the blows with interest. No, the truth is, we are delighted to see you return to us."

"Yes," said the countess, playfully, "and in honor of your return, we fire off cannon, rockets; and you know, Duke —"

"I know nothing, Madame!" said the marshal, with child-like innocence.

"Well, in fire-works there is always some wig scorched by the sparks, some hat crushed by the rocket-stick."

The duke touched his wig and looked at his hat.

"That is the explanation," said the countess; "but you have come back to us, — that is the principal thing; as for me, I am, as Monsieur d'Aiguillon has told you, in high spirits. Do you know why?"

"Countess, Countess, you are going to say something spiteful!"

"Yes; but it will be the last."

"Well, go on."

"I am in good spirits, Marshal, because your return foretells fine weather."

Richelieu bowed.

"Yes," continued the countess, "you are like those poetic birds which predict a calm. What is the name of those birds, Monsieur d'Aiguillon? — you who write poetry can tell me."

"Halcyons, Madame."

"Precisely. Ah, Marshal, you will not take offence, I hope! I am comparing you to a bird with a pretty name."

"I shall take offence so much the less, Madame," said Richelieu, with a little grimace which expressed satisfaction, — and Richelieu's satisfaction always foreboded some great wickedness, — "I shall take offence so much the less that the comparison is good."

"Do you see?"

"Yes, I bring good news."

"Ah!" said the countess.

"What is it?" asked D'Aiguillon.

"The devil! my dear Duke, you are in great haste," said the countess; "give the marshal time to make it."

"No, the devil take me! I can tell you immediately; it is made already, and even of ancient date."

"Marshal, if you have brought us any old trash —"

"Indeed!" said the marshal; "it is take, or leave, Countess."

"Well, let us take, then."

"It seems, Countess, that the king has fallen into the trap."

"Into the trap?"

"Yes, completely."

"Into what trap?"

"Into the one you have set for him."

"I!" said the countess; "I have set a trap for the king?"

"Parbleu! you know it very well."

"No, upon my word, I do not know it."

"Ah, Countess, it is not kind to mystify me so."

"Truly, Marshal, I do not mean to. Explain yourself, I beg you!"

"Yes, uncle, explain yourself," said D'Aiguillon, who thought he saw some evil design beneath the ambiguous smile of the marshal; "Madame is waiting, and is very anxious."

The old duke turned to his nephew. "Pardieu!" said he, "it would be strange if Madame la Comtesse had not taken you into her confidence, my dear D'Aiguillon. Ah, in that case, it would show that she is even deeper than I supposed."

"Me, uncle?"

"Him?"

"Doubtless you, — doubtless him. Come, Countess, let us be frank. Have you taken him in partnership in your little conspiracies against his Majesty, — this poor duke, who has played so noble a part in them?"

Madame Dubarry blushed. It was so early in the day that she had neither rouge nor patches on her face, therefore blushing was possible; but blushing was also especially dangerous.

"You look at me, both of you, with your great, handsome, wondering eyes," said Richelieu; "do I need, then, to give you information about your own affairs?"

"Yes, Marshal," said, at the same time, the duke and the countess.

"Well, the king has discovered everything, thanks to his wonderful sagacity; and he has taken fright."

"What has he discovered?" asked the countess; "tell us, for indeed, Marshal, I am dying with impatience."

"But your show of friendship with my fine nephew here — "

D'Aiguillon grew pale, and his glance at the countess seemed to say, "Do you see? I was sure there was something malicious coming."

Women are courageous in such an emergency, — much more so than men. The countess returned immediately to the combat. "Duke," said she, "I am afraid of enigmas when you fill the rôle of sphinx; for sooner or later you are sure to get the better of me. Relieve me of anxiety, and if it is a jest indeed, let me judge the evil of it."

"Evil, Countess! it is, on the contrary, excellent!" cried Richelieu; "it is not mine, but yours, be it understood."

"I am not at all concerned in it, Marshal," said Madame Dubarry, biting her lips with an impatience which her little rebellious foot betrayed still more.

"Come, come, no pride, Countess!" continued Richelieu. "It is very good; you have feared that the king would become attached to Mademoiselle de Taverney. Oh, do not dispute it! I have had evidence of it."

"Oh, it is true! I do not deny it."

"Well, fearing this, you wished on your part to pique the king as much as possible."

"I do not deny it. Then?"

"We are coming to it, Countess. But to pique his Majesty, who is rather thick-skinned, you needed a very sharp thorn[1] — Ah, ah, ah! upon my word, what a wretched pun escaped me! Do you understand?" and the marshal begun to laugh, or to feign to laugh, boisterously, so that he could better observe, while convulsed with that hilarity, the very anxious faces of his victims.

"What play of words do you find in that, uncle?" asked D'Aiguillon, the first to recover composure, and affecting simplicity.

"You have not understood it?" said the marshal. "Ah, so much the better! it was execrable. Well, I mean that Madame la Comtesse had wished to make the king jealous, and that she had chosen for this purpose a nobleman who is handsome, witty, — in short, a marvel of Nature."

[1] French: aiguillon.

"Who says that?" cried the countess, furious, like all those who are powerful and in the wrong.

"Who says that? — why, everybody, Madame."

"Everybody means nobody; you know it very well, Duke."

"On the contrary, Madame, everybody means one hundred thousand people in Versailles alone; it means six hundred thousand in Paris; it means twenty-five millions in France; and you will see that I am not counting the Hague, Hamburg, Rotterdam, London, Berlin, where there are as many newspapers, in proportion, as in Paris."

"And they say in Versailles, in Paris, in France, in the Hague, in Hamburg, in Rotterdam, in London, and in Berlin — ?"

"Well, they say that you are the most intellectual, the most charming woman in Europe; they say that, thanks to that ingenious stratagem of seeming to have secured a lover — "

"A lover! and what foundation has that stupid accusation, I should like to know?"

"Accusation! what do you mean, Countess? Admiration! They know there is nothing at the bottom of it all, but they admire the stratagem. Upon what is this admiration, this enthusiasm founded? Why upon your manner, sparkling with intelligence; upon your skilful tact; upon your having pretended, with wonderful art, to remain alone that night, — you know, the night when I was at your house, when the king was at your house, and when Monsieur d'Aiguillon was at your house; the night when I left first, when the king went out second, and Monsieur d'Aiguillon the third — "

"Well! go on."

"Upon your having pretended to stay alone with D'Aiguillon, as if he were your lover; to send him out quietly in the morning from Luciennes, also as if he were your lover; and in such a way that two or three fools, two or three gulls, like me for example, might see it and cry it from the house-tops; so that the king would know, would take fright, and not to lose you would quickly leave the little Taverney."

Madame Dubarry and D'Aiguillon could no longer retain their composure. Richelieu troubled them neither by looks nor by gestures; on the contrary, his snuff-box and his frill seemed to absorb all his attention. "In short," continued the marshal, playing with his shirt-frill, "it appears that the king has certainly left that little one."

"Duke," replied Madame Dubarry, "I declare that I do not comprehend one word of all your imaginings; and I am sure of one thing, that if the king should be questioned about it, he would not comprehend it any better."

"Really!" said the duke.

"Yes, really; and you attribute to me, and the world attributes to me more imaginative faculty than I possess. I have never wished to excite the jealousy of his Majesty by the means of which you speak."

"Countess!"

"I swear it."

"Countess, perfect diplomacy,—and there are no better diplomatists than women, — perfect diplomacy never confesses failure; for there is an anxiom in politics — I know it, who have been an ambassador — which says, 'Do not communicate to any one the means which has brought you success once, for it may bring you success twice.'"

"But Duke —"

"The means has succeeded, that is all, and the king is on very bad terms with the whole Taverney family."

"But, indeed, Duke," cried Madame Dubarry, "you have a way of supposing things peculiar to yourself."

"Ah, you do not believe that the king is at variance with the Taverney family?" said Richelieu, eluding a quarrel.

"That is not what I mean."

Richelieu tried to take the countess's hand. "You are a bird," said he.

"And you are a serpent."

"Ah, very good! I shall be eager to bring you good news again, if I am to be rewarded in this way."

"Be undeceived, uncle," said D'Aiguillon, quickly, who had understood the full significance of this manœuvre of Richelieu, "no one appreciates you so highly as Madame la Comtesse, and she was saying so to me at the very moment when you were announced."

"The fact is," said the marshal, "that I am very fond of my friends; also I wished to be the first to bring you the assurance of your triumph, Countess. Do you know that Taverney the father wished to sell his daughter to the king?"

"It has been done, I think," said Madame Dubarry.

"Oh, Countess, how crafty that man is! it is he who is the serpent. Imagine it! I was lulled to sleep by stories of friendship, of old comradeship in arms. Any one can lead me by my affections. And then to think that this rural Aristides should come straight to Paris to cut the grass under the feet of Jean Dubarry, one of the brightest of men! It has indeed required all my devotion to your interests, Countess, to give me a little good sense and penetration; upon my honor I was blind—"

"And according to what you say it is all over then?" asked Madame Dubarry.

"Oh, entirely, I assure you; I have handled this worthy purveyor so roughly that there is probably no more fight in him, and we are now masters of the situation."

"But the king?"

"The king?"

"Yes."

"Upon three points I have confessed his Majesty."

"The first?"

"The father."

"The second?"

"The daughter."

"And the third?"

"The son. Now his Majesty has condescended to call the father a — pander; his daughter an impertinent minx; and as for the son, his Majesty has not called him anything for he did not even remember him."

"Very well, we are now rid of the whole brood."

"I think so."

"Is it worth while to send that fellow back to his hole?"

"I think not; they are reduced to extremities."

"And you say that this son, to whom the king had promised a regiment — ?"

"Ah, you have a better memory than the king, Countess. It is true that Monsieur Philippe is a very pretty boy, who sends you killing glances. Indeed! he is neither colonel, nor captain, nor brother of the favorite; but at least he has been distinguished by you."

In saying this, the old duke was trying to tear the heart of his nephew with jealousy, but Monsieur d'Aiguillon was not thinking of jealousy; he was trying to account for the actions of the old marshal, and to discover the real motive for his return. After some reflections he hoped that the wind of favor alone had brought Richelieu to Luciennes. He made a sign to Madame Dubarry which the old duke saw in a pier-glass while adjusting his wig, and immediately the countess invited Richelieu to take chocolate with her.

D'Aiguillon took leave with a thousand expressions of endearment for his uncle which were returned by Richelieu. The latter remained alone with the countess before the round table which Zamore had just spread.

The old marshal observed all this manœuvring of the favorite, saying in a low tone, "Were I twenty years younger I should now be looking at the clock, saying, 'In one hour I shall be a minister,' and I should be one. What a foolish thing life is," he continued, all the time speaking to himself; "during the first part one gives the body to the service of the mind; during the second the mind, which alone has survived, becomes the servant of the body; it is absurd."

"Dear Marshal," said the countess, interrupting the private monologue of her guest, "now that we are good friends, and especially since we are by ourselves, tell me why you gave yourself so much trouble to put that little piece of affectation into the king's bed."

"Upon my word, Countess," replied Richelieu, sipping his cup of chocolate, "that is what I asked myself. I know nothing about it."

CHAPTER XL.

THE RETURN.

Monsieur de Richelieu knew what course Philippe would take, and he might safely have foretold his return; for that morning, setting out from Versailles to go to Luciennes, he had met him on the high-road going toward Trianon, and had passed near enough to observe on his countenance indications of sadness and anxiety.

Philippe, indeed, forgotten at Rheims, first having passed through every degree of favor, then of indifference and neglect; Philippe, bored at first by expressions of friendship from the officers jealous of his advancement, then by attentions even from his superiors, — Philippe, in proportion as disfavor had tarnished with its breath this brilliant fortune, was disgusted to see friendships changed to coldness, and civility to rudeness; and in this refined soul, sorrow had taken on the characteristic of regret.

Philippe regretted very much his lieutenantship at Strasburg, now that the dauphiness had come to France; he regretted his good friends, his equals, his comrades; he regretted especially the quiet and pure private life of the paternal home, about the fireside of which La Brie was the grand priest. All trouble found consolation in silence and forgetfulness, — that sleep of active minds; then in the solitude of Taverney, which bore witness to the decay of things as well as to the ruin of individuals, there was something philosophical which spoke powerfully to the heart of the young man.

But Philippe above all felt the loss of his sister's companionship, and of her judgment, always so correct, — a judgment born of elevation of mind rather than the result of experience; for it is a remarkable and conspicuous characteristic of noble souls that they soar involuntarily, and by nature even, above the vulgar crowd, and often on account of their very elevation they escape the wounds and snares which all the cleverness of human insects of a lower order cannot always avoid, however accustomed they may be to manœuvre, to craft, to contemplation of low thoughts.

As soon as Philippe had felt ennui, discouragement overtook him, and the young man became so unhappy in his loneliness that he could not believe that Andrée, that half of himself, could be happy at Versailles when he, the half of Andrée, was suffering so cruelly at Rheims.

He wrote then to the baron the letter with which we are acquainted, and in which he announced his approaching return. This letter surprised no one, especially not the baron; what did surprise him, on the contrary, was that Philippe had had patience to wait so long, when he himself was very anxious, and for fifteen days had begged Richelieu, every time he saw him, to hasten the progress of his affairs.

Philippe, not having received the commission within the time which he himself had allowed, took leave of his officers without seeming to notice their disdain and their sarcasms, — disdains and sarcasms quite hidden under a veil of politeness, which was still at that period a French virtue, and restrained by the natural respect which a brave man always inspires.

Consequently at the hour when he had determined to depart, — the hour up to which he had awaited his commission with more fear than desire for its coming, — he mounted his horse and took the road to Paris.

The three days' journey which he had before him looked very long, and as he proceeded on his way, his father's silence toward him, and especially that of his sister who had promised faithfully to write to him at least twice a week, assumed an ominous significance.

We have said that Philippe arrived about noon at Versailles, just as Monsieur de Richelieu was leaving it. Philippe had travelled a part of the night, having slept only a few hours at Melun; he was so preoccupied that he did not see Monsieur de Richelieu in his carriage, and did not even recognize his livery. He went straight to the railing in the park where he had bade Andrée good-by on the day of his departure, when the young girl without any cause for distress, since the prosperity of the family was at its height, felt mounting to her brain the prophetic sense of an incomprehensible sorrow.

Philippe too on that day had been affected by a superstitious sympathy with Andrée's griefs. But gradually his mind, having recovered command of itself, had shaken off the burden; and by a strange chance it was he, Philippe, who now without reason, after all, returned to the same place a prey to the same fears, and without finding, alas! even in his thought, consolation for that insuperable sadness which having no cause, seemed like a presentiment. When his horse stepped upon the flint stones of the pavement with a clatter of his hoofs, some one, attracted doubtless by this sound, came out from the trimmed hedge-rows. It was Gilbert, holding in his hand a pruning-bill. The gardener recognized his old master. Philippe also recognized Gilbert.

Gilbert had been wandering about in this way for a month; like a soul in trouble, he knew not where to stop. On that day with his usual cleverness in the execution of his designs, he was occupied in choosing points of view in the alleys where he might see the pavilion or the window of Andrée, and have constant watch upon that house without any one noticing his preoccupation, his tremblings, and his sighs.

With pruning-bill in hand to keep up appearances he ran through corpse and parterre, cutting here the branches laden with flowers, under pretext of trimming, stripping there the sound bark from the young lindens, under pretext of getting resin and gum; at the same time ever listening, ever watching, wishing, and regretting.

The young man had become very pale in the month just passed; his face no longer showed signs of youth, except by the strange fire of his eyes and the dead and smooth whiteness of his complexion; but his mouth shrivelled by dissimulation, his furtive glance, the trembling of the muscles of his face, belonged to the more sombre years of ripe age. Gilbert had recognized Philippe, as we have said; and on recognizing him, he turned to go back into the hedge-row. But Philippe rode toward him, crying out, "Gilbert! I say, Gilbert!"

Gilbert's first thought had been to fly; a second more and the vertigo of terror, and that delirium, impossible to explain, which the ancients who sought a cause for everything attributed to the god Pan, would have seized upon him and dragged him like a madman through the paths, through the shrubbery, through the hedge-rows, even into the ponds.

A word full of sweetness spoken by Philippe was fortunately heard and comprehended by the furious fellow.

"You do not recognize me, then, Gilbert?" cried Philippe to him.

Gilbert saw his folly and stopped short. Then he turned back, but slowly and defiantly. "No, Monsieur le Chevalier," said he, trembling, "no, I did not recognize you; I had taken you for one of the guards, and as I am not at my work I had feared to be seen here, and reported for punishment."

Philippe was satisfied with the explanation, jumped to the ground, put the horse's bridle over his arm, and placing the other hand upon Gilbert's shoulder, who shuddered visibly, asked, "What is the matter with you, Gilbert?"

"Nothing, Monsieur," replied the latter.

Philippe smiled sadly. "You do not like us, Gilbert," said he.

The young man shuddered again.

"Yes, I know," continued Philippe; "my father has treated you unjustly and harshly; but I, Gilbert?"

"Oh, you —" murmured the young man.

"I have always loved you, and upheld you."

"It is true."

"So, forget the evil in the good; my sister has also been good to you."

"Oh, no, — as to that, — no," the young man replied quickly, with an incomprehensible expression; for it included an accusation against Andrée, and an excuse for himself. It flashed out like pride, while it groaned like remorse.

"Yes, yes," said Philippe, in his turn, — "yes, I know my sister is rather haughty, but she is good at heart." Then after a pause, — for all this conversation was only delaying an interview which he looked forward to with gloomy forebodings, — "Do you know where my good Andrée is at this moment, Gilbert?"

This name smote Gilbert's heart painfully; he answered, with choking voice, "At home, Monsieur, I suppose, — how should I know?"

"Alone as usual, with nothing to amuse her; poor sister!" interrupted Philippe.

"Alone at this moment, yes, Monsieur, most probably; for since the flight of Nicole — "

"What! Nicole has fled?"

"Yes, Monsieur, with her lover."

"With her lover?"

"At least, I presume so," said Gilbert, who saw that he had gone too far. "That is the common report."

"But, indeed, Gilbert," said Philippe, more and more uneasy, "I do not understand it at all. I have to drag the words from you. Be a little more agreeable. You have intelligence, and you are not wanting in natural distinction of manner; come, do not spoil these good qualities by an affected unsociableness, by a gruffness which suits neither your station in life nor any other."

"But I do not know all that you ask me, Monsieur; and when you think of it, you will see that I cannot know it. I work all day in the gardens, and how can I know what they are doing at the chateau?"

"Gilbert, Gilbert, I thought that you had eyes."

"I?"

"Yes, and that you would take an interest in all who bear my name; for however poor the hospitality of Taverney may have been, you at least shared it."

"So I do take great interest in you, Monsieur Philippe," said Gilbert, in a voice harsh and rough; for the gentleness of Philippe, and another sentiment which the latter could not divine, had softened this fierce heart. "Yes, I like you, you; that is why I will tell you that Mademoiselle, your sister, is very ill."

"Very ill, my sister!" Philippe burst out, — "very ill, my sister, very ill! and you did not tell me so at once!" And immediately abandoning his slow pace for a quicker one, "What is the matter with her, mon Dieu?" he asked.

"Indeed," said Gilbert, "nobody knows."

"But what is it?"

"Only that she has fainted three times to-day in the garden, and that, early as it is, the doctor of Madame la Dauphine has already visited her, and Monsieur le Baron also."

Philippe heard no more. His forebodings were realized; and confronted with real danger, all his courage had returned to him. He left his horse in Gilbert's hands, and went hastily toward the offices.

As for Gilbert, left alone, he quickly led the horse to the stable, and fled, like those wild or noxious birds which can never stay within range of man.

CHAPTER XLI.

BROTHER AND SISTER.

PHILIPPE found his sister lying on the little sofa of which we have already had occasion to speak.

On entering the antechamber, the young man noticed that Andrée had carefully put away all the flowers, — she who was so fond of them; for since her sickness the fragrance of the flowers had caused her unbearable pains, and she attributed to this irritation the affection of the cerebral fibres which had lasted now fifteen days.

When Philippe entered, Andrée was dreaming; her beautiful brow was clouded, and her eyes moved painfully in the sockets. Her hands were hanging down, and although in this situation the blood would naturally flow into them, they were as white as those of a wax statue. So motionless was she that she seemed lifeless, and it was necessary to hear her breathe to be sure that she was not dead.

Philippe had walked more rapidly after Gilbert had told him that his sister was sick, so that he was almost breathless when he arrived at the foot of the stairs. But there he had stopped, his reason had returned to him, and he had ascended the stairs with a calmer step; so that at the threshold of the chamber he trod as noiselessly and quietly as if he had been a sylph. He wished to examine for himself the illness by its symptoms, with the solicitude characteristic of those who love; he knew that Andrée was so tender and good, that, as soon as she had seen him, she would assume such a conduct and demeanor as not to alarm him.

He went in, opening the glass-door so gently that Andrée did not hear him, and was in the middle of the chamber before she suspected anything.

Philippe had therefore time to look at her, to notice that paleness, that immobility, that atony; he perceived the strange expression of those eyes, which were sunk in deep hollows; and more alarmed than he had thought possible, he discovered that the sufferings of his sister were in a great degree of a moral nature. At this sight, which sent a chill to his heart, he could not restrain a movement of fright.

Andrée looked up, and uttering a loud cry she stood up like a dead person come to life, and in her turn panting for breath, ran to throw her arms around her brother's neck.

"You, you, Philippe!" said she; and her strength left her before she could say anything more. Besides, what else could she say, when that was all her thought?

"Yes, yes, I," replied Philippe, embracing and supporting her, for he felt her sinking within his arms, — "I, who come back to find you sick! Ah, poor sister, what is the matter with you?"

Andrée began to laugh in a nervous way, which troubled Philippe instead of reassuring him, as the invalid had wished.

"Do you ask what is the matter with me? Do I look sick, then, Philippe?"

"Oh, yes, Andrée! you are very pale, and you tremble all over."

"But where have you seen that, brother? I am not even indisposed; who has informed you so incorrectly? Who has been so foolish as to frighten you? But indeed

I do not know what you mean; and I am remarkably well, with the exception of some slight attacks of dizziness, which will pass away as they have come."

"Oh! but you are so pale, Andrée —"

"Have I, then, usually much color?"

"No; but you are alive at least, while to-day —"

"It is nothing."

"See, see! your hands, which a little while ago were burning, are now as cold as ice."

"It is very simple, Philippe; when I saw you enter —"

"Well?"

"I felt a lively sensation of joy, and the blood went to my heart, that is all."

"But you totter, Andrée; you lean upon me."

"No; I am embracing you, that is all. Do you not wish me to embrace you, Philippe?"

"Oh, dear Andrée!" and he pressed the young girl to his heart.

At that very moment Andrée felt her strength leaving her again; in vain she tried to cling to her brother's neck, her hand slipped, stiff, and almost inanimate, and she fell back on the sofa whiter than the muslin curtains upon which her charming figure was outlined.

"You see, you see that you deceive me!" cried Philippe. "Ah, dear sister, you are suffering, you are ill!"

"The flask!" murmured Andrée, forcing upon her countenance a smile which he would remember to his dying day. And her feeble glance and hand raised with pain pointed out to Philippe a flask on the little desk by the window.

Philippe rushed toward it, his eyes fixed on his sister whom he dreaded to leave. Then opening the window he came back and put the flask to her pinched nostrils.

"There, there," said she, inhaling in long draughts air and life, "you see that I am revived. Come, do you think I am very sick? Speak."

But Philippe did not even think of answering, he was looking at his sister. Andrée recovered gradually, sat up on the sofa, took in her moist hands Philippe's trembling hand, and her face taking on a softened expression, the blood mounting to her cheeks, she appeared more beautiful than she had ever been.

"Ah, mon Dieu!" said she; "you see, Philippe, it is over, and I am sure that but for the surprise which you gave me with such good intention, the spasms would not have returned, and I should have been well; but coming so suddenly before me, you know, Philippe (before me who love you so much), — you who are the moving power, the substance of my life, — why, that was enough to kill me, even if I had been strong."

"Yes, all that is very pleasant and very charming, Andrée; meanwhile tell me, I beg you, to what you attribute this illness?"

"How do I know, dear? To the return of spring, the season of flowers. You know how nervous I am; yesterday the odor of the Persian lilacs suffocated me. You know what an intoxicating perfume is exhaled from those magnificent plumes which sway in the early breezes of spring; well, yesterday — Oh, mon Dieu! Philippe, I do not wish to think of it, for I am afraid the illness will return."

"Yes, you are right, and perhaps it is that; flowers are very harmful sometimes. Do you remember that when a child at Taverney I took it into my head to surround my bed with a border of cut lilacs? It was pretty as an altar we both said; but the next day I did not wake up, you know, and everybody thought me dead except you, who would not believe that I could leave you without saying good-by; and it was you alone, poor Andrée, — you were six years old at that time, — it was you alone who revived me with kisses and tears."

"And air, Philippe, for it is air that one needs in such a case; I seem never to have air enough."

"Ah, sister, sister! you have forgotten all about that; you have had flowers brought into your chamber!"

"No, Philippe, no indeed; for fifteen days there has not been even an Easter daisy here! What a strange thing! I who loved flowers so much, now hold them in abhorrence. But let us leave the flowers alone. Then I have had headache; Mademoiselle de Taverney has had headache, dear Philippe, and what a fortunate person this Demoiselle de Taverney is! for on account of this headache which brought on a fainting-fit, both the court and the town have become interested in her condition."

"How is that?"

"To be sure, Madame la Dauphine has been kind enough to come to see me, — oh, Philippe what a charming protectress and refined friend Madame la Dauphine is! She has taken care of me, nursed me, brought me her own physician, and when that grave personage, whose decrees are infallible, felt my pulse, looked at my eyes and tongue, — can you think of the latest piece of good fortune which has befallen me?"

"No."

"Well, it was proved unqualifiedly that I was not sick the least in the world; Doctor Louis did not think it necessary to order me a single potion, to prescribe me a single pill, — he who, it is said, every day cuts off arms and legs which it makes one shudder to think of. So, Philippe, you see, I am remarkably well. Now tell me who has frightened you?"

"It is that little fool of a Gilbert, pardieu!"

"Gilbert?" said Andrée, with a gesture of impatience.

"Yes, he told me that you were very sick."

"And you believed that little idiot, that fellow good for nothing but to do or speak evil?"

"Andrée, Andrée!"

"Well?"

"You are growing pale again."

"No, but Gilbert irritates me; it is not enough to meet him in my path, but I must hear him spoken of when he is not by."

"Come, you are going to faint again."

"Oh, yes, yes! mon Dieu! But it is as—" And Andrée's lips blanched, and her voice stopped.

"How strange this is!" murmured Philippe.

Andrée made an effort. "No, it is nothing," she said; "do not mind all my nervous feelings. See, I am standing up, Philippe; if you agree, we will take a walk together, and in ten minutes I shall be well."

"I think you are mistaken as to the amount of your strength, Andrée."

"No; Philippe's return would bring me health even if I were dying. Shall we go out, Philippe?"

"Presently, dear Andrée," said Philippe, gently detaining his sister. "You have not wholly reassured me; wait until you are better."

"Very well."

Andrée fell back upon the sofa, drawing after her Philippe, whose hand she held. "And why," she continued, "do you come so suddenly without sending word?"

"But answer me, dear Andrée, why did you cease writing to me?"

"It is only a few days since I wrote."

"Almost fifteen days, Andrée."

Andrée bowed her head.

"Negligent!" said Philippe, with gentle reproach.

"No, but suffering, Philippe. Well, you are right; my illness began on the day when you ceased to hear from me. Since that day things most dear have wearied me and been distasteful to me."

"And in the midst of all this I am much pleased with what you have just said."

"What have I said?"

"You have said that you were happy; so much the better, for if you are loved and respected, it is not so with me."

"With you?"

"Yes, with me, who was entirely neglected yonder, even by my sister."

"Oh, Philippe!"

"Could you believe, my dear Andrée, that since my departure, which they told me was so urgent, I have heard nothing of that pretended regiment which they sent me to take possession of, and which the king had promised me through Monsieur de Richelieu, through my father, even?"

"Oh, that does not surprise me," said Andrée.

"What! that does not surprise you?"

"No. If you knew, Philippe! Monsieur de Richelieu and my father are unsettled in their relations with each other; they seem like two bodies without souls. I do not understand the life of such people. On a certain morning my father runs over to see his old friend, as he calls him; he sends him to Versailles to see the king; then he returns here to wait, where he occupies himself in putting to me questions I do not understand. The day passes; no news. Then Monsieur de Taverney enters in great anger. The duke drives him away, he says; the duke is a traitor. Whom does the duke betray? I ask you; for I know nothing about it, and I confess I have but little desire to understand it. Monsieur de Taverney lives like a lost soul in purgatory, expecting always something which does not happen, — some one who never comes."

"But the king, Andrée, the king?"

"What, the king?"

"Yes, the king; so well disposed toward us."

Andrée looked timidly about her.

"What?"

"Listen! The king — let us speak low — I think I am very whimsical, Philippe. His Majesty at first seemed to be interested in me as well as in you, our father, and the family; but suddenly this interest grew cold without any apparent reason for it. The fact is, that his Majesty no longer looks at me, — he even turns his back on me, — and only yesterday, when I fainted in the garden —"

"Ah, you see, Gilbert was right; you did faint then, Andrée?"

"That miserable little Monsieur Gilbert had great need to tell you that, indeed; to tell everybody, perhaps! What concern is it of his whether I faint or not? I know very well, dear Philippe," added Andrée, smiling, "that it is not the thing to faint in a royal mansion; but in short, one does not faint for the pleasure of it, and I did not do it on purpose."

"But who blames you for it, dear sister?"

"Eh! why, the king."

"The king?"

"Yes, his Majesty was crossing the orchard on his way from the great Trianon just at the fatal moment. I was stretched quite senseless on a bench, in the arms of good Monsieur de Jussieu, who was helping me the best he could, when the king perceived me. You know, Philippe, fainting does not take away all perception, all consciousness of what is passing around us. Well, when the king saw me, insensible as I seemed, I noticed a knitting of the eyebrows, a look of anger, and I heard some very disagreeable words which the king muttered between his teeth; then his Majesty hurried off, very much scandalized, I suppose, that I allowed myself to be ill on his grounds. Indeed, dear Philippe, it was, however, not my fault."

"Poor dear," said Philippe, pressing affectionately the hands of the young girl, "I believe, indeed, that it was not your fault; and then?"

"That is all, my dear. And Monsieur Gilbert might have spared his remarks."

"Come, now, you are hard on the poor fellow."

"Oh, yes, assume his defence, — a charming subject!"

"Andrée, for mercy's sake, do not be so unkind toward this boy. You wound him; you treat him harshly. I have seen you doing it — Oh, my God! Andrée, what is the matter now?"

This time Andrée had fallen backward upon the sofa-cushions without uttering a word. This time the flask could not revive her; it was necessary to wait until the swoon was over, — until circulation was restored.

"Decidedly," murmured Philippe, "you are suffering, my sister, in a way to frighten persons more courageous than I am where your sufferings are concerned. You may say what you please, but it seems to me that you ought not to treat this indisposition so lightly as you do."

"But, indeed, Philippe, since the doctor has said — "

"The doctor does not convince, and will never convince me; I wish I could have spoken to him myself! Where is this doctor to be found?"

"He comes every day to Trianon."

"But at what hour every day? In the morning?"

"Morning and evening, when he is in attendance."

"Is he on duty now?"

"Yes, my dear, and at seven in the evening precisely, for he is punctual, he will ascend the flight of stairs which leads to the apartments of Madame la Dauphine."

"Well," said Philippe, more composed, "I will wait here."

CHAPTER XLII.

A MISUNDERSTANDING.

PHILIPPE continued the conversation unaffectedly, meanwhile secretly observing his sister, who tried to gain command over herself so that she might not increase his anxiety by new fainting-fits.

Philippe spoke much of his disappointments, of the neglect of the king, the inconstancy of Monsieur de Richelieu. And when he heard seven o'clock strike he went out hastily, troubling himself but little to conceal from Andrée what he was about to do.

He went straight to the pavilion of the queen, and stopped at a distance sufficient to prevent his being questioned by persons in the service of the house, but so near that no one could pass without being recognized by him. In about five minutes he saw approaching him the stately and almost majestic figure of the doctor, whom Andrée had described to him. The day was declining, and in spite of the difficulty he found in reading, the worthy doctor was conning a treatise recently published at Cologne upon the causes and results of paralysis of the stomach. Darkness was gradually settling about him and the doctor was already guessing rather than reading, when a moving and opaque body shut out the last ray of light from the eyes of the learned practitioner. He looked up, saw a man in front of him, and asked, "What is the matter?"

"Pardon, Monsieur!" said Philippe; "have I the honor of speaking to Monsieur le Docteur Louis?"

"Yes, Monsieur," replied the doctor, shutting his book.

"Then a word with you, Monsieur, if you please!" said Philippe.

"Monsieur, excuse me! It is the hour for my visit to Madame la Dauphine, and I must not delay."

"Monsieur," and Philippe, with a gesture of entreaty, placed himself in the doctor's way, — "Monsieur, the person for whom I ask your aid is in the service of Madame la Dauphine. She is very ill, while Madame la Dauphine is not ill at all."

"In the first place, of whom are you speaking?" asked the doctor.

"Of a person to whom you have been introduced by Madame la Dauphine herself."

"Ah, ah! it might perhaps be Mademoiselle de Taverney?"

"Precisely, Monsieur."

"Ah, ah!" said the doctor, looking up quickly to observe the young man.

"You know, then, that she is very sick?"

"Yes; spasms, is it not?"

"Continual swoons, — yes, Monsieur. To-day, in the space of a few hours, she has fainted three or four times in my arms."

"Is the young lady worse?"

"Alas! I do not know; but you understand, Doctor, when one loves — "

"Do you love Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney?"

"Oh, more than my life, Doctor!" Philippe pronounced these words with such exaltation of fraternal love, that Doctor Louis mistook their meaning.

"Ah, ah!" said he, "it is you, then — " The doctor hesitated.

"What do you mean, Monsieur?" asked Philippe.

"It is you, then, who are —"

"Who am what, Monsieur?"

"Eh, parbleu! who are her lover?" said the doctor, impatiently.

Philippe took two steps backward, putting his hand to his brow, and becoming pale as death. "Monsieur," he said, "take care; you insult my sister!"

"Your sister! is Mademoiselle your sister?"

"Yes, Monsieur; and I did not think I had said anything to give rise, on your part, to such a misunderstanding."

"Excuse me, Monsieur! the hour at which you accost me, the air of mystery with which you spoke, — I have thought, I have supposed, that an interest more tender even than that of a brother —"

"Oh, Monsieur! neither lover nor husband will ever love my sister with a more profound love than mine."

"Very well, in that case I understand that my supposition may have wounded you, and I offer you an apology. Will you allow me, Monsieur?" and the doctor made a movement to go on.

"Doctor," insisted Philippe, "I beg of you, do not leave me without having reassured me as to the condition of my sister."

"But what has made you anxious about her condition?"

"Eh, mon Dieu! what I have seen."

"You have seen symptoms which indicate an indisposition —"

"Grave, Doctor!"

"That depends upon circumstances."

"Listen, Doctor! there is in all this something strange; it would seem that you will not, that you dare not, answer me."

"Suppose rather, Monsieur, that in my impatience to go to Madame la Dauphine, who is expecting me — "

"Doctor, Doctor!" said Philippe, passing his hand over his streaming brow, "you have taken me for the lover of Mademoiselle de Taverney?"

"Yes; but you have undeceived me."

"You think, then, that Mademoiselle de Taverney has a lover?"

"Pardon, Monsieur! I am not accountable to you for my thoughts."

"Doctor, have pity on me! Doctor, you have let fall a word which sticks in my heart like the broken blade of a poniard. Doctor, do not try to put me off; as you are a gentleman and a skilful doctor, what is that malady which you could explain to a lover, and which you wish to conceal from a brother? Doctor, I entreat you to answer me!"

"I will ask you, on the contrary, to excuse me from answering you, Monsieur; for by the way in which you question me, I see that you are not master of yourself."

"Oh, my God! you do not know, then, Monsieur, how each one of your words drives me toward that abyss, — the thought of which makes me shudder."

"Monsieur!"

"Doctor!" cried Philippe, with added vehemence, "you have as much as said that you have a terrible secret to disclose to me, to hear which I need all my composure and all my courage."

"But I do not know what supposition is misleading you. I have said nothing of the kind."

"Oh, you do a hundred times more than say! You let me think things. Oh, it is not kindness, Doctor; you see how my heart is consuming before you; you see how I beg, how I entreat. Speak, speak! See, I swear to you, I am composed, I have courage — This sickness, this dishonor perhaps — Oh, my God! you do not contradict me, Doctor, Doctor!"

"Monsieur de Taverney, I have said nothing, neither to Madame la Dauphine, nor to your father, nor to you. Do not ask me anything more."

"Yes, yes; but you see how I interpret your silence. You see how I follow your thought into the dark and fatal road into which it plunges; stop me, at least, if I wander."

"Adieu, Monsieur," replied the doctor, sharply.

"Oh, you will not leave me without saying yes or no? One word, only one, — it is all I ask."

The doctor stopped. "Monsieur," he said, "just now — and that brings us back to the fatal mistake which has wounded you —"

"Do not let us speak of that, Monsieur."

"On the contrary, we will speak of it. Just now — a little late, perhaps — you told me that Mademoiselle de Taverney was your sister; but previously, with an exaltation which caused my error, you had told me that you loved Mademoiselle Andrée more than your life."

"It is true."

"If your love for her is so great, she must love you in return?"

"Oh, Monsieur! Andrée loves me better than she loves any one else."

"Well, then, return to her, question her, Monsieur, — question her on that mystery in which I am obliged to leave you; and if she loves you as you love her, why she will answer your questions. There are many things one will say to a friend which one will not say to a physician; then, perhaps, she will consent to tell you that of which I would not give you even a hint to save a finger of my right hand. Adieu, Monsieur;" and the doctor turned again toward the pavilion.

"Oh, no, no, it is impossible!" cried Philippe, mad with grief, and sobbing at every word; "no, Doctor, I have misunderstood, — you cannot have said that!"

The doctor quietly moved away. Then, with a gentleness full of commiseration, "Do as I have just advised you, Monsieur de Taverney," he said, "and believe me, it is the best thing for you to do."

"Oh, but think of it! To believe you is to renounce the religion of my whole life; it is to accuse an angel; it is to tempt God, Doctor. If you require me to believe it, prove it, at least prove it!"

"Adieu, Monsieur."

"Doctor!" cried Philippe, in despair.

"Take care, if you speak so violently you will make known what I had determined to hide from the world, and had wished to conceal from yourself."

"Yes, yes; you are right, Doctor," said Philippe, in a tone so low that the words died on his lips; "but, indeed, science can make mistakes, and you will confess that you yourself are sometimes mistaken."

"Rarely, Monsieur," replied the doctor; "I am a man of hard study, and my lips never affirm until my eyes and my mind have said, 'I have seen, I know, I am sure.' Yes, certainly, you are right, Monsieur; sometimes I am mistaken, like every fallible creature; but according to all probability, it is not the case now. Come, be calm and let us part."

But Philippe could not be resigned. He put his hand upon the doctor's arm with such an air of entreaty that the latter stopped. "One last, one supreme favor, Monsieur," he said; "you see how agitated I am; I feel something which resembles madness; to know whether I am going to live or die I need confirmation of that reality which threatens me. I am going to my sister; I will not speak to her until you shall have seen her again; consider."

"It is for you to consider, Monsieur; for I have not a word to add to what I have said."

"Monsieur, promise me, — my God! it is a favor that the executioner would not refuse his victim, — promise me to see my sister again after your visit to her Highness Madame la Dauphine; Doctor, in the name of Heaven promise me that!"

"It is useless, Monsieur; but you wish it, it is my duty to do what you desire. On leaving Madame la Dauphine, I will go to see your sister."

"Oh, thanks, thanks! Yes, come, and then you will confess that you have been mistaken."

"I hope so with all my heart, Monsieur; and if I am mistaken, I will confess it joyfully. Adieu." And the doctor, restored to freedom, went away, leaving Philippe upon the esplanade, shaking with fever, covered with cold perspiration, and in his delirium conscious neither of the place where he was nor of the man with whom he had been talking, nor of the secret which he had just learned. For some minutes he gazed without intelligence at the sky, gradually illumined by stars, and at the pavilion, in which lights appeared.

CHAPTER XLIII.

AN INVESTIGATION.

As soon as Philippe had recovered his senses and succeeded in gaining control over his reason, he directed his steps toward the apartment of Andrée. Indeed, as he approached the pavilion the phantom of his unhappiness gradually vanished; it seemed to him a dream and not a reality against which he had for a moment struggled. The farther he went from the doctor the less he believed in his threatening intimations. Surely science was mistaken, and virtue had not failed. Had not the doctor completely justified his incredulity in promising to come to see his sister?

Nevertheless, when Philippe came into Andrée's presence he was so changed, so pale, so haggard, that she was anxious in her turn to know how so terrible a change could have taken place in him in so short a time. One thing alone could have produced such an effect on Philippe.

"Good Heavens! brother," she said, "I am then very ill?"

"Why do you ask?" said Philippe.

"Because the consultation with Doctor Louis has frightened you."

"No, sister," said Philippe; "the doctor is not anxious, and you told me the truth. I could hardly induce him to come again."

"Ah, is he coming again?"

"Yes; that does not vex you, Andrée?" and Philippe, saying this, gazed into the eyes of the young girl.

"No," she replied simply, "and if it reassures you, that is all I ask; but meanwhile tell me, whence comes this frightful paleness which troubles me?"

"Does that disturb you, Andrée?"

"You ask that!"

"You love me, then, tenderly, Andrée?"

"What did you say?" said the young girl.

"I ask, Andrée, if you love me as well now as in our childhood?"

"Oh, Philippe, Philippe!"

"So I am one of the dearest friends you have on earth?"

"Oh, the dearest, the only one!" cried Andrée. Then, blushing and confused, "Excuse me, Philippe," she said, "I forgot —"

"Our father, is it not Andrée?"

"Yes."

Philippe took his sister's hand and looking at her tenderly, said, "Andrée, do not think that I should blame you if your heart held still another affection than the love you have for my father, or that you feel for me." Then sitting down by her, he continued, "You are at an age, Andrée, when the hearts of young girls are stirred more deeply than they themselves wish, and, you know, a divine precept commands women to leave parents and family to follow their husband."

Andrée looked at Philippe for some time as if he had spoken a strange language which she did not understand. Then beginning to laugh, with a simplicity nothing could describe. "My husband!" she said, "did you not say 'husband,' Philippe? Eh, mon Dieu! he is yet unborn, or at least, I do not know him."

Philippe touched by this exclamation of Andrée, evidently so sincere, approached her, and taking her hand between his own he answered, "Before having a husband, my good Andrée, one must have a lover."

Andrée looked at Philippe in amazement, permitting him to gaze into the very depths of her clear, pure eyes in which her whole soul was reflected.

"My sister," said Philippe, "since your birth I have been your best friend, as you have been my only one; I never left you, to go to play with my comrades. We have grown up together, and nothing has disturbed the perfect confidence we placed in each other; why is it that for some time, Andrée, and without apparent reason, you have been so changed toward me?"

"Changed, I! I changed toward you, Philippe? Explain yourself. Indeed, I understand nothing you have said to me since you came in."

"Yes, Andrée," said the young man, pressing her to his breast; "yes, my sweet sister, the passions of youth have succeeded to the affections of childhood, and now that you are in love I am no longer worthy of your confidence."

"My brother, my friend," said Andrée, more and more astonished, "why do you say that? Why do you speak of love to me?"

"Andrée, I come courageously to a question full of dangers for you, full of anguish for me. I know very well that in asking or rather demanding your confidence at this time, I fall in your esteem; but I would rather — and believe me, it is a hard thing to say — I would rather feel that you love me less, than leave you a prey to the misfortunes which threaten you, — terrible misfortunes, Andrée, if you persist in the silence which I deplore, and of which I could not have thought you capable toward a friend, a brother."

"My brother, my friend," said Andrée, "I swear to you I do not understand your reproaches."

"Andrée, do you wish me to make you understand them?"

"Oh, yes; certainly, yes."

"Well, then, if, encouraged by you, I speak too plainly, if I call the color to your brow, and shame to weigh heavily upon your heart, blame only yourself, who have driven me by unjust distrust to search your soul to its very depths that I may tear your secret from it."

"Do so, Philippe, and I assure you that I shall not be offended."

Philippe looked at his sister, then arose and strode about the floor in great agitation. The composure of the young girl contradicted so strangely the charge against her he had made in his own mind, that he did not know what to think.

Andrée on her part contemplated her brother with astonishment, and became chilled in contact with this solemnity, so different from the sweet fraternal authority.

So, before Philippe had recovered speech, Andrée arose in her turn and went to her brother, putting her arm in his. Then looking at him with an unspeakable tenderness, she said, "Listen, Philippe, look at me as I look at you!"

"Oh, I ask nothing better," the young man replied, fixing upon her his burning eyes; "what do you wish to say to me?"

"I wish to say to you, Philippe, that you have always been a little jealous of my friendship; that is natural, since I also have been jealous of your care and affection; well, look at me as I told you to." The young girl smiled. "Do you see a secret in my eyes?" she said.

"Yes, yes, I see one," said Philippe; "Andrée, you love some one."

"I?" cried the young girl, with an expression of astonishment so natural that the most skilful actress could not have imitated the accent of that utterance. And she began to laugh; "I love some one?" she said.

"Some one loves you, then?"

"Upon my word, so much the worse; for as that unknown person has never become acquainted with me and consequently has not declared himself, it is a dead waste of love."

Then, seeing his sister laugh and jest upon this question so frankly, observing the limpid blue of her eyes, the pure frankness of her demeanor, Philippe, who felt Andrée's heart beating against his with so steady a motion, said to himself that a month's absence could not make such a change in the character of an irreproachable young girl; that poor Andrée was suspected unjustly; that science lied. He confessed that there was some excuse for Doctor Louis, who did not know Andrée's purity and exquisite instincts; who thought her like all those girls of noble rank, who, fascinated by unworthy examples, or carried away by the excessive ardor of corrupted blood, surrender themselves without regret, or even without ambition.

A last glance at Andrée persuaded Philippe of the doctor's error; and he was so happy in this conviction, that he embraced his sister like those martyrs who confessed the purity of the Virgin Mary, confessing at the same time their belief in her divine Son.

While in the midst of these changes of feeling Philippe heard on the stairs the step of Doctor Louis, faithful to his promise. Andrée trembled; in her situation, everything was an event. "Who is coming?" she asked.

"Doctor Louis, probably," said Philippe.

At the same moment the door opened, and the doctor, expected so anxiously by Philippe, entered the room. He was, as we have said, one of those grave and honorable men to whom science is a priesthood, and who study its mysteries religiously. Doctor Louis sought to discover the diseases of the soul beneath the diseases of the body, — which was an unusual thing at this very materialistic period. He went on his way boldly, gruffly, paying little attention to rumors and obstacles, economizing his time, that patrimony of laboring men, with an avarice which made him rude toward the idle and garrulous. It was for this reason that he had answered Philippe so roughly at their first interview. He had taken him for one of those fops of the court who come to fawn upon the doctor in order to procure congratulations upon their feats of prowess in love, and who are very proud of having a secret to pay for. But as soon as the medallion was turned, and instead of the fop, more or less amorous, the doctor had seen the dark, threatening face of the brother; as soon as in the place of an offence he had seen a misfortune, — the philosophic practitioner, the man of heart, was moved, and after the last words of Philippe, the doctor had said to himself, "Not only may I have been mistaken, but I sincerely wish I may be." That is the reason why even without the urgent entreaty of Philippe, he would have come to see Andrée, to satisfy himself by a more decisive examination that his first opinion had been correct. He came in, and his first glance, that "taking possession" of the doctor and the observer, was fastened upon Andrée as he entered the antechamber, and he continued to observe her closely. Immediately, either by reason of the excitement caused by the doctor's visit, or by natural accident, Andrée was seized with one of those attacks which had frightened Philippe, and she tottered, putting her handkerchief to her lips with an expression of pain. Philippe, engaged in receiving the doctor, had not seen it. "Doctor," he said, "you are welcome. Pardon the somewhat unceremonious manner in which I addressed you, when I accosted you an hour ago, I was as agitated as I am now calm."

The doctor ceased looking at Andrée for a moment, and his observation fell upon the young man, whose smile and effusiveness he tried to comprehend.

"You have talked with Mademoiselle, your sister, as I advised you?" he asked.

"Yes, Doctor, yes."

"And you are reassured?"

"I have more of heaven and less of hell in my heart."

The doctor took Andrée's hand and felt her pulse a long time.

Philippe looked on as if to say, "Oh, go on, Doctor; I dread no longer the physician's diagnosis. — Well, Monsieur?" he said, with an air of triumph.

"Monsieur le Chevalier," replied Doctor Louis, "will you leave me alone with your sister?" These words, simply pronounced, shook the young man's confidence. "What! do you still wish it?" he said.

The doctor made an affirmative gesture.

"Very well, I will leave you, Monsieur," replied Philippe, with a serious air. Then to his sister, "Andrée," he continued, "be frank and straightforward with the doctor." The young girl shrugged her shoulders as if she could not understand what he meant. Philippe continued, "While he is talking to you about your health I will take a turn in the park. The hour for which I ordered my horse has not arrived, so that I shall be able to see you again before my departure and to have a moment's conversation with you." And he pressed Andrée's hand, trying to smile. But to the young girl the pressure and the smile seemed constrained and convulsive. The doctor accompanied Philippe to the door, which he closed after him. Then he sat down on the same sofa with Andrée.

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE CONSULTATION.

THE most profound silence reigned without. Not a breath of wind was stirring; not a human voice could be heard, — all Nature was still.

Andrée, in the depths of her heart, was considerably disturbed to see the importance which Philippe and the doctor attributed to this disease. She was rather surprised at the return of Doctor Louis, who that very morning had declared her illness insignificant, and remedies useless; but thanks to her deep purity, the resplendent mirror of the soul was not even dulled by the breath of all these different suspicions.

Suddenly the doctor, who had not ceased looking at her, after having turned upon her the full light of the lamp, took her hand like a friend or a confessor, no longer trying the pulse like a doctor. This unexpected movement surprised the susceptible Andrée; she came near drawing away her hand.

"Mademoiselle," asked the doctor, "did you wish to see me, or have I acceded only to the desire of your brother in coming again to see you?"

"Monsieur," replied Andrée, "my brother, on his return, informed me that you would come again to see me; but since you had done me the honor this morning to speak so lightly of my illness, I should not have taken the liberty to trouble you again."

The doctor bowed. "Monsieur, your brother," he replied, "seems very passionate, jealous of his honor and unreasonable in some matters; that is probably the reason why you have declined to open your heart to him."

Andrée looked at the doctor as she had looked at Philippe. "You too, Monsieur?" she said, with a supreme haughtiness.

"Pardon, Mademoiselle, let me finish."

Andrée made a gesture of impatience, or rather of resignation.

"It is, then, natural," continued the doctor, "that, seeing the sorrow and dreading the anger of this young man, you have obstinately kept your secret; but with me, Mademoiselle, — with me, who am, you may well believe, the doctor of souls as well as of bodies; with me, who see and who know; with me, who, consequently, meet you half-way on the difficult road of confession, — with me, I have the right to expect that you will be more frank."

"Monsieur," replied Andrée, "if I had not seen my brother's face grow sad and take on the expression of a real sorrow; if I did not consider your grave appearance and the reputation for seriousness which you enjoy, — I should think that you were putting your heads together to play a comedy at my expense, and to make me take, after a consultation, through the fear which you would have caused me, some very black and bitter medicine."

The doctor frowned. "Mademoiselle," he said, "I beg you, stop short in this course of dissimulation."

"Dissimulation!" cried Andrée.

"Would you prefer to have me call it hypocrisy?"

"But, Monsieur," cried the young girl, "you insult me!"

"Say that I understand you."

"Monsieur!" Andrée rose, but the doctor forced her gently, to sit down again.

"No," he continued, "no, my child, I do not insult you, — I serve you; and if I convince you, I save you! So neither your expression of anger nor your pretended indignation will change my resolution."

"But what do you wish? What do you demand?"

"Confess, or, upon my honor, I shall have a very bad opinion of you."

"Monsieur, once more, my brother is not here to defend me, and I say that you insult me, that I do not understand, and that I demand a clear and complete explanation in regard to this pretended disease."

"For the last time, Mademoiselle," replied the astonished doctor, "will you not spare me the pain of making you blush?"

"I do not understand! I do not understand! I do not understand!" Andrée exclaimed three times, with flashing eyes, which questioned, defied, and almost threatened.

"Well, I understand about you, Mademoiselle; you doubt science, and you hope to conceal your condition from the world. But, be undeceived, with one single word I will humble all your pride, — you are enceinte!"

Andrée uttered a terrible cry, and fell back on the sofa. This cry was followed by the sound of a door opened with violence, and Philippe bounded into the middle of the room, sword in hand, with blood-shot eyes and trembling lips. "Scoundrel!" he said to the doctor, "you lie!"

The doctor turned slowly toward the young man without letting go the scarcely beating pulse of Andrée. "I have said what I have said, Monsieur," he replied, "and the fear of your sword, naked or sheathed, will not make me say what is not true."

"Doctor!" murmured Philippe, letting his sword fall.

"You wished me to verify by a second trial my first examination; I have done so. Now that certainty is established, nothing can destroy my faith in it. I regret it extremely, young man; for you have inspired me as much with sympathy as this young girl has inspired me with aversion, through her persistence in falsehood."

Philippe started, but Andrée was motionless.

"I am a family man, Monsieur," continued the doctor, "and I understand how much you must suffer. I offer you my services, then, and I promise secrecy. My word is sacred, Monsieur, and everybody will tell you that I think more of my word than of my life."

"Oh! but, Monsieur, it is impossible!"

"I do not know whether it is impossible; but it is true. Adieu, Monsieur de Taverney." And the doctor turned away with the same steady and slow step, looking affectionately at the young man, who was writhing with pain, and who, as soon as the door was shut, sank overcome with grief into a chair two steps from Andrée.

The doctor having gone, Philippe arose, shut the doors of the corridor and of the chamber, closed the windows, and approaching Andrée, who was astonished to see him making these inauspicious preparations, "You have deceived me in a stupid and cowardly manner," he said, folding his arms, — "cowardly, because I am your brother, because I was so weak as to love you, to prefer you to all, to esteem you above all, and because this confidence on my part ought at least to call forth your own, even if affection could not inspire it; stupidly, because now the infamous secret which dishonors us is in the power of a third person; because in spite of your secrecy it may have been seen by others; because, in short, if you had confessed your situation to me at first, I might have saved you from shame, if not through affection for you, at least for my own sake; for indeed I should save myself in saving you. See, now, the full measure of your guilt. Your honor, so long as you are not married, is shared by all those whose name you bear, — that is to say, whose name you soil. Now, then, I am no longer your brother, since you have denied me that right; now, I am a man interested in wresting from you by all possible means the whole secret, so that from this confession may spring forth for myself some reparation. I come, then, to you full of anger and resolution, and I say to you, Since you have been coward enough to trust in a lie, you will be punished as cowards are punished. Confess, then, your crime, or — "

"Threats!" cried the proud Andrée, — "threats to a woman!" and she arose pale and threatening herself.

"Yes, threats, — not to a woman, but to a creature without honesty, without honor."

"Threats!" continued Andrée, gradually becoming exasperated, — "threats to me, who know nothing, who understand nothing, who regard you all as bloodthirsty lunatics, conspiring together to kill me with grief, if not with shame!"

"Well, yes!" cried Philippe; "die, then! die, then, unless you confess, — die this instant! God judges you, and I will strike you;" and the young man took up, convulsively, his sword, and quick as lightning placed the point at his sister's breast.

"Well, well, kill me!" she cried, without showing fear of the light which flashed from the blade, without trying to avoid the pain of the wound; and she threw herself forward, full of grief and madness, and her movement was so quick that the sword would have pierced her breast if it had not been for the sudden terror of Philippe, and the sight of drops of blood which stained the muslin thrown around his sister's neck. The young man had lost his strength and his anger; he started back, dropped his sword, and falling on his knees, sobbing, he put his arms around the body of the young girl.

"Andrée! Andrée!" he cried, "no, no! it is I who will die! You love me no longer, you know me no more; I have nothing more to do in this world. Oh, you love some one so much, Andrée, that you prefer death to confiding in me! Oh, Andrée, you shall not die! it is I who will die;" and he attempted to escape, but already Andrée had put both arms about his neck, beside herself, covering him with kisses, bathing him with tears.

"No, no," she said; "you were right at first. Kill me, Philippe, for they say that I am guilty. But you, so noble, so pure, so good, — you whom no one accuses, live and pity me instead of cursing me."

"Well, sister," replied the young man, "in the name of Heaven, in the name of our former friendship, come, fear nothing, neither for yourself nor for him whom you love; he, whoever he may be, shall be sacred to me, were he my greatest enemy, were he the vilest of men. But I have no enemy, Andrée; and you are so noble in heart and thought that your lover must be well chosen. Well, I will go to find him, I will call him brother. You say nothing; do you mean that marriage between you and him is impossible? Well, so be it! I will be resigned; I will keep all my grief to myself; I will stifle this imperious voice of honor which demands blood. I ask you nothing, not even the name of this man. You have loved this man, therefore he is dear to me — Only, let us leave France, let us go together. The king has given you a valuable present, they say; well, we will sell it; we will send half of the money to our father; then with the other half we will live unknown. I will be all to you, Andrée; you shall be all to me. I love no one; you see that I am devoted to you, Andrée; you see what I am doing; you see that you can rely on my friendship, — come, will you refuse me still your confidence, after what I have just said to you? Come, come, will you not call me your brother?"

Andrée had listened in silence to what the distracted young man had said. The beating of her heart alone gave sign of life; her look alone indicated reason.

"Philippe," she said, after a long silence, "you thought that I loved you no longer, poor brother! you thought that I loved another man; you thought that I had forgotten the law of honor, — I, who am a girl of noble birth, and who understand all the duties that word imposes upon me! My dear, I forgive you. Yes, yes; in vain have you believed me base; in vain have you called me cowardly. Yes, yes, I forgive you; but I will not forgive you if you believe me so impious, so vile as to swear falsely to you. I swear to you, Philippe, by the God who hears me, by the soul of my mother, — which has not sufficiently protected me, alas! as it would seem, — I swear to you by my ardent love for you, that never a thought of love has distracted my reason; that never has a man said to me, 'I love you;' that never have lips kissed my hand; that I am pure in mind, virgin in desire as on the day of my birth. Now, Philippe, God has my soul, take you my body in your hands."

"It is well," said Philippe, after a long silence, — "it is well, Andrée, I thank you. Now I see clearly into the very depths of your heart. Yes, you are pure, innocent, dear victim; but there are magic drinks, poisoned philtres; some one has set for you an infamous trap; some one has taken from you in your sleep that which living no one could have torn from you but with your life. You have fallen into some snare, Andrée; but now we are united, consequently we are strong. You trust to me the care of your honor and of your vengeance, do you not?"

"Oh, yes, yes!" said Andrée, quickly, with bitter emphasis; "yes, for if you avenge me it will be for a crime."

"Well," continued Philippe, "aid me, support me.

Let us search together; let us go back hour by hour over the past days; let us follow the helpful thread of memory, and at the first clew — "

"Oh, I wish it! I wish it!" said Andrée; "let us search."

"Well, have you noticed any one following you, watching you?"

"No."

"No one has written to you?"

"No one."

"No man has told you he loved you?"

"No one."

"Women have a remarkable instinct in this respect; have you ever noticed that any one — desired you?"

"I have never noticed anything of the kind."

"Dear sister, search the circumstances of your life, its inmost details."

"Lead me."

"Have you walked out alone?"

"Never, that I can remember, except to go to see Madame la Dauphine."

"When you went off into the park, into the woods?"

"Nicole always accompanied me."

"Speaking of Nicole, she has left you?"

"Yes."

"On what day?"

"The very day of your departure, I think."

"She was a girl of questionable conduct; do you know the particulars of her flight? Think carefully."

"I only know that she went off with her lover."

"What were your last relations with that girl?"

"Oh, at nine o'clock, she came as usual into my chamber, undressed me, prepared my glass of water, and went out."

"You did not notice whether she mixed any cordial with the water?"

"No; besides, that circumstance would have had no importance, for I remember that at the moment when I lifted the glass to my lips, I experienced a very strange sensation."

"What was it like?"

"Like that I experienced one day at Taverney."

"At Taverney?"

"Yes, when that stranger was passing by."

"What stranger?"

"Comte de Balsamo."

"Comte de Balsamo? And what was this sensation?"

"Oh, something like vertigo, like dizziness; then the loss of all my faculties."

"And you felt this impression at Taverney, you say?"

"Yes."

"Under what circumstances?"

"I was at my piano; I felt myself fainting; I looked before me and saw the count in a mirror. From that moment I remember nothing more, except that when I awoke I was still at the piano, and could not judge of the length of my sleep."

"It is the only time, you say, that you experienced this singular sensation?"

"Once more, on the day or rather the night of the fire-works. I was dragged along by all that crowd, upon the point of being crushed, destroyed; I collected all my strength for the struggle; all at once my arms relaxed, a cloud enveloped my eyes, but through this cloud I had yet time to see this very man."

"The Comte de Balsamo?"

"Yes."

"And you went to sleep?"

"I went to sleep or fainted, I cannot tell which. You know how he carried me away, and brought me back to my father."

"Yes, yes; and that night, — the night that Nicole went away, — did you see him then?"

"No; but I experienced all the symptoms which gave notice of his presence, — the same strange sensations, the same nervous dizziness, the same torpor, the same sleep."

"The same sleep?"

"Yes, sleep full of vertigos, of which, even while struggling against them, I recognized the mysterious source before yielding to them."

"Great God!" cried Philippe, "go on, go on!"

"I went to sleep."

"Where did you go to sleep?"

"On my own bed, I am very sure; and I awoke upon the floor, alone, ill, and cold, like a dead person reviving. I called Nicole, but in vain; Nicole had disappeared."

"And this sleep was the very same?"

"Yes."

"The same as at Taverney? the same as on the day of the fêtes?"

"Yes, yes."

"On the first two occasions, just before yielding, you had seen this Joseph Balsamo, this Comte de Fenix?"

"Certainly."

"And the third time you did not see him?"

"No," said Andrée, in terror, for she was beginning to understand; "no, but I felt his presence."

"Good!" cried Philippe; "now be calm, be reassured, be proud, Andrée; I know the secret. Thanks, dear sister, thanks. Ah, we are saved!"

Philippe took Andrée in his arms, pressed her tenderly to his heart, and carried away by the ardor of resolution, he rushed out of the chamber. He ran to the stables, saddled his horse himself, mounted, and took in great haste the road to Paris.

CHAPTER XLV.

GILBERT'S CONSCIENCE.

All the scenes we have just described had reacted powerfully upon Gilbert. The unbalanced susceptibility of this young man was subjected to too severe a trial when, in the depths of the retreat which he knew how to choose in some corner of the garden, he saw every day the progress of the disease on the face and in the step of Andrée; when this paleness, which had alarmed him the evening before, seemed next morning more marked, more accusing, when Mademoiselle de Taverney came to the window to get the first rays of the morning sun. Then whoever had observed Gilbert's countenance would not have failed to see in it the characteristic traits of that remorse which was so favorite a subject among the painters of antiquity.

Gilbert loved the beauty of Andrée, and on the other hand he detested it. This brilliant beauty, together with so many other superior qualities, established a new barrier between him and the young girl; nevertheless this beauty seemed to him a new treasure to acquire. Such were the reasons for his love and his hatred, for his desire and his scorn.

But from the time this beauty was sullied, when the features of Andrée became a revelation of suffering, or of shame, from the time when there was danger for Andrée, danger for Gilbert, the situation was wholly changed; and Gilbert, who was eminently just, changed also his point of view. We may say that his first feeling was one of profound sadness. He did not see without pain the beauty of his mistress fading, her health failing. He experienced the delicious pride of pitying this haughty woman, so scornful of him, and of rewarding her with compassion for all the opprobrium with which she had loaded him. But we do not on this account make excuses for Gilbert; pride justifies nothing. But pride was not the only sentiment in Gilbert's heart as he confronted the situation. Every time that Mademoiselle de Taverney, pale, suffering, and sad, appeared like a phantom before the eyes of Gilbert, his heart leaped, the blood rushed to his eyelids like tears, and he pressed to his breast a clinched, restless hand, which tried to restrain the revolt of his conscience.

"It is through me that she is ruined," he murmured. And devouring her with a furious look, he fled, imagining all the time that he could see her, and hear her groan. Then he was stricken to the heart; he experienced one of the most poignant griefs that it is given man to endure. His furious love needed consolation, and he would have given his life for the right to fall on his knees before Andrée, to take her by the hand, to console her, to recall her to life when she fainted. His powerlessness on these occasions was a punishment, the tortures of which no words could describe. Gilbert bore this martyrdom three days. On the first day he had noticed the change, the slow working of the disease on Andrée. Where others saw nothing more, he, the cause, could divine and interpret everything. More than this, he had studied the course of the disease, and could calculate the exact time of the crisis.

The day of Andrée's faintings he spent in frights, in agitations, in wild wanderings, — certain indications of a conscience at bay. All this running to and fro, these airs of indifference or of eagerness, these bursts of sympathy or sarcasm which Gilbert considered as master-pieces of dissimulation and manœuvring, any clerk of the Châtelet, any turnkey of Saint Lazare, would have analyzed and interpreted them as the ferret of Monsieur de Sartines could read and write cipher. One does not see a man run until out of breath, then suddenly stop, utter inarticulate sounds, then plunge all at once into the deepest silence, — one does not see him listening in the air for indifferent sounds, or dig the ground, or hack the trees in rage, without thinking of him, "This man is mad if he is not a culprit."

After this first outpouring of remorse, Gilbert had passed from commiseration to egotism. He knew that these frequent fainting fits of Andrée would not seem to be a natural sickness, and that the cause of them would be sought for. Gilbert called to mind the brutal and expeditious forms of justice which investigate all kinds of crime which can dishonor a man, — the questions, the examinations, the analogies unknown to the rest of the world, and which put on the track of a criminal those blood-hounds, full of resources, called "instructors." Now that which Gilbert had done seemed to him morally most odious and deserving of punishment. He began to tremble in earnest; for he feared that the sickness of Andrée would instigate inquiry. From this time, like the criminal in that celebrated picture pursued by the angel of remorse by the pale light of his touch, Gilbert cast frightened looks upon everything about him. He was suspicious; every sound and every whisper, every word he heard spoken, however insignificant, seemed to have some relation to Mademoiselle de Taverney or to himself.

He had seen Monsieur de Richelieu go to see the king, and Monsieur de Taverney go to visit his daughter. The house had seemed on that day to take on an extraordinary air of conspiracy and suspicion. It was still worse when he saw the doctor and the dauphiness repair to the chamber of Andrée. Gilbert was one of those sceptics who believe in nothing. He cared but little for God or man; but he recognized science as God, and proclaimed its omnipotence. There were times when Gilbert would have denied the infallible knowledge of the Supreme Being; he never doubted the clear-sightedness of the doctor. The visit of Doctor Louis to Andrée was a blow from which Gilbert's mind could not recover. He ran to his chamber, leaving his work, and deaf as a statue to the injunctions of his superiors. There, behind the poor curtain which he had improvised to conceal his spyings, he addressed all his faculties to the endeavor to discover a word or movement which would reveal the result of the consultation. Nothing happened which would enlighten him. Only once he saw the face of the dauphiness, who came to the window to take a look at the court, which she had probably never seen. He could also see Doctor Louis opening this window to let into the chamber a little fresh air. As for hearing what was said, or seeing the expression of their faces, that was not possible; a thick curtain, which served as a blind, fell the whole length of the window, and prevented all knowledge of what was going on.

The anguish of the young man may be conceived. The doctor, with the eye of a lynx, had solved the mystery. Disclosure must follow, not immediately, as Gilbert justly supposed, on account of the presence of the dauphiness, but very soon between the father and daughter when the two visitors should leave them alone. Gilbert, wild with grief and impatience, beat his head against the walls of his garret. He saw Monsieur de Taverney go out with Madame la Dauphine, the doctor having already left.

"The explanation will take place between Monsieur de Taverney and the dauphiness," he said to himself.

The baron did not return to his daughter; Andrée remained alone in her room, and spent the time upon her sofa, partly in reading, interrupted by spasms and headaches, partly in meditations so deep and quiet that Gilbert took them for trances, when he caught a glimpse of her through an opening in the curtain which the wind occasionally blew aside.

Andrée, worn out with pain and emotion, went to sleep. Gilbert profited by this respite to go out of doors to gather rumors and comments. This time was precious to him, because it gave him opportunity for reflection. The danger was so imminent that he must combat it by a sudden, heroic resolution. This was the first point of support upon which this mind, vacillating because subtle, found strength and tranquillity. But what resolution to take? Any change, in such circumstances, would attract attention. Flight? Ah, yes! flight, with that energy of youth, that vigor of despair and of fear, which doubles the strength of a man and renders it equal to that of an army, — hide by day, travel by night, and arrive at length — where? In what place could he hide where the avenging arm of justice could not find him?

Gilbert knew the customs of the country. What would they think in countries almost savage, almost deserted, — for as to cities he must not think of them, — what would they think in a small town, a hamlet, of the stranger who comes some day to beg his bread, or whom they suspect of stealing it? And then Gilbert knew himself by heart, — a noticeable face, a face which henceforth would bear the indelible impress of a terrible secret, would attract the attention of every observer. To fly was already a danger; but to be discovered was a disgrace.

Flight would condemn him; he rejected this idea, and as if his mind had strength for only one idea, the unhappy man, after dismissing the idea of flight, entertained that of death. It was the first time he had thought of it; the apparition of this lugubrious phantom he had evoked occasioned him no fear. "It will be time enough to think of death when all resources are exhausted. Besides, it is cowardly to kill one's self. Rousseau has said, 'To suffer is more noble.'" With the utterance of this paradox, Gilbert raised his head and renewed his wandering course through the gardens. He had obtained the first glimpse of security, when, all at once, Philippe, arriving as we have seen, overturned all his ideas, and threw him into a fresh series of perplexities.

The brother, the brother sent for! it has been then satisfactorily proved! The family have determined on silence. Yes; but with all the investigations, all the refinement of details which for Gilbert meant the tortures of the Conciergerie, of the Châtelet, and of the Tournelle. They would drag him before Andrée; they would force him to kneel, to confess ignominiously his crime; and they would kill him like a dog with a cudgel or knife, — a legitimate vengeance justified in advance by numerous precedents.

Louis XV. was very indulgent to the nobility in such cases. And then Philippe was the most formidable avenger that Mademoiselle de Taverney could call to her aid. Philippe, who alone of the family had shown toward Gilbert the sentiments of a man and almost of an equal, — would not Philippe as surely kill the criminal with a word as with the sword; if this word were, "Gilbert, you have eaten of our bread, and you have dishonored us!"

So we have seen Gilbert stealing away at the first appearance of Philippe; and in returning he obeyed only his instinct not to accuse himself; and from that moment, he concentrated all his strength into a single purpose, — resistance. He followed Philippe, saw him go to the apartments of Andrée, and talk with Doctor Louis; he watched everything, judged everything, understood the despair of Philippe. He saw that grief spring up and increase; his terrible scene with Andrée he discovered from the play of the shadows behind the curtains. "I am lost," he thought. And immediately, his reason wandering, he seized a knife to kill Philippe whom he expected to see appear at his door, or to kill himself, if necessary.

But, on the contrary, Philippe was reconciled with his sister. Gilbert saw him on his knees kissing Andrée's hands; here was a fresh hope, a door of safety. If Philippe had not come up to him with cries of rage, it was because Andrée was wholly ignorant of the name of the criminal. If she, the only witness, the only accuser, knew nothing, why no one knew anything. If Andrée, foolish hope, knew and did not speak, it was more than safety, — it was happiness, it was triumph. From this moment Gilbert rose to the level of the situation. Nothing arrested his progress now that he had recovered his clearness of vision. "Where is the evidence," he said, "if Mademoiselle de Taverney does not accuse me? And, fool that I am, is it the result she will accuse me of, or the crime itself? Now, she has not reproached me for the crime; nothing for three weeks past has indicated to me that she detested me, or avoided me more than formerly. If, then, she has not known the cause, nothing in the effect will point to me more than to another. I saw the king himself in the chamber of Mademoiselle Andrée. I will prove it, if need be, to the brother, and in spite of every denial of his Majesty, they will believe me. Yes; but this would be a dangerous game. I will be silent; the king has too many ways of proving his innocence, or of crushing my evidence. But in default of the king, whose name cannot be brought into this affair under pain of imprisonment for life, or of death, have I not that unknown man who the same night led Mademoiselle de Taverney into the garden? This man, how will he defend himself? What will be their reason for suspecting him? How will they find him if they do suspect him? He is but an ordinary man; I am as good as he, and I will defend myself stoutly against him. Besides, they will not even think of me. God alone saw me," he added, laughing bitterly; "but this God who so often sees my grief and my tears without saying anything, why should he be so unjust as to betray me on this first chance for happiness that he has given me? Moreover, if there has been a crime, it is his, and not mine; and Monsieur de Voltaire proves incontestably that there are no longer any miracles. I am saved, I am calm; my secret is my own, the future is mine." After these reflections, or rather this compromise with his conscience, Gilbert locked up his garden-tools, and took his evening meal with his companions. He was gay, careless, defiant even. He had had remorse, he had been afraid, — a two-fold weakness which a man, a philosopher, must hasten to forget. Only he reckoned without his conscience; Gilbert did not sleep.

CHAPTER XLVI.

TWO GRIEFS.

GILBERT had rightly judged the position when he said, speaking of the unknown man surprised by him in the gardens on that evening which had been so fatal to Mademoiselle de Taverney, "Will they find him?" In fact Philippe was wholly ignorant of the place of residence of Joseph Balsamo, Comte de Fenix. But he remembered that lady of quality, that Marquise de Savigny, to whom, on the thirtieth of May, Andrée had been conducted to be cared for. It was not yet too late to present himself at the house of this lady, who lived in the Rue Saint Honoré. Philippe restrained the agitation of his mind and of his senses; he ascended to the apartments of the lady, and the servant gave him immediately without hesitation the address of Balsamo, Rue Saint Claude, au Marais. Philippe hastened directly to the address indicated.

But it was not without profound emotion that he touched the knocker of this suspicious house, where, as he thought, were forever buried the repose and honor of poor Andrée. But with an appeal to his will he sufficiently overcome indignation and emotion to preserve the strength which he was sure to need. He knocked, then, with a firm hand at the gate of the house which, according to the custom of the place, flew open. Philippe entered the court, holding his horse by the bridle. But he had not taken four steps when Fritz, coming out from the vestibule and appearing at the top of the steps, stopped him with this question, "What does Monsieur want?"

Philippe trembled as if he had met with an unforeseen obstacle. He looked at the German, knitting his brow as if Fritz had not performed his simple duty as an attendant.

"I wish to speak to the master of the house, — to Comte de Fenix," replied Philippe, passing the bridle of his horse through a ring, and walking toward the house, which he entered.

"Monsieur is not at home," said Fritz, letting Philippe pass, however, with the politeness of a well-trained servant. Strange thing! Philippe seemed to have anticipated nothing less than this simple reply. He remained for a moment abashed. "Where can I find him?" he asked.

"I do not know, Monsieur."

"But you ought to know."

"I beg pardon, Monsieur does not account to me for his movements."

"My friend," said Philippe, "I must, however, speak to your master this evening."

"I doubt if it is possible."

"It must be; it is on business of the greatest importance."

Fritz bowed without answering.

"He has gone out, then?" asked Philippe.

"Yes, Monsieur."

"He will return of course?"

"I think not, Monsieur."

"Ah, you think not?"

"Yes."

"Very well," said Philippe, growing impatient; "meanwhile go tell your master —"

"But I have the honor of informing you," replied the imperturbable Fritz, "that Monsieur is not here."

"I know the importance of orders, my friend," said Philippe, "and yours ought to be regarded; but it cannot indeed apply to me, whose visit your master could not anticipate, and who come here accidentally."

"The order is for everybody, Monsieur," replied Fritz, blundering.

"Then since there is an order," said Philippe, "the Comte de Fenix is here?"

"Well, what then?" said Fritz, becoming impatient in his turn at such persistence.

"Why, I will wait for him."

"Monsieur is not here, I tell you," he replied; "the house took fire some time ago, and consequently it is not habitable."

"You live in it, however," said Philippe, blundering in his turn.

"I live here as keeper."

Philippe shrugged his shoulders like a man who does not believe a word of what is told him. Fritz began to get angry. "For the rest," he said, "whether Monsieur le Comte is here or not, it is not usual for persons to enter his house by force; and if you do not conform to custom, I shall be obliged —" Fritz stopped.

"To what?" asked Philippe, forgetting himself.

"To put you out," replied Fritz, calmly.

"You?" cried Philippe, his eyes flashing.

"I!" replied Fritz, resuming with the characteristic of his nation every appearance of coolness in proportion as his anger increased. And he took a step toward the young man, who, exasperated beyond control, drew his sword. Fritz, not alarmed at the sight of the blade, without calling for help, — he might, indeed, have been alone, — seized from an armory a sort of stake armed with a short but sharp blade, and throwing himself upon Philippe like a cudgel-player rather than a fencer, he broke into a thousand pieces, at the first stroke, the blade of that little sword. Philippe uttered a cry of rage, and rushing in his turn toward the armory, tried to seize a weapon from it. At this moment the secret door of the corridor was opened, and the count appeared coming out from the shadow.

"What is the matter, Fritz?" he asked.

"Nothing, Monsieur," replied the servant, putting down his stick, but placing himself like a barrier before his master, who, standing on the steps of the private staircase, was more elevated than he by half his height.

"Monsieur le Comte de Fenix," said Philippe, "is it the custom in your country for lackeys to receive a gentleman spear in hand, or is it an order peculiar to your noble mansion?"

Fritz lowered his spear, and at a sign from his master put it in the corner of the vestibule.

"Who are you, Monsieur?" asked the count, who could scarcely see Philippe in the faint light of the lamp which lighted the antechamber.

"Some one who insists on speaking with you."

"Who insists?"

"Yes."

"That is a word which fully excuses Fritz, Monsieur; for I wish to speak to no one, and when I am at home I do not recognize the right of any one to insist on speaking to me. You are then guilty of a wrong toward me; but," Balsamo added with a sigh, "I pardon you, — on the condition, however, that you retire and trouble me no more."

"It well becomes you, indeed," cried Philippe, "to ask for peace, — you, who have destroyed mine."

"I have destroyed your peace?"

"I am Philippe de Taverney!" cried the young man, thinking that to the conscience of the count this name would explain everything.

"Philippe de Taverney? Monsieur," said the count, "I was well received at your father's house, you are welcome to mine."

"Ah, that is very fortunate," murmured Philippe.

"Please to follow me, Monsieur."

Balsamo shut the door of the private staircase, and preceding Philippe, he conducted him to the salon, where some of the scenes of this story have been unfolded to our view, — particularly the most recent of all which had taken place there, that of the Five Masters. The salon was lighted up as if some one had been expected; but it was evident that this was one of the luxurious customs of the house.

"Good evening, Monsieur de Taverney," said Balsamo, in a tone so mild and suppressed that Philippe involuntarily looked up at him. But at the sight of Balsamo he stepped back. The count indeed was but the shadow of himself, — his hollow eyes had no lustre; his cheeks, in growing thin, had encircled the mouth with two folds, and the facial angle, bare and bony, made the whole head look like a death's head. Philippe was astounded. Balsamo saw his astonishment, and a smile of mortal sadness passed over his white lips. "Monsieur," he said, "let me apologize for my servant; but indeed he followed his orders, and you — allow me to say so — were wrong in forcing him."

"Monsieur," said Philippe, "there are, you know, in life extreme situations, and I was in one of these situations." Balsamo did not answer. "I wished to see you," continued Philippe; "I wished to speak to you; I would have braved death in order to gain admission to you."

Balsamo remained silent and seemed to await an explanation of the words of the young man, without having the strength or the curiosity to ask for it.

"I have you now," continued Philippe, — "I have you now at length, and we will come to an explanation if you please; but in the first place be so good as to dismiss that man." And Philippe pointed to Fritz, who had just raised the portière as if to ask his master his last orders respecting the importunate visitor.

Balsamo fixed upon Philippe a look, the object of which was to discover his intentions; but finding himself in the presence of a man his equal in rank and distinction, Philippe had recovered calmness and presence of mind; he was impenetrable. Balsamo, therefore, by a simple motion of the head, or rather eyebrows, dismissed Fritz, and the two men sat down opposite each other, Philippe with his back to the fireplace, Balsamo with his elbow resting on a small table.

"Speak quickly, and clearly, if you please, Monsieur," said Balsamo, "for I listen to you only through kindness, and I warn you that I shall be quickly fatigued."

"I shall speak as I ought, Monsieur, and as long as I think proper," said Philippe; "and with your permission, I will begin with a question."

At this word a terrible frown shot from the eyes of Balsamo an electric flash. This word brought to his mind such memories that Philippe would have trembled if he had known what commotion he had excited in the depths of this man's heart. However, after a moment's silence to gain command over himself, Balsamo said, "Ask your question."

"Monsieur," replied Philippe, "you have never explained satisfactorily how you spent the time during that famous night of the thirtieth of May, from the moment when you raised my sister from among the dying and the dead who crowded the Place Louis XV.?"

"What does that signify?" asked Balsamo.

"It signifies, Monsieur le Comte, that your whole conduct on that night has been and is now more than ever subject to suspicion."

"Suspicion?"

"Yes; and in all probability, it has not been the conduct of a man of honor."

"Monsieur," said Balsamo, "I do not understand you; you must see that my head is weary, weak, and that this weakness naturally makes me impatient."

"Monsieur!" cried Philippe, in his turn irritated by Balsamo's tone, at once haughty and calm.

"Monsieur," continued Balsamo, in the same tone, "since I last had the honor of seeing you I have met with a great misfortune: my house has been partly burned, and I have lost many precious treasures, — very precious, understand; in consequence of this trouble I am somewhat confused. Be, therefore, very clear, I beg, or I shall take leave of you immediately."

"Oh, no, Monsieur," said Philippe, "no, you will not take leave of me so easily as you say. I shall respect your sorrow if you show yourself considerate of mine; to me, also, Monsieur, there has come a great misfortune, — much greater than yours, I am sure."

Balsamo smiled with that smile of despair which Philippe had already seen upon his lips.

"I, Monsieur," continued Philippe, "have lost the honor of my family."

"Well, Monsieur," replied Balsamo, "how can I help you in this misfortune?"

"How can you help me?" cried Philippe, with flashing eyes.

"Certainly."

"You can restore me what I have lost, Monsieur!"

"Ah, you are mad, Monsieur!" cried Balsamo, and he reached for the bell. But he made this movement so gently and with so little anger that Philippe's arm easily stopped him.

"I am mad?" cried Philippe, in an angry tone. "But you do not understand that I refer to my sister, whom you held fainting in your arms on the thirtieth of May, — my sister, whom you conveyed to a house, which you said was respectable, but, as I think, infamous, — to my sister, in a word, whose honor I demand sword in hand?"

Balsamo shrugged his shoulders. "Eh, good God!" he murmured, "how many turnings to reach a thing so simple!"

"Scoundrel!" cried Philippe.

"What a deplorable voice you have, Monsieur!" said Balsamo, with the same gloomy impatience; "you stun me. Why, you do not come here to tell me that I have insulted your sister?"

"Yes, coward!"

"Again an exclamation, and a useless insult, Monsieur; who the devil has told you that I have insulted your sister?"

Philippe hesitated; the tone with which Balsamo pronounced these words amazed him. It was the height of impudence, or it was the cry of a clear conscience. "Who told me?" replied the young man.

"Yes, I demand it of you."

"My sister herself, Monsieur."

"Well, Monsieur, your sister —"

"You are about to say?" cried Philippe, with a threatening gesture.

"I was about to say, Monsieur, that you give me a very poor idea both of yourself and your sister. It is the worst speculation in the world, do you know, that which certain women make on their dishonor. Now you have come with insult in your mouth, like the bearded brothers of the Italian comedy, sword in hand, to force me either to marry your sister, which shows that she is in great want of a husband, or to give you money because you know that I make gold. Well, you are very much mistaken on both points, — you will not have money, and your sister will remain unmarried."

"Then, I will have the blood which flows in your veins," cried Philippe, "if there is any."

"No, not even that, Monsieur."

"Why not?"

"The blood I have, I keep, and I could have had, if I wished, a cause for shedding it more serious than the one you offer me. Therefore, Monsieur, do me the favor to return peacefully; and if you make a noise, as the noise will make my head ache, I shall call Fritz. Fritz will come, and at a sign from me, he will break you in two like a twig. Go!" This time Balsamo rang, and as Philippe tried to prevent him, he opened an ebony box sitting on the little table, and took from it a double-barrelled pistol.

"Well, I like that better," cried Philippe; "kill me!"

"Why should I kill you?"

"Because you have dishonored me." The young man pronounced, in his turn, these words with such an accent of truth that Balsamo, looking at him with eyes full of kindness, said, "Is it possible then that you are in earnest?"

"You doubt it? you doubt the word of a gentleman?"

"And that Mademoiselle de Taverney could have herself conceived this infamous idea, and that she could have urged you to carry it out? Well, if it be so, I will give you satisfaction. I swear to you on my honor that my conduct toward Mademoiselle your sister on the night of the thirtieth of May was irreproachable; that neither honor, nor human tribunal, nor divine justice, could discover in it anything contrary to the most perfect probity; do you believe me?"

"Monsieur!" said the young man, astonished.

"You know that I do not fear a duel, — you read that in my eyes, do you not? As to my weakness, do not be deceived; it is only apparent. I have little blood in my face, it is true; but my muscles have lost nothing of their strength. Do you wish for a proof of it? See!" And Balsamo raised with a single hand, and without effort, an enormous bronze vase placed on a stand carved by Boule.

"Well, so be it, Monsieur," said Philippe; "I believe you as to the thirtieth of May. But you employ subterfuge; you take advantage of an error in time. Since that you have seen my sister again."

Balsamo hesitated in his turn. "It is true," said he, "I have seen her since;" and his brow, clear for a moment, grew dark in a terrible manner.

"Ah, you see plainly!" said Philippe.

"Well, I have seen your sister again. What does that prove against me?"

"It proves that you have put her into this inexplicable sleep, of which, three times already, at your approach, she has felt the effect, and that you have taken advantage of this insensibility to cover the secret of your crime."

"Once more, who says that?" cried Balsamo.

"My sister."

"How does she know it, since she was asleep?"

"Ah, you confess, then, that she was put to sleep?"

"More, Monsieur; I confess to having magnetized her myself."

"Magnetized her?"

"Yes."

"And with what object, if not to dishonor her?"

"With what object, alas!" said Balsamo, dropping his head upon his breast.

"Speak, speak, then!"

"With the object, Monsieur, of making her reveal a secret which was more precious to me than life."

"Oh, trickery, subterfuge!"

"And it was during this night," continued Balsamo, following out his own thought, rather than answering Philippe's insulting question, "that your sister —"

"Was dishonored; yes, Monsieur."

"Dishonored?"

"My sister is a mother!"

Balsamo uttered a cry. "Oh, true, true!" said he, "I remember; I went off without waking her."

"You confess! you confess!" cried Philippe.

"And some villain, during that terrible night, — oh, terrible for us all, Monsieur! — took advantage of her sleep."

"Ah! would you mock me, Monsieur?"

"No; I would convince you."

"That will be difficult."

"Where is your sister at this moment?"

"There, where you so conveniently discovered her."

"At Trianon?"

"Yes."

"I will go to Trianon with you, Monsieur."

Philippe was motionless with astonishment.

"I have committed a fault, Monsieur, but I am guiltless of crime. I left that child in a magnetic sleep. Well, as satisfaction for this fault, which may justly be forgiven me, I myself will tell you the name of the guilty man."

"Tell it! tell it!"

"I do not know it myself," said Balsamo.

"Who does know it, then?"

"Your sister."

"But she has refused to tell me."

"Perhaps, but she will tell it to me."

"My sister?"

"If your sister accuses any one, will you believe her?"

"Yes; for my sister is an angel of purity."

Balsamo rang. "Fritz, a carriage," said he, when the German appeared.

Philippe paced the room like a madman. "The guilty one!" said he; "you promise to inform me who he is?"

"Monsieur," said Balsamo, "your sword has been broken in the struggle. Permit me to offer you another;" and he took from a chair a magnificent sword, with hilt of silver-gilt, which he drew through Philippe's belt.

"But you?" said the young man.

"I, Monsieur, do not need weapons," replied Balsamo; "my defence is at Trianon, and my defender will be yourself, when your sister shall have spoken." A quarter of an hour after, they entered the carriage, and Fritz, driving two excellent horses at a rapid pace, conveyed them to Versailles.

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE RIDE TO TRIANON.

ALL these journeys and all this explanation had taken time, so that it was nearly two o'clock in the morning when they left the Rue Saint Claude. It took an hour and a quarter to reach Versailles, and ten minutes to go from Versailles to Trianon, so that it was half-past three before the two men reached their destination. During the last part of the way, the dawn already spread its rosy tint on the green forests and the hillsides of Sèvres. As if a veil had been slowly withdrawn from their eyes, the fish-ponds of Ville d'Avray, and the more distant ones of Buc, were shining like mirrors. Then at last appeared the colonnades and roofs of Versailles, already red with the rays of a sun not yet visible. From time to time a window sparkled with the reflection of a ray of fire, which penetrated with its light the violet tint of the morning's mist. On coming to the end of the avenue that leads from Versailles to Trianon, Philippe stopped the carriage, and addressing his companion, who during the journey had preserved a gloomy silence, "Monsieur," said he, "we shall be obliged, I am afraid, to wait here some time. At Trianon the gates are not opened before five in the morning, and I am afraid that if we enter earlier our arrival will look suspicious to the watchmen and the guards."

Balsamo did not reply, but showed by a movement of the head that he acquiesced in the proposition.

"However, Monsieur," continued Philippe, "this delay will give me time to impart to you some reflections made during our journey hither."

Balsamo gave Philippe a look full of weariness and indifference. "As you please, Monsieur," said he; "speak, I am listening!"

"You told me, Monsieur," replied Philippe, "that during the night of the thirtieth of May you placed my sister in the house of Madame la Marquise de Savigny?"

"You were assured of it yourself, Monsieur," said Balsamo, "since you called to thank that lady."

"You then added that, as an attendant in the king's stables had accompanied you from the hôtel of the marchioness to our house, that is, to the Rue Coq-Héron, you had not been alone with her; I believed you on your word of honor."

"And you did well, Monsieur."

"But in recalling to myself the more recent circumstances, I am forced to think that a month since at Trianon, that night when you found a way to slip into the gardens, you must have entered her chamber."

"I never entered the chamber of your sister at Trianon, Monsieur."

"Listen, however! you see that before coming into the presence of Andrée, all things must be made clear."

"Clear up matters, Monsieur le Chevalier. I ask nothing better, and we have come here for that purpose."

"Well, on that night, — be careful in your answer, for what I say is true, and I have it from the lips of my sister, — on that night, I say, my sister retired early; you must then have surprised her in bed?"

Balsamo shook his head by way of denial.

"You deny it; take care!" said Philippe.

"I do not deny, Monsieur; you question me, I answer."

"Well, I shall go on questioning; continue therefore to reply."

Balsamo did not become angry, but on the contrary made a sign to Philippe to go on.

"When you ascended to the apartments of my sister," continued Philippe, becoming more and more excited, "when you surprised her, and magnetized her by your infernal power, Andrée was in bed; she was reading; she felt the approach of that torpor which your presence always brings upon her, and she lost consciousness. Now you say that you did nothing but question her; only, you add that you forgot when going away to awaken her; and yet," added Philippe, seizing Balsamo's arm, and pressing it convulsively, — "yet, when she came to her senses the next day, she was no longer in bed, but at the foot of her sofa, half-naked. Reply to this accusation, Monsieur, without evasion."

During this appeal, Balsamo, like a man waking up, drove away one by one the gloomy thoughts which obscured his mind. "Indeed, Monsieur," said he, "you need not have returned to this subject, thus seeking with me a lasting quarrel. I have come here out of condescension and from interest in you, — you seem to forget that. You are young, you are an officer, you are accustomed to speak out with your hand on the pommel of your sword. All this makes you reason falsely in serious circumstances. At my own house I did more than I ought to have done to convince you, and obtain from you a little peace. You begin again; take care, for if you fatigue me, I shall go to sleep in the midst of my troubles, in comparison with which yours are, I assure you, mere trifles; and when I sleep thus, Monsieur, woe to him who wakes me! I did not enter your sister's chamber; that is all I can tell you.

Your sister of her own free will, in which I confess my will had great share, came to me in the garden."

Philippe made a movement, but Balsamo stopped him. "I promised you proof," continued he; "you shall have it. Shall it be immediately? So be it. Let us enter Trianon instead of wasting time in useless talking. Do you prefer to wait? We will wait, then; but in silence and without excitement if you please." This said, with the air with which our readers are acquainted, Balsamo, the momentary gleam fading from his eyes, became absorbed in meditation.

Philippe uttered a low growl, like the ferocious beast which is preparing to bite; then changing suddenly his attitude and thought, "With this man," said he, "one must persuade or dominate by some superiority. I have just now no means of domination or persuasion; I must have patience." But as it was impossible for him to be patient in the presence of Balsamo, he jumped out of the carriage and began pacing the verdant alley in which the carriage had stopped. At the end of ten minutes, Philippe felt that it was impossible to wait any longer. He preferred to have the gate opened before the hour, at the risk of arousing suspicions. "Besides," he murmured, cherishing an idea which many times before had presented itself to his mind, — "besides, what suspicions can the porter entertain, if I say to him that anxiety about the health of my sister impelled me to go to Paris for a physician, and bring him here by sunrise?"

Adopting this idea, which by reason of his desire to put it into execution, had gradually lost its dangerous aspect, he ran to the carriage. "Yes, Monsieur," he said, "you are right; it is useless to wait longer, come, come!"

But it was only on a repetition of this request that Balsamo threw off his cloak, fastened his great coat with burnished steel buttons, and left the carriage. Philippe took a path which led by a short cut to the gate of the park. "Let us walk quickly," he said to Balsamo. And he went on so rapidly that Balsamo could with difficulty keep up with him. The gate was opened, Philippe gave his explanation, and the two men passed in. When the gate was closed behind them, Philippe stopped once more. "Monsieur," he said, "one final word. We are at the end of our journey; I do not know what question you are about to ask my sister. Spare her at least the details of the horrible scene which took place during her sleep. Spare the purity of mind, though the purity of the body has been soiled."

"Monsieur," replied Balsamo, "observe carefully what I say; I never entered the park beyond the tall trees you see yonder, opposite the house in which your sister lives. I have consequently never gone into the chamber of Mademoiselle de Taverney, as I have already had the honor of telling you. As to the scene whose effect you dread upon the mind of Mademoiselle, your sister, this effect will be produced only upon you, because from this very moment I order Mademoiselle, your sister, to fall into a magnetic sleep."

Balsamo stopped, folded his arms, turned toward the pavilion where Andrée lived, and stood one moment motionless, with knitted brow and with the expression of all-powerful will upon his countenance.

"And stay," he said, letting his arms fall, "Mademoiselle Andrée must be sleeping at this moment."

Philippe's face expressed doubt.

"Ah, you do not believe me," said Balsamo. "Well, listen. To prove to you that I have no occasion to go in to her, I will command her, asleep as she is, to come to us at the foot of the steps, at the very spot where I spoke to her at our last interview."

"Be it so," said Philippe; "when I see that I shall believe."

"Let us go into this walk, and wait behind the hedge."

Philippe and Balsamo repaired to the place designated. Balsamo extended his hand toward the apartment of Andrée; but he had scarcely done so, when a slight noise was heard in the adjoining hedge-row.

"A man," said Balsamo; "let us be careful."

"Where?" asked Philippe, searching for the person whom the count had spoken of.

"There, in the shrubbery on the left," said the latter.

"Ah, yes," said Philippe; "it is Gilbert, an old servant of ours."

"Have you anything to fear from this young man?"

"No, I think not; but no matter. Stop, Monsieur; if Gilbert has risen, others may have risen as well."

Meantime Gilbert had fled in fright; for seeing Philippe and Balsamo together, he comprehended instinctively that he was lost.

"Well, Monsieur, on what do you decide?"

"Monsieur," said Philippe, experiencing in spite of himself the sort of magnetic charm which this man diffused around him, "if your power is really so great as to lead Mademoiselle de Taverney to us, show it by some sign; but do not bring my sister to a place exposed like this, where the first-comer might hear your questions and her answers."

"You spoke in time," said Balsamo, seizing the arm of the young man and pointing out to him, at the window of the main corridor, Andrée, white and rigid, who had left her chamber, and obeying Balsamo's command was preparing to descend the stairs.

"Stop her; stop her!" said Philippe, frightened and astonished at the same time.

"Be it so," said Balsamo. The count extended his arm in the direction of Mademoiselle de Taverney, who immediately stopped. Then after stopping a moment, she turned right about and entered her chamber. Philippe hurried after her, Balsamo following him, and entered the room almost as soon as Andrée, and taking the young girl in his arms, he made her sit down. A few moments later Balsamo came in and shut the door behind him. But brief as the interval between these entrances, a third person had had time to slip in between the two men and enter Nicole's cabinet, where he hid himself, knowing that his life depended on this interview. This third person was Gilbert.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

THE REVELATION.

Balsamo closed the door behind him, and appeared on the threshold just as Philippe was looking at his sister with mingled terror and curiosity. "Are you ready, Chevalier?" he asked.

"Yes, Monsieur, yes," stammered Philippe, trembling.

"We can begin then, to question your sister?"

"If you please," said Philippe, trying to raise by force of respiration the weight which was crushing his breast.

"But before we begin, observe your sister."

"I see her, Monsieur."

"You really believe that she sleeps, do you not?"

"Yes."

"And that consequently she has no consciousness of what takes place here?"

Philippe made no reply, except by a gesture which expressed doubt. Balsamo then went to the fireplace and lighted a candle, which he passed before Andrée's eyes without causing her to move an eyelid.

"Yes, yes; she sleeps, it is evident," said Philippe; "but, good Heavens! what a strange sleep!"

"Well, I will question her," continued Balsamo; "or rather, since you have manifested fear lest I address her some indiscreet interrogation, question her yourself, Chevalier."

"But I have spoken to her; I touched her just now. She did not seem to hear me, she did not seem to feel my touch."

"I will put you in connection with her," and Balsamo placed Philippe's hand in that of Andrée.

Immediately the young girl smiled, and murmured, "Ah, it is you, brother?"

"You see," said Balsamo, "she recognizes you now."

"Yes; it is strange."

"Question her, she will answer."

"But if she does not remember when awake, how can she remember when asleep?"

"It is one of the mysteries of science," and Balsamo, sighing, sat down upon an easy chair in a corner.

Philippe sat motionless, his hand in Andrée's. How should he begin his questioning, the result of which would assure him of his dishonor, and reveal a criminal whom perhaps his vengeance could not reach? As for Andrée, she was in a state of calmness bordering on ecstasy, and her face expressed peace rather than any other feeling. Trembling all over, he obeyed nevertheless the expressive glance of Balsamo, which bade him begin. But in proportion as he contemplated his misfortune, as his face grew dark, that of Andrée was covered with a cloud, and it was she who began by saying, "Yes, you are right, brother; it is a great misfortune for the family."

Andrée interpreted thus the thought which she read in her brother's mind. Philippe was not expecting this beginning; he started, "What misfortune?" he asked, without considering his answer.

"Ah, you know well, brother."

"Force her to speak, Monsieur; she will speak."

"How can I force her?"

"Will her to speak, that is all."

Philippe looked at his sister, forming a wish in his mind. Andrée blushed.

"Oh!" said the young girl, "how bad it is of you, Philippe, to think that Andrée has deceived you."

"You love no one, then?"

"No one."

"Then it is not an accomplice, it is a criminal I must punish!"

"I do not understand you, brother."

Philippe looked at the count as if to ask advice.

"Press her," said Balsamo.

"Press her?"

"Yes, question her freely."

"Without respect for the modesty of this child?"

"Oh, do not be alarmed; on awaking she will remember nothing of it."

"But can she answer my questions?"

"Do you see clearly?" Balsamo asked Andrée.

Andrée started at the sound of this voice; she turned her lustreless eyes toward Balsamo. "Not so clearly as if you questioned me; but still I see."

"Well," Philippe asked, "if you see, sister, give me an account in detail of that night when you fainted away."

"Do you not begin with the night of the thirtieth of May, Monsieur? Your suspicions date from that night, I think. The time has come to clear up everything at once."

"No, Monsieur," replied Philippe; "it is useless, and now I trust your word. He who wields a power like yours, does not use it for the attainment of any common object. Sister," repeated Philippe, "tell me everything that happened on that night of your swoon."

"I do not remember," said Andrée.

"You hear, Monsieur le Comte?"

"She must remember; she must speak. Order her to."

"But if she was asleep?"

"The mind was awake." Then he arose, held out his hand to Andrée, and with a knitting of the brows which indicated a redoubling of will and action, "Remember," he said; "I will it."

"I remember," said Andrée.

"Oh!" said Philippe, wiping his forehead.

"What do you wish to know?"

"Everything."

"From what moment?"

"From the moment when you retired to bed."

"Do you see yourself?" said Balsamo.

"Yes, I see myself; I hold in my hand the glass prepared by Nicole — Oh, my God!"

"What? what is it?"

"Oh, the wretch!"

"Speak, sister; speak!"

"This glass contains a drink which has been drugged; if I drink it, I am lost."

"A drink which has been drugged!" cried Philippe; "for what object?"

"Wait! wait!"

"First, about the drink."

"I was about to raise it to my lips; but — at that moment —"

"Well?"

"The count called me."

"What count?"

"He," said Andrée, pointing to Balsamo.

"And then?"

"Then I put down the glass and went to sleep."

"What next? what next?" asked Philippe.

"I arose and joined him."

"Where was the count?"

"Under the lime-trees opposite my window."

"And the count never entered your room, sister?"

"Never."

A glance from Balsamo toward Philippe said clearly, "You see whether I deceive you, Monsieur?"

"And you say you went to join the count?"

"Yes; I obey him when he calls me."

"What did the count want of you?"

Andrée hesitated.

"Say, say!" cried Balsamo; "I will not listen," and he fell back into his chair, burying his head in his hands as if to prevent the sound of Andrée's words from reaching him.

"Speak! What did the count want?" repeated Philippe.

"He wished to seek intelligence from me —" She again stopped; one would have said that she was afraid of breaking the count's heart.

"Go on, sister, go on."

"Of a person who had escaped from his house, and —" Andrée lowered her voice, —"and who has since died." Softly as Andrée had pronounced these words Balsamo heard or divined them, for he uttered a deep groan. Philippe stopped; there was a moment's silence.

"Continue, continue," said Balsamo; "your brother wishes to know everything, Mademoiselle; your brother must know all. After this man had received the information he desired, what did he do?"

"He fled," said Andrée.

"Leaving you in the garden?" asked Philippe.

"Yes."

"What did you do then?"

"As he retreated from me, since the strength which sustained me went with him, I fell."

"In a swoon?"

"No; still a sleep, but a leaden sleep."

"Can you remember what happened to you during that sleep?"

"I will try."

"Well, what happened? Speak!"

"A man came out from a thicket, took me in his arms, and carried me —"

"Where?"

"Here into my chamber."

"Ah! — and this man, do you see him?"

"Stay — yes — yes — Oh!" continued Andrée, with an expression of disgust and uneasiness; "oh, it is again that little Gilbert!"

"Gilbert?"

"Yes."

"What did he do?"

"He put me down on the sofa."

"Afterward?"

"Wait."

"See! see!" said Balsamo; "I will that you see."

"He listens; he goes into the other chamber; he draws back as if in fear; he enters Nicole's cabinet — My God! my God!"

"What?"

"A man follows him; and I, — I, who cannot rise, defend myself, or cry out; I, who sleep —"

"Who is this man?"

"Brother, brother!" and Andrée's countenance expressed the profoundest grief.

"Tell who this man is," commanded Balsamo; "I will it!"

"The king!" murmured Andrée; "it is the king!"

Philippe shuddered.

"Ah!" muttered Balsamo, "I suspected it."

"He approaches me," continued Andrée; "he speaks to me, he takes me in his arms, he kisses me. Oh, brother, brother!"

Great tears came into Philippe's eyes, while his hand grasped the handle of the sword given him by Balsamo.

"Speak! speak!" continued the count, in a tone more and more imperative.

"Oh, what happiness! he is perplexed; he stops; he looks at me; he is afraid; he flies; Andrée is saved!"

Philippe drank in, breathless, every word that issued from Andrée's lips. "Saved! Andrée is saved!" he repeated mechanically.

"Wait, brother, wait!" and the young girl sought the arm of her brother as if to support herself.

"Afterward?" asked Philippe.

"I had forgotten."

"What?"

"There, there, in Nicole's cabinet, a knife in his hand —"

"A knife in his hand?"

"I see him; he is pale as death."

"Who?"

"Gilbert."

Philippe held his breath.

"He follows the king," continued Andrée; "he closes the door after him; he puts his foot upon the candle which is burning the carpet; he comes toward me. Oh!" The young girl raised herself in the arms of her brother. Every muscle in her body grew stiff, almost to breaking.

"Oh, the villain!" said she, at last; and she fell back powerless.

"My God!" said Philippe, not daring to interrupt her.

"It is he; it is he!" murmured the young girl. Then raising herself up to speak in her brother's ear, with flashing eye and trembling voice, "You will kill him, will you not, Philippe?"

"Oh, yes!" cried the young man, jumping up, and upsetting a small table behind him covered with china. The china was broken into pieces. With the noise of this fall was mingled a dull sound and a sudden shaking of the partitions; then a cry from Andrée, which was heard above all.

"What is that?" said Balsamo. "A door was opened."

"Was any one listening?" cried Philippe, grasping his sword.

"It was he," said Andrée, — "it was he again."

"But who is he?"

"Gilbert, Gilbert, still! Ah, you will kill him, Philippe, you will kill him?"

"Oh, yes, yes, yes!" cried the young man; and he rushed to the antechamber sword in hand, while Andrée fell back on the sofa. Balsamo rushed after the young man, and held him by the arm.

"Take care, Monsieur!" said he, "that which is secret would become public; it is daylight, and the echo of royal houses is loud."

"Oh, Gilbert, Gilbert!" murmured Philippe; "and he was hidden there. He heard us; I could kill him. Oh, the accursed villain!"

"Yes, but silence! You can find this young man another time; your sister needs you now, Monsieur. You see she begins to be fatigued by so much emotion."

"Oh, yes; I understand her suffering by my own; this misfortune is so terrible, so irreparable! Oh, Monsieur, Monsieur, it will kill me!"

"On the contrary, you will live for her, Chevalier; for she needs you, having only you. Love her, pity her, take care of her! And now," continued he, after a moment's silence, "have you further need of me?"

"No, Monsieur. Pardon me my suspicions, my insults; and yet all the injury comes from you, Monsieur."

"I do not excuse myself, Chevalier; but do you forget what your sister said?"

"What did she say? My mind wanders."

"If I had not come, she would have taken the draught prepared by Nicole, and then it would have been the king. Would the misfortune have been less?"

"No, Monsieur, it would have been still the same; and I see clearly that we were doomed. Awake my sister, Monsieur."

"But she will see me; she will, perhaps, understand what has been going on. It is better that I awake her, as I put her to sleep, — at a distance."

"Thanks, thanks!"

"Then, adieu, Monsieur."

"One word more, Count. You are a man of honor?"

"Oh, the secret you mean?"

"Count —"

"A needless charge, Monsieur; in the first place, because I am a man of honor; then, having decided to have nothing more to do with men, I shall forget men and their secrets. At all times call upon me, if I can be of use to you. But, no, no, I am no longer good for anything; I am of no more use upon the earth. Adieu, Monsieur, adieu!" and bowing to Philippe, Balsamo looked once more at Andrée, whose head was leaning back with every appearance of grief and lassitude. "O Science!" he murmured, "how many victims for a result without value!" and he disappeared.

As he retreated Andrée revived. She raised her head, heavy as if it had been made of lead, and looking at her brother with wondering eyes, "Oh, Philippe!" she murmured, "what has happened?"

Philippe restrained the sob which was choking him, and smiling heroically, "Nothing, sister!" said he.

"And yet I seem to have been mad, and to have dreamed."

"Dreamed? and what have you dreamed, my dear and good Andrée?"

"Oh, Doctor Louis, Doctor Louis, brother!"

"Andrée," cried Philippe, pressing her hand, "Andrée, you are pure as the light of day; but everything accuses you, everything is against you. A terrible secret is imposed upon us two. I will go and find Doctor Louis, and ask him to say to Madame la Dauphine that you are attacked by an unconquerable homesickness, which a stay at Taverney alone can cure; and then we will depart either for Taverney or for some other part of the world. Then both, in seclusion there, loving, consoling each other —"

"Yet, brother," said Andrée, "if I am as pure as you say —"

"Dear Andrée, I will explain it all to you; meantime, prepare for departure."

"But my father?"

"Father," said Philippe, with a serious air, "father, — that is my concern; I will prepare him."

"He will accompany us, then?"

"Father? oh, impossible, impossible! We two, Andrée, — we two alone, I say."

"Oh, how you frighten me, dear! how you alarm me, brother! how I suffer, Philippe!"

"God is everywhere, Andrée," said the young man; "courage, then! I will seek the doctor. What makes you ill, Andrée, is sorrow at leaving Taverney, — sorrow which you conceal for the sake of Madame la Dauphine. Come, come, be brave, sister, the honor of both of us is at stake!" and Philippe embraced his sister hastily, for he was choking with emotion. Then he picked up his sword, which he had dropped, sheathed it with trembling hand, and rushed out on to the stairs. A quarter of an hour after he knocked at Doctor Louis's door, who, while the court was at Trianon, lived at Versailles.

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE LITTLE GARDEN OF DOCTOR LOUIS.

Doctor Louis, at whose door we have left Philippe, was walking in a little garden surrounded by four high walls, which formed a part of the dependencies of an old Ursuline convent, and had been converted into a storehouse for Messieurs the dragoons of the king's household.

Doctor Louis read, while walking, the proofs of a new work he was about to have printed, and stooped from time to time to pull from the path in which he was walking, or from the parterre on either side, the weeds which offended his instinct of symmetry and order. A single servant, rather surly, like every domestic of an industrious man who does not like to be disturbed, took the whole care of the doctor's house. In answer to Philippe's resounding knock, she approached the door and half opened it. But the young man, instead of parleying with the servant, pushed the door open and went in. Once master of the passage he saw the garden and in it the doctor. Then, without paying any attention to the speeches and outcries of the vigilant guardian, he rushed into the garden. At the sound of his steps the doctor looked up. "Ah, ah!" he said, "is it you?"

"Pardon me, Doctor, for having forced your door and disturbed your solitude; but the moment you had foreseen has arrived; I need you, and I come to implore your assistance."

"I have promised you, Monsieur," said the doctor; "and I promise it now."

Philippe bowed, too much affected to begin the conversation himself. Doctor Louis understood his hesitation. "How is the invalid?" he asked, anxious on account of Philippe's paleness, and fearing some catastrophe as a crisis of this drama.

"Very well, thank God, Doctor; and my sister is so worthy and so honest a girl that really God would not be just to send her suffering and danger."

The doctor looked at Philippe as if to question him; his words seemed to him a continuation of the denials of the evening before.

"Then," said he, "she was the victim of some surprise, or some plot."

"Yes, Doctor, victim of an unheard of surprise, — victim of an infamous plot."

The doctor clasped his hands, and lifted his eyes toward heaven. "Alas!" said he, "we live, in this respect, in horrible times; and I think there is pressing need of physicians of nations, as there have been so long physicians of individuals."

"Yes," said Philippe, "yes, let them come; no one will be more glad to see them than I; meanwhile —" And Philippe made a threatening gesture.

"Ah!" said the doctor, "you are, I see, Monsieur, one of those who make the reparation of crime consist in violence and murder."

"Yes, Doctor," Philippe calmly replied, "yes, I am one of those."

"A duel," sighed the doctor, — "a duel, which will not restore your sister's honor, even if you kill the criminal, and which will plunge her in despair if you are killed. Ah, Monsieur, I thought that you had a sound mind and an intelligent heart; I thought I had heard you express the desire that everything relating to this affair should be kept secret."

Philippe laid his hand upon the doctor's arm. "Monsieur," said he, "you are strangely mistaken in me; I have a steadfast purpose which springs from deep conviction and a clear conscience. I wish to do justly, not to do myself justice; I wish, not to expose my sister to abandonment and death by getting myself killed, but to avenge her by killing the scoundrel."

"You will kill him, — you, a gentleman? You will commit a murder?"

"Monsieur, if I had seen him ten minutes before the crime, stealing like a thief into that chamber, into which, on account of his low station, he had no right to put his foot, and had then killed him, every one would have said that I had done well; why, then, should I spare him now? Has crime made him sacred?"

"So this bitter purpose is determined upon in your mind, fixed in your heart?"

"Fixed, determined upon! I shall find him some time, however carefully he hides; and then, I tell you, Monsieur, without pity, without remorse, I will kill him like a dog!"

"Then," said Doctor Louis, "you will commit a crime equal to his, — a more odious crime, perhaps; for one never knows whether an imprudent word, or the coquettish look of a woman may not have urged on the desire and lust of the man. Kill him! when you have other reparation, — when a marriage —"

Philippe looked up. "Are you unaware, Monsieur, that the family of Taverney-Maison-Rouge dates from the Crusades, and that my sister is as noble as an infanta or an archduchess?"

"Yes, I understand; and the culprit, he is not; he is a wretch, a clodhopper, as you high-bred men say. Yes, yes," he continued, with a bitter smile, "yes, it is true; God has made men of a certain inferior clay to be killed by other men of finer clay; oh, yes! you are right, — kill, Monsieur, kill!" And the doctor turned his back on Philippe and began to pull up here and there the weeds in his garden.

Philippe folded his arms. "Doctor, listen to me," he said; "it is not a question of a seducer to whom a coquette has given more or less encouragement; it is not a question of a man provoked, as you say, — we speak of a miserable fellow brought up by us, and who, after having eaten the bread of pity, in the night, taking advantage of an artificial sleep, of a swoon, of death, so to speak, has basely and treacherously profaned the holiest and purest of women, whom in the light of day he did not dare look in the face. Before a tribunal this guilty man would certainly be doomed to death; well, I will judge him as impartially as a tribunal, and I will kill him. Now, Doctor, will you, whom I have thought so generous and so noble, — will you make me purchase this service, or impose on me a condition? In rendering it to me, will you do like those who seek to oblige, and to satisfy themselves at the same time? If it is so, Doctor, you are not that wise man I have admired; you are only an ordinary man, and in spite of the disdain which you showed me just now, I am superior to you, — I, who have confided to you, without reservation, my whole secret."

"You say," replied the doctor, thoughtfully, "that the guilty man has fled?"

"Yes, Doctor; no doubt he foresaw that the affair would become known; he heard that he was accused, and immediately took flight."

"Good! Now what do you desire, Monsieur," asked the doctor.

"Your assistance in removing my sister from Versailles, to bury in a thicker and more silent darkness the terrible secret that would dishonor us if it should become known."

"I will ask you but one question."

Philippe was indignant.

"Listen to me," continued the doctor, with a gesture which commanded calmness. "A Christian philosopher, of whom you have just made a confessor, is obliged to impose upon you a condition, not with reference to the service rendered, but in pursuance of the law of conscience. Humanity is a duty, Monsieur, not a virtue. You speak to me of killing a man; I must prevent it, as I would have prevented by all the means in my power, by violence even, the accomplishment of the crime committed upon your sister. Therefore, Monsieur, I adjure you, make me an oath."

"Oh, never! never!"

"You will do it," cried Doctor Louis, vehemently, — "you will do it, man of blood; recognize everywhere the hand of God, and do not assume to direct its stroke. The culprit, you say, was within your reach?"

"Yes, Doctor; by opening a door, if I could have divined that he was there, I should have been face to face with him."

"Well, he has fled, he trembles, his punishment has begun. Ah, you smile; what God does appears to you feeble! remorse seems insufficient! Wait, wait, then! You will stay with your sister, and you will promise me never to pursue the criminal. If you meet him, that is, if God delivers him up to you — well, I am also a man! — in that case you will see!"

"Nonsense, Monsieur; will he not always fly from me?"

"Who knows? The assassin flies, the assassin seeks refuge, the assassin fears the scaffold; and yet as if he were magnetized, the sword of justice draws this criminal to itself, and he finally falls under the hand of the executioner. Besides, it is a question now of giving up all that you have undertaken so painfully to do? It is for the world in which you live and to whom you cannot explain the innocence of your sister, it is for all these curious idlers that you kill a man; and you would feed their curiosity twice, — by the avowal of the attempt in the first place, afterward by the scandal of the punishment. No, no, believe me; keep silence, bury this misfortune."

"Oh, who will know when I shall have killed this villain, that it was on my sister's account?"

"You would have to give a reason for this murder."

"Well, Doctor, I will obey; I will not pursue the criminal. But God will be just; oh, yes! God uses impunity as a bait; God will again show me the criminal."

"In that case it will be God who has condemned him. Give me your hand, Monsieur."

"There it is."

"What must I do for Mademoiselle de Taverney? Tell me."

"You must, dear Doctor, find a pretext with Madame la Dauphine for taking her away for a time, — longing for the country, fresh air, regimen —"

"That is easy."

"Yes; that is your affair, and I rely upon you. I will then take my sister to some corner of France, Taverney for example, far from all eyes, from all suspicions."

"No, no, Monsieur, that would be impossible. The poor child needs constant care and solace; she will need all the aid of science. Let me then find for her near here, in a village I know of, a retreat a hundred times more secluded, a hundred times more safe than the wild country into which you would take her."

"Oh, Doctor, you think so?"

"Yes, I have reason to think so. Suspicion always moves from the centre outward like those circles caused by a stone thrown into the water; the stone however does not move, and when the undulations are obliterated no one sees the cause of them, buried as it is under the depths of the water."

"Then, Doctor, go to work."

"From to-day, Monsieur?"

"Apprise Madame la Dauphine."

"This very morning."

"And for the rest?"

"In twenty-four hours, you shall have my answer."

"Oh, thanks, Doctor; you are for me a god!"

"Well, young man, now that everything is arranged between us, accomplish your mission; return to your sister, console her, protect her."

"Adieu, Doctor, adieu!"

The doctor, after having watched Philippe until he was out of sight, returned to his walk, his proofs, and the weeding of his little garden.

CHAPTER L.

FATHER AND SON.

When Philippe returned to his sister he found her very much agitated, very uneasy. "My dear," said she, "I have been thinking while you were away of all that has happened to me for some time past. It is an abyss which will swallow up the little reason that remains to me. Well, you have seen Doctor Louis?"

"I have just been to his house, Andrée."

"That man has brought a terrible accusation against me; is it just?"

"He was not mistaken, sister."

Andrée grew pale, and her small and delicate hands contracted nervously.

"The name," said she, then, — "the name of the wretch who ruined me?"

"My sister, you must remain ignorant of it forever."

"Oh, Philippe, you do not speak the truth; Philippe, you are false to your own conscience. This name, I must know it; so that feeble as I am, and having nothing for myself but prayer, I may by prayer direct against the criminal all the anger of God. The name of this man, Philippe?"

"Let us never speak of it, sister."

Andrée seized his hand, and looked him in the face. "Oh!" said she, "this is what you reply to me, — you who have a sword by your side!"

Philippe grew pale at this exhibition of anger, and restraining his own fury, "Andrée," he said, "I cannot tell you what I do not know myself. Secrecy is ordered me by the destiny which overwhelms us; this secret, exposure of which would compromise the honor of our family, a last favor of God renders inviolable to all."

"Except for one man, Philippe,— for a man who laughs, for a man who defies us!— oh, my God! for a man who laughs infernally at us, perhaps, in his dark retreat."

Philippe wrung his hands, looked upward, and answered nothing.

"This man," cried Andrée, with increasing anger and indignation, "I know him, perhaps,— in short, Philippe, permit me to present him to you. I have already described his strange influence over me; I think I sent you to him —"

"That man is innocent; I have seen him; I have proof. So do not seek farther, Andrée, seek no farther."

"Philippe, let us ascend a little higher than this man, will you? Let us go to the first ranks of the powerful men of this kingdom. Let us go even to the king!"

Philippe encircled with his arms this poor child, sublime in her ignorance and in her indignation, "There," he said, "all those whom you have mentioned while awake, you have named in your sleep; all these whom you accuse with the ferocity of virtue you have vindicated in your magnetic sleep, when you saw, so to speak, the crime committed."

"Did I name the guilty one?" she said, with flashing eyes.

"No," Philippe replied, "no. Ask no more, follow my example,— submit to destiny. The misfortune is irreparable; it is doubled for you by the impunity of the criminal; but hope, hope! God is above all; God reserves for those who are oppressed a savage joy which is called vengeance."

"Vengeance!" she murmured, frightened at the terrible emphasis with which Philippe pronounced this word.

"Meantime rest, sister, from all the troubles, all the shame, which my mad curiosity has caused you. If I had known! oh, if I had known!" And he hid his face in his hands in fearful despair. Then suddenly looking up, "What have I to complain of?" said he, with a smile. "My sister is pure, she loves me; she has never betrayed confidence nor friendship. My sister is young like myself, kind like myself; we will live together, we will grow old together. Together we shall be stronger than the whole world!"

In proportion as the young man spoke in a manner to console Andrée, she became gloomy; she bent down her pale face; she took the attitude and settled look of dull despair, which Philippe had just shaken off so courageously. "You never speak but of us two!" she said, looking steadily, with her searching blue eyes upon her brother's changing countenance.

"Of whom would you have me speak, Andrée?" said the young man, meeting her look.

"But — we have a father; how will he treat his daughter?"

"I told you yesterday," Philippe coldly replied, "to forget all trouble, all fear, — to dismiss, as the wind dispels the morning mist, every memory and every affection except mine. Indeed, my dear Andrée, nobody in the world loves you but myself; I am loved only by you. Poor abandoned orphans, why should we bear the yoke of gratitude or relationship? Have we received kindness? Have we enjoyed the protection of a father? Oh!" he added, with a bitter smile, "you know my very thoughts, you know the state of my heart. If you must love him you speak of, I will say, 'Love him!' I am silent. Andrée, forbear."

"Then, brother, I must believe —"

"Sister, in great misfortunes man involuntarily hears those words so little understood in childhood, 'Fear God!' Oh, yes! God has cruelly recalled it to our memory! 'Respect thy father' — Oh, my sister, the strongest proof of respect you could give your father would be to blot him from your memory."

"It is true —" murmured Andrée, gloomily, leaning back in her chair.

"My dear, let us not waste time in useless words. Collect all your effects; Doctor Louis will see Madame la Dauphine, and inform her of your departure. The causes he will allege, you know, — the need of change of air, unaccountable suffering. Be all ready, I say, for departure."

Andrée arose. "The furniture?" she said.

"Oh, no, — linen, clothes, jewels."

Andrée obeyed. She set in order in the first place the boxes from the closet, the clothes from the wardrobe where Gilbert had hidden; then she took some jewel-cases which she was about to put in the principal box.

"What is that?" said Philippe.

"It is the casket of jewels sent me by the king, for my representation at Trianon."

Philippe turned pale on seeing the richness of the present.

"With only these jewels," said Andrée, "we can live respectably anywhere. I have heard that the pearls alone are worth one hundred thousand francs."

Philippe closed the casket. "They are indeed very valuable," he said. And taking the casket from Andrée's hands, "I think there are some other jewels, sister."

"Oh, my dear, they are not worthy to be compared with these; they adorned, however, the toilet of our mother fifteen years ago. The watch, the bracelets, the earrings, are enriched with brilliants. There is also the portrait. Father wished to sell them all, because, he said, they were no longer fashionable."

"This is, however, all that remains to us," said Philippe, "our only resource. My sister, we will melt the gold articles; we will sell the jewels of the portrait. We shall thus have twenty thousand francs, which is a sufficient sum for the unhappy."

"But — this case of pearls is mine," said Andrée.

"Never touch those pearls, Andrée; they will burn you. Each one of these pearls is of a strange nature, sister; they stain the foreheads which they touch."

Andrée shuddered.

"I will keep this case, sister, to return it to whom it belongs. I tell you it is not our property, and we have no wish to claim it, have we?"

"As you please, brother," Andrée replied, with a shudder of shame.

"Dear sister, dress yourself for the last time to go to see Madame la Dauphine; be very calm, very respectful, and much affected at leaving so noble a protectress."

"Oh, yes! much affected," murmured Andrée, with emotion; "it is a great grief in my misfortune."

"I am going to Paris, sister, and I will return to-night; as soon as I arrive I will take you away. Pay all that you owe here."

"Nothing, nothing; I had Nicole, she has fled, — ah, I forgot the little Gilbert."

Philippe started, his eyes kindled. "You owe Gilbert?" he cried.

"Yes," said Andrée, naturally, "he has furnished me with flowers through the season. But, as you told me yourself, I have been at times unjust and harsh toward this fellow, who was after all polite. I will recompense him differently."

"Do not seek Gilbert," said Philippe.

"Why not? He must be in the garden; I will send for him then."

"No, no; you will lose precious time. I, on the contrary, shall meet him; I will speak to him; I will pay him."

"Very well, then, that will do."

"Yes, adieu until this evening;" and he kissed the hand of the young girl, who threw herself into his arms. He restrained even the beating of his heart in this gentle embrace.

Without delay Philippe departed for Paris, where the carriage set him down before the door of the little hôtel in the Rue Coq-Héron. Philippe knew that he should find his father there. The old man, since his strange rupture with Richelieu, had not found life tolerable at Versailles, and he sought, like all minds of exuberant activity, to beguile mental torpor by the excitement of change of place.

Now the baron, when Philippe rang at the gate of the court-yard, was pacing, with terrible oaths, the little garden of the hôtel and the court adjoining it. He started at the sound of the bell, and answered it himself. As he expected no one, this unforeseen visit gave him hope; the unhappy man in his fall caught at every branch. He therefore received Philippe with a feeling of spite and vague curiosity. But he had no sooner glanced at the face of his visitor than that dull pallor, those rigid lines, and that contracted mouth froze the reservoir of questions which he was prepared to open.

"You?" he said only, "and by what chance?"

"I shall have the honor of explaining to you, Monsieur," said Philippe.

"Good! is it serious?"

"Very serious; yes, Monsieur."

"This boy always has ceremonious ways that disturb me. Is it a misfortune, or is it good fortune, which you bring?"

"It is a misfortune!" Philippe said gravely. The baron staggered. "We are quite alone?" asked Philippe.

"Why, yes."

"Would you like to go into the house, Monsieur?"

"Why not in the open air under these trees?"

"Because there are some things which are not spoken of under the open sky."

The baron looked at his son, obeyed his silent gesture, and affecting to be unmoved, even smiling, he followed him into the hall, the door of which Philippe had already opened. When the doors were carefully closed, Philippe waited for a sign from his father to begin the conversation; and the baron being seated comfortably in the best chair in the salon, —

"Monsieur," said Philippe, "my sister and I intend to take leave of you."

"What!" said the baron, very much surprised, "you — you go away! And the service?"

"There is no more service for me. You know the promises made by the king have not been realized, — fortunately."

"I do not see any 'fortunately' about it."

"Monsieur — "

"Explain it to me; how can you be fortunate in not being colonel of a fine regiment? You carry your philosophy to extremes."

"I carry it so far as not to prefer dishonor to prosperity, that is all. But we will not enter upon considerations of this kind, if you please, Monsieur — "

"We will, pardieu!"

"I entreat you —" replied Philippe, with a firmness which signified, "I will not!"

The baron frowned. "And your sister, does she also forget her duties, — her service with Madame?"

"There are some duties which she must subordinate to others, Monsieur."

"Of what nature, Monsieur?"

"Of the most imperious necessity."

The baron rose. "It is a foolish sort of people," he growled, "they who make enigmas."

"Is all this that I am saying really an enigma to you?"

"Absolutely!" replied the baron, with a coolness that astonished Philippe.

"I will explain, then. My sister goes away because she is obliged to fly to avoid dishonor!"

The baron burst out laughing. "Oh, what model children I have!" he cried. "The son abandons the hope of a regiment because he fears dishonor; the daughter gives up a sure position because she is afraid of dishonor. Really, I have returned to the times of Brutus and Lucretia! In my time (a miserable time, doubtless, and not equal to these fine days of philosophy) when a man saw dishonor approaching in the distance; and when he, like you, carried a sword at his side; and when, like you, he had taken lessons from two masters and three provost-marshals, — he ran the first dishonor through with the point of his sword."

Philippe shrugged his shoulders.

"Yes, it is hardly the thing to say to a philanthropist who does not like to see blood flow; but then, officers are not exactly born to be philanthropists."

"Monsieur, I know as well as you the necessities imposed by a point of honor; but the shedding of blood will not redeem —"

"Phrases, phrases of a philosopher!" said the old man, angry almost to the point of becoming majestic. "I think I was going to say of a coward!"

"You did well not to say so," replied Philippe, pale and trembling.

The baron met proudly the implacable and threatening look of his son. "I said," he replied, — "and my logic is not so bad as they would make me believe, — I said that all dishonor in this world comes, not from an action, but from the tattling about it. Ah, it is thus: If you are criminal before the deaf, the blind, the dumb, are you dishonored? You will answer me by that stupid line, 'The crime makes the disgrace, not the scaffold.' That is very well to say to children or women, but to a man, mordieu! we speak a different language. Now I imagine that I have created a man. So, then, if the blind man has seen anything, if the deaf man has heard, if the dumb man has spoken, you seize your sword, and you tear out the eyes of one, and the tympanum of another, and you cut out the tongue of the third, — this is how an attack of dishonor is met by a gentleman of the name of Taverney-Maison-Rouge!"

"A gentleman of that name, Monsieur, always knows that among all obligations the first is that of refusing to commit a dishonorable action; that is the reason why I will not reply to your arguments. But it sometimes happens that opprobrium springs from an inevitable misfortune; this is the case with my sister and myself."

"I come now to your sister. If, according to my system, man ought never to fly from a thing which he can fight against and conquer, woman ought also to stand firm. Of what use is virtue, Monsieur Philosopher, except to repel the attacks of vice? Where is the triumph of this same virtue, if not in the defeat of vice?" and Taverney began to laugh. "Mademoiselle de Taverney has been much frightened, has she not? She feels very weak, then? If so —"

Philippe suddenly drew nearer. "Monsieur," he said, "Mademoiselle de Taverney has not been weak; she was overcome by force! She has fallen helpless into a trap."

"Into a trap?"

"Yes. Keep, I beg, a little of that fervor which animated you just now to blast those scoundrels who have basely plotted the ruin of this spotless honor."

"I do not understand —"

"You shall understand. A villain, I tell you, has introduced some one into the chamber of Mademoiselle de Taverney."

The baron grew pale.

"A villain," continued Philippe, "has resolved that the name of Taverney — mine, yours, Monsieur — should be soiled by an indelible stain. Well! where is your young man's sword to shed a little blood? Is it worth the trouble?"

"Monsieur Philippe —"

"Ah, fear nothing; I accuse no one, I know no one. The crime was plotted in the dark, accomplished in the dark; the result shall disappear in the dark, I am determined! — I who understand in my own way the glory of my house."

"But how do you know?" cried the baron, aroused from his stupor by the allurement of an infamous ambition, of an ignoble hope; "what indications have you?"

"It is a question which no one who may see my sister, your daughter, in a few months will ask, Monsieur le Baron!"

"But, then, Philippe," cried the old man, with eyes full of joy, "in that case the fortune and glory of our house have not vanished; in that case we shall triumph!"

"In that case, you are really the man I believed you," said Philippe, with supreme disgust; "you have betrayed yourself, and you have failed in intelligence before a judge, after failing in heart before your son."

"Insolent!"

"Enough!" replied Philippe. "Tremble lest you awaken, in speaking so loud, the spirit, alas! too insensible, of my mother, who, if she had lived, would have watched over her daughter."

The baron lowered his eyes before the dazzling brightness which flashed from the eyes of his son. "My daughter," he continued after a moment, "shall not leave me without my consent."

"My sister will never see you again, father."

"Has she said so?"

"She sends me to inform you."

The baron wiped, with a trembling hand, his white and moist lips. "Be it so," he said. Then, shrugging his shoulders, "I have been unfortunate in my children," he cried, —"a fool and a brute."

Philippe made no reply. "Good, good!" continued Taverney; "I have no further need of you; go — if the thesis is recited."

"I had still two things more to say to you, Monsieur."

"Speak."

"The first is this; the king has given you a casket of pearls —"

"To your sister, Monsieur."

"To you, Monsieur. Besides, it matters little; my sister never wears such jewels. Mademoiselle de Taverney is not a prostitute; she begs you to return the casket to the one who gave it, or if you fear to disoblige his Majesty, who has done so much for our family, to keep it yourself."

Philippe handed the case to his father. The latter took it, opened it, looked at the pearls, and threw it upon a chiffonniere. "What next?" he said.

"Then, Monsieur, as we are not rich; since you have pledged, or spent even, the property of our mother, for which I will not reproach you — God forbid — "

"You had better not," said the baron, grinding his teeth.

"But still, as we have only Taverney left of this moderate inheritance, we beg you to choose between Taverney and this little hôtel in which we are. Live in one, we will retire to the other."

The baron rumpled his lace frill with a rage which was betrayed only by the movement of his fingers, the moisture of his forehead, and the trembling of his lips. Philippe did not even notice it. He had turned away his head. "I prefer Taverney," said the baron.

"Then we will keep the hôtel."

"As you like."

"When will you set out?"

"This very evening; no, immediately."

Philippe bowed.

"At Taverney," continued the baron, "one may be a king with three thousand francs' income. I shall be twice king." He stretched his hand toward the chiffonniere to take the casket, which he put in his pocket. Then he went toward the door. Suddenly retracing his steps, he said, with a wicked smile, "Philippe, I permit you to sign our name to the first treatise of philosophy which you publish. As for Andrée — for her first work — advise her to call it Louis or Louise; it is a name which brings luck;" and he left with a sneer. Philippe, with blood-shot eye, head on fire, pressed the hilt of his sword, murmuring, "My God! give me patience, grant me forgetfulness!"

CHAPTER LI.

A CASE OF CONSCIENCE.

AFTER having copied with scrupulous care some pages of his "Réveries d'un Promeneur Solitaire," Rousseau had finished a frugal breakfast. Although a retreat had been offered him in the delicious gardens of Ermenonville, Rousseau, hesitating to submit to the slavery of the great, as he said in his mania of misanthropy, still lived in this little lodging of the Rue Plastrière with which we are acquainted.

On her part, Thérèse, having put in order her little house, had just taken her basket to go to market. It was nine o'clock in the morning. The housekeeper, according to her custom, came to ask Rousseau what he would like for dinner that day. Rousseau emerged from his revery, slowly raised his head, and looked at Thérèse like a man half-awake.

"Whatever you wish," he said, "provided there are cherries and flowers."

"We will see, — if all this is not too dear."

"Of course," said Rousseau.

"For indeed," continued Thérèse, "I do not know whether what you do is worth anything; but it seems to me that they do not pay you as formerly."

"You are mistaken, Thérèse. They pay me the same; but I get tired and work less, and then my bookseller is in arrears with me to the extent of half a volume."

"You will see that this one will make you bankrupt again."

"I hope not; he is an honest man."

"An honest man, an honest man! When you have said that, you think you have said all."

"I have said much, at least," replied Rousseau, smiling; "for I cannot say it of everybody."

"It is not surprising; you are so cross."

"Thérèse, we are wandering from the question."

"Yes; you want your cherries, gourmand! you want your flowers, sybarite!"

"What would you have, my good housewife?" replied Rousseau, with the patience of an angel; "my heart and my head are so bad that not being able to go out, I take delight at least in the sight of what God spreads over the country with bountiful hand."

Indeed, Rousseau was pale and exhausted, and his listless hands turned over the leaves his eyes did not read.

Thérèse shook her head. "Very well, very well," said she; "I am going out for an hour; remember that I shall put the key under the mat, and that if you need —"

"Oh, I shall not go out," said Rousseau.

"I know very well that you will not go out, since you cannot stand up; but I say this to you, that you may pay a little attention to persons who may call, and that you may answer the bell if it rings. You may be sure that it is not I."

"Thanks, good Thérèse, thanks; go."

The housekeeper went out, grumbling as usual; and the sound of her heavy and slow step was heard for a long time on the stairs. But as soon as the door was closed Rousseau took advantage of his seclusion to stretch himself deliciously on his chair, looked at the birds that pecked upon the window-sill at some crumbs of bread, and enjoyed the sunlight which shone in between the chimneys of the neighboring houses. His fancy, young and active, had no sooner felt its liberty than it spread its wings like the sparrows after their joyous repast. Suddenly the entrance door creaked on its hinges, which disturbed the philosopher's delightful repose. "What!" he said to himself, "already returned! have I slept, when I thought myself only dreaming?"

The door of the cabinet slowly opened in its turn. Rousseau turned his back to this door; convinced that it was Thérèse who was entering, he did not trouble himself. There was a moment's silence. Then in the midst of this silence, "Pardon, Monsieur," said a voice that made the philosopher start.

Rousseau hastily turned round. "What, Gilbert!" he said.

"Yes, Gilbert; once more, pardon, Monsieur Rousseau."

It was, indeed, Gilbert, — but Gilbert pale, his hair dishevelled, his disordered garments scarcely covering his thin and trembling limbs. His appearance made Rousseau shudder, and drew from him an exclamation of pity which resembled anxiety. Gilbert had the fixed and eager eyes of hungry birds of prey; a smile of affected timidity contrasted with this look, as would the upper part of the eagle's solemn head with the lower portion of the cunning head of a wolf or fox.

"What have you come here for?" cried Rousseau, who did not like disorder, and regarded it in another as the sign of an evil purpose.

"Monsieur, I am hungry," replied Gilbert.

Rousseau shuddered at hearing the sound of this voice, uttering the most terrible word in the human language.

"And how did you get in here?" he asked. "The door was locked."

"Monsieur, I knew that Madame Thérèse generally puts the key under the mat. I waited until Madame Thérèse had gone out, for she does not like me, and perhaps would have refused to receive me or take me to you; then, when you were alone, I came up, took the key from its hiding place, and here I am."

Rousseau raised himself on the two arms of his chair.

"Listen to me," said Gilbert, "for a moment, one single moment; I swear to you, Monsieur Rousseau, that I deserve to be heard."

"Well," replied Rousseau, full of amazement at sight of this face, which no longer expressed any of the sentiments common to men.

"I should tell you that I am reduced to such an extremity that I do not know whether to steal, kill myself, or do something still worse. Oh, do not be alarmed, my master and protector," said Gilbert in a voice full of gentleness, "for I think, on reflection, that I shall die without having to kill myself. During the eight days since I fled from Trianon I have wandered in the woods and fields without eating anything but green vegetables or wild fruits. I am weak. I am perishing with fatigue and hunger. As for stealing, it is not from you that I shall attempt it; I like your house too well, Monsieur Rousseau. As for that third thing, oh! to accomplish it —"

"Well?" said Rousseau.

"Well, it needs resolution, which I have come here to seek."

"Are you mad?" cried Rousseau.

"No, Monsieur; but I am very unhappy, full of despair, and would have drowned myself in the Seine this morning, but for a reflection which occurred to me."

"What reflection?"

"Why, that you have written, 'Suicide is a robbery committed on mankind.'"

Rousseau looked at the young man as if to say to him, "Do you flatter yourself that I was thinking of you in writing this?"

"Oh, I understand," murmured Gilbert.

"I do not think so," said Rousseau.

"You mean to say, 'Would your death, yours, — the death of a worthless fellow, who possesses nothing, who does nothing, — be worthy to be called an event?'"

"That is not the question," said Rousseau, ashamed of being divined; "but you were hungry, I think."

"Yes; I said so."

"Well, since you knew where the door was, you also know where the bread is; go to the cupboard, take some bread, and go away."

Gilbert did not stir.

"If it is not bread you want, but money, I do not think you wicked enough to maltreat an old man, who was your protector, in the very house that has given you shelter. Be satisfied, then, with this little — here;" and he offered him some pieces of money which he took from his pocket.

Gilbert stayed his hand. "Oh!" he said, with poignant grief, "it is a question neither of money nor bread; you did not understand what I meant when I spoke of killing myself. If I do not kill myself, it is because my life may now be useful to some one, — because my death might rob some one, Monsieur. You, who know all the social laws, all the natural obligations, tell me if there is in this world any tie which should bind a man to life who wishes to die!"

"There are many," said Rousseau.

"To be a father," murmured Gilbert, "is that one of the ties? Look at me while you answer, Monsieur Rousseau, that I may read it in your eyes."

"Yes," stammered Rousseau, — "yes, most certainly. Why this question from you?"

"Monsieur, your words will be a law to me," said Gilbert; "consider them carefully, I entreat you, Monsieur. I am so unhappy that I would like to kill myself; but — but I have a child!"

Rousseau started in astonishment.

"Oh, do not mock at me, Monsieur!" Gilbert said humbly; "you will think you are only pricking my heart when indeed you are opening it as with a poniard. I repeat it, I have a child!"

Rousseau looked at him without answering.

"But for this I should be already dead," continued Gilbert; "in this alternative I said to myself that you would give me good advice, and so I came."

"But," asked Rousseau, "why have I advice to give you? Did you consult me when you committed the fault?"

"Monsieur, this fault — " and Gilbert, with a strange expression, approached Rousseau.

"Well?" said the latter.

"This fault," replied Gilbert, "there are those who call it a crime."

"A crime! All the more reason, then, that you should not speak to me of it. I am a man like you, and not a confessor. Besides, what you tell me does not surprise me. I always foresaw that you would turn out badly; you have a wicked nature."

"No, Monsieur," replied Gilbert, shaking his head, gloomily, — "no, Monsieur, you are mistaken; my mind is unnatural, or rather, perverted. I have read many books which taught me the equality of castes, pride of spirit, the dignity of instincts. These books, Monsieur, had so illustrious authors that a poor peasant like myself might well be led astray. I am lost."

"Ah, ah! I see what you are aiming at, Monsieur Gilbert."

"I?"

"Yes; you are blaming my doctrine. Have you not free will?"

"I do not blame, Monsieur; I say only that I have read. I blame my credulity; I believed, I fell. There are two causes for my crime, — you are the first, and I come, in the first place, to you; I shall next go to the second, but in his turn, and at the proper time."

"In short, what is it you ask of me?"

"Neither gifts, nor shelter, nor bread even, although I am an outcast and hungry. No, I ask of you moral support; I ask you to confirm your doctrine. I ask you to restore by a word my strength, which is broken down, not by inanition in my arms and legs, but by doubt in my head and heart. Monsieur Rousseau, I entreat you, therefore, to tell me if what I have felt for the past eight days is the pain of hunger in the muscles of my stomach, or if it is the torture of remorse in the organs of my mind. In committing a crime, Monsieur, I have begotten a child. Well, then, tell me, must I tear my hair in bitter despair, and roll in the dust crying, Pardon! or must I exclaim, like the woman in Scripture, 'I have done as others; if there is among men a better one than I, let him stone me'? In a word, Monsieur Rousseau, you who must have felt what I feel, answer this question. Say, say, is it natural for a father to abandon his child?"

Gilbert had no sooner spoken thus than Rousseau became paler than Gilbert himself, and losing self-control,

"What right have you to speak to me thus?" he stammered.

"Because, in your house, Monsieur Rousseau, in this garret where you showed me hospitality, I read what you have written on this subject; because you have declared that children born in misery belong to the State, which ought to take care of them; because, in short, you have always considered yourself an honest man, although you have not shrunk from abandoning children which were born to you."

"Miserable fellow," said Rousseau, "you have read my book, and you use such language to me!"

"Well?" said Gilbert.

"Well, you have a wicked mind joined to a wicked heart."

"Monsieur Rousseau!"

"You have misread my books, as you misread human life! You have seen but the surface of the pages, as you see only that of the face! Ah, you expect to make me an accomplice in your crime by citing to me the books I have written, — by saying to me, 'You confess having done this, therefore I may do it!' But, unhappy man, what you do not know, what you have not read in my books, what you have not divined, is that the whole life of him whom you take as an example, this life of misery and suffering, I could exchange for a gilded existence, — voluptuous, full of splendor and pleasure. Have I less talent than Monsieur de Voltaire, and could I not produce as much as he? By applying myself less than I do, could I not sell my books as dear as he sells his, and bring the money rolling into my coffer, keeping always a coffer half-full at the disposal of my book-sellers? Gold attracts gold; do you not know it? I also could have had a carriage for a young and beautiful mistress to ride in, and you may be sure this luxury would not have dried up the source of an inexhaustible poesy. Have I not passions still? Observe carefully my eyes, which at sixty years yet glow with the ardors of youth and desire. You who have read or copied my books, come, do you not recall that in spite of the decline of years, notwithstanding very real and very serious troubles, my heart, still young, seems to have inherited, in order to suffer more, all the strength of the other parts of my organization? Weighed down with infirmities which prevent me from walking, I feel that I have more vigor and life for sustaining sorrow than I ever had in my youth for the reception of the rare felicities which God has bestowed upon me."

"I know all that, Monsieur," said Gilbert. "I have observed you closely and have understood you."

"Then, if you have observed me closely, if you have understood me, has not my life for you a meaning which others do not see? Does not this strange self-denial, which is unnatural to me, mean that I wish to expiate —"

"Expiate!" murmured Gilbert.

"Have you not understood," continued the philosopher, "that this misery having driven me in the very first place to make an unreasonable resolution, I have since been unable to find any other excuse for this resolution than disinterestedness and perseverance in misery? Have you not understood that I have punished my mind by humiliation? For it was my mind that was guilty, — my mind, which had recourse to paradoxes to justify itself, while on the other hand, I punished my heart by ceaseless remorse."

"Ah!" cried Gilbert, "it is thus you reply to me! it is thus that you philosophers, who fling your written precepts at mankind, plunge us in despair, and then blame us if we are angry with you! Eh! of what consequence is your humiliation to me, when it is secret; your remorse, when it is unknown? Oh, woe! woe to you, woe! and may the crimes committed in your name fall upon your own head!"

"On my head, you say, curses, — and with them, punishment; for you forget the punishment. Oh, that would be too much! You who have sinned as I have, you condemn yourself as severely as you do me!"

"More severely even," said Gilbert; "for my punishment will be terrible; for since I have no longer faith in anything, I shall let my adversary, or rather my enemy, kill me, — a suicide which my misery recommends, which my conscience excuses; for now my death is no longer a robbery of mankind, and when you wrote that, you wrote what you did not think."

"Stop, unhappy man!" said Rousseau, "stop! have you not done harm enough with foolish credulity? Must you do more still with stupid scepticism? You have spoken to me of a child? You said that you were, or were about to be, a father?"

"I said so," repeated Gilbert.

"Do you realize what it is," murmured Rousseau, in a low voice, "to drag with you, not to death, but to shame, creatures born to breathe freely and innocently the pure air of virtue, a gift of God to every man born into the world? Let me tell you nevertheless, how horrible my condition is. When I abandoned my children, I imagined that society, which all superiority offends, would throw this wrong in my face as an ignominious reproach; then I justified myself with paradoxes; then I employed ten years of my life in advising mothers how to educate their children, — I who did not know what it was to be a father; in advising the nation how to make its citizens brave and honest, — I who had been weak and corrupt. Then one day the executioner, who avenges society, the nation, and the orphan, unable to reach me, seized my book and burned it as a living shame to the country whose air it had poisoned. Decide, divine judge! was I right in action; was I wrong in my precepts? You do not answer; God himself would be perplexed, — God, who holds in his hand the unerring scales of justice. Well, I have a heart which solves the question; and this heart has said to me from its very depths: 'Woe to you, unnatural father, who have abandoned your children! Woe to you, if you meet the young prostitute who laughs brazenly at night at the street corners; for it may be your abandoned daughter, whom hunger has driven to infamy! Woe to you, if you meet in the street the arrested thief, with his guilt fresh upon him; for he may be your abandoned son, whom hunger has driven to crime!'"

After saying these words, Rousseau who had risen, fell back upon his chair. "And yet," he continued, with a broken voice which had the accent of a prayer, "I have not been as guilty as they believe; I have seen an unfeeling mother, an accomplice in my crime, forget like the animals, and I said to myself, 'God has allowed the mother to forget; it is therefore right for her to forget.' Well, I was at that time in error; and now — since you have heard me say to you what I never before said to any one — you must remain in error no longer."

"So," asked the young man, knitting his brow, "you would never have abandoned your children if you had had money enough to support them?"

"If only what was absolutely needful, — no, never; I swear it, never!" and Rousseau solemnly stretched his trembling hand toward heaven.

"Twenty thousand francs," asked Gilbert, "is that enough to support a child?"

"Yes; it is enough," said Rousseau.

"Good," said Gilbert; "thanks, Monsieur; now I know what remains for me to do."

"And in any event, young as you are, with your labor, you can support your child," said Rousseau. "But you have spoken of crime; they are looking for you, pursuing you perhaps?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"Well, conceal yourself here, my boy; you are always welcome to the little garret."

"You are a man I love, Master!" cried Gilbert, "and your offer fills me with joy. Indeed, I ask only a shelter; as for my bread, I will earn it. You know that I am not an idler."

"Well," said Rousseau, appearing uneasy, "if the thing is settled, go up; do not let Madame Rousseau find you here. She never goes up to the garret now; for since your departure we lock up nothing. Your mattress is still there; make yourself as comfortable as possible."

"Thanks, Monsieur; if that is so I am more fortunate than I deserve to be."

"Now is that all you desire?" said Rousseau, looking toward the door.

"No, Monsieur; one word more, if you please."

"Speak."

"One day at Luciennes you accused me of having betrayed you; I did not betray any one, Monsieur, I was pursuing my love affair."

"Let us not speak of that. Is that all?"

"Yes; now, Monsieur Rousseau, when we are ignorant of the address of any one at Paris, can we obtain it?"

"Undoubtedly, when that person is known."

"He of whom I speak is very well known."

"His name?"

"Monsieur le Comte Joseph Balsamo."

Rousseau shuddered; he had not forgotten the meeting in the Rue Plastrière. "What do you want with this man?" he asked.

"A very simple thing. I have accused you — you, my master — of being morally the cause of my crime, since I believed I was only obeying a natural law."

"And I have undeceived you?" cried Rousseau, trembling at the idea of this responsibility.

"You have enlightened me, at least."

"Well, what were you going to say?"

"That my crime had not only a moral cause, but also a physical one."

"And this Comte de Balsamo is the physical cause, is he not?"

"Yes. I have copied examples, I have seized an opportunity; and in this — I see it now — I have acted like a wild animal, and not like a man. You gave me the example; Monsieur le Comte de Balsamo, the opportunity. Do you know where he lives?"

"Yes."

"Give me his address, then."

"Rue Saint Claude."

"Thanks; I shall go to his house immediately."

"Take care, child," exclaimed Rousseau; "he is powerful and adroit."

"Fear nothing, Monsieur Rousseau. I am determined, and you have taught me to keep my temper."

"Quick, quick, — go upstairs!" cried Rousseau; "I hear the gate shut; it is, doubtless, Madame Rousseau coming in. Hide yourself in the garret until she has come in, then you can go away."

"The key, if you please?"

"On the nail, in the kitchen, as usual."

"Adieu, Monsieur, adieu."

"Take some bread; I will prepare you some work for to-night."

"Thanks!" And Gilbert slipped out so quickly that he was already in his garret before Thérèse had reached the second floor.

Furnished with the precious information given him by Rousseau, Gilbert made no delay in putting his project into execution. Indeed, Thérèse had no sooner closed the door of her apartment than the young man, who from the door of his garret had watched all her movements, descended the stairs as rapidly as if he had not been weakened by a long fast. His head was full of hopeful plans, of bitter memories, and over all hovered an avenging spirit which spurred him on with its complaints and accusations. He arrived at Rue Saint Claude in a state difficult to describe. As he entered the court of the hôtel, Balsamo was accompanying to the door the Prince de Rohan, who was paying his generous alchemist a visit. As the prince was leaving, stopping once more to renew his thanks to Balsamo, the poor ragged fellow slipped in like a dog, not daring to look about him for fear of being dazzled.

The carriage of Prince Louis awaited him on the boulevard; the prelate slowly crossed the space that separated him from his carriage, which rapidly rolled away as soon as the door was closed upon him. Balsamo had looked after him sadly, and when the carriage had disappeared he turned toward the steps, upon which stood a sort of beggar in the attitude of supplication. Balsamo stepped up to him, and although his lips were silent, his expressive look was an interrogatory.

"A quarter of an hour's audience, if you please, Monsieur le Comte," said the young man in the ragged clothes.

"Who are you, my friend?" asked Balsamo, with supreme gentleness.

"Do you not recognize me?" asked Gilbert.

"No, — but no matter; come," replied Balsamo, not disturbed by the strange expression of the solicitor, any more than by his ragged garments and his importunity. Walking before him he led him into the nearest apartment, where, seating himself, without change of tone or expression, he said, "You asked if I recognized you?"

"Yes, Monsieur le Comte."

"Indeed, I think I have seen you somewhere."

"At Taverney, Monsieur, when you came there on the night before the arrival of the dauphiness."

"What were you doing at Taverney?"

"I lived there."

"As servant of the family?"

"No; as member of the family."

"You have left Taverney?"

"Yes, Monsieur; nearly three years since."

"And you came —"

"To Paris, where at first I studied with Monsieur Rousseau; after which I was placed in the gardens at Trianon in the capacity of under-gardener, through the influence of Monsieur de Jussieu."

"These are great names you mention, my friend. What do you want with me?"

"I will tell you;" and pausing, he looked at Balsamo steadily. "Do you remember," he continued, "coming to Trianon during the night of the great storm, six weeks ago next Friday?"

Balsamo's seriousness was changed to melancholy, as he said, "Yes, I remember; you saw me there, perhaps?"

"I saw you."

"Then you come to be paid for the secret?" said Balsamo, in a threatening tone.

"No, Monsieur; for I am more interested than you in keeping this secret."

"Then you are the one they call Gilbert?" said Balsamo.

"Yes, Monsieur le Comte."

Balsamo looked with long and searching gaze at the young man whose name carried with it so terrible a charge. He was surprised, he who was a judge of men, at the assurance of his bearing, at his dignity of speech. Gilbert was standing before a table upon which he did not lean. One of his thin hands, white, even though accustomed to garden work, was hidden in his bosom; the other fell gracefully at his side.

"I see by your countenance," said Balsamo, "why you have come here; you know that Mademoiselle de Taverney has brought a terrible charge against you, that by the aid of science I have forced her to tell the truth; you have come to upbraid me for obtaining this evidence, have you not? to reproach me with this conjuring of a secret which, but for me, would have remained buried in darkness as in a tomb?"

Gilbert only nodded his head.

"You are wrong, however," continued Balsamo; "for, admitting that I had wished to inform against you without being driven to it in my own interest, — for they accused me, — admitting that I had treated you as an enemy, that I had attacked you while defending myself; admitting, I say, all this, you have no right to say anything, for indeed you have committed a base deed."

Gilbert tore his breast with his finger-nails, but answered nothing.

"The brother will pursue you, and the sister will have you killed," replied Balsamo, "if you have the imprudence to walk as you do about the streets of Paris."

"Oh, as to that, it is of little consequence to me," said Gilbert.

"What! of little consequence to you?"

"Yes; I loved Mademoiselle Andrée. I loved her as no other will ever love her; but she scorned me, — me whose sentiments for her were so respectful; she scorned me, — me who had already held her twice in my arms without even daring to touch with my lips the hem of her dress."

"Precisely, and you have made her pay for this respect; you have avenged yourself for her scorn, by what, — by a snare?"

"Oh, no, no! the snare did not originate with me; an opportunity for committing the crime was furnished me."

"By whom?"

"By you."

Balsamo drew himself up as if a serpent had stung him. "By me?" he cried.

"By you; yes, Monsieur, by you," repeated Gilbert. "Monsieur, you magnetized Mademoiselle Andrée; then you fled. As you went away, her limbs failed her, and she fell. I took her in my arms to carry her to her chamber; I felt her body touching mine, — that contact would have animated a marble statue! I, who loved, yielded to my love. Am I then so criminal as they say, Monsieur? I ask it of you, — of you, the cause of my misfortune."

Balsamo fixed upon Gilbert a look filled with sadness and pity. "You are right, child," he said; "it is I who have caused your crime and the misfortune of this young girl."

"And instead of providing a remedy for it, — you who are so powerful, and who ought to be so good, — you have aggravated the misfortune of the young girl, you have exposed the criminal to death."

"It is true," replied Balsamo, "and what you say is reasonable. For some time past, look you, young man, I have been a thing accursed, and all the projects of my brain assume, when executed, threatening and pernicious forms. This is the consequence of misfortunes that I also have suffered, and which you do not comprehend. At the same time it is no reason why I should make others suffer; tell me what you want."

"I ask the means of repairing all, Monsieur le Comte, — crime and misfortune."

"You love this young girl?"

"Oh, yes!"

"There are many kinds of love. In what way do you love her?"

"Before possessing her, I loved her to distraction; now, I love her madly. I should die of grief if she received me with anger; I should die of joy if she allowed me to kiss her feet."

"She is of noble birth, but she is poor," said Balsamo, reflecting.

"Yes."

"Yet her brother is a man of heart, who, I think, cares but little for the prerogative of birth. What would happen if you asked this brother for his sister in marriage?"

"He would kill me," Gilbert replied coldly; "however, as I desire death more than I fear it, if you advise me to make this demand, I will do so."

Balsamo considered. "You are a man of sense," he said, "and we may say that you are a man of heart, although your action was really criminal, my complicity apart. Well, seek out not Monsieur de Taverney the son, but the Baron de Taverney, his father, and say to him that on the day he permits you to marry his daughter, you will bring a dowry to Mademoiselle Andrée."

"I cannot say that, Monsieur le Comte; I have nothing."

"And I tell you that you shall bring her a dowry of one hundred thousand crowns, which I will give you to repair the misfortune and the crime, as you said just now."

"He will not believe me; he knows that I am poor."

"Well, if he does not believe you, show him these bank-notes, and he will no longer doubt." While saying this, Balsamo opened the drawer of a table, and counted thirty notes of ten thousand francs each. He then handed them to Gilbert.

"And is this money?" said the young man.

"Read."

Gilbert cast an eager glance at the roll he was holding in his hand, and saw the truth of what Balsamo said. A joyful light shone in his eyes. "It may be possible!" he cried. "But, no; such generosity would be too sublime."

"You are distrustful," said Balsamo; "you are right; but accustom yourself to choose your subjects for suspicion. Take, then, these hundred thousand crowns, and go to Monsieur de Taverney."

"Monsieur," said Gilbert, "while such a sum is given by word only I cannot believe in the reality of the gift."

Balsamo took a pen and wrote: —

I give to Gilbert as dowry, the day he signs his contract of marriage with Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney, the sum of one hundred thousand crowns, which I have delivered him in advance, in the hope of a successful negotiation.

JOSEPH BALSAMO.

"Take this paper, go, and doubt no longer."

Gilbert received the paper with a trembling hand, "Monsieur," he said, "if I owe you so much happiness, you shall be the god I will worship upon the earth."

"There is but one God to worship," Balsamo answered seriously, "and I am not he. Go, my friend."

"A last favor, Monsieur."

"What is it?"

"Give me fifty francs."

"You ask me for fifty francs when you already have three hundred thousand in your hand?"

"These three hundred thousand francs are not mine," said Gilbert, "until the day when Mademoiselle Andrée consents to marry me."

"And for what are these fifty francs?"

"To purchase a decent coat in which I may present myself to the baron."

"There, my friend," said Balsamo; and he gave him the fifty francs. Upon this he dismissed Gilbert, and with the same slow and melancholy step returned to his apartments.

CHAPTER LII.

GILBERT'S PROJECTS.

Once in the street, Gilbert's feverish imagination was cooled, which at the last words of the count had carried him beyond not only the probable, but also the possible. Arrived at the Rue Pastourel, he sat down upon a milestone, and casting his eyes about him to assure himself that he was not watched, he drew from his pocket the bank-notes all rumpled by the pressure of his hand. A terrible thought had occurred to him, and brought the perspiration to his brow. "Let us see," he said, looking at the notes, "if this man has not deceived me; let us see if he has not set a trap for me; let us see if he does not send me to certain death under pretence of securing my happiness; let us see if he does not treat me as they do the sheep which they allure to the shambles by offering it a bunch of flowering herbs. I have heard it said that there are a great many false notes in circulation, with which the roués of the court cheat the girls of the opera. Let us see if the count has not taken me for a dupe." And he took out of the roll one of the notes of ten thousand francs; then going into a shop, he asked, showing the note, the address of a banker who would change it, having been charged with this commission by his master, he said.

The shop-keeper looked at the note, turned it over and over admiringly, — for it was a magnificent sum, and his shop was small; then he directed him to the banker in the Rue Sainte Avoie, — therefore the note was good.

Gilbert, happy and elated, gave reins to his imagination, secured more carefully than ever the roll of bills in his handkerchief, and noticing in the Rue Sainte Avoie a dealer in second-hand clothes whose display attracted him, he purchased, for twenty-five francs, — that is, for one of the two louis Balsamo had given him, — a complete suit of maroon cloth whose neatness pleased him, a pair of black silk stockings, a little faded, and shoes with bright buckles, a good linen shirt completed the costume, neat rather than rich, at which Gilbert gave one admiring glance in the mirror of the establishment. Then, leaving his old garments in addition to the twenty-five francs, he put the precious handkerchief in his pocket, and went from the shop of the tailor to that of the hair-dresser, who in a quarter of an hour made this very remarkable head of Balsamo's protégé elegant, and even beautiful.

At last, when all these operations had been accomplished, Gilbert bought a small loaf in a baker's shop near the Place Louis XV., and ate it quickly as he took the road to Versailles. At the fountain of the Conférence he stopped to drink. Then he continued his journey, refusing every proposition of the coachmen, who could not comprehend why a young man so neatly dressed should wish to save fifteen sous at the expense of his polished shoes. What would they have said if they had known that this young man who was travelling on foot had in his pocket three hundred thousand francs? But Gilbert had his reasons for travelling on foot, — in the first place, his firm resolution not to spend more than was absolutely necessary; secondly, the need of seclusion to indulge at his pleasure in pantomime and monologues. God alone knows what happy dreams of the future filled the head of this young man during his walk of two hours and a half. In this time he had walked more than four leagues without noticing the distance, without feeling the least fatigue, so vigorous was his constitution.

All his plans were made, and he had determined to introduce his demand in the following manner: To approach Taverney with ceremonious words; then, when he had the authority of the baron, to address Mademoiselle Andrée with so much eloquence that she would not only pardon him, but would conceive a respect and affection for the author of the pathetic speech he had prepared. The more he thought of it, the more hope triumphed over fear; and it seemed impossible to Gilbert that a girl in Andrée's position should not accept the reparation offered by love, when this love was accompanied by a fortune of one hundred thousand crowns.

Gilbert, in building these castles in the air, was as innocent and honest as the most simple child of primitive times. He forgot all the wrong he had done, and was perhaps more true-hearted than one would think. All these batteries prepared, he arrived with anxious heart at the grounds of Trianon. Once there, he was ready for everything, — for the first wrath of Philippe, which the generosity of his proposal must, he thought, assuage; for the first disdain of Andrée, which must yield to his love; for the first insults of the baron, which his gold would soothe.

Indeed, Gilbert, quite removed from the society in which he had lived, knew instinctively that three hundred thousand francs in his pockets was a safe armor. What he dreaded most was the sight of Andrée's sufferings; in presence of this misfortune only he feared his weakness, — a weakness that would take from him a part of the means necessary for the success of his cause. He entered the gardens, looking, not without pride, which suited his face well, upon all these workmen, yesterday his companions, to-day his inferiors. The first question he asked was in reference to the Baron de Taverney. He addressed himself naturally to the lackey on service at the offices.

"The baron is not at Trianon," replied the latter.

Gilbert hesitated a moment. "And Monsieur Philippe?" he asked.

"Oh, Monsieur Philippe has gone away with Mademoiselle Andrée!"

"Gone away!" cried Gilbert.

"Yes."

"Mademoiselle Andrée has gone, then?"

"Five days ago."

"To Paris?"

The lackey made a movement as if to say, "I know nothing about it."

"What! you know nothing about it?" cried Gilbert. "Mademoiselle Andrée has gone away without any one knowing where she was going? There must be a reason for her going away, however."

"What nonsense!" replied the lackey, showing little respect for Gilbert's maroon coat; "of course there was a cause for her going away."

"And why did she go?"

"For change of air."

"For change of air?" repeated Gilbert.

"Yes; it seemed that the air of Trianon did not agree with her, and by the doctor's orders she has left Trianon."

It was useless to question further; it was evident that the lackey had said all that he knew about Mademoiselle de Taverney. And yet Gilbert, amazed, could not believe what he had heard. He ran to Andrée's chamber, and found the door closed. Fragments of glass, bits of straw and hay, threads from the mattress strewing the floor, proved to him plainly that there had been a removal. Gilbert entered his old chamber, which remained just as he had left it. Andrée's window was open to admit air to the apartment; he could look through into the antechamber. The apartment was quite empty.

Gilbert then gave way to extravagant grief; he beat his head against the wall, he wrung his hands, he rolled on the floor. Then like a madman, he rushed out of the garret, descended the stairs as if he had wings, plunged into the woods, his hands clutching his hair, and with cries and imprecations he fell down in the midst of the bushes, cursing life and those who had given him birth.

"Oh, it is over, all over!" he murmured. "God does not wish me to find her again; God wishes me to die of remorse, of despair and love. Thus I shall expiate my crime; thus I shall avenge her whom I have wronged. Where can she be? At Taverney! Oh, I will go, I will go! I will go even to the end of the world; I will mount to the clouds, if necessary. Oh, I will trace her, and follow her even if I sink by the way from hunger and fatigue!"

But relieved by degrees by this outburst of grief, Gilbert arose, breathed more freely, looked about him more calmly, and continued at a slow pace his journey to Paris, which he was five hours in accomplishing.

"The baron," he said to himself, with some show of reason, "may not have left Paris; I will speak to him. Mademoiselle Andrée has fled. Indeed, she could not remain at Trianon; but her father must know where she has gone. A word from him will put me on her track; and besides he may recall his daughter if I can succeed in satisfying his avarice."

Gilbert, strong in this new idea, entered Paris about seven o'clock, — that is, at about the hour when the crowd in the Champs-Élysées were enjoying the cool evening air, when Paris fluctuated between the early fogs of evening and the first rays of that artificial light which extended the day to twenty-four hours.

The young man, carrying out his resolution, went directly to the door of the little hôtel in the Rue Coq-Héron, and knocked without waiting a moment. Silence only answered him. He redoubled his knocks, but without result. This last resource, then, upon which he had relied, had failed him. Mad with rage, biting his hands to punish his body for suffering less than his soul, Gilbert quickly turned the corner of the street, pushed the spring of Rousseau's door, and ascended the stairs. The handkerchief which enclosed the thirty bank-notes also held the key of the garret door. Gilbert rushed in, as he would have thrown himself into the Seine if it had been there. Then, as the evening was fine and the fleecy clouds were sporting in the azure of the sky, as a sweet perfume rose from the lime and chestnut trees in the evening twilight, as the bat beat with its silent wings on the panes of the little window, Gilbert, recalled to life by all these sensations, approached the window, and seeing in the midst of the trees the pavilion of the garden, where once he found Andrée whom he thought to be forever lost, his heart was at the point of breaking, and he fell almost fainting on the edge of the gutter, lost in vague and stupid contemplation.

CHAPTER LIII.

A VAIN STRUGGLE; IN WHICH GILBERT FINDS THAT IT IS EASIER TO COMMIT A CRIME THAN TO CONQUER A PREJUDICE.

As the sensation of grief which had had possession of Gilbert decreased, his ideas became clearer and more definite. In the mean time the increasing darkness prevented him from distinguishing anything; then an unconquerable desire seized him to see the trees, the house, the walks, which the darkness blended into one mass, over which the air wandered as over an abyss. He remembered that one evening, in happier times, he had wished to procure news of Andrée, to see her, to hear her speak even, and that at the peril of his life, suffering still from a sickness which followed the thirtieth of May, he had slid down by the gutter-pipe from the second floor to the bottom, — that is, into the blessed garden itself. At that time there was great danger in forcing a way into that house in which the baron lived, and where Andrée was so well guarded; and yet Gilbert remembered how delightful the situation was, in spite of its danger, and how joyously beat his heart when he heard the sound of her voice. "What if I should do it again," he said to himself; "what if I should go once more, and on my knees search the sanded paths for the adored footprints of my mistress."

This word Gilbert spoke almost aloud, taking a strange pleasure in uttering it. He interrupted his monologue to look searchingly at the place where he thought the pavilion should be. Then, after a moment's silence and investigation, "There is no indication," he added, "that the pavilion is inhabited by other tenants, — neither light, nor sound, nor open doors. I will go!"

Gilbert had the merit of quickly putting into execution a resolution once formed. He opened the door of the garret, descended on tiptoe like a sylph to the door of Rousseau, and having reached the second floor he boldly seized the gutter-pipe and slid to the ground, at the risk of ruining the pair of breeches new that morning. Having reached the foot of the trellis he experienced once more all the emotions of his first visit to the pavilion; the gravel creaked under his feet, and he recognized the little door by which Nicole had introduced Monsieur de Beausire. At last he went to the steps to press his lips upon the brass button of the window-blind, saying to himself that doubtless Andrée's hand had touched this button. Gilbert's crime had turned his love into a sort of religion.

Suddenly a sound from the inside startled the young man, — a faint and dull sound like that of a light step on the floor. Gilbert retreated. His face was livid; and for the past eight or ten days he had been so distressed in mind that, on seeing a glimmer of light through the door, he thought that superstition — that daughter of ignorance and remorse — held before his eyes one of her sinister torches, and that it was this torch which was shining through the slats of the blinds. He imagined that his soul, loaded with terror, conjured another soul, and that one of those hallucinations which visit madmen or enthusiasts had now come upon him. Nevertheless the step and the light approached nearer. Gilbert saw and heard without belief. But the blind suddenly opening, just when the young man drew near to look through the slats, he was thrown by the shock against the wall; he uttered a loud cry and fell upon his knees. It was not so much the shock which prostrated him thus as the sight exposed to his view; in this house, which he thought deserted, at the door of which he had knocked without answer, he had just seen Andrée.

The young girl, for it was she and not a spirit, uttered a cry as Gilbert had; then, less frightened, for she doubtless expected some one; "What is it?" she asked. "Who are you? What do you want?"

"Oh, pardon, pardon, Mademoiselle!" murmured Gilbert, his face humbly turned toward the ground.

"Gilbert, Gilbert here!" cried Andrée, with a surprise free from fear or anger; "Gilbert in this garden! Why have you come here, my friend?"

This last title vibrated painfully in the heart of the young man. "Oh!" he said, with emotion, "do not crush me, Mademoiselle; be merciful, I have suffered so much!"

Andrée looked at Gilbert in astonishment, and like a woman who did not understand such humility. "In the first place," she said, "get up, and explain to me why you are here."

"Oh, Mademoiselle," cried Gilbert, "I will not rise until you have pardoned me!"

"What have you done to me that I should pardon you? Speak, explain yourself. At all events," she continued, with a sad smile, "as the offence cannot be great, the pardon will be easy. Did Philippe give you the key?"

"The key?"

"Certainly; it was agreed that I should admit no one in his absence, and he must have given you the means to enter, unless you have climbed over the walls."

"Your brother, Monsieur Philippe?" stammered Gilbert. "No, no, it is not he; but never mind your brother, Mademoiselle. You have not gone away, then? you have not, then, left France? Oh, happiness! unhoped for happiness!"

Gilbert had risen on one knee, and with arms extended, he returned thanks to Heaven with strange earnestness.

Andrée leaned toward him and looking at him uneasily, she said, "You speak like a madman, Monsieur Gilbert, and you will tear my dress; let go my dress, I beg you, and put an end to this comedy."

Gilbert rose. "You are angry," he said; "but I must not complain, for I have deserved it well. I know that I ought not to have presented myself in this way; but I did not know that you were living in this pavilion; I believed it empty, solitary; what I came to seek was a remembrance of you, — nothing more. Chance alone — Indeed, I no longer know what I am saying. Pardon me; I wished to speak first to Monsieur your father, but he had disappeared."

Andrée made a movement. "To my father," she said; "and why to my father?"

Gilbert was deceived by this reply. "Oh, because I fear you too much," he said; "and yet I know very well that it is better that everything should be arranged between you and me; it is the surest way of repairing all."

"Repairing! what is that?" asked Andrée, "and what must be repaired? Speak!"

Gilbert looked at her with eyes full of love and humility. "Oh, do not be angry," he said; "certainly it is a great boldness on my part, I who am of so little consequence; it was a great boldness, I say, to look so high, but the injury is done."

Andrée started.

"The crime, if you will," continued Gilbert; "yes, the crime, for really it was a great crime. Well, of this crime accuse fatality, Mademoiselle, but never my heart —"

"Your heart! your crime! fatality! You are mad, Monsieur Gilbert, and you frighten me."

"Oh, it is impossible that with so much respect, so much remorse, with bowed head, clasped hands, I can inspire in you any other sentiment than that of pity. Mademoiselle, listen to what I am about to say, and it is a sacred pledge I make before God and men. I wish my whole life to be consecrated to expiating the wrong of a moment. I wish your future happiness to be so great that it shall efface all the griefs of the past. Mademoiselle —" Gilbert hesitated. "Mademoiselle, consent to a marriage which will sanctify a criminal union."

Andrée drew back a step.

"No, no," said Gilbert; "I am not a madman; do not attempt to fly, do not snatch away the hands which I clasp; for pity's sake, consent to be my wife."

"Your wife?" exclaimed Andrée, believing that she herself had become mad.

"Oh," continued Gilbert, with heart-rending sobs; "oh, say that you pardon me that horrible night; say that my crime filled you with horror, but say also that you forgive me; say that my love, restrained so long, justified my crime!"

"Wretch!" exclaimed Andrée, with savage fury, "it was you, then? Oh, my God! my God!" and Andrée held her head between her hands as if to prevent the revolting thought from escaping.

Gilbert drew back silent and petrified before this beautiful and pale Medusa's face, which expressed both terror and astonishment.

"Was this misfortune reserved for me, my God!" cried the young girl, with growing excitement, "to see my name doubly dishonored, — dishonored by the crime, dishonored by the criminal? Answer, wretch! answer villain! It was you, then?"

"She did not know it!" murmured Gilbert, astounded.

"Help! help!" cried Andrée, returning to her apartment. "Philippe! Philippe! here Philippe!"

Gilbert, who had followed her, gloomy and in despair, looked about him, seeking either a place in which to fall nobly under the blows he expected, or something with which to defend himself. But no one came at Andrée's call; she was alone in the apartment.

"Alone! oh, alone!" cried the young girl, in a burst of rage. "Away, villain; do not tempt the anger of God!"

Gilbert gently raised his head. "Your anger," he murmured, "is to me the most fearful of all anger; do not overwhelm me, then, Mademoiselle, have pity!" and he clasped his hands in supplication.

"Assassin! assassin!" screamed the young woman.

"But you will not hear me, then?" exclaimed Gilbert. "Listen to me first at least, and have me killed afterward, if you wish."

"Listen to you! listen to you! — still more torture; and what have you to say? let me hear!"

"What I said just now; that I have committed a crime, — a crime very excusable to one who will read my heart, — and that I bring reparation for that crime."

"Oh!" cried Andrée, "this, then, is the meaning of the word which horrified me even before I comprehended it, — a marriage! I think that was what you said?"

"Mademoiselle!" stammered Gilbert.

"A marriage," continued the proud young girl, more and more excited; "oh, it is not anger I feel toward you, it is scorn, it is hatred! with this scorn there is a feeling so humiliating and at the same time so appalling that I do not understand how any one living can bear the expression of it as I fling it in your face."

Gilbert turned pale; tears of rage sparkled on his eyelashes; his lips were pinched, whitening like two threads of pearl. "Mademoiselle," he said, trembling, "I am not of so little consequence that I cannot serve to repair the loss of your honor."

Andrée drew herself up. "If there were any question of the loss of honor, Monsieur," she said proudly, "it would be of your honor, not of mine. Such as I am, my honor is unsullied, and it would be in marrying you that I should be dishonored!"

"I did not think," said Gilbert, in a cold and incisive tone, "that a woman when she became a mother ought to consider anything in the world but the future of her child."

"And I do not suppose that you dare to interest yourself in that, Monsieur," retorted Andrée, with sparkling eyes.

"On the contrary, Mademoiselle, I am interested in it," replied Gilbert, beginning to rise from beneath the infuriated foot that trampled on him. "I am interested, for I do not wish this child to perish with hunger, as often happens in the houses of the great, where girls interpret honor in a manner of their own. All men are equal; some of the greatest men have proclaimed this maxim. That you should not love me I can conceive, for you do not see my heart; that you should scorn me I can conceive also, for you do not know my thoughts; but that you should refuse me the right to be interested in my child, I can never understand. Alas! in seeking to marry you I have not sought to satisfy a desire, a passion, an ambition; I have performed a duty, I have devoted myself to be your slave, I have offered you my life. Eh, mon Dieu! you would never have borne my name; had you wished, you might have continued to treat me as the gardener Gilbert; that would be just. But it would not be just for you to sacrifice your child. Here are three hundred thousand francs which a generous protector, who has judged me differently from you, gives me for a dowry. If I marry you this money belongs to me. Now, for myself, Mademoiselle, I need nothing but a little air to breathe if I live, and a hole in the ground to hide my body if I die. Everything else I give to my child. See, here are the three hundred thousand francs," and he laid the bunch of bank-notes on the table, almost under Andrée's hand.

"Monsieur," said Andrée, "you are making a serious mistake; you have no child."

"I?"

"Of what child are you speaking, then?" asked Andrée.

"Why, that of which you are the mother. Have you not admitted in the presence of two persons — your brother Philippe and the Comte de Balsamo — that you were enceinte, and that it was I, I, unhappy —"

"Ah, you heard that?" cried Andrée; "well, so much the better, so much the better. Then, Monsieur, this is my reply to you: You have basely done me violence; you have possessed me in my sleep; you have possessed me by a crime. I am a mother, it is true; but my child has only a mother, — do you understand? You have violated me, it is true; but you are not the father of my child," and seizing the bank-notes she threw them disdainfully out of the room, in such a manner that they touched in their flight the whitening face of the unhappy Gilbert. Then he felt an impulse of anger so profound that Andrée's good angel might well have trembled for her a second time. But that fury was restrained by its own violence, and Gilbert went out from Andrée's presence without even looking at her. He had no sooner passed over the threshold than she darted after him, and closed doors, blinds, windows, and shutters, as if by this violent action she would place the universe between the present and the past.

CHAPTER LIV.

RESOLUTION.

How Gilbert returned to his room; how, without expiring of pain and anger, he sustained the anguish of the night; how he rose without at least a blanching of his hair, — we shall not attempt to explain to the reader.

When daylight came Gilbert had a strong desire to write to Andrée and state to her all the arguments, so solid and so straightforward, which had sprung up in his mind during the night. But under too many circumstances already had he observed the young girl's unbending character to cherish now any further hope. Besides, to write would be concession revolting to his pride; and his letter would perhaps be crumbled up and thrown away without being read; it might put upon his track a pack of furious, unintelligent enemies. He then thought that his proposition would perhaps be more favorably received by the father, who was avaricious and ambitious, or by the brother, who was a man of heart, and whose first movement alone was to be feared. "But," said he, to himself, "of what use to be supported by Monsieur de Taverney or by Monsieur Philippe, since Andrée will pursue me with her eternal 'I do not know you'? It is well," he added, "nothing now pushes me to that woman; she herself has taken pains to sunder the bonds that united us." He said this while rolling with anguish on his mattress, while recalling with rage the smallest details of Andrée's voice and face; he said this while suffering indescribable torment, for he loved her to distraction.

When the sun, already high above the horizon, penetrated the garret, Gilbert rose, shaken by a last hope of seeing his enemy in the garden or even in the pavilion. It was still a joy in his misery. But suddenly a bitter flood of hatred, remorse, and rage overwhelmed his thought; he recalled all the scorn and contempt which the young girl had inflicted on him, and stopping in the middle of the room, by a command suddenly imposed by will on matter, "No," he said, "you shall not go to look out at that window; you shall not inhale that poison of which you would be glad to die. She is a cruel person, who never, when you bowed your head before her, smiled at you, or gave you a word of consolation or of friendship; who took pleasure in rending your heart, when still full of innocence and chaste love. She is a creature without honor and without religion, who has denied to her child its father, its natural support, and who condemns the poor little thing to neglect, to misery, to death, perhaps; because that child dishonors the womb in which it was conceived. Well, no, Gilbert; criminal as you were, amorous and base as you are, I forbid you to approach that window, or cast a glance in the direction of that pavilion. I forbid you to commiserate the fate of that woman, or to weaken the springs of your life by dwelling on what is past. Employ your life, like the brute, in work and the satisfaction of material wants. Make use of the time that will elapse between the affront and vengeance; and remember always that the only way to self-respect and to a position higher than that of these haughty nobles is to be more noble still than they."

Pale, trembling, urged by the impulses of his heart in the direction of the window, Gilbert nevertheless obeyed the command of his reason. He might have been seen moving little by little, slowly, step by step, toward the door of the stairway. At last he went out on his way to Balsamo's house. But suddenly he returned, saying to himself, "Fool! wretched fool that I am! I spoke, I think of vengeance; and what is the vengeance I would have? Kill the woman? Oh, no; she would die happy in having inflicted on me an additional burden. Dishonor her publicly? Oh, that is a coward's way. Is there a sensitive place in that creature's soul where my needle thrust may cause as much pain as a thrust of a dagger? It is humiliation; she must be humiliated, — yes, for she has even more pride than I. How, then, can I humiliate her? I am nothing, I have nothing, and doubtless she is about to disappear. To be sure, my presence, my frequent appearance, my look of scorn or of defiance would punish her cruelly. I know well that a mother without pity must be a sister without heart, and she might send her brother to kill me. But what prevents my learning how to kill a man, as I have learned how to reason and to write? What prevents my overcoming Philippe, disarming him, and laughing in the face of the avenger, as in that of the offended person herself? No, that savors too much of comedy; in doing that one reckons on his skill and experience, without considering the intervention of God or of chance. Alone, I alone, with my bare arm, with my reason clipped of imagination, with the strength of my muscles given by nature, with the force of my mind, I will reduce to nothing the projects of those miserable — What does Andrée wish; what does she possess; what does she place before her for her defence and my injury? Let me think."

Then, sitting on the edge of the projection of the wall, bending forward and gazing with fixed eyes, Gilbert meditated profoundly. "Whatever might please Andrée," he said, "is what I detest; I must therefore destroy whatever

I detest. Destroy? Oh, no; my vengeance must never drive me to evil deeds; it must never persuade me to use fire or the sword. What, then, remains? This: to seek the cause of Andrée's superiority, — to discover by what chain she will restrain at the same time my heart and my arm — Oh, to see her no more! — to be no more looked upon by her! Oh, to pass within two steps of that woman when, smiling with her insolent beauty, she holds by the hand her child — her child who will never know me — Heavens and earth!"

Gilbert accentuated that phrase with a furious blow of the fist on the wall, and with an oath more terrible still. "Her child! here is the whole secret. It is not necessary that she should ever possess that child, whom she would accustom to execrate the name of Gilbert. It is necessary, on the contrary, for her to learn that the child will grow up execrating the name of Andrée. In a word, that child, whom she would not love, whom she would torture, perhaps, for she has a bad heart, — that child, with whom they would continually scourge me, Andrée must never see, but, losing it, she must rage and moan like a lioness deprived of her young."

Gilbert rose, handsome in his wrath and savage joy. "That is it," he said, extending his fist toward Andrée's pavilion. "You have condemned me to shame, to loneliness, to remorse, to love; I condemn you to suffering without result, to loneliness, to shame, to terror, to hate without vengeance. You will seek for me, — I shall have fled. You will cry out for your child, if only to tear it to pieces on recovering it; but it will be at least a rage of desire which I shall have kindled in your soul; it will be a blade without a hilt which I shall have plunged into your heart. Yes, yes; the child! I shall have the child, Andrée. I shall have, not your child, as you said, but mine. Gilbert will have his child! — a child noble on the mother's side. My child! — my child!" and gradually he excited himself to transports of intoxicating joy. "Now," said he, "I have nothing to do with vulgar spite or pastoral lamentation; I have to do with a serious undertaking. There is no longer any reason to order my eyes not to seek yonder pavilion; I must order all my energy, all my soul, to watch, that the success of my enterprise may be assured. I will watch, Andrée," he said solemnly, and going nearer to the window, "day and night. You will not make a movement that I shall not see; you will not utter a cry of grief for which I shall not promise you a grief more bitter; you will not exhibit a smile to which I shall not reply by a sardonic and insulting laugh. You are my prey, Andrée; a part of you is my property. I watch, I watch!"

Gilbert then went to the window, and saw the blinds of the pavilion opened; then Andrée's shadow glide over the curtains and the ceiling of the chamber, reflected doubtless by some mirror. Presently Philippe entered, who had risen earlier, but who had been at work in his own room, situated behind Andrée's. Gilbert noticed that their conversation was animated. Doubtless they spoke of him, and of the scene of the evening before. Philippe walked about, showing signs of perplexity. That visit by Gilbert had perhaps induced them to modify their plans; perhaps they would go away in search of peace, obscurity, oblivion. At that idea Gilbert's eyes became luminous rays, which might have set fire to the pavilion and penetrated to the centre of the world.

But very soon a servant-girl entered by the garden-door; she brought a recommendation of some kind. Andrée came to an agreement with her, for she installed herself at once, with her little bundle of clothes, in the chamber formerly occupied by Nicole. Furthermore, certain recent purchases of furniture, utensils, and provisions satisfied the vigilant Gilbert that the brother and sister intended to remain quietly in that habitation.

Philippe examined with close scrutiny the locks on the garden-door. What especially convinced Gilbert that he was suspected of having entered by using a false key, given him perhaps by Nicole, was that the locksmith, in Philippe's presence, changed the wards of the locks. It inspired Gilbert with the first joy he had experienced since these events began. He smiled ironically. "Poor creatures!" he murmured; "they are not very dangerous. They strengthen the lock, and do not even suspect that I had the daring to scale the wall. A poor idea they have of you, Gilbert! So much the better. Yes, proud Andrée, in spite of the locks on your door, if I wished to penetrate to you I could do it. But it is my turn for good fortune; I scorn you, and unless caprice —" He pirouetted on his heels, imitating the roués of the court. "But no," he continued bitterly, "this is more worthy of me; I want no more of you. Sleep in peace; I have what is better than possession of you, with which to torture you at my ease. Sleep!"

Gilbert left the window, and after giving a glance at his clothes, he descended the stairs, and started out to visit Balsamo.

CHAPTER LV.

THE FIFTEENTH OF DECEMBER.

GILBERT found no difficulty, as far as Fritz was concerned, in being admitted to Balsamo.

The count was resting on a sofa, like a rich and idle man, from the fatigue of having slept all night, — at least so Gilbert thought, seeing him lying there at so early an hour. The order must have been given to the valet to admit Gilbert whenever he should present himself, for he had no occasion to give his name.

As Gilbert entered, Balsamo rose upon his elbow and closed his book, which he held open without reading. "Oh, oh!" said he, "here is a fellow who is going to be married."

Gilbert did not answer.

"Good!" said the count, resuming his insolent attitude; "you are happy and almost grateful. You come to thank me; it is superfluous. Keep that, Gilbert, for new occasions. Thanks are a currency which is generally satisfactory when bestowed with a smile. There, my friend, there!"

There was in these words and in Balsamo's tone an accent mournful and gentle, which struck Gilbert as conveying at the same time a reproach and a revelation.

"No," he said; "you are mistaken, Monsieur. I am not to marry at all."

"Ah!" said the count, "what are you going to do? What has happened?"

"I have been rejected," replied Gilbert.

The count turned completely round. "You have misunderstood, my friend."

"No, Monsieur; I think not, at least."

"Who rejected you?"

"The young lady."

"Of course; why did you not speak to her father?"

"Because fate ordered otherwise."

"Ah, we are fatalist?"

"I have not the capacity for possessing faith."

Balsamo frowned, and looked at Gilbert with a sort of curiosity. "Do not speak of things of which you are ignorant," he said; "with men it is stupidity, with children it is presumption. I will permit you to have pride, but not to be an idiot; tell me that you have not the capacity to be a fool, and I will approve. In short, what have you done?"

"This: Like the poets, I wished to dream instead of act; I wished to walk in the avenues where I had enjoyed dreaming of love, and suddenly the reality presented itself to me before I was prepared for it. The reality killed me at once."

"Again it serves you right, Gilbert; for a man in such a situation as yours resembles the scouts of the army. Those men must march with the musket in the right hand and a dark-lantern in the left hand."

"In short, Monsieur, I have failed. Mademoiselle Andrée called me villain, assassin, and said that she would have me killed."

"Good! but her child?"

"She told me that the child was hers, not mine."

"What next?"

"Then I retired."

"Ah!"

Gilbert looked up. "What would you have done?" he said.

"I do not know yet. Tell me what you wish to do."

"To punish her for subjecting me to such humiliations."

"Mere words, that."

"No, Monsieur; it is a resolution."

"But you allowed her, perhaps, to wrest your secret from you, your money?"

"My secret is my own, and no one shall have it. The money is yours; I have brought it back," and Gilbert opened his vest and drew from it the thirty notes, which he counted carefully, spreading them out on Balsamo's table.

The count took them, folded them, all the time watching Gilbert, whose face betrayed not the slightest emotion. "He is honest; he is not covetous. He has sense, firmness; he is a man," he thought.

"Now, Monsieur le Comte," said Gilbert, "I have to give you an account of the two louis you gave me."

"Do not overdo it," replied Balsamo; "it is handsome to return one hundred thousand crowns; it is childish to return forty-eight francs."

"I did not wish to return them; I only wished to tell you what I had done with these louis, that you may know that I need others."

"That is different. You ask, then?"

"I ask."

"For what?"

"For means to do what just now you called 'mere words.'"

"Be it so. You wish to avenge yourself."

"Nobly, I think."

"I do not doubt it; but cruelly?"

"Yes, cruelly."

"How much do you need?"

"Twenty thousand francs."

"And you will not touch this young woman?" said Balsamo, expecting to check Gilbert by this question.

"I will not touch her."

"Her brother?"

"Neither her brother, nor her father."

"You will not calumniate her?"

"I will never speak her name."

"Good; I understand you. But it is equally as bad to kill a woman with continual insults, as to stab her with a weapon. You wish to defy her by showing yourself, by following her, by heaping upon her smiles full of insult and hatred."

"I have so little desire to do this, that I come to ask for means for crossing the sea without expense to myself, in case I should desire to leave France."

"Master Gilbert," exclaimed Balsamo, with eager and caressing tone, which contained however neither grief nor joy, — "Master Gilbert, it seems to me that you are not consistent with your display of disinterestedness. You ask me for twenty thousand francs, and from this sum you cannot take one thousand for passage money?"

"No, Monsieur; and there are two reasons for that."

"Let me hear the reasons?"

"In the first place, I shall not have a farthing on the day I embark; for mark this well, Monsieur le Comte, it is not for myself I ask it, — I ask it for the reparation of a wrong which you facilitated — "

"Ah, you are tenacious!" said Balsamo, with pinched lips.

"Because I am right. I ask you for money for reparation, I tell you, and not for my living or for my own comfort. Not a sou of these twenty thousand francs will touch my pocket; they have their destination."

"Your child; I see that —"

"My child; yes, Monsieur," replied Gilbert, with a certain pride.

"But yourself?"

"I am strong, free, and intelligent; I can always live. I wish to live."

"Oh, you will live! God never gives such strength of will to souls which are to leave this earth prematurely. God clothes warmly the plants which have to endure long winters; he gives armor of steel to hearts which must bear heavy trials. But you have, it seems to me, told me of two reasons for not appropriating one thousand francs, — int he first place, delicacy."

"Secondly, prudence. When I leave France, I must do so secretly. Now, I cannot succeed in this, if I seek out some captain in the port, paying him myself, — for I presume it is done in that way, — it is not, I say, by going out to sell myself that I shall succeed in hiding myself."

"Then you suppose that I can aid you in disappearing?"

"I know that you can."

"Who told you so?"

"Oh, you have too many supernatural means at your disposal not to have a whole storehouse of natural means. A sorcerer is never so sure of himself that he has not some haven of safety."

"Gilbert," said Balsamo, suddenly, extending his hand to the young man, "you are a bold, adventurous spirit; you are made up of evil and good like a woman; you are stoical and unaffectedly upright, — I will make a very great man of you. Stay here, I say; this hôtel is a safe asylum; besides, I leave Europe in a few months, — I will take you away."

Gilbert listened. "In a few months I would not decline your offer; but to-day I must say, Thanks, Monsieur le Comte, your proposal is dazzling to a poor man; at the same time I refuse it."

"A moment's vengeance is worth more than a future of fifty years, perhaps?"

"Monsieur, while my fancy or my caprice possesses me it is always worth to me more than the whole universe; and besides vengeance, I have a duty to fulfil."

"There are your twenty thousand francs," replied Balsamo, without hesitation.

Gilbert took two bank-notes, and looking at his benefactor, "You give like a king!" he said.

"Oh, better, I hope," said Balsamo; "for I do not ask even to be remembered."

"But I am grateful, as you said just now; and when my task shall be accomplished, I will pay you these twenty thousand francs."

"How can you do that?"

"By putting myself in your service for as many years as will be required for a servant to pay his master twenty thousand francs."

"You are again illogical, Gilbert. You said to me a moment ago, 'I ask you for twenty thousand francs, which you owe me.'"

"That is true; but you have won my heart."

"I am glad of it," said Balsamo, coldly. "So, you will be mine, if I wish it?"

"Yes."

"What do you know how to do?"

"Nothing; but I am capable of everything."

"That is true."

"But I wish to have in my pocket the means for leaving France in two hours, if necessary."

"Ah, my service is then deserted."

"I shall be sure to return to you."

"And I shall be sure to find you again. Well, let us finish; it tires me to talk so long. Draw up the table."

"There it is."

Balsamo took from it some papers, and began to read half-aloud the following lines upon one of the papers, inscribed with three signatures, or rather three strange ciphers: "'The fifteenth of December, from Havre for Boston, P. J. the Adonis.' What do you think of America, Gilbert?"

"That it is not France, and that I shall be very glad to go by sea, at a certain moment, into any country whatever that is not France."

"Good! About the fifteenth of December; is not that the time to which you allude?"

Gilbert counted on his fingers, reflecting. "Precisely," he said.

Balsamo took a pen and wrote upon a fresh sheet these two lines, —

Receive upon the "Adonis" a passenger.

JOSEPH BALSAMO.

"But this paper is dangerous," said Gilbert, "and I who seek a shelter may find the Bastille."

"By having too much imagination one becomes absurd," said the count. "The 'Adonis,' my dear Monsieur Gilbert, is a merchant vessel of which I am the principal owner."

"Pardon me, Monsieur le Comte," said Gilbert, bowing; "I am indeed an unhappy fellow whose head is sometimes turned, — but never twice in succession. Pardon me, and believe in my gratitude."

"Go, my friend."

"Adieu, Monsieur le Comte."

"Au revoir," said Balsamo, turning away.

CHAPTER LVI.

THE LAST AUDIENCE.

In November, that is, several months after the events we have related had taken place, Philippe de Taverney went out very early in the morning, considering the season, — that is to say, at daybreak, — from the house in which he lived with his sister. Already all the little Parisian industries were astir under the lamps still lighted. There were the little smoking cakes which the poor merchant from the country devours as a feast in the keen morning air, the trucks loaded with vegetables, the carts full of fish and oysters going to market; and there was, in all this bustle of the laborious crowd, a sort of restraint imposed upon the workmen by respect for the sleep of the rich.

Philippe hurried across the populous and crowded quarter in which he lived, to reach the Champs-Élysées, absolutely deserted.

The leaves were turning red upon the tops of the trees; the beaten walks of the Queen's Court, and the bowling-greens, abandoned at this hour, were hidden under a thick carpet of these rustling leaves.

The young man was dressed like the rich bourgeois of Paris, in a coat with long skirts, in breeches and silk stockings; he carried a sword; his carefully arranged hair indicated that he must have been in the hands of his hairdresser long before daybreak. So, when Philippe saw that the morning wind was deranging his hair and scattering the powder, he threw a glance full of displeasure upon the avenue of the Champs-Élysées, to see if any of the public carriages on this route were not already running. Nor did he have long to wait. A carriage worn out, faded, broken, drawn by a starved, dun mare, came jolting along the street; its driver, with a watchful eye and dejected expression, searched afar among the trees for a passenger, as Æneas watched for one of his vessels on the waves of the sea. On perceiving Philippe he applied his whip, and the carriage came up with the passenger.

"Arrange," said Philippe, "to have me at Versailles at nine o'clock precisely, and you shall have half a crown."

In fact, at nine o'clock Philippe had with the dauphiness one of those morning audiences which she had begun to give. Alert, and freeing herself from every law of etiquette, the princess was accustomed to inspect every morning the work which she was having done at Trianon; and meeting on her way the solicitors to whom she had granted an interview, she disposed of them rapidly, with a presence of mind and an affability which did not exclude dignity, sometimes even haughtiness when she perceived that her condescension was misconstrued.

Philippe had at first resolved to make the journey on foot, for he was reduced to the severest economy; but the sentiment of self-respect, or perhaps only that of the respect, which no military man ever loses, for his correct appearance in the presence of a superior, had constrained the young man to dispense with economy for one day, that he might present himself properly at Versailles. He expected, indeed, to return on foot. So, on the same step of the ladder, starting from two opposite points, the patrician Philippe and the plebeian Gilbert had, as we may see, come together.

Philippe beheld again with heavy heart that Versailles, still magical, where so many golden and roseate dreams had enchanted him with their promises. He beheld again, with broken heart, Trianon, memorial of misfortune and disgrace. At nine o'clock exactly, provided with his letter of audience, he sauntered in the little walk near the pavilion. He perceived, at a distance of a hundred paces, the princess conversing with her architect, enveloped in furs though the weather was not cold. The young dauphiness, with a little hat in the style of that worn by the ladies of Watteau, was distinctly outlined against the green hedges. At times the sound of her silvery and vibrating voice reached Philippe, and awakened in him sentiments which ordinarily efface all chagrin in a wounded heart.

Several persons, favored like Philippe with an audience, presented themselves one after another at the door of the pavilion, in the antechamber of which an usher came to seek them in their turn. Placed along the course of the princess, whenever she returned, with Mique upon her footsteps, these persons received a word from Marie Antoinette, or even the special favor of an exchange of several words spoken privately. Then the princess would wait for another visitor to present himself.

Philippe remained the last. He had seen already the eyes of the princess turning toward him, as if she tried to recognize him; then he blushed and endeavored to assume in his place a modest and patient attitude. The usher came to him at length, and asked if he would not also present himself, since Madame la Dauphine was about to go in, and once having returned she would receive no one. Philippe therefore went forward. The dauphiness did not lose sight of him while he advanced over that distance of a hundred paces, and he chose the most favorable moment to make his respectful salutation.

The dauphiness turned to the usher, saying, "The name of this person who salutes?"

The usher read the letter of audience. "Monsieur Philippe de Taverney, Madame," he replied.

"It is true," said the princess; and she looked at the young man with an expression of interest. Philippe stood in an attitude of deference.

"Good-day, Monsieur de Taverney," said Marie Antoinette; "how is Mademoiselle Andrée?"

"Quite ill, Madame," replied Philippe; "but my sister will be made happy by this evidence of interest your Highness deigns to show her."

The dauphiness did not reply. She read the traces of suffering on Philippe's pale and wasted features, and could scarcely recognize, in the modest garb of a citizen, that handsome officer who had first served her as guide upon the soil of France.

"Monsieur Mique," said she, approaching the architect, "we have, then, agreed concerning the ornamentation of the dancing-hall; the grove in the neighborhood is already decided upon. Pardon me for keeping you so long in the cold."

This was equivalent to a dismissal; Mique saluted and went away. The dauphiness bowed to those persons who still were waiting, and they immediately retired.

Philippe understood that signal to be addressed to him as well as to the rest, and already his heart was oppressed, when the dauphiness, coming to him, said, "You say, then, Monsieur, that your sister is ill?"

"If not ill, Madame, at least drooping."

"Drooping!" cried the dauphiness, with interest, — "she, in so good health!"

Philippe bowed. The young princess cast at him one of those searching glances which, in speaking of a man of her rank, we should call an eagle's glance. Then after a pause, "Allow me to walk a little," said she; "the wind is chilly."

She advanced a few steps; Philippe remained in his place.

"What! you do not follow me?" said Marie Antoinette, turning.

Philippe made two bounds, and rejoined her.

"Why have you not sooner informed me of the condition of Mademoiselle Andrée, in whom I am interested?"

"Alas!" said Philippe, "your Highness has just said the word; your Highness was interested in my sister, but now —"

"I am interested in her still, Monsieur; and yet it seems to me that Mademoiselle de Taverney left my service unseasonably."

"Necessity, Madame!" said Philippe, in a low voice.

"What! that word 'necessity' is alarming; explain that word to me, Monsieur."

Philippe made no reply.

"Doctor Louis," continued the dauphiness, "has stated to me that the air of Versailles was injurious to the health of Mademoiselle de Taverney, which might be restored by a residence in the family home. This is all that I have learned. Now, your sister paid me but one visit before her departure. She was pale; she was sad. I must say that she showed me much devotion in that interview, for she wept copiously."

"Sincere tears, Madame," said Philippe, whose heart beat violently, "the source of which is not exhausted."

"I fancied," continued the princess, "that your father had compelled his daughter to come to court, and that the child regretted your country — some attachment —"

"Madame," Philippe hastened to say, "my sister regrets only your Highness."

"And she suffers — Strange illness, which the country air was to cure, and which it aggravates."

"I will not longer deceive your Highness," said Philippe; "my sister's illness is a profound sorrow, which has driven her nearly to despair. Mademoiselle de Taverney, however, loves in this world only your Highness and myself; but she begins to prefer God to all affections. And the audience which I have had the honor to solicit, Madame, is for the purpose of asking your aid respecting this desire of my sister."

The dauphiness raised her head. "She wishes to enter the religious life, does she not?"

"Yes, Madame."

"And you will suffer it, — you, who love that child?"

"I think I judge rightly her position, Madame; and this counsel came from me. Still, I love my sister too much for this counsel to be suspected, and the world will not ascribe it to avarice on my part. I have nothing to gain by Andrée's withdrawing to a cloister; neither of us possess anything."

The dauphiness paused, and with a stealthy glance at Philippe, "That is what I was saying just now, when you would not understand me, Monsieur; you are not rich."

"Your Highness — "

"No false shame, Monsieur; the happiness of that poor girl is at stake. Answer me sincerely, like an honest man, — as I am sure you are."

The brilliant and loyal eyes of Philippe met the gaze of the princess, and were not lowered. "I will reply, Madame," he said.

"Well, is it through necessity that your sister wishes to leave the world? Let her speak. Good God! princes are unfortunate. God has given them hearts to pity the suffering; but he has refused them that supreme clear-sightedness which can discover suffering under the veil of reserve. Answer, then, frankly; is that it?"

"No, Madame," said Philippe, with firmness, "it is not that; nevertheless, my sister wishes to enter the convent of Saint Denis, and we have but a third of the entrance-money."

"The entrance-money is sixty thousand francs!" cried the princess; "you have, then, only twenty thousand francs?"

"Hardly that, Madame; but we know that your Highness can, by a word, and without opening your purse, give admission to the convent."

"Certainly I can."

"This, then, is the single favor which I shall venture to solicit from your Highness, unless you have already promised to some one else your intercession with Madame Louise."

"Colonel, you surprise me strangely," said Marie Antoinette. "What! so near to me I have so much noble poverty! Eh, Colonel, you should not thus have deceived me."

"I am not colonel, Madame," replied Philippe, gently; "I am only your Highness's devoted servant."

"Not colonel, you say? And since when?"

"I have never been colonel, Madame."

"The king promised in my presence a regiment —"

"The commission for which was never sent."

"But you had a rank —"

"Which I have resigned, Madame, having fallen into disgrace with the king."

"Why?"

"I do not know."

"Oh!" said the dauphiness, with deep sadness, — "oh, the court!"

Philippe smiled sorrowfully. "You are an angel from heaven, Madame," he said; "and I regret not serving the house of France, that I might have an opportunity of dying for you."

A light so vivid and so warm came into the eyes of the dauphiness that Philippe hid his face in his hands. The princess did not even try to console him, or to draw from him the sentiment that overpowered him at that moment. Silent, and breathing with effort, she picked the petals of some Bengal roses, plucked from their stem by her nervous and trembling hand.

Philippe recovered himself. "Pardon me, Madame," he said.

Marie Antoinette did not reply to these words. "Your sister will enter Saint Denis to-morrow, if she wishes," she said, with feverish excitement; "and you in a month will be at the head of a regiment. I am determined."

"Madame," replied Philippe, "will you still have the goodness to hear me in my last explanations? My sister accepts the gift of your Royal Highness; as for myself, I must refuse it."

"You refuse?"

"Yes, Madame; I have received an affront from the court; the enemies who have inflicted it on me would find a way to wound me more severely, on seeing me in higher station."

"What! even under my protection?"

"Especially because of your gracious protection, Madame," said Philippe, resolutely.

"It is true," said the princess, turning pale.

"And then, Madame, — no, I forget, in speaking with you, that there is no more happiness on earth; I forget that once entered into obscurity, I must no more leave it. In obscurity a man of heart prays and remembers."

Philippe pronounced these words with an accent that made the princess start. "A day will come," said she, "when I shall have the right to say what now I can only think. Monsieur, your sister may enter at Saint Denis whenever she pleases."

"Thanks, Madame, thanks."

"As to yourself — I wish you to make me a request."

"But, Madame — "

"I wish it."

Philippe saw the gloved hand of the princess extended toward him; it remained suspended, as if in expectation, perhaps it expressed only command. The young man knelt, took the hand, and slowly, with a swelling and palpitating heart touched it with his lips.

"The request! come!" said the dauphiness, so moved that she did not withdraw her hand.

Philippe bowed his head. A flood of bitter thoughts overwhelmed him. He remained some seconds silent and motionless; then, rising, pale and dull-eyed, "A passport to leave France," said he, "the day my sister enters the convent of Saint Denis."

The dauphiness recoiled as if terrified. Then, seeing all that grief, which doubtless she comprehended, which perhaps she shared, she could reply only by the words, hardly intelligible, "It is well." And she disappeared in an avenue of cypress-trees, the only ones that had preserved intact their everlasting leaves, a mantle of the tomb.

CHAPTER LVII.

THE CHILD WITHOUT A FATHER.

THE day of pain, the day of shame drew near. Andrée, notwithstanding the visits, more and more frequent, of the good Doctor Louis, notwithstanding the affectionate care and consolations of Philippe, became continually more depressed, like the condemned whose last hour approaches. The unhappy brother sometimes found Andrée dreamy and trembling; her eyes were dry; for whole days she would not speak; then suddenly she would rise and make several turns around her chamber, trying, like Dido, to get away from herself, — that is to say, from the sorrow that was killing her.

At length, seeing her one evening paler, more uneasy, more nervous than usual, Philippe sent for the doctor to come at once. It was the twenty-ninth of November. Philippe had had the art to keep Andrée sitting up until a late hour; he had entered with her upon subjects of conversation the most gloomy, the most intimate, those even which the young girl dreaded, as the wounded man dreads a rough and heavy hand approaching his wound. He was sitting near the fire. The servant, on starting for Versailles to get the doctor, had forgotten to close the blinds, so that the reflection of the lamp, that of the fire even, cast a soft light on the carpet of snow thrown on the soil of the garden by the first frosts of winter.

Philippe waited till Andrée's mind began to grow calm, and then, without preamble, "Dear sister," he said, "have you at last come to a decision?"

"On what subject?" replied Andrée, with a sigh of pain.

"On the subject — of your child, sister."

Andrée started.

"The time approaches," continued Philippe.

"My God!"

"And I should not be surprised if to-morrow —"

"To-morrow?"

"To-day, even, dear sister."

Andrée became so pale that Philippe, alarmed, took hold of her and kissed her hand. She presently recovered, "Brother," she said, "I will not practise toward you the hypocrisies which dishonor vulgar souls. Expectation of good is in my mind confounded with expectation of evil. What is evil I no longer know, since I have lost confidence in what is good. So do not judge me more severely than one would judge a foolish person, — unless you prefer to take seriously the philosophy which I am about to outline to you, and which, I assure you, is the perfect, consummate expression of my sentiments as I gather it from my experience."

"Whatever you may say, Andrée, whatever you may do, you will always be to me the dearest, the most respected of women."

"Thank you, my only friend. I dare to say that I am not unworthy of what you promise me. I am a mother, Philippe; but God has appointed, — I think so, at least," she added, blushing, — "that maternity should be, with the creature, a state analogous to that of fructification in the plant. The fruit comes only after the flower. In the flowering the plant is prepared, transformed; for the flowering, according to my idea, is love."

"You are right, Andrée."

"I," continued the young girl, quickly, — "I have known neither preparation nor transformation; I am an anomaly. I have not loved, I have not desired; my mind and heart are as virginal as my body; and yet, sad prodigy! what I have not desired, what I have not even dreamed of, God sends me, — he who has never given fruit to the tree created to be sterile. Where in me are the aptitudes, the instincts; where are the resources, even? The mother who suffers the pains of confinement knows and understands her lot; I — I know nothing. I tremble at thought; I go to that last day as I would go to the scaffold. Philippe, I am accursed."

"Andrée, sister!"

"Philippe," she resumed vehemently, "do I not well know that I hate that child? Oh, yes! I hate it! I shall remember all my life, if I live, Philippe, the day when for the first time the mortal enemy I bear stirred within me. I shudder yet as I remember how that movement, so sweet to mothers, of the innocent creature kindled in my blood a fever of wrath, and brought blasphemy to my lips, till then so pure. Philippe, I am a bad mother; Philippe I am accursed!"

"In the name of Heaven, dear Andrée, calm yourself. Let not your mind lead your heart astray. That child is your life, your blood; I love it, because it comes from you."

"You love it!" she exclaimed, furious and livid; "you dare to tell me, me, that you love my dishonor and your own! you dare to tell me that you love that memorial of a crime, that representation of the base criminal! Well, Philippe, I am not base, I am not false; I hate the child because it is not my child, and I have not called it. I execrate it because it will, perhaps, resemble its father. Its father! — Oh! I shall die some day in pronouncing that horrible word! My God!" she cried, falling to her knees on the floor, "I cannot kill that child at its birth, for thou dost give it life. I could not kill myself while I bore it, for thou hast forbidden suicide as well as murder. But I pray thee, I beseech thee, I implore thee, if thou art just, my God, if thou carest for the miseries of this world, if thou hast not decreed that I shall die of despair after having lived in disgrace and tears, — my God, take back that child! My God, kill that child! My God, deliver me! avenge me!" Terrible with rage, and grand in movement, she struck her forehead against the marble chimney-piece in spite of Philippe's efforts, who pressed her in his arms. Suddenly the door opened; the servant returned, conducting the doctor, who at the first glance understood the whole scene.

"Madame," said the doctor, with that professional quiet which always imposes restraint or submission, "do not aggravate the pains of this labor which is now approaching. You," he said to the servant, "prepare everything as I told you on the way. You," speaking to Philippe, "will be more reasonable than Madame, and instead of sharing her fears and her weakness, you will add your encouragements to mine."

Andrée rose almost ashamed. Philippe led her to an armchair. The patient then turned red and threw herself back in a painful convulsion; her clenched hands clung to the fringes of the chair, and the first cry issued from her violet lips.

"That sorrow, that fall, that anger, have hastened the crisis," said the doctor; "withdraw to your chamber, Monsieur de Taverney, and — courage!"

Philippe, with swelling heart, rushed to Andrée, who had heard, who trembled, and who, rising in spite of her pain, threw her arms around her brother's neck. She embraced him closely, kissed his cold cheek, and said in a low voice, "Adieu! adieu! adieu!"

"Doctor! Doctor!" cried Philippe, in despair; "do you hear!"

Louis separated the unhappy couple with gentle force, replaced Andrée in the easy chair, conducted Philippe to his chamber, and bolted the door which separated it from Andrée's room; then closing curtains and doors, he shrouded thus the scene which was about to take place between the physician and the woman, between God and both.

At three o'clock in the morning the doctor opened the door behind which Philippe wept and prayed. "Your sister has given birth to a son," he said.

Philippe clasped his hands.

"Do not come in," said the doctor; "she is asleep."

"She sleeps — Oh, Doctor! is it really true that she sleeps?"

"If it were otherwise, Monsieur, I should say to you: Your sister has given birth to a son, but that son has lost his mother. Look, then."

Philippe advanced his head.

"Listen to her breathing."

"Yes! oh, yes!" murmured Philippe, embracing the doctor.

"Now, you know that we have engaged a nurse. In passing the Point-du-Jour, where that woman lives, I notified her to be ready. But you alone can bring her; take advantage, then, of the patient's sleep, and set off with the carriage in which I came."

"But you, Doctor, you?"

"I have in the Place Royale a patient very ill with pleurisy. I will finish the night at his bedside."

"The cold, Doctor —"

"I have my cloak."

"The town is not very safe."

"Twenty times in twenty years I have been stopped by night. I have always replied: 'My friend, I am a physician, on my way to a patient. Do you wish for my cloak? Take it; but do not kill me, for without me my patient may die.' And observe, Monsieur, this cloak has seen twenty years' service. The thieves have always left it to me."

"Good, Doctor — To-morrow, is it not?"

"To-morrow, at eight o'clock, I shall be here?"

The doctor directed the servant to perform certain services, and bestow careful attention on the patient. He wished the child to be placed by its mother's side. Philippe begged him to remove it, recalling his sister's last words.

Louis therefore placed the child in the servant's chamber, and then departed by way of the Rue Montorgueil, while the carriage took Philippe in the direction of Roule. The servant fell asleep in the easy chair near her mistress.

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE ABDUCTION.

In the intervals of the refreshing sleep that follows great fatigue, the mind seems to acquire a double force, — the faculty of appreciating the comfort of the situation, and the faculty of watching over the body in its prostration.

Andrée, returning to a consciousness of life, opened her eyes and saw at her side the sleeping servant. She heard the joyous crackling on the hearth, and wondered at the silence of the chamber where everything was, like herself, in repose. This consciousness was not that of complete wakefulness, nor was it a dream. Andrée took pleasure in prolonging that state of indecision, of soft somnolence; she suffered ideas to spring up one after another in her tired brain, as if she feared the sudden invasion of reason in its completeness. Suddenly a cry, distant, feeble, hardly heard, reached her ear through the thickness of the partition. This noise again produced in Andrée the tremblings from which she had suffered so much. It brought back to her that feeling of hatred which for some months had troubled her innocence and her kindness, as a shock disturbs a liquid in a vessel in which dregs are sleeping.

From this moment there was for Andrée no more sleep nor repose; she remembered, — she hated. But the force of sensations is commonly in proportion to corporeal strength. Andrée no longer had the vigor she had manifested in the scene with Philippe the evening before. The cry of the child reached her brain, first as a pain, and then as an annoyance. At length she asked herself if Philippe, in removing that child, with his usual consideration, had not been the executor of a will somewhat cruel.

The thought of the evil we wish to any creature is not so repulsive as the sight of it. Andrée, who execrated that child when invisible, an idea, who had even desired its death, was hurt at hearing the unfortunate being cry. "He is suffering," she thought. And then she replied to herself, "Why should I be concerned for his sufferings, — I, the most miserable of living creatures?"

The child uttered another cry, louder and more painful. Andrée then perceived that this voice awoke in her, as it were, a troubled voice, and felt her heart drawn as by an invisible chain toward the abandoned, crying child. That of which the young girl had felt the want was now realized in her. Nature had accomplished one of its preparations. Physical pain, that strong tie, had bound the mother's heart to the slightest movement of her child.

"It must not be," thought Andrée, "that this poor orphan cries to Heaven for vengeance against me. God has given to these little creatures, hardly born, the most eloquent of voices. One may kill them, — that is, put them out of suffering; but one has no right to inflict pain upon them. If we had that right, God would not have permitted them to cry so."

Andrée raised her head, and tried to call her servant; but her feeble voice could not arouse the robust peasant. The child had ceased crying.

"Doubtless," thought Andrée, "the nurse has arrived; I heard the noise of the outer door. Yes, some one is moving in the next room; and the little creature no longer cries. The care of a stranger is already extended over it, and reassures its unformed intelligence. Oh, she, then, is the mother who takes care of the child! For a few crowns the child born of my body will find a mother. And later, passing near me who have suffered so much, near me whose life has produced its own, that child will not look at me; it will say 'mother' to a mercenary more generous in her hired love than I in my first resentment. That shall not be. I have suffered; I have purchased the right to look on the face of that child; I have the right to compel it to love me for my care, to respect me for my sacrifice and my sorrow." She made a more determined effort, summoned all her forces, and called, "Marguerite! Marguerite!"

The servant awoke lazily, and without moving from her easy chair, to which she was bound by a heaviness almost lethargic.

"Do you hear me?" said Andrée.

"Yes, Madame, yes," said Marguerite, coming to her senses. And she approached the bed. "Madame wishes to drink?"

"No."

"Madame perhaps wishes to know what time it is?"

"No, no," replied Andrée, looking steadily at the door of the next chamber.

"Ah, I understand; Madame wishes to know if Monsieur her brother has returned."

Andrée struggled against her desire with all the weakness of a proud soul, with all the energy of a warm and generous heart.

"I wish," she stammered at length, — "I wish — Open that door, Marguerite."

"Yes, Madame — Ah, how cold it is there! The wind, Madame, — what a wind!"

The wind in fact came into Andrée's chamber, and shook the flame of the candles and of the night-lamp.

"It is the nurse, who has left open a door or a window. See, Marguerite, see! That child must be cold."

Marguerite turned toward the adjoining chamber. "I will go and cover him up, Madame," she said.

"No, no!" murmured Andrée, with a feeble and broken voice; "bring it to me."

Marguerite stopped in the middle of the chamber. "Madame," she said softly, "Monsieur Philippe expressly directed the child to be left there, — fearing, no doubt, that Madame might be disturbed or excited."

"Bring me my child!" cried the young mother, with a burst that must have broken her heart; for from her eyes, which had continued dry in the midst of her sufferings, issued tears on which must have smiled, in heaven, the protecting angels of little children.

Marguerite hastened into the chamber. Andrée, sitting up, hid her face in her hands. The servant returned immediately, with a look of stupefaction.

"Well?" said Andrée.

"Well — Madame — some one, then, has come?"

"What, — some one? Who?"

"Madame, the child is no longer there."

"Indeed, I heard a noise a little while ago," said Andrée, — "steps; the nurse must have come while you were asleep, — she did not wish to wake you. But where is my brother? Look in his chamber."

Marguerite ran to Philippe's room. No one there!

"It is strange," said Andrée, anxiously; "can he have gone out again without seeing me?"

"Ah, Madame!" cried the servant.

"What is it?"

"The street-door was just opened."

"Look! look!"

"It is Monsieur Philippe returning. Enter, Monsieur, enter."

Philippe, in fact, entered. Behind him a peasant woman, enveloped in a thick cloak of striped wool, bestowed upon the house that benevolent smile with which the hireling welcomes every new connection.

"Sister, sister, I am here," said Philippe, coming into the chamber.

"Dear brother! what troubles, what sorrows I cause you! Ah, here is the nurse; I was so afraid she had gone —"

"Gone? she has just come."

"Has returned, you mean. No; I heard her plainly a little while ago, softly as she walked."

"I don't understand you, sister; no one —"

"Oh, I thank you, Philippe," said Andrée, drawing him to her, and accenting each word, — "I thank you for having understood me so well that you would not take away that child till I had seen it — kissed it. Philippe, you have well read my heart. Yes, yes; be tranquil, I shall love my child."

Philippe seized Andrée's hand, and covered it with kisses.

"Tell the nurse to restore it to me," added the young mother.

"But, Monsieur," said the servant, "you know well that the child is no longer there."

"What! what are you saying?" replied Philippe.

Andrée looked at her brother with terror in her eyes. The young man ran to the servant's bed; he searched, and finding nothing, uttered a terrible cry. Andrée followed his movements in the mirror. She saw him return, pale, with arms inert; she understood a part of the truth, and replying like an echo to her brother's cry, she sighed, and fell back unconscious upon the pillow.

Philippe was not prepared either for this new misfortune or for Andrée's great grief. He collected all his forces, and by dint of caresses, consolations, and tears, he recalled her to life.

"My child!" Andrée murmured, — "my child!"

"Let us save the mother!" said Philippe to himself. "Sister, my dear sister, we are all crazy, it seems to me; we forget that the good doctor has taken the child away with him."

"The doctor?" cried Andrée, with the pain of doubt, with the joy of hope.

"Why, yes! why, yes! Ah, why, we lose our senses here!"

"Philippe, you swear to me — "

"Dear sister, you are no more reasonable than I. How do you imagine that that child could have disappeared?" and he forced a laugh which deceived both nurse and servant.

Andrée came to herself. "Yet I heard — " she said.

"What?"

"Steps."

Philippe shuddered. "Impossible!" he said; "you were asleep."

"No, no; I was wide awake! I heard — I heard — "

"Very well, you heard that good doctor, who, returning after my departure, because he feared for the health of that child, took him away. Besides, he had spoken to me about it."

"You reassure me."

"How could it be that I should not reassure you; it is so simple?"

"But then," objected the nurse, "what am I doing here?"

"Sure enough! The doctor is waiting for you at your house."

"Oh!"

"Go to him, then. That Marguerite slept so soundly that she heard nothing of what the doctor said, or else he did not speak to her."

Andrée fell back, more tranquil after that terrible shock. Philippe dismissed the nurse, and gave some directions to the servant. Then taking a lamp he examined carefully the door of the adjoining chamber, found a door of the garden open, saw footprints in the snow, and followed them to the garden-door, where they were lost. "Steps of a man!" he cried. "The child is stolen. Misfortune! misfortune!"

CHAPTER LIX.

THE VILLAGE OF HARAMONT.

THOSE footsteps in the snow were Gilbert's, who, since his last interview with Balsamo, had followed up his task of surveillance, and had made ready his vengeance. He had spared no pains. By dint of pleasant words and small services he had succeeded in making himself acceptable, even pleasing, to Rousseau's wife. His method was simple. Of the thirty sous a day which Rousseau allowed his copyist, the prudent Gilbert set aside one franc, three times every week, with which he purchased some little present for Thérèse, — a ribbon for her bonnet, a delicacy for the table, or a bottle of cordial. The good lady, sensitive to everything that flattered her taste or her small pride, was now and then gratified by exclamations of Gilbert at table in praise of her culinary skill.

For the Genevan philosopher had succeeded in getting his young protégé admitted to the table; and during the last two months Gilbert, thus favored, had accumulated two louis in his treasury, which slept under his pallet, side by side with Balsamo's twenty thousand francs.

But what a life! What persistency of resolution and of will! Rising at daybreak Gilbert began by examining with his keen eyes the situation of Andrée, that he might discover the least change introduced into the dull and regular life of the recluse. Nothing, then, escaped his observation, — neither the sand of the garden-walks, where his piercing sight measured Andrée's footprints; nor the folds of the curtains, more or less closely drawn, the opening in which was for him a sure index of Andrée's humor, for on her days of gloom she refused even to see the light of day. Thus Gilbert knew what was going on in her soul, and in the house. He had also learned to interpret all Philippe's movements; and making his inferences with skill, he divined Philippe's purpose when he went out, and what result he brought on his return. He pushed detail so far as to follow Philippe one evening when he went to Versailles to find Doctor Louis. This visit to Versailles had slightly puzzled him; but when, two days later, he saw the doctor stealing furtively into the garden he understood the mystery.

Gilbert knew the dates, and was aware that the time for the realization of all his hopes was at hand. He had taken all the precautions necessary to assure success in an enterprise bristling with difficulties. This was his plan as laid out: the two louis enabled him to hire in the Faubourg Saint Denis a cabriolet with two horses. That carriage was to be at his orders whenever he should need it. He had also explored the suburbs of Paris in a vacation of three or four days which he had taken. During that vacation he had visited a little town of Soissonnais, lying eighteen leagues from Paris, and surrounded by a vast forest. This little town was called Villers-Cotterets. On arriving he had immediately called upon the only notary in the place, Maître Niquet. To him Gilbert presented himself as the son of a great nobleman's intendant. This great nobleman, wishing to do a kindness to the child of one of his peasants, had charged Gilbert to find a nurse for it. In all probability the munificence of the great nobleman would not be limited to the nurse's monthly pay; and besides, he would place in the hands of Maître Niquet a certain sum for the use of the child.

Then Maître Niquet, the father of three fine boys, had mentioned to him the daughter of the nurse of his three sons, who lived in the little village of Haramont, a league from Villers-Cotterets, and who, after being legitimately married in his office, continued the occupation of madame her mother. This honest woman was named Madeleine Pitou, and was the happy mother of a son, four years old, who showed every indication of robust health; besides, she had recently been confined, and consequently would be at Gilbert's service whenever he should bring or send his nursling.

These arrangements having been made, Gilbert, always punctual, had returned to Paris two hours before the expiration of his leave of absence.

Why had Gilbert chosen the little town of Villers-Cotterets, in preference to all others? In this, as in many other matters, he had been guided by the influence of Rousseau, who had once spoken of the forest of Villers-Cotterets as one of the most fertile in existence, and had named three or four villages hidden in that forest like nests in deep foliage. It would be impossible, then, for any one to discover Gilbert's child in one of those villages.

Haramont especially had interested Rousseau, — so much indeed, that he, the misanthrope, the hermit, said again and again: "Haramont is the end of the world; Haramont is the desert; one can live and die there like the birds, — on the branch while he lives, under the leaves when he dies." Gilbert had also heard the philosopher describe the interior of a cottage, lighting up details with the fire of his genius, — from the smile of the nurse to the bleating of the goat; from the appetizing odor of the thick vegetable soup to the perfumes of the wild mulberry and the violet-colored heather.

"I will go there," Gilbert had said; "my child shall grow up beneath the shades where the master has breathed his wishes and his sighs."

To Gilbert a caprice was an inexorable command, especially when that caprice presented itself in the guise of a moral necessity. His joy, then, was great when Maître Niquet, anticipating his wishes, mentioned Haramont to him as a village that would suit his purposes exactly.

On his return to Paris, Gilbert had given his attention to the cabriolet. It was not handsome, but it was strong, — it was all that he needed. The horses were of heavy build; the postilion was a dull fellow from the stables. But what Gilbert had in mind was to fulfil his intentions, and without awakening any curiosity. His story had not been questioned by Maître Niquet; with his new garments he was of sufficiently good appearance to resemble the son of the intendant of a good family, or the valet, in disguise, of a duke and peer. Nor had his proposition been received with any suspicion by the owner of the cabriolet. It was a period when there was still confidence between the people and gentlemen. Money paid was received in those times with a degree of gratitude and without the asking of questions. Besides, two louis were then worth as much as four are worth to-day; and to-day four louis are good to earn. The proprietor agreed therefore that on two hours' notice his carriage should be at Gilbert's service.

This enterprise had for the young man all the attractiveness which the imagination of poets and that of philosophers, — two fairies very differently clad, — lend to good actions and to good resolutions. To remove the child from its cruel mother, — that is, to plant shame and sorrow in the enemy's camp, — and then with a change of front, to enter the cottage of virtuous villagers, as painted by Rousseau, and deposit on a child's cradle a large sum of money, to be regarded as a tutelary god by those poor villagers, to pass for a grand personage, — this was more than enough to satisfy pride, resentment, love for neighbors, hatred for enemies.

The fatal day at length arrived. It followed ten other days which Gilbert had spent in anxiety, ten nights in which he had hardly slept. Notwithstanding the severity of the weather he lay with his window open, and every movement of Andrée or of Philippe was repeated in his ear, as the bell answers to the hand that pulls the cord. On this last day he saw Philippe and Andrée talking together near the fireplace; he saw the servant set out hastily for Versailles, forgetting to close the blinds. He ran immediately to notify the owner of the carriage, and waited in front of the stable while they harnessed the horses, biting his hands in the effort to control his impatience. At length the postilion mounted his horse, and Gilbert the cabriolet, which he stopped at the corner of a little deserted street near the market. He then returned to Rousseau's, and wrote a letter of farewell to the good philosopher, and of thanks to Thérèse, announcing that a small inheritance called him to the South, and that he should return, — all without precise information. Then with his money in his pocket and a long knife in his sleeve he was about to slide down the gutter-pipe into the garden, when a sudden idea arrested him. The snow! He had been so occupied that he had not thought of that. On the snow his footprints would be visible. Those footprints, leading from the wall of Rousseau's house would cause Philippe and Andrée to make an investigation, and his disappearance at the very time of the abduction would reveal the whole secret.

It was therefore necessary to go round by way of the Rue Coq-Héron, and enter by the garden-door, a key to which Gilbert had obtained a month previously, and from which ran a well-beaten path in which his feet would leave no tracks. He lost no time, and arrived while the carriage that had brought Doctor Louis was waiting before the principal entrance of the little hôtel. He opened the door cautiously, saw no one, and went and hid himself in the corner of the pavilion, near the summer-house.

It was a terrible night. He could hear all, — the groans and cries wrested by suffering, even the first wail of the child that was born to him. Meanwhile, leaning against the naked wall, he received, without knowing it, the snow which fell thick and heavy from the darkened sky. His breast beat against the handle of the knife which he pressed despairingly to his breast. His fixed eyes had the color of blood, the glow of fire.

At length the doctor went out; at length Philippe exchanged with the doctor a few last words. Then Gilbert approached the blind, leaving a track on the carpet of snow which, ankle-deep, crackled under his step. He saw Andrée sleeping on her bed, Marguerite dozing in the easy chair, and looking for the child near its mother, he did not see it. He understood immediately and turned toward the entrance. He opened the door, not without making a noise that alarmed him, and finding his way to the bed which had been Nicole's, feeling around he put his icy fingers on the poor child's face, who thereupon uttered the cries which Andrée had heard. Then enveloping the new-born infant in a woollen wrap, he carried it away, leaving the door half-open, to avoid the risk of noise. A minute later he had gained the street by way of the garden; he hastened to his carriage, aroused the postilion whom he found asleep, and closing the leather curtain while the man mounted his horse, he said, —

"A half-louis for you, if in a quarter of an hour we have passed the barrier."

The horses, sharp-shod for ice, started off at a gallop.

CHAPTER LX.

THE PITOU FAMILY.

During the journey everything frightened Gilbert. The noise of the carriages that followed or passed by his own, the moaning of the wind in the dismantled trees, seemed to him sounds of an organized pursuit, or the cries of those from whom the child had been taken. Nothing threatened him, however. The postilion bravely did his duty, and the steaming horses arrived at Dammartin at the time Gilbert had expected, — that is, before the first light of day. Gilbert paid his half-louis, changed horses and postilion, and resumed his journey.

During the first part of the way, the child, carefully sheltered by the covering and shielded by Gilbert himself, had not felt the cold, and had not uttered a single cry. As soon as it was light Gilbert, seeing the country in the distance, felt more courageous, and to drown the cries which the child was beginning to make, he started on one of those everlasting songs which he used to sing at Taverney when he was returning from the chase. The creaking of the axle-tree and the traces, the noise of the iron-work about the carriage, the little bells of the horses, made a diabolical accompaniment, the volume of which the postilion himself increased by mingling with Gilbert's refrain fragments of a Bourbonnaise of a character somewhat seditious.

This last driver did not even suspect that Gilbert had a child in the cabriolet. He stopped his horses just before reaching Villers-Cotterets, received the stipulated fare for his journey, a crown and six francs, and Gilbert, taking up his burden carefully enveloped in the folds of the blanket, singing his song as seriously as possible, quickly moved away, crossed a ditch, and disappeared in a path strewed with leaves, which led to the village of Haramont.

The weather had become very cold. The snow had ceased falling; the ground was hard and bristling with underbrush and thorny bushes. Above could be seen the outlines of the trees of the forests, leafless and gloomy, through whose branches shone the pale blue of a sky still hazy. The keen air, the fragrance of the oaks, the pearls of ice suspended on the ends of the branches, all this freedom, all this poetry excited the young man's imagination. He walked with a rapid and proud step through the little ravine, without stumbling, without looking around; for in the midst of the groups of trees, he took for his guide the steeple of the hamlet and the blue smoke of the chimneys which could be seen through the gray lattice-work of the branches. Within half an hour he crossed a stream bordered with ivy and yellow cress, and asked, at the first cottage, the children of a laborer to direct him to the house of Madeleine Pitou.

Silent and attentive, instead of stupid and inactive like some peasants, the children rose, and staring at the stranger, led him, holding each other by the hand, to a cottage rather large, of very good appearance, and situated by the banks of a stream which flowed by most of the houses in the village. The limpid waters of this stream were swollen somewhat by the first melting of the snow. A wooden bridge — that is, a large plank — joined the road to the steps of earth that led to the house.

One of the children, his guides, showed Gilbert where Madeleine Pitou lived.

"There?" repeated Gilbert.

The child nodded his head without saying a word.

"Madeleine Pitou?" Gilbert asked the child once more.

The latter having reiterated his silent affirmation, Gilbert crossed the little bridge, and knocked at the door of the cottage; while the children, who had again taken each other's hands, looked with all their might to see what had brought to Madeleine's house this fine gentleman in a brown suit and buckled shoes.

Gilbert, however, had not yet noticed in the village any living creature but these children. Haramont was really the desert so much desired.

As soon as the door was opened, a spectacle full of charm for everybody, but particularly so for a young philosopher, met Gilbert's view. A stout peasant woman was nursing a fine child, a few months old, while kneeling before her, another child, a vigorous boy four or five years of age, was saying his prayer in a loud voice. In a corner by the fireplace, near a window, or rather a hole cut in the wall and closed with glass, another peasant woman, about thirty-five years old, was spinning flax, — her wheel on her right, a wooden stool under her feet, a large poodle on the stool.

The dog, seeing Gilbert, barked in a very hospitable and civil manner, just enough to show his vigilance. The child at prayers turned round, cutting short the utterance of the Pater, and the two women uttered a sort of exclamation of surprise mingled with joy.

Gilbert began by smiling at the nurse. "Good dame Madeleine," he said, "I salute you."

The woman started up, "Monsieur knows my name!" she said.

"As you see; but don't let me disturb you, I beg. In fact, instead of one nursling which you have now, you are about to have two;" and he deposited in the homely cradle of the country child the little city child he had brought.

"Oh, how pretty he is!" exclaimed the woman who was spinning.

"Yes, Sister Angélique, very pretty," said Madeleine.

"Madame is your sister?" said Gilbert, pointing to the spinner.

"My sister, yes, Monsieur," replied Madeleine; "my husband's sister."

"Yes, my aunt Gélique," murmured the little fellow, in a low voice, who joined in the conversation without rising.

"Be still, Ange; be still!" said the mother; "you interrupt Monsieur."

"What I have to propose to you is very simple, good dame. This child is the son of one of my master's tenants, a ruined farmer. My master, godfather to this child, wishes him to be brought up in the country, and become a good workman, with good health and good manners; will you take charge of this child?"

"But, Monsieur —"

"He was born yesterday, and has not yet been nursed," interrupted Gilbert. "Besides, it is the child of which Maître Niquet, notary of Villers-Cotterets, must have spoken to you."

Madeleine immediately seized the child, and gave it the breast with a generous impetuosity which moved Gilbert, deeply.

"They did not deceive me," he said; "you are a good woman. I confide to your care this child in the name of my master. I see that he will be happy here, and I hope that he will bring into this cottage a dream of happiness in exchange for that which he will find here. How much a month did you have for the children of Maître Niquet, of Villers-Cotterets?"

"Twelve francs, Monsieur; but Monsieur Niquet is rich, and he added now and then a few francs for sugar and maintenance."

"Mother Madeleine," said Gilbert, with pride, "for this child you shall be paid twenty francs a month, which makes two hundred and forty francs a year."

"Jesus!" cried Madeleine; "thanks, Monsieur."

"This is for the first year," said Gilbert, laying on the table ten handsome louis, which made the two women stare, and toward which the little Ange stretched his rapacious hand.

"But, Monsieur, if the child should not live?" the nurse objected timidly.

"That would be a great misfortune, — which will not happen," said Gilbert. "You are satisfied with the monthly pay for nursing, then?"

"Oh, yes, Monsieur!"

"Let us pass to the payments of an allowance for the other years."

"Will the child remain with us?"

"Probably."

"In that case, Monsieur, we should be his father and mother."

Gilbert turned pale. "Yes," he said, in a suppressed tone.

"Then, Monsieur, this poor little one is abandoned?"

Gilbert was not expecting such emotion, such questions. He composed himself, however. "I have not told you all," he added; "the poor father has died from grief."

The two good women clasped their hands expressively.

"And the mother?" asked Angélique.

"Oh, the mother, the mother!" replied Gilbert, breathing painfully, "no child, born or unborn, can ever count on her."

It was at this point in their conversation that Father Pitou returned from the fields, appearing calm and happy. His was one of those dull and honest natures, full of gentleness and health, which Greuze has represented in his excellent paintings. A few words explained to him the situation. Besides, he comprehended things through pride, especially those things which he did not understand.

Gilbert explained that the allowance of the child was to be paid until he became a man and capable of supporting himself by the use of his mind and his arms.

"Be it so," said Pitou; "I think we shall love this child, he is so pretty."

"He too," said Angélique and Madeleine, — "he thinks as we do."

"Come, then, with me, I beg, to see Maître Niquet; I will deposit with him the necessary money, that you may be satisfied, and the child may be happy."

"Immediately, Monsieur," replied Pitou, rising from his seat.

Then Gilbert took leave of the good women, and approached the cradle in which the new-comer had already displaced the child of the house. He bent over the cradle with a gloomy look, and for the first time noticing the face of his son, he saw that it resembled Andrée. This sight broke his heart; he had to bury his finger-nails in his flesh to restrain a tear which rose from his wounded heart to his eyelid. He placed a timid kiss on the fresh cheek of the newly born, and drew back tottering.

Father Pitou was already on the threshold, a stout stick in his hand, his best coat on his back.

Gilbert gave a half-louis to the chubby Ange Pitou, who crawled between his legs, and the two women requested the honor of embracing him, with the touching familiarity of country people.

This father of eighteen years had been so weighed down with emotions that he was nearly crushed by them. Pale, nervous, he began to grow bewildered.

"Let us go," he said to Pitou.

"As you please, Monsieur," replied the peasant, walking on; and they took their departure.

Suddenly Madeleine cried out from the door. "Monsieur! Monsieur!"

"What is it?" said Gilbert.

"His name! his name! What do you wish him to be called?"

"His name is Gilbert!" replied the young man, with a manly pride.

CHAPTER LXI.

THE DEPARTURE.

At the notary's, the business was soon disposed of. Gilbert deposited, under his own name, a sum of twenty thousand francs, lacking a few hundred, designed to defray the expenses of education and maintenance of the child, and also to establish him in some business when he reached manhood. He allowed for the education and maintenance the sum of five hundred francs a year for fifteen years, and decided that the rest of the money should be set aside for the purchase of some business or a piece of land.

Having thus provided for the child, Gilbert thought of the guardians. He wished that two thousand four hundred francs should be given to Pitou by the boy when he attained the age of eighteen years. Until then Maître Niquet was to pay out annually only five hundred francs. Maître Niquet was to enjoy the use of the money as compensation for his trouble.

Gilbert took a proper receipt for the money from Niquet, and for the child from Pitou, — Pitou witnessing the signature of Niquet, Niquet that of Pitou; so that at about noon Gilbert was ready to take his departure, leaving Niquet in a state of admiration for this precocious wisdom, and Pitou rejoicing in his good fortune.

On leaving the village of Haramont, Gilbert fancied himself separating from the whole world. Nothing had for him now either meaning or promise. He had left behind the careless life of a young man, and had committed what men call a crime, which perhaps God would severely punish. At the same time, confident in his own strength of mind and body, Gilbert had the courage to tear himself away from Maître Niquet, who had accompanied him, and had taken a great liking to him, and who tempted him by a thousand allurements.

But the mind is capricious; human nature is subject to weaknesses. In proportion as a man has will, spontaneity of action, energy in the execution of his plans, he measures the distance which already separates him from his first step. It is then that the most courageous are alarmed; it is then that they say, like Cæsar, "Have I done well in passing the Rubicon?"

Gilbert, finding himself on the verge of the forest, turned to look once more upon the brown tops of the trees which hid all Haramont except the steeple. This charming picture of happiness and peace plunged him into a revery full of regrets and delights.

"Fool that I am!" he said to himself; "where am I going? Will not God turn away in anger in the depths of heaven? What! an idea presented itself to me; what! circumstances favored the accomplishment of that idea; what! a man created by God to cause the wrong which I have done, has consented to repair this wrong, and I find myself to-day possessor of riches and my child! So, with ten thousand francs, ten thousand being reserved for the child, I can live here like a happy husbandman, among these good villagers, in the bosom of this sublime and fruitful Nature. I can bury myself forever in peaceful blessedness, in work and contemplation; I can forget the world, and be forgotten by it; I can — unbounded happiness! — bring up this child myself, and thus enjoy my labor. Why not? Are not these good chances compensation for all my past suffering? Oh, yes; I can live thus! yes, I can share in the division of this money with that child, which, besides, I shall have brought up myself, earning thus the money which would be given to these hirelings. I can confess to Maître Niquet that I am his father; I can do everything." And his heart was filled by degrees with inexpressible joy, and with a hope which he had not yet tasted, even in the most pleasant hallucinations of his dreams.

Suddenly the worm which slumbered at the core of this beautiful fruit awoke, and showed its hideous head; it was remorse, it was shame, it was misery. "I cannot," said Gilbert, turning pale; "I have robbed this woman of her child, as I robbed her of her honor. I have robbed this man of money, to make, I said, reparation. I have, then, no longer the right to use it for my own happiness; I have no longer the right to keep the child, since the mother cannot have it; it belongs to both of us or to neither."

And with these words, painful as wounds, Gilbert rose in despair; his face now expressed the most gloomy, the most hateful of passions. "Well, then," said he, "I will be miserable; I will suffer; I will give up love and fortune; but the portion of good which I should have done, I will turn to evil. My patrimony henceforth is vengeance and misery. Do not fear, Andrée, I will share faithfully with you!" He turned to the right, and after a moment's reflection as to the direction he should take, plunged into the woods, where he walked all day in the direction of Normandy, which he had reckoned on reaching after a four days' journey.

He possessed nine francs and a few sous. His appearance was irreproachable, his face calm and quiet. Carrying a book under his arm, he looked very much like a student of good family returning to the paternal mansion. He was accustomed to walk at night in the fine roads, and to sleep by day in the fields in the sun's rays. Twice only the wind disturbed him so much that he was obliged to enter a cottage, where, upon a chair by the fireplace, he slept to his heart's content without noticing the approach of night. He always had a pretext and a destination. "I am going to Rouen," he said, "to my uncle's, and I come from Villers-Cotterets; I wished, like other young men, to make a journey on foot by way of amusement."

There was no suspicion on the part of the peasants; at that time a book carried respect with it. If Gilbert saw an expression of doubt upon some more compressed lips, he spoke of a school to which his vocation called him. This quickly dispelled every suspicion. Eight days passed thus, during which Gilbert lived like a peasant, spending ten sous a day and walking ten leagues. He arrived at last at Rouen, and once there, had no need of information, nor of asking his way.

The book which he carried was a copy of "La Nouvelle Héloise," richly bound. Rousseau had given it to him, and had written his name on the first leaf of the book. Gilbert, reduced to four francs ten sous, tore out this leaf, which he carefully preserved, and sold the book to a book-seller for three francs.

Thus the young man was enabled to arrive, three days later, in sight of Havre, and at sunset he beheld the sea. His shoes were in a condition not at all becoming to a young gentleman who daintily put on silk stockings for travelling through the towns. But Gilbert had another idea; he sold his silk stockings, or rather exchanged them, for a pair of shoes of irreproachable stoutness. As to their elegance, we will say nothing.

This last night he passed in Harfleur, lodged and fed for sixteen sous. There he ate oysters for the first time in his life. "A dish of the rich," he said to himself, "for the poorest of men; so true is it that God has done nothing but good, while men have done the evil, according to the maxim of Rousseau."

At ten o'clock in the morning on the thirteenth of December, Gilbert entered Havre, and the first thing he saw was the "Adonis," a fine brig of three hundred tons, lying in a dock. The wharves were deserted. Gilbert ventured to go on board the brig over a gang-plank. A cabin-boy approached to question him.

"The captain?" said Gilbert.

The boy pointed to the companion-way, and directly a voice from below cried out, "Let him come down."

Gilbert descended. He was led into a small room, constructed of mahogony and furnished with the most quiet simplicity. A man, thirty years old, pale, nervous, with keen and restless eye, was reading a paper upon a table made of mahogany like the walls. "What does Monsieur wish?" he said to Gilbert.

Gilbert made a sign to the man to dismiss his boy, and the boy withdrew.

"You are the captain of the 'Adonis,' Monsieur?" said Gilbert, immediately.

"Yes, Monsieur."

"This note is addressed to you, then?" He handed to the captain Balsamo's note.

Scarcely had he looked at the writing, when the captain rose and said hastily to Gilbert, with a smile full of affability, "Ah, you too? So young? Good! good!"

Gilbert merely bowed.

"You are going?" he said.

"To America."

"You start?"

"I go with you."

"Good. In eight days, then."

"What shall I do in the mean time, Captain?"

"Have you a passport?"

"No."

"Then you must come on board to-night, after having walked all day outside the town, — at Sainte-Adresse, for instance. Do not speak to any one."

"I must eat; I have no money."

"You must dine here; you shall have supper to-night."

"And afterward?"

"Once embarked, you will not again land; you will remain in hiding here. You will depart without looking again at the sky. Once at sea, twenty leagues out, you shall be free as you please."

"Good."

"Finish to-day all that you have to do."

"I have a letter to write."

"Write it on this table; here is pen, ink, and paper. The post-office is in the faubourg; the boy will conduct you."

"Thanks, Captain," and Gilbert, left alone, wrote a short letter upon which he placed this address: "Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney; Paris, Rue Coq-Héron, 9, — the first door beyond the Rue Plastrière." Then he put the letter in his pocket, ate what the captain himself served him, and followed the boy, who conducted him to the post-office, where the letter was mailed.

All day long Gilbert watched the sea from the top of the cliffs. At night he returned. The captain was on the lookout for him, and brought him on board.

CHAPTER LXII.

GILBERT'S LAST FAREWELL.

PHILIPPE had passed a terrible night. Those footprints in the snow were sufficient proof that some one had made his way into the house to carry off the child; but whom could he accuse? There was nothing to fix his suspicions upon any one.

Philippe knew his father so well that he did not doubt his complicity in the affair. Monsieur de Taverney believed Louis XV. to be the father of this child; he would attach great importance to the preservation of this living witness of the king's infidelity to Madame Dubarry. The baron would also believe that, sooner or later, Andrée would be restored to favor, and would wish to regain at any price the principal means of her coming fortune. These reflections, based upon a revelation, still quite fresh, of the paternal character, comforted Philippe somewhat, who thought it possible to recover this child since he knew who had stolen it. He watched therefore for the coming of Doctor Louis at eight o'clock, to whom, as they walked back and forth in the street, he related the frightful event of the night.

The doctor was a man of good judgment; he examined the footprints in the garden, and after consideration decided in favor of Philippe's suppositions. "I know the baron well enough," he said, "to believe him capable of this wicked deed. At the same time, may not some other interest, more immediate, have led to the abduction of this child?"

"What interest, Doctor?"

"That of the real father."

"Oh!" cried Philippe, "for a moment I had this idea; but the miserable man has not even bread for himself. He is a madman, a fanatic, a fugitive by this time, who must be afraid of my very shadow. Let us make no mistake, Doctor. The miserable fellow committed this crime under the temptation of opportunity; but now that I am no longer angry, although I hate this criminal, I think that I shall avoid meeting him, so that I may not kill him. I think he must have feelings of remorse which punish him; I think that hunger and exile will avenge me as efficiently as my sword."

"Let us say no more about it," said the doctor.

"You will, dear and good friend, consent to just one last falsehood; for we must, first of all, reassure Andrée. You will tell her that yesterday you were alarmed about the health of this child; that you returned in the night, and took him to carry him to his nurse. This fiction which I have improvised for Andrée is the first one that presents itself to my mind."

"I will say that; you will, however, seek for this child?"

"I have a plan for finding him. I have decided to leave France. Andrée will enter the monastery of Saint Denis; then I will seek Monsieur de Taverney. I will tell him that I know all; I will make him disclose to me the hiding-place of the child. His resistance I will overcome by threats of public exposure, by threats of intervention on the part of Madame la Dauphine."

"And what will you do with the child, your sister being in the convent?"

"I will place him at nurse with a woman whom you will recommend to me; afterward I will send him to college, and when he is grown up I will keep him with me, if I live."

"And do you think that the mother will consent to leave either you or her child?"

"Andrée will henceforth consent to anything I wish. She knows that I have approached Madame la Dauphine on the subject, whose promise I have; she will not allow me to be wanting in respect toward our protectress."

"Let us go in to see the poor mother," said the doctor; and he entered the apartment of Andrée, who was sleeping quietly, comforted by Philippe's attentions. Her first word was a question to the doctor, who had already reassured her by his happy expression. She, from that time, became so calm that her convalescence was much accelerated; and ten days later she rose, and could walk in the conservatory when the sun was shining upon the glass.

On the very day of this walk, Philippe, who had been away for some days, returned to the house in the Rue Coq-Héron with a face so gloomy that the doctor, on opening the door for him, divined some great misfortune.

"What is the matter, then? Does your father refuse to restore the child?"

"My father," said Philippe, "has been seized with an attack of fever, which confined him to his bed three days after his departure from Paris, and he was very low when I arrived. I looked upon all this sickness as a trick, as a pretence, as a proof even of his complicity in the abduction. I insisted, I threatened; but Monsieur de Taverney swore to me by the Christ that he understood nothing I said to him."

"So you return to Paris without having obtained any intelligence?"

"Yes, Doctor."

"And convinced of the baron's veracity?"

"Almost convinced."

"More artful than you, he has not disclosed his secret."

"I threatened him with the intervention of Madame la Dauphine, and the baron turned pale. 'Ruin me if you like,' he said; 'bring dishonor upon your father and yourself; it will be an egregious folly without any result. I do not know what you mean.'"

"So that —"

"So that I return in despair."

At this moment Philippe heard his sister's voice saying, "Has not Philippe returned?"

"Great God! here she is! What shall I say to her?" murmured Philippe.

"Silence!" said the doctor.

Andrée entered the room, and embraced her brother with a joyous tenderness which chilled the young man's heart.

"Well," she said, "where do you come from?"

"I come from my father, in the first place, as I told you."

"Monsieur le Baron is well?"

"Yes, Andrée; but that was not the only visit I have made. I have seen several persons respecting your entrance at Saint Denis. Thank God, everything is now ready; you are saved, you can think of your future with intelligence and firmness."

Andrée approached her brother and with a tender smile, "Dear friend," she said, "my future no longer concerns me; neither must my future trouble any one. The future of my child is all to me, and I shall consecrate myself solely to the son God has given me. This is my resolution, irrevocably taken, since, with the return of my strength, I can no longer doubt the steadiness of my mind. To live for my son, to suffer privation, to labor even, if necessary, but never to leave him, day or night, — such is the future I have laid out for myself. No more convent, no more egotism; I belong to some one; God no longer wants me!"

The doctor looked at Philippe as if to say: "Well, what did I predict?"

"My sister," cried the young man, "what are you saying?"

"Do not blame me, Philippe, this is no caprice of a weak and vain woman; I will not incommode you. I will impose nothing upon you."

"But — but, Andrée, I cannot remain in France; I wish to leave everything. I have no longer any fortune; no longer any future. I might consent to abandon you at the foot of an altar, but in the world, in the midst of toil, — Andrée, take care!"

"I have considered everything. I love you sincerely, Philippe; but if you leave me, I will restrain my tears, and take refuge near the cradle of my son."

The doctor approached. "This is extravagance, madness," he said.

"Ah, Doctor, what would you have? It is a state of madness to be a mother, but God sent me this madness. So long as this child needs me I shall persist in my resolution."

Philippe and the doctor exchanged glances.

"My child," said the doctor, "I am not a very eloquent preacher; but I think I remember that God forbids too strong an attachment to any creature."

"Yes, sister," added Philippe.

"God does not forbid a mother's strong love for her son, I think, Doctor."

"Pardon me, my child. For every law that comes from God, search out, not the moral cause alone, but also the material cause. God forbids a mother to love her child to excess, because the child is a frail, delicate plant, exposed to all misfortunes, to all sufferings; and because to love intensely an ephemeral creature is to expose one's self to despair."

"Doctor," murmured Andrée, "why do you say this to me? And you, Philippe, why are you regarding me with this compassion, this paleness?"

"Dear Andrée," interrupted the young man, "follow my advice. Your health is re-established; enter as soon as possible the convent of Saint Denis."

"I! I have told you that I will not leave my son."

"So long as he shall have need of you," said the doctor, gently.

"My God!" cried Andrée, "what is it? Speak! Something sad, cruel?"

"Be careful," the doctor whispered in Philippe's ear; "she is too weak to bear a decided blow."

"Brother, you do not answer; explain yourself."

"Dear sister, you know that on my return I passed through Point-de-Jour, where your child is at nurse."

"Yes, well?"

"Well, the child was somewhat ill."

"Ill! that dear child! Quick, Marguerite; Marguerite, a carriage! I am going to see my child!"

"Impossible!" cried the doctor; "you are not in a condition to go out, or to bear the motion of a carriage."

"You told me this morning that this was possible; you told me that to-morrow on Philippe's return, I should go to see the poor little one."

"I thought you would be stronger than you are."

"Are you deceiving me?"

The doctor remained silent.

"Marguerite!" repeated Andrée, "obey me; a carriage!"

"But it may kill you," interrupted Philippe.

"Well, let it kill me! I do not care so very much for life."

Marguerite waited, regarding in turn her mistress, her master, and the doctor.

"Come! when I command!" cried Andrée, whose cheeks suddenly reddened.

"Dear sister!"

"I will hear nothing more; and if you refuse me a carriage, I will go on foot."

"Andrée," said Philippe, suddenly, "you will not go; no, there is no need of your going."

"My child is dead!" said the young girl, coldly, letting her hands fall over the sides of the chair in which Philippe and the doctor had seated her.

Philippe answered only by kissing one of her cold and listless hands. By degrees Andrée's neck lost its rigidity; her head drooped on her bosom, and she shed copious tears.

"God has willed," said Philippe, "that we should submit to this new misfortune, — God, who is so great, so just, who may have other plans for you, who judged, no doubt, that the presence of this child at your side would be a punishment undeserved."

"But yet," sighed the poor mother, "why has God made this innocent creature suffer?"

"God has not made him suffer, my child," said the doctor; "he died on the very night of his birth. Have no more regret for him than for a shadow that comes and goes."

"The cries that I heard?"

"Were his farewell to life."

Andrée hid her face in her hands, while the two men, expressing their thought in an eloquent look, congratulated themselves on their pious lie.

Suddenly Marguerite entered with a letter addressed to Andrée in the following manner: "Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney, Paris, Rue Coq-Héron, — the first door beyond the Rue Plastrière."

Philippe showed the letter to the doctor over Andrée's head, who was no longer weeping, but was absorbed in her grief. "Who could have written it?" he thought. "No one knew her address, and it is not our father's writing."

"Here, Andrée," said Philippe, "is a letter for you."

Without thinking, without hesitating, without surprise, Andrée tore open the envelope, and wiping her eyes, unfolded the paper to read; but she had scarcely run over the lines which composed this letter when she uttered a loud cry, rose up like a mad woman, and with a terrible contraction of her arms and feet fell, heavy as a statue, into the arms of Marguerite who was standing near.

Philippe picked up the letter and read,—

AT SEA, December 15, 17—

I go, driven away by you, and you will not see me again; but I carry away my child, which shall never call you mother!

GILBERT.

Philippe crushed the paper, with a roar of anger. "Oh!" he said, grinding his teeth, "I had almost pardoned the crime committed on the spur of temptation; but this deliberate crime shall be punished. Over your lifeless head, Andrée, I swear to kill the miserable fellow the first time I meet him. God will permit me to meet him, for he has filled the measure to the brim. Doctor, will Andrée recover?"

"Yes, yes!"

"Doctor, Andrée must enter the monastery of Saint Denis to-morrow; by the day after to-morrow I must be at the nearest seaport. The villain has fled, I will follow him. Besides, I must have this child. Doctor, which is the nearest seaport?"

"Havre."

"I will be at Havre in thirty-six hours," replied Philippe.

CHAPTER LXIII.

ON BOARD.

From that moment Andrée's house was dull and silent as a tomb.

The knowledge that her son was dead would perhaps have killed Andrée. It would have been one of those heavy, abiding sorrows which perpetually undermine. Gilbert's letter was a blow so violent that it aroused all the aggressive force and feeling that still remained in Andrée's generous soul. Coming to herself, she looked at Philippe, and the wrath which she read in his eyes was a new source of courage for herself. She remained silent until her strength was so far recovered that her voice would not tremble, and then, taking Philippe's hand, "My friend," she said, "you spoke to me this morning of the monastery of Saint Denis, in which a cell has been granted me by Madame la Dauphine?"

"Yes, Andrée."

"You will conduct me thither to-day, if you please."

"Thanks, sister."

"To you, Doctor," Andrée continued, "for so many kindnesses a word of thanks would be a barren recompense. Your recompense, Doctor, cannot be found on earth." She went to him and kissed him. "This little medallion," she said, "contains my portrait, which my mother caused to be made when I was two years old. It should resemble my son. Keep it, Doctor, and let it speak to you sometimes of the child whom you have ushered into life, and of the mother whom your care has saved."

Having spoken thus, Andrée, without giving way to emotion, made her preparations for the change, and at six o'clock in the evening she passed through the wicket-door of the parlor of Saint Denis, before the bars of which Philippe, unable to control his emotions, uttered within himself a farewell, perhaps eternal.

Poor Andrée's fortitude suddenly left her. She turned and ran back to her brother with outstretched arms; he also extended his arms toward her. They met, notwithstanding the cold barrier of bars between them, and their tears were mingled on their burning cheeks.

"Adieu! adieu!" murmured Andrée, whose grief burst forth in sobs.

"Adieu!" replied Philippe, stifling his despair.

"If you ever find my son," said Andrée, in a low voice, "do not let me die till I have embraced him."

"Be assured. Adieu! adieu!"

Andrée tore herself from her brother's arms, and supported by a lay sister went forward, constantly looking back at him as he stood in the deep shadow. So long as he could see her he made signs to her with his head and by shaking his handkerchief. At length he received a last farewell, which she sent to him from the end of the dim passage-way. Then an iron gate fell between them with a melancholy sound, and all was over.

Philippe took post at Saint Denis; with his portmanteau behind him he journeyed all that night, all the following day, and in the evening arrived at Havre. He slept at the first hostelry he found, and at daybreak the next day was out on the wharves inquiring about the earliest departures for America. He learned that the brig "Adonis" would sail that very day for New York. He sought out the captain, who was finishing his preparations, and on paying the price for the passage was admitted as a passenger. Then, having written a last letter to Madame la Dauphine, declaring his respectful devotion and his gratitude, he sent his baggage on board, and himself embarked at the time of high tide.

Four o'clock was striking in the tower of François I. when the "Adonis" left the channel under foresail and topsails. The sea was of a sombre blue, the sky red on the horizon. Philippe, leaning on the railing, after having saluted the few passengers, his travelling companions, stood gazing at the coast of France, which gradually became embrowned with a purplish smoke, as the brig, unfurling more sail, moved rapidly to the right and gained the open sea. Very soon the shore of France, fellow-passengers, and the ocean disappeared; dark night had covered all with its extended wings. Philippe went to his little cabin to read over the copy of his letter to the dauphiness, which might serve for a prayer addressed to the Creator, as well as for a farewell addressed to a fellow-creature. Philippe had written as follows: —

MADAME, — A man without hope and without support withdraws himself from you with regret at having done so little for your future Majesty. He goes to encounter the storms and tempests of the sea while you remain amid the troubles and dangers of government. Young, beautiful, adored, surrounded by respectful friends and idolizing servants, you will forget him whom your royal hand has condescended to lift above the crowd. But I shall never forget you. I am going to a new world to study the means of serving you more effectively upon your throne. I leave to you my sister, poor abandoned flower, who will have no other sun than the light of your countenance. Deign sometimes to condescend to her; and in the midst of your joy, of your almightiness, in the chorus of unanimous devotion, listen, I beseech you, to the benediction of an exile who will no longer hear you, and perhaps will never see you again.

After reading this letter Philippe's heart was oppressed. The melancholy sound of the groaning vessel and the rush of the waves which broke against the prow made a combination of noises which would have saddened the happiest imaginations. The night was long and painful to the young man. A visit which the captain made him in the morning did not restore him to a satisfactory state of mind. That officer informed him that the greater part of the passengers feared the sea and confined themselves to their berths, and that the passage promised to be short, but disagreeable, owing to the violence of the wind.

Philippe fell into the custom of dining with the captain, and having breakfast served in his cabin; and not finding himself well-hardened against the inconveniences of a sea-voyage, he acquired the habit of spending some hours on the deck reclining on his large military cloak. The rest of the time he employed in planning his future course, and in supporting his mind by solid reading. Sometimes he met his fellow-passengers. There were two ladies on their way to take possession of an inheritance in North America, and four men, one of whom, already old, had with him two sons. These were the cabin passengers. On the other side Philippe once noticed some men of an appearance and bearing more common; he found nothing there to occupy his attention.

In proportion as habit diminished his suffering, Philippe recovered his serenity. Some fine days, clear and free from storms, announced to the passengers the approach to temperate latitudes. Then they remained longer on deck; then, in the night, Philippe, who had concealed his name even from the captain, that he might not have to talk on any subject he dreaded to approach, — Philippe heard, in his cabin, steps over his head; he even heard the voice of the captain, who doubtless was walking with a passenger. It was a reason why he should not go up. He therefore opened his port-hole, to breathe a little fresh air, and waited for the morning.

Once only during the night, hearing neither voices nor footsteps, he ascended to the deck. The night was warm, the sky clouded, and in the wake of the vessel were seen, springing up in whirls, thousands of phosphorescent atoms. The night apparently had seemed to the passengers too dark and too stormy; for Philippe saw no one on the stern-deck. But forward, on the bow and leaning against the mast of the bowsprit, motionless in sleep or meditation, was a dark figure, which in the dim light Philippe could hardly distinguish, — doubtless some second-class passenger, some poor exile looking forward to the arrival in America, while Philippe himself was regretting the departure from France.

Philippe contemplated that motionless passenger a long time; then feeling the cold of the early morning, he prepared to return to his cabin. Meantime the passenger at the prow gazed at the sky, which began to grow light. Philippe heard the captain coming, and turned round. "You are taking the morning air, Captain?" he said.

"Monsieur, I am just out of bed."

"You have been anticipated by some of your passengers, as you see."

"By you; but officers are, like sailors, early birds."

"Oh, not by me, only!" said Philippe. "See, yonder, that man who meditates so profoundly; he also is one of your passengers, is he not?"

The captain looked and appeared to be surprised.

"Who is that man?" asked Philippe.

"A — merchant," said the captain, with hesitation.

"Who is running after a fortune?" murmured Philippe. "This brig goes too slowly for him."

The captain, instead of replying, went forward to the passenger, and spoke to him, and Philippe saw him disappear down the companion-way.

"You have disturbed his meditations," said Philippe to the captain, who rejoined him. "He did not annoy me, however."

"No, Monsieur, I warned him that the morning cold is dangerous in these latitudes. Passengers of the second-class have not good cloaks, like you."

"Where are we, Captain?"

"Monsieur, to-morrow we shall see the Azore Islands, at one of which we will take in a little fresh water, for it is very warm."

CHAPTER LXIV.

THE AZORE ISLANDS.

THE next day, as the captain had predicted, the passengers could see islands in the northeast, far off under the dazzling sun. They were the Azores. The wind was fair, and the brig made good progress. Toward three o'clock they were near enough for a complete view. When they had approached within the distance of a cannon-shot from the nearest island, the brig was brought up into the wind, and the crew prepared to go ashore for some barrels of fresh water, as the captain had promised. All the passengers welcomed the pleasure of a trip to the shore. To place the feet on solid ground after twenty days and nights of painful navigation is a sort of pleasure which those only can appreciate who have made a long voyage.

"Gentlemen," said the captain to the passengers who he thought were undecided, "you have five hours for a trip to the shore. Take advantage of the opportunity. You will find on that little island, entirely uninhabited, springs of ice-water for you who are naturalists, and rabbits and red partridges for you who are sportsmen."

Philippe took his gun and ammunition. "But, Captain," said he, "do you remain on board? Why do you not come with us?"

"Because yonder," replied the captain, pointing out to sea, "comes a vessel of suspicious appearance, — a vessel which has followed me for four days. I wish to see what she means to do."

Philippe, satisfied with the explanation, got into the last boat and started for the shore. The ladies and several other passengers, of both classes, did not care to take the chances of the trip, or awaited their turn. The two boats then moved away, carrying joyous sailors, and passengers more joyous still.

The captain's last words were : " At eight o'clock, gentlemen, the last boat will go for you. Consider that as settled ; those who are behind time will be left."

When all the party, naturalists and sportsmen, had landed, the sailors immediately entered a cavern, situated about a hundred paces from the shore, and which turned at a right angle near the entrance, as if to avoid the rays of the sun. From a living spring, clear, bluish water glided over the mossy rocks, and was lost in fine sand within the cavern. Here the sailors stopped and filled their casks, which then they rolled toward the shore.

Philippe watched them at their work. He admired the tinted shades of the cavern, and the freshness and gentle noise of the water as it glided from fall to fall. He was surprised at finding at first dense darkness and intense cold, while after a few minutes the temperature became mild, and the darkness was pierced by a soft, mysterious light. Thus with arms outstretched and knocking against the rocky sides, he had begun to follow the sailors without seeing them ; and then by degrees every face, every form, became clear and distinct. Philippe preferred, as to clearness, the light of that grotto to the light of heaven, so glaring and harsh in full day in those latitudes. Meantime he heard the voices of his companions die away in the distance. One or two gunshots echoed along the mountain ; then all noises ceased, and Philippe was alone. The sailors had accomplished their task, and would not return to the grotto.

Philippe yielded himself to the charm of that solitude and to the thoughts whirling in his brain. He stretched himself out upon the soft, luxurious sand, with his back against the rocks carpeted with aromatic herbs, and sank into meditation. The hours rolled on. He had forgotten the world. At his side his gun, discharged, leaned against the rock, and that he might lie more comfortably, he had taken from his pockets the pistols which were his inseparable companions. All his past life came up before him, slowly, solemnly, as a warning or a reproach; all his future took flight before him, like the timid bird which one may touch with a look, but never with the hand.

While Philippe thus dreamed, doubtless others, within a hundred feet of him, dreamed, laughed, and hoped. He had an insensible perception of that movement, and more than once he thought he heard the boatmen's oars as they conveyed passengers to the vessel or brought other passengers to the shore, — the former surfeited with the day's pleasures, the latter eager to enjoy them in their turn. But his meditation had not yet been disturbed, — either because the entrance to the grotto had escaped notice, or because those who observed it disdained to enter.

Suddenly a shadow, timid, undecided, interposed itself between the light of day and the grotto, at its very entrance. Philippe saw some one walking, with his hands extended before him, and his head bent down, in the direction of the murmuring water. This person fell once against the rocks, his foot having slipped on some herbs. Then Philippe rose and went forward, offering his hand to the visitor to help him find a safe path. In this courteous action his fingers touched the hand of the traveller in the darkness. "This way," he said, with politeness; "Monsieur, the water is in this direction."

At the sound of that voice the stranger quickly raised his head, and prepared to answer, exposing his face in the azure twilight of the grotto. But Philippe, with a sudden cry of horror, started back. The unknown also drew back with an exclamation of fright.

"Gilbert!"

"Philippe!"

These two words burst forth at the same time, like subterranean thunder. Then ensued the sound of a sort of struggle. Philippe had seized with both hands his enemy's throat and dragged him to the depths of the cavern. Gilbert suffered himself to be dragged, without uttering a word of protest. Pushed against the rocky wall of the interior, he could recoil no farther.

"Scoundrel! I have you at last!" roared Philippe. "God has delivered you into my hands; God is just."

Gilbert was very pale, but made no movement; his arms hung idly by his sides.

"Oh, coward and villain!" said Philippe; "he has n't even the instinct of the wild beast, which defends itself."

But Gilbert replied in gentle tones, "Defend myself! and why?"

"True, you know well that you are in my power; you know well that you have deserved the most terrible punishment. All your crimes are proved. You have loaded a woman with shame; you have killed her by cruelty. It was not enough for you to dishonor a virgin; you wished also to assassinate a mother!"

Gilbert made no reply. Philippe, who gradually became wild with the heat of his own fury, again raised violent hands against Gilbert. The young man offered no resistance.

"You are not a man, then?" said Philippe, shaking him in his rage; "you have only the face of a man?

What! — not even resistance? But I am strangling you, — you see it plainly. Resist, then; defend yourself, coward! coward! assassin!"

Gilbert felt the sharp fingers of his enemy in his throat. He drew himself up, stiffened himself, and vigorous as a lion, by a single movement of his shoulders cast Philippe off from him. Then he crossed his arms. "You see," said he, "that I could defend myself if I wished; but why should I? Now you run to your gun. I would rather be killed at once than torn by finger-nails and crushed by shameful blows."

Philippe had, in fact, seized his gun, but at these words he laid it aside. "No," he murmured. Then, aloud, "Where are you going? How are you here?"

"I embarked in the 'Adonis.'"

"You hid yourself, then? you saw me?"

"I did not even know you were on board."

"You lie!"

"I do not lie."

"How is it that I have not seen you?"

"Because I have left my berth only at night."

"You see! — you hide yourself!'

"Certainly."

"From me?"

"No, I tell you; I go to America on a mission, and I must not be seen. The captain has lodged me apart for that reason."

"You hide yourself, I tell you, to conceal from me your presence, and especially to hide the child which you have stolen."

"The child?" said Gilbert.

"Yes; you have stolen and carried away that child, to make of him a weapon by which some day you may profit, villain!"

Gilbert shook his head. "I have taken the child," he said, "so that no one may teach him to despise or to deny his father."

Philippe paused for a moment. "If that is true," said he, "if I could believe it, you would be less villanous than I thought; but you have stolen, — why have you not denied it?"

"Stolen? I have stolen?"

"You have stolen the child."

"He is my son! he is mine! We do not steal, Monsieur, when we take our own."

"Listen!" said Philippe, trembling with rage. "Just now I thought I would kill you. I had sworn it; I had the right to do it."

Gilbert did not answer.

"Now God enlightens me. God has thrown you in my way as if to say to me: 'Vengeance is useless; vengeance is right only when one is abandoned by God.' I will not kill you, I will only destroy the structure of misery you have erected. This child is your means of mischief for the future; you must give me this child."

"But I have him not," said Gilbert. "One does not take to sea a child fifteen days old."

"You must have procured a nurse for him; why did you not bring away the nurse?"

"I tell you that I have not brought away the child."

"Then you have left him in France. In what part have you left him?"

Gilbert was silent.

"Answer! where have you placed him at nurse, and with what means of support?"

Gilbert was silent.

"Ah, scoundrel, you defy me!" said Philippe. "Are you not afraid of arousing my anger? Will you tell me where my sister's child is hidden? Will you give me this child?"

"My child is my own," murmured Gilbert.

"Villain! you see plainly that you will die!"

"I will not give up my child."

"Gilbert, listen; I speak to you kindly. Gilbert, I will try to forget the past; I will try to pardon you. Gilbert, you understand my generosity, do you not? I pardon you! I forgive all the shame and misfortune you have brought upon our house; it is a great sacrifice. Give me back this child. Would you have more? Would you have me try to overcome the so justifiable repugnance of Andrée? Would you have me intercede for you? Well, I will do it if you give me back this child! One word more: Andrée loves her son — your son — madly; she will be moved by your repentance, I promise you. But give me back this child, Gilbert, give it back to me!"

Gilbert folded his arms, fixing upon Philippe a glance of gloomy determination. "You have not believed me," he said; "I do not believe you. Not that you are a dishonest man, but because I have sounded the depth of the prejudice of caste. There is no possible return, — no more pardon! We are mortal enemies. You are the stronger, therefore be the conqueror. I do not ask you for your weapon, do not ask me for mine."

"You confess, then, that it is a weapon?"

"Against scorn, yes; against ingratitude, yes; against insult, yes!"

"Once more, Gilbert," said Philippe, foaming at the mouth, "will you?"

"No."

"Take care!"

"No."

"I do not wish to murder you; I wish you to have the chance of killing Andrée's brother. One crime more! Ah, ah! that is tempting. Take this pistol; here is another. Let us each count three and fire," and he threw one of the pistols at Gilbert's feet.

The yonng man stood motionless. "A duel," he said, "is precisely what I refuse."

"You prefer to have me kill you!" cried Philippe, mad with rage and despair.

"I prefer to be killed by you."

"Reflect. I am beside myself."

"I have reflected."

"It is my right; God will absolve me."

"I know it, — kill me."

"For the last time, will you fight?"

"No."

"You refuse to defend yourself?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, die like a villain of whom I rid the earth! die like a heathen, die like a thief, die like a dog!" and Philippe discharged his pistol at Gilbert, almost touching him with the muzzle. The latter stretched out his arms, swayed first backward, then forward, and fell upon his face without uttering a cry. Philippe felt the sand under his feet wet with the warm blood; he completely lost his senses, and rushed out of the cavern. Before him was the shore; a boat was waiting. Eight o'clock had been announced as the hour of departure; it was now some minutes after eight.

"Ah, here you are, Monsieur!" said the sailors. "You are the last; every one is on board. What have you killed?"

Philippe, hearing this word, lost consciousness. They took him on board the ship, which was unfurling its sails.

"Is every one on board?" asked the captain.

"Here is the last passenger," replied the sailors. "He must have had a fall, for he has fainted."

The captain gave the necessary orders, and the brig sailed rapidly away from the Azores, at the same time that the unknown vessel, which had annoyed them so long, entered the harbor under the American flag.

The captain of the "Adonis" exchanged signals with this vessel, and reassured, apparently at least, he continued his course toward the east, and was soon lost in the darkness of night.

It was not until the next day that they discovered that one passenger was missing.

EPILOGUE.

On the ninth of May, 1774, at eight o'clock in the evening, Versailles presented a most curious and interesting spectacle.

From the first day of the month the king, Louis XV., attacked with a malady the serious nature of which his physicians at first dared not confess to him, had been confined to his bed, anxiously consulting the countenances of those who surrounded him, to discover in them some reflection of the truth or some ray of hope.

The physician Bordeu had pronounced the king suffering from an attack of small-pox of the most malignant nature, and the physician La Martinière, who had agreed with his colleague as to the nature of the king'scomplaint, gave it as his opinion that his Majesty should be informed of the real state of the case, in order that, both spiritually and temporally, as a king and as a Christian, he might take measures for his own safety and that of his kingdom. "His most Christian Majesty," said he, "should have extreme unction administered to him."

La Martinière represented the party of the dauphin,—the opposition. Bordeu asserted that the bare mention of the serious nature of the disease would kill the king, and said that for his part he would not be a party to such regicide.

Bordeu represented Madame Dubarry's party. In fact, to call in the aid of the Church to the king was to expel the favorite. When God enters at one door, it is full time for Satan to make his exit by the other.

In the mean time, during all these intestine divisions of the faculty, of the royal family, and of the different parties of the court, the disease took quiet possession of the aged, corrupt, and worn-out frame of the king, and set up such a strong position that neither remedies nor prescriptions could dislodge it.

From the first symptoms of the attack, Louis beheld his couch surrounded by his two daughters, the favorite, and the courtiers whom he especially delighted to honor. They still laughed and stood firm by one another.

Suddenly the austere and ominous countenance of Madame Louise of France appeared at Versailles. She had left her cell to give to her father, in her turn, the cares and consolations he so much required. She entered, pale and stern as a statue of Fate. She was no longer a daughter to a father, a sister to her fellow-sisters; she rather resembled those ancient prophetesses who in the evil day of adversity poured in the startled ears of kings the boding cry, "Woe! woe! woe!" She fell upon Versailles like a thunder-shock at the very hour when it was Madame Dubarry's custom to visit the king, who kissed her white hands, and pressed them in soft caresses to his aching brow and burning cheeks. At sight of her all fled. The sisters, trembling, sought refuge in a neighboring chamber. Madame Dubarry bent the knee and hastened to her apartment; the privileged courtiers retreated in disorder to the antechambers; the two physicians alone remained standing by the fireside.

"My daughter!" murmured the king, opening his eyes, heavy with pain and fever.

"Yes, Sire," said the princess, "your daughter."

"And you come —"

"To remind you of God!"

The king raised himself in an upright posture and attempted to smile.

"For you have forgotten God," resumed Madame Louise.

"I!"

"And I wish to recall him to your thoughts."

"My daughter, I am not so near death, I trust, that your exhortations need to be so very urgent. My illness is very slight, — a slow fever, attended with some inflammation."

"Your malady, Sire," interrupted the princess, "is that which, according to etiquette, should summon around your Majesty's couch all the great prelates of the kingdom. When a member of the royal family is attacked with small-pox, the rites of the Church should be administered without loss of time."

"Madame!" exclaimed the king, greatly agitated, and becoming deadly pale, "what is that you say?"

"Madame!" broke in the terrified physicians.

"I repeat," continued the princess, "that your Majesty is attacked with the small-pox."

The king uttered a cry.

"The physicians did not tell me so," he replied.

"They had not the courage. But I look forward to another kingdom for your Majesty than the kingdom of France. Draw near to God, Sire, and solemnly review your past life."

"The small-pox!" muttered Louis; "a fatal disease! — Bordeu! — La Martinière! — can it be true?"

The two practitioners hung their heads.

"Then I am lost!" said the king, more and more terrified.

"All diseases can be cured, Sire," said Bordeu, taking the initiative, "especially when the patient preserves his composure of mind."

"God gives peace to the mind and health to the body," replied the princess.

"Madame," said Bordeu, boldly, although in a low voice, "you are killing the king!"

The princess deigned no reply. She approached the sick monarch, and, taking his hand, which she covered with kisses, "Break with the past, Sire," said she, "and give an example to your people. No one warned you; you ran the risk of perishing eternally. Promise solemnly to live a Christian life if you are spared; die like a Christian if God calls you hence."

As she concluded she imprinted a second kiss on the royal hand, and with slow step took her way through the antechambers. There she let her long black veil fall over her face, descended the staircase with a grave and majestic air, and entered her carriage, leaving behind her a stupefaction and terror which cannot be described.

The king could not rouse his spirits, except by dint of questioning his physicians; but the blow had been struck. "I do not wish," said he, "that the scenes of Metz with the Duchesse de Châteauroux should be re-enacted here. Send for Madame d'Aiguillon, and request her to take Madame Dubarry with her to Rueil."

This order was equivalent to an expulsion. Bordeu attempted to remonstrate, but the king ordered him to be silent. Bordeu, moreover, saw his colleague ready to report all that passed to the dauphin, and well aware what would be the issue of the king's malady, he did not persist; but going out from the royal chamber he proceeded to acquaint Madame Dubarry with the blow which had just fallen on her fortunes.

The countess, terrified at the ominous and insulting expression which she saw already on every face around her, hastened to withdraw. In an hour she was without the walls of Versailles, seated beside the Duchesse d'Aiguillon, who, like a trustworthy and grateful friend, was taking the disgraced favorite to her chateau of Rueil, which had descended to her from the great Richelieu.

Bordeu, on his side, shut the door of the king's chamber against all the royal family, under pretext of contagion. Louis's apartment was thenceforward walled up; no one might enter but Religion and Death.

The king had the last rites of the Church administered to him that same day, and this news soon spread through Paris, where the disgrace of the favorite was already known, and circulated from mouth to mouth.

All the court hastened to pay their respects to the dauphin, who closed his doors and refused to see any one.

But the following day the king was better, and sent the Duc d'Aiguillon to carry his compliments to Madame Dubarry. This day was May 9, 1774.

The court deserted the pavilion occupied by the dauphin, and flocked in such crowds to Rueil, where the favorite was residing, that since the banishment of Monsieur de Choiseul to Chanteloup such a string of carriages had never been witnessed.

Things were in this position, therefore: would the king live, and Madame Dubarry still remain queen; or would the king die, and Madame Dubarry sink to the condition of an infamous and execrable courtesan? This was why Versailles, on the evening of May 9, in the year 1774, presented such a curious and interesting spectacle.

On the Place d'Armes, before the palace, several groups of persons had formed in front of the railing who seemed affected and anxious to hear the news. They were citizens of Versailles or of Paris, and every now and then, with all the politeness imaginable, they questioned the guards who were pacing slowly up and down the Court of Honor, with their hands behind their backs, respecting the king's health.

Gradually these groups dispersed. The inhabitants of Paris took their seats in the stage-coaches to return peaceably to their own homes; while those of Versailles, sure of having the earliest news from the fountain-head, also retired to their several dwellings. No one was to be seen in the streets but the patrols of the watch, who performed their duty a little more quietly than usual; and that gigantic world, called the Palace of Versailles, became by degrees shrouded in darkness and silence, like that greater world which contained it.

At the angle of the street bordered with trees which extends in front of the palace, a man advanced in years was seated on a stone-bench overshadowed by the already leafy boughs of the horse-chestnuts, with his expressive and poetic features turned toward the chateau, leaning with both hands on his cane, and supporting his chin on his hands. He was an old man, bent by age and ill-health, but his eye still sparkled with something of its youthful fire, and his thoughts glowed even more brightly than his eyes. He was absorbed in melancholy contemplation, and did not perceive a second personage who, after peeping curiously through the iron railing and questioning the guards, crossed the esplanade in a diagonal direction, and advanced straight toward the bench with the intention of seating himself upon it.

This personage was a young man with projecting cheek-bones, low forehead, aquiline nose slightly bent to one side, and a sardonic smile. While advancing toward the stone-bench he chuckled sneeringly, although alone, seeming to reply by this laughter to some secret thought.

When within three paces of the bench he perceived the old man, and paused, scanning him with his oblique and stealthy glance, although evidently fearing to let his purpose be seen. "You are enjoying the fresh air, Monsieur?" said he, approaching him with an abrupt movement.

The old man raised his head.

"Ha!" exclaimed the new-comer, "it is my illustrious master!"

"And you are my young practitioner?" said the old man.

"Will you permit me to take a seat beside you, Monsieur?"

"Most willingly," and the old man made room on the bench beside him.

"It appears that the king is doing better?" said the young man. "The people rejoice," and he burst a second time into his sneering laugh.

The old man made no reply.

"The whole day long the carriages have been rolling from Paris to Rueil, and from Rueil to Versailles. The Comtesse Dubarry will marry the king as soon as his health is re-established," and he burst into a louder laugh than before.

Still the old man made no reply.

"Pardon me if I laugh at Fate," continued the young man, with a gesture of nervous impatience, "but every good Frenchman, look you, loves his king, and my king is better to-day."

"Do not jest thus on such a subject, Monsieur," said the old man, gently. "The death of a man is always a misfortune for some one, and the death of a king is frequently a great misfortune for all."

"Even the death of Louis XV.?" interrupted the young man, in a tone of irony. "Oh, my dear master, a distinguished philosopher like you to sustain such a proposition! I know all the energy and skill of your paradoxes, but I cannot compliment you on this one."

The old man shook his head.

"And besides," added the new-comer, "why think of the king's death? Who speaks of such an event? The king has the small-pox; well, we all know that complaint. The king has beside him Bordeu and La Martinière, who are skilful men. Oh, I will wager a trifle, my dear master, that Louis the Well-Beloved will recover! Only this time the French people do not suffocate themselves in churches, putting up vows for him, as on the occasion of his former illness. Mark me, everything grows antiquated and is abandoned!"

"Silence!" said the old man, shuddering, — "silence! for I tell you, you are speaking of a man over whom the destroying angel hovers at this moment."

His young companion, surprised at this strange language, looked at the speaker, whose eyes were fixed on the façade of the chateau.

"Then you have more positive intelligence?" he asked.

"Look!" said the old man, pointing with his finger to one of the windows of the palace; "what do you behold yonder?"

"A window lighted up, — is that what you mean?"

"Yes; but lighted in what manner?"

"By a wax candle placed in a little lantern."

"Precisely."

"Well?"

"Well, young man, do you know what the flame of that wax-light represents?"

"No, Monsieur."

"It represents the life of the king."

The young man looked more fixedly at his aged companion, as if to be certain that he was in his senses.

"A friend of mine, Monsieur de Jussieu," continued the old man, "has placed that wax-light there, which will burn as long as the king is alive."

"It is a signal, then?"

"A signal which Louis XV.'s successor devours with his eyes from behind some neighboring curtain. This signal, which shall warn the ambitious of the dawn of a new reign, informs a poor philosopher like myself of the instant when the breath of the Almighty sweeps away, at the same moment, an age and a human existence."

The young man shuddered in his turn, and moved closer to his companion.

"Oh," said the aged philosopher, "mark well this night, young man! Behold what clouds and tempests it bears in its murky bosom! The morning which will succeed it I shall witness no doubt, for I am not yet old enough to abandon hope of seeing the morrow; but a reign is perhaps about to begin which you will witness even to the end, and which includes — like this night — mysterious events which I shall not see. It is not, therefore, without interest that I watch yonder trembling flame, whose signification I have just explained to you."

"True, my master," murmured the young man, "most true."

"Louis XIV. reigned seventy-three years," continued the old man. "How many will Louis XVI. reign?"

"Ah!" exclaimed the younger of the two, pointing to the window, which had just become shrouded in darkness.

"The king is dead!" said the old man, rising with a sort of terror; and both kept silence for some minutes.

Suddenly a chariot, drawn by eight fiery horses, started at full gallop from the court-yard of the palace. Two outriders preceded it, each holding a torch in his hand. In the chariot were the dauphin, Marie Antoinette, and Madame Elizabeth, the sister of the king. The flame of the torches threw a gloomy light on their pale features. The carriage passed close to the two men, within ten paces of the bench from which they had risen.

"Long live King Louis XVI.! Long live the queen!" shouted the young man in a loud, harsh voice, as if he meant to insult this new-born Majesty instead of saluting it.

The dauphin bowed; the queen showed her face at the window, sad and severe. The carriage dashed on and disappeared.

"My dear Monsieur Rousseau," said the younger of the two spectators, "then Madame Dubarry is a widow."

"To-morrow she will be exiled," said his aged companion. "Adieu, Monsieur Marat!"

THE END.

THE QUEEN'S NECKLACE.

PROLOGUE.

On one of the early days in April, 1784, at about quarter past three in the afternoon, our old acquaintance Maréchal de Richelieu, having with his own hands colored his eyebrows with a perfumed dye, pushed away the mirror held before him by his valet, — the successor, but not the equal, of his faithful Rafté, — and shaking his head in the manner peculiar to himself, said: "Ah, that will do very well!"

He arose from his armchair, brushing from his blue-velvet small-clothes, with a movement of the finger almost juvenile, the atoms of white powder which had floated down from his wig. Then, after taking two or three turns up and down the room, stretching his instep, and straightening his knee, "My major-domo!" said he.

In five minutes the major-domo presented himself, in full dress.

The marshal assumed a grave air, befitting the occasion. "Monsieur," said he, "I suppose you have prepared me a good dinner;"

"Most certainly, Monseigneur."

"I have sent you the list of my guests, have I not?"

"And I have carefully noted their number, — a dinner for nine, is it not?"

"There are dinners and dinners, Monsieur."

"Yes, Monseigneur, but —"

The marshal interrupted him with a slightly impatient movement, though tempered with dignity. "'But' — that is not an answer, Monsieur. Every time I hear the word 'but,' and I have heard it many times in eighty-eight years, — well, Monsieur, every time I have heard that word, I am sorry to say, Monsieur, it has preceded some folly."

"Monseigneur!"

"In the first place, at what hour are we to dine?"

"Monseigneur, the common people dine at two, the bar at three, the nobility at four —"

"And I, Monsieur?"

"Monseigneur will dine to-day at five."

"Oh, oh, at five!"

"Yes, Monseigneur, like the king."

"And why like the king?"

"Because on the list Monseigneur has done me the honor to send me, is the name of a king."

"Not at all, Monsieur, you are mistaken; among my guests to-day are none but simple gentlemen."

"Monseigneur doubtless is inclined to jest with his humble servant, and I thank him for the honor he does me; but Monsieur le Comte de Haga, who is among the guests —"

"Well, Monsieur?"

"Well, the Comte de Haga is a king."

"I know no king of that name."

"Monseigneur must pardon me, then," said the major-domo, bowing; "but I had believed, I had supposed —"

"Your business is not to believe, Monsieur; your duty is not to suppose. What you have to do is to read the orders which I give you, without adding to them any comments. When I wish a thing to be known I tell it; when I do not tell it I wish it unknown."

The major-domo bowed again, and this time more respectfully, perhaps, than he would have bowed in talking with a reigning monarch.

"Therefore, Monsieur," continued the old marshal, "since I have only gentlemen to dinner, you will let us dine at my usual hour, four o'clock."

At this order the major-domo's face darkened as if he had heard his death-warrant. He grew pale, and bent under the blow. Then arousing himself, with the courage of despair he said: "Let come what God wills; but Monseigneur will not dine till five o'clock."

"Why, and what does that mean?" said the marshal, straightening himself up.

"Because it is a material impossibility that Monseigneur should dine earlier."

"Monsieur," said the old marshal, shaking his head haughtily, like one still young and vigorous, "it is now, I believe, twenty years since you entered my service?"

"Twenty-one years, one month, and two weeks."

"Well, Monsieur, to these twenty-one years, one month, and two weeks, you will not add a day, — not an hour. You understand me, Monsieur," he continued, biting his thin lips and knitting his dyed eyebrows; "this evening you seek a new master. I will not have the word 'impossible' pronounced in my house. I have no wish, at my age, to begin an apprenticeship to that word. I have no time to waste."

The major-domo bowed a third time. "This evening," he said, "I shall take leave of Monseigneur. But at any rate, up to the last moment my service will be performed as it ought to be;" and he made two steps toward the door.

"What do you mean by 'as it ought to be'?" cried the marshal. "Understand, Monsieur, that things must be done here according to my will; that is the only 'ought.' Now, it is my will to dine at four, and it is against my will that you make me wait till five."

"Monseigneur," replied the major-domo, gravely, "I have served as butler to his Highness the Prince de Soubise, and as steward to his Eminence the Cardinal de Rohan. With the former his Majesty the late king of France dined once a year; with the latter his Majesty the emperor of Austria dined once a month. I know, therefore, how sovereigns should be treated, Monseigneur. King Louis XV., when he visited the Prince de Soubise, vainly called himself the Baron de Gonesse; he was always a king. In the house of Monsieur de Rohan the Emperor Joseph was vainly called the Comte de Packenstein; he was always the emperor. To-day, Monsieur le Maréchal receives a guest who vainly calls himself the Comte de Haga. The Comte de Haga is none the less the king of Sweden. I will leave the hôtel of Monsieur le Maréchal this evening; but meantime Monsieur le Comte de Haga will have been treated like a king."

"But that is the very thing that I kill myself with trying to prevent, you obstinate fellow. The Comte de Haga wishes to keep himself strictly, absolutely, unknown. Pardieu! I understand your absurd vanities, gentlemen of the napkin. It is not that you would honor the crown; you would magnify yourselves with our crowns."

"I do not imagine," said the major-domo, gloomily, "that Monseigneur speaks to me seriously of money."

"Eh, no, Monsieur!" said the marshal, almost ashamed. "No! Money! — who the devil said anything to you about money? Don't evade the question, if you please. I repeat, I want nothing said about the presence here of a king."

"Why, Monsieur le Maréchal, for whom do you take me? Do you think I am blind? Why, there will not be the slightest mention of a king."

"Then do not be obstinate; let us dine at four."

"But at four o'clock, Monseigneur, what I am expecting will not have arrived."

"What are you expecting?—a fish, like Monsieur Vatel?"

"Monsieur Vatel, Monsieur Vatel," murmured the major-domo.

"Well, are you shocked by the comparison?"

"No; but for a miserable sword-thrust which Monsieur Vatel gave himself through the body, Monsieur Vatel is immortalized."

"Ah, ah, and you think, Monsieur, that your brother artist obtained glory at too cheap a price?"

"No, Monseigneur; but how many others in our profession suffer more than he did, devouring griefs and humiliations a hundred times worse than a sword-thrust, who nevertheless are not immortalized!"

"Eh, Monsieur! do you not know that to be immortalized one must be a member of the Academy or must be dead?"

"Monseigneur, if that is so it is much better for one to be alive, and do his duty. I will not die, and my service will be performed as that of Monsieur Vatel would have been if Monsieur le Prince de Condé had had the patience to wait half an hour."

"Oh, now you are promising me wonders; it is adroit."

"No, Monseigneur; nothing wonderful."

"But what, then, are you expecting?"

"Monseigneur wishes me to tell him?"

"Faith, yes; I am curious."

"Then, Monseigneur, I am expecting a bottle of wine."

"A bottle of wine! explain yourself, Monsieur; the thing begins to interest me."

"Listen then, Monseigneur; his Majesty the king of Sweden — I beg pardon, the Comte de Haga I should have said — drinks nothing but Tokay."

"Well, am I so poor as to have no Tokay in my cellar? If so, I must dismiss my butler."

"Not so, Monseigneur; on the contrary, you have about sixty bottles."

"Well, do you think the Comte de Haga will drink sixty-one bottles with his dinner?"

"Patience, Monseigneur; when the Comte de Haga first visited France, while he was only Prince Royal, he dined with the late king, who had received twelve bottles of Tokay from the emperor of Austria. You are aware that the Tokay of the finest vintages is reserved exclusively for the cellar of the emperor, and that kings themselves can drink it only when he pleases to send it to them."

"I know it."

"Well, Monseigneur, of these twelve bottles, from one of which the Prince Royal drank with much satisfaction, only two remain."

"Oh! oh!"

"One is still in the cellar of his Majesty Louis XVI."

"And the other?"

"Ah, Monseigneur," said the major-domo, with a triumphant smile, — for he felt that, after the long battle he had been fighting, the moment of victory was at hand, — "the other was stolen."

"By whom?"

"By one of my friends, the late king's butler, who was under great obligations to me."

"Oh, and so he gave it to you?"

"Certainly, Monseigneur," said the major-domo, with pride.

"And what did you do with it?"

"I placed it carefully in my master's cellar, Monseigneur."

"Your master; and who was your master at that time Monsieur?"

"His Eminence the Cardinal de Rohan."

"Ah, mon Dieu! at Strasburg?"

"At Saverne."

"And you have sent to seek this bottle for me!" cried the old marshal.

"For you, Monseigneur," replied the major-domo, in a tone which plainly said, "ungrateful as you are."

The Duc de Richelieu seized the hand of the old servant and cried, "I beg your pardon, Monsieur; you are the king of major-domos."

"And you would have dismissed me!" he replied, with an indescribable shrug of his shoulders.

"Oh, I will pay you one hundred pistoles for that bottle of wine!"

"And the expense of bringing it here will be another hundred, that will make two hundred pistoles; but Monseigneur will admit that it is a trifle."

"I will admit anything you please, Monsieur; and meantime, from to-day I double your salary."

"But, Monseigneur, there is no occasion for that; I have but done my duty."

"And when will your hundred-pistole courier arrive?"

"Monseigneur may judge if I have lost time; on what day did I have my orders for the dinner?"

"Why, three days ago, I believe."

"It takes a courier, at his utmost speed, twenty-four hours to go, and the same to return."

"There still remained to you twenty-four hours. Prince of major-domos, what have you done with those twenty-four hours?"

"Alas, Monseigneur, I lost them! The idea came to me only the day after I received the list of your guests. Now calculate the time necessary for the negotiation, and you will perceive that in asking you to wait till five, I am asking only for the time that is absolutely necessary."

"What! the bottle is not yet here?"

"No, Monseigneur."

"Ah, Monsieur, if your colleague at Saverne is as devoted to the Prince de Rohan as you are to me, and refuses the bottle, as you would do in his place —"

"I, Monseigneur?"

"Yes; you would not, I suppose, give away such a bottle if it were in my cellar?"

"I humbly beg Monseigneur's pardon; but should a friend, having a king to provide for, ask me for your best bottle of wine, I would give it to him immediately."

"Oh!" said the marshal, with a grimace.

"It is only through helping others that we can expect help in our own need, Monseigneur."

"Then I may feel somewhat reassured," said the marshal, with a sigh; "but there is still another risk, — if the bottle should be broken?"

"Oh, Monseigneur, no man ever broke a bottle of wine worth two thousand francs!"

"I was wrong; let us say no more about it. At what time, then, do you expect your courier?"

"At four o'clock, precisely."

"Then why not dine at four?" replied the marshal, with the obstinacy of a Castilian mule.

"Monseigneur, the wine must rest for an hour; and but for an invention of my own, it would need three days."

Beaten at all points, the marshal saluted his major-domo in token of surrender.

"Besides," continued the old servant, "Monseigneur's guests, knowing that they will have the honor of dining with the Comte de Haga, will not arrive until half-past four."

"Here is still another reason!"

"Certainly, Monseigneur; the guests are the Comte de Launay, the Comtesse Dubarry, Monsieur de Lapeyrouse, Monsieur de Favras, Monsieur de Condorcet, Monsieur de Cagliostro, and Monsieur de Taverney."

"Very well?"

"Well, Monseigneur, let us take them in their order. Monsieur de Launay comes from the Bastille, and with the ice at present covering the roads he will be three hours coming from Paris."

"Yes; but he will leave immediately after the prisoners' dinner, at twelve o'clock."

"Pardon, Monseigneur, but the dinner hour at the Bastille has been changed since Monseigneur was there; it is now one."

"Monsieur, one learns something every day, and I thank you! Go on."

"Madame Dubarry comes from Luciennes, one continued descent, and in this frost —"

"That would not prevent her being punctual. Since she is now only a duke's favorite, she plays the queen only among barons. But let me tell you, Monsieur, that I desired to have dinner early on account of Monsieur de Lapeyrouse, who sets off to-night, and will not wish to be late."

"Monseigneur, Monsieur de Lapeyrouse is with the king, discussing geography and cosmography; he will not get away too early."

"It is possible."

"It is certain, Monseigneur; and it will be the same with Monsieur de Favras, who is with the Comte de Provence, talking, no doubt, of the new play, by Monsieur Caron de Beaumarchais."

"You mean the 'Mariage de Figaro'?"

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"Why, you are quite literary also, it seems, Monsieur."

"In my leisure moments I read, Monseigneur."

"We have, however, Monsieur de Condorcet, who, being a geometrician, should at least be punctual."

"Yes; but he will be deep in some calculation, from which when he rouses himself, he will find that he is half an hour too late. As for the Comte de Cagliostro, as he is a stranger, and not well acquainted with the customs of Versailles, he will, in all probability, make us wait for him."

"Well," said the marshal, "you have disposed of all my guests, except Monsieur de Taverney, in a manner worthy of Homer, or of my poor Rafté."

The major-domo bowed. "I have not," said he, "named Monsieur de Taverney; because being an old friend, he will probably be punctual. I believe, Monseigneur, these eight are all the guests, are they not?"

"Precisely. Where will you have us dine, Monsieur?"

"In the great dining-room, Monseigneur."

"But we shall freeze there."

"It has been warmed for three days, Monseigneur; and I believe you will find it perfectly comfortable."

"Very well, but there is a clock striking. Why, it is half-past four!" cried the marshal.

"Yes, Monseigneur, and there is the courier entering the court-yard, with my bottle of Tokay."

"May I continue for another twenty years to be served in this manner," said the marshal, turning again to his looking-glass, while the major-domo ran downstairs.

"Twenty years!" said a laughing voice, interrupting the marshal in his survey of himself, — "twenty years, my dear Duke! I hope you may have them; but then I shall be sixty, — I shall be very old."

"You, Countess!" cried the marshal. "You are the first, and mon Dieu! you look as young and charming as ever."

"Duke, I am frozen."

"Come into the boudoir, then."

"Oh, tête-à-tête, Marshal?"

"Not so," replied a somewhat broken voice.

"Ah, Taverney," said the marshal; and then whispering to the countess, "Plague take him for disturbing us."

Madame Dubarry laughed, and they all entered the adjoining room.

At the same moment the noise of carriages in the street warned the marshal that his guests were arriving; and soon after, thanks to the punctuality of his major-domo, nine persons were seated round the oval table in the dining-room. Nine lackeys, silent as shadows, quick without bustle, and attentive without importunity, glided over the carpet, and moved among the guests, without ever touching their chairs, placed in the midst of furs, which covered to their knees the legs of those who occupied them. These furs, with the heat from the stoves, and the odors from the wine and the dinner, diffused a degree of comfort which manifested itself in the gayety of the guests, who had just finished their soup.

No sound was heard from without and none within, save that made by the guests themselves; for the plates were changed, and the silver-ware was brought to the table without the slightest noise. Nor from the major-domo could a whisper be heard; he seemed to give his orders with his eyes. The guests, therefore, began to feel as though they were alone. It seemed to them that servants so silent must also be deaf.

Monsieur de Richelieu broke the silence by saying to the guest on his right hand, "Monsieur le Comte, you do not drink."

This was addressed to a man about thirty-eight years of age, short, fair-haired, and with high shoulders; his eye, a clear blue, was sometimes bright, but oftener melancholy. Nobility was stamped unmistakably on his open and manly forehead.

"I drink only water, Marshal," he replied.

"Excepting with Louis XV.," returned the marshal; "I had the honor of dining at his table with you, and you deigned that day to drink wine."

"Ah, you recall a pleasing remembrance, Marshal. That was in 1771; it was Tokay, from the imperial cellar."

"It was like that with which my major-domo will now have the honor to fill your glass, Monsieur le Comte," replied Richelieu, bowing.

The Comte de Haga raised his glass, and looked through it. The wine sparkled in the light like liquid rubies. "It is true, Monsieur le Maréchal," said he; "I thank you."

These words were uttered in a manner so noble that the guests, as if by a common impulse, rose, and cried, "Long live his Majesty!"

"Yes," said the Comte de Haga, "long live his Majesty the king of France. What say you, Monsieur de Lapeyrouse?"

"Monsieur le Comte," replied the captain, with the tone, at once flattering and respectful, common to those accustomed to address crowned heads, "I have just left the king, and his Majesty has shown me so much kindness that no one will more willingly cry, 'Long live the king,' than I. But as in one hour I shall be travelling post to the seashore, to join the two ships which the king has placed at my disposal, I will ask your permission, as soon as I have left this house, to cry, 'Long life to another king,' whom I should be proud to serve, had I not already so good a master;" and raising his glass, Monsieur de Lapeyrouse bowed humbly to the Comte de Haga.

"This health that you propose," said Madame Dubarry, who sat at the marshal's left hand, "we are all ready to drink; but the oldest of us should take the lead as in parliament."

"Is it to you that this remark applies or to me, Taverney?" said the marshal, laughing.

"I do not believe —" said a new speaker, sitting opposite the marshal.

"What is it that you do not believe, Monsieur de Cagliostro?" asked the Comte de Haga, fixing his piercing look on the speaker.

"I do not believe, Monsieur le Comte," said Cagliostro, bowing, "that Monsieur de Richelieu is the senior of our party."

"Oh, that is good," said the marshal; "apparently it is you, Taverney."

"Come, now; I am eight years younger than you. I was born in 1704," returned the old nobleman.

"How rude," said the marshal, "to expose my eighty-eight years!"

"Really! Monsieur le Duc; you are eighty-eight years old?" said Monsieur de Condorcet.

"Oh, mon Dieu! yes. It is a calculation easy to make, and therefore unworthy of an algebraist like you, Marquis. I am of the last century, — the great century, as we call it. My date is 1696."

"Impossible!" cried De Launay.

"Oh, if your father were here, he would not say impossible, — he who when governor of the Bastille had me for a lodger in 1714."

"The senior in age, here, however," said Monsieur de Favras, "is the wine which the Comte de Haga is at this moment pouring into his glass."

"You are right, Monsieur de Favras; this wine is a hundred and twenty years old. To the wine then belongs the honor of proposing the health of the king."

"One moment, gentlemen," said Cagliostro, raising his eyes, beaming with intelligence and vivacity; "I claim the precedence."

"You claim precedence over the Tokay!" exclaimed all the guests in chorus.

"Assuredly," returned Cagliostro, calmly; "since it was I who bottled it."

"You?"

"Yes, I; on the day of the victory won by Montecuculli over the Turks in 1664."

A burst of laughter followed these words, which Cagliostro had pronounced with quiet gravity.

"By this calculation, you would be something like one hundred and thirty years old," said Madame Dubarry; "for you must have been at least ten years old when you bottled the wine."

"I was more than ten when I performed that operation, Madame; as on the following day I had the honor of being deputed by his Majesty the emperor of Austria to congratulate Montecuculli, who by the victory of Saint Gothard had avenged the day at Especk in Sclavonia, — a day on which the infidels treated the imperialists so roughly, who were my friends and companions in arms in 1536."

"Oh," said the Comte de Haga, as coldly as Cagliostro himself, "you must have been at least ten years old when you were at that memorable battle."

"A terrible defeat, Monsieur le Comte," returned Cagliostro, bowing.

"Less terrible than Cressy, however," said Condorcet, smiling.

"True, Monsieur, for at the battle of Cressy, it was not only an army, but all France, that was beaten. But then this defeat was scarcely a fair victory to the English; for King Edward had cannon, a circumstance of which Philippe de Valois was ignorant, or rather which he would not believe, although I warned him that I had with my own eyes seen four pieces of artillery, which Edward had bought from the Venetians."

"Ah," said Madame Dubarry, "you knew Philippe de Valois?"

"Madame, I had the honor to be one of the five noblemen who escorted him off the field of battle," replied Cagliostro; "I came to France with the poor old king of Bohemia, who was blind, and who threw away his life when he heard that the battle was lost."

"Ah, Monsieur," said Monsieur de Lapeyrouse, "how much I regret that instead of the battle of Cressy, it was not that of Actium at which you assisted."

"Why so, Monsieur?"

"Oh, because you might have given me some nautical details, which, in spite of Plutarch's fine narration, have ever been obscure to me."

"Which, Monsieur? I should be happy to be of service to you."

"You were there, then?"

"No, Monsieur; I was then in Egypt. I had been employed by Queen Cleopatra to restore the library at Alexandria, — an office for which I was better qualified than any one else, from having personally known the best authors of antiquity."

"And you have seen Queen Cleopatra, Monsieur de Cagliostro?" said Madame Dubarry.

"As I now see you, Madame."

"Was she as pretty as they say?"

"Madame, you know beauty is only comparative; a charming queen in Egypt, in Paris she would have been only a pretty grisette."

"Say no harm of grisettes, Monsieur le Comte."

"God forbid!"

"Then Cleopatra was —"

"Little, slender, lively, and intelligent; with large almond-shaped eyes, a Grecian nose, teeth like pearls, and a hand like your own, Madame, — a fit hand to hold a sceptre. See, here is a diamond which she gave me, and which she had from her brother Ptolemy; she wore it on her thumb."

"On her thumb?" cried Madame Dubarry.

"Yes. It was an Egyptian fashion, and I, you see, can hardly put it on my little finger;" and taking off the ring, he handed it to Madame Dubarry.

It was a magnificent diamond of such fine water, and so beautifully cut, as to be worth thirty thousand or forty thousand francs.

The diamond was passed round the table and returned to Cagliostro, who, putting it quietly on his finger again, said, "Ah, I see well you are all incredulous; this fatal incredulity I have had to contend against all my life. Philippe de Valois would not listen to me when I told him to leave open a retreat to Edward; Cleopatra would not believe me when I warned her that Antony would be beaten; the Trojans would not credit me when I said to them, with reference to the wooden horse, 'Cassandra is inspired; listen to Cassandra.'"

"Oh, but this is marvellous!" said Madame Dubarry, shaking with laughter; "I have never met a man at once so serious and so diverting."

"I assure you," replied Cagliostro, bowing, "that Jonathan was much more so. Oh, he was a charming companion; until he was killed by Saul he nearly drove me crazy with laughing."

"Do you know, Count," said the Duc de Richelieu, "if you go on in this way you will drive poor Taverney crazy; he is so afraid of death that he is staring at you with all his eyes, thinking you to be immortal. Come, frankly, are you immortal, — yes, or no?"

"Immortal?"

"Immortal."

"I cannot say, but one thing I can affirm —"

"What?" cried Taverney, who was the most eager listener.

"That I have seen all the people and events of which I have been speaking to you."

"You have known Montecuculli?"

"As well as I know you, Monsieur de Favras; and, indeed, much better; for this is but the second or third time I have had the honor of seeing you, while I lived nearly a year under the same tent with the skilful strategist of whom you speak."

"You knew Philippe de Valois?"

"As I have already had the honor of telling you, Monsieur de Condorcet; but when he returned to Paris, I left France and returned to Bohemia."

"And Cleopatra?"

"Yes, Madame la Comtesse; Cleopatra, I can tell you, had eyes as black as yours, and shoulders almost as beautiful."

"But what do you know of my shoulders?"

"They are like what Cassandra's once were; and there is still a further resemblance, — she had like you, or rather you have like her, a little black spot on your left side, just above the sixth rib."

"Oh, Count, now you really are a sorcerer."

"No, no," cried the marshal, laughing; "it was I who told him."

"And pray how do you know?"

The marshal bit his lips, and replied, "Oh, it is a family secret."

"Well, really, Marshal," said the countess, "one should put on a double coat of rouge before visiting you;" and turning again to Cagliostro, "then, Monsieur, you have the art of renewing your youth; for although you say you are three or four thousand years old you scarcely look forty."

"Yes, Madame, I do possess that secret."

"Oh, then, Monsieur, impart it to me."

"To you, Madame? It is useless, — your youth is already renewed; your age is only what it appears to be, and you do not look thirty."

"Ah! you flatter."

"No, Madame, I speak only the truth, but it is easily explained; you have already tried my receipt."

"How so?"

"You have taken my elixir."

"I?"

"You, Countess. Oh, you cannot have forgotten it. Do you not remember a certain house in the Rue Saint Claude, and coming there on some business respecting Monsieur de Sartines? You remember rendering a service to one of my friends, called Joseph Balsamo; and that this Joseph Balsamo gave you a bottle of elixir, recommending you to take three drops every morning? Do you not remember having done this regularly until the last year, when the bottle became exhausted? If you do not remember all this, Countess, it is more than forgetfulness, — it is ingratitude."

"Oh! Monsieur de Cagliostro, you are telling me things — "

"Which were only known to yourself, I am aware; but what would be the use of being a sorcerer if one did not know one's neighbor's secrets?"

"Then, Joseph Balsamo has, like you, the secret of this famous elixir?"

"No, Madame; but he was one of my best friends, and I gave him three or four bottles."

"And has he any left?"

"Oh, I know nothing of that; for the last two or three years, poor Balsamo has disappeared. I saw him for the last time in America, on the banks of the Ohio; he was setting off on an expedition to the Rocky Mountains, and since then I have heard that he is dead."

"Come, come, Count," said the marshal, "a truce to compliments, for pity's sake! The secret, Count, the secret!"

"Are you speaking seriously, Monsieur?" asked the Comte de Haga.

"Very seriously, Sire, — I beg pardon; I mean Monsieur le Comte," and Cagliostro bowed in such a way as to indicate that his error was a voluntary one.

"Then," said the marshal, "Madame Dubarry is not old enough to be made young again?"

"No, on my conscience."

"Well, then, I will give you another subject. Here is my friend Taverney, — what do you say to him? Does he not look like a contemporary of Pontius Pilate? But perhaps he, on the contrary, is too old."

Cagliostro looked at the baron. "No," said he.

"Ah, my dear Count," exclaimed Richelieu; "if you will renew his youth, I will proclaim you a pupil of Medea."

"You wish it?" asked Cagliostro, of the host, and looking round at the same time on all assembled.

All present signified their assent.

"And you also, Monsieur de Taverney?"

"I more than any one, morbleu!" said the baron.

"Well, it is easy," said Cagliostro; and he drew from his pocket a small bottle, and poured into a glass a few drops of the liquid it contained. Then mixing these drops with half a glass of iced-champagne, he passed it to the baron. All eyes followed his movements eagerly.

The baron took the glass, but as he was about to drink he hesitated. Every one, on observing his hesitation, began to laugh, — so noisily that Cagliostro became impatient, and said, "Make haste, Baron, or you will waste a cordial of which each drop is worth a hundred louis d'or."

"The devil!" cried Richelieu, trying to jest; "that is even better than Tokay."

"I must, then, drink?" said the baron, almost trembling.

"Or pass the glass to another, Monsieur, that some one at least may profit by the elixir."

"Pass it to me," said Richelieu, holding out his hand.

The baron raised the glass, and decided doubtless by the delicious smell and the beautiful rose color which those few drops had given to the champagne, he swallowed the magic cordial. In an instant a kind of shiver ran through him; he seemed to feel all the old and sluggish blood stagnant in his veins flowing toward the surface of his body; his wrinkled skin became smooth; his eyes, half-covered by their lids, opened without his will; the pupils became larger and brighter; the trembling of his hands was arrested; his voice strengthened; and his limbs recovered their former youthful elasticity. In fact it seemed as if the liquid in its descent had regenerated his whole body.

A cry of surprise, stupefaction, and admiration rang through the room. Taverney, who had been slowly chewing with his gums, began to feel famished; he seized a plate, knife, and fork, and helped himself largely to a ragoût, and then demolished a partridge, bones and all, calling out that his teeth were coming back to him. He ate, laughed, and cried for joy for about half an hour, while the others remained gazing at him in stupefied wonder; then little by little he failed again, like a lamp whose oil is burning out. First, his forehead, from which the wrinkles had disappeared, became wrinkled anew; his eyes were veiled and darkened; he lost his sense of taste; his back was bent again; his appetite departed; his knees began again to tremble.

"Oh!" he groaned, "once more, adieu to my youth!" and he gave utterance to a deep sigh, while two tears rolled over his cheeks.

Instinctively, at this mournful spectacle of the old man first made young again, and then, by contrast, seeming to become yet older than before, the sigh breathed by the old man was echoed around the table.

"It is easy to explain, gentlemen," said Cagliostro; "I gave the baron but thirty-five drops of the elixir, and he became young for only thirty-five minutes."

"Oh, more, more, Count!" cried the old man, eagerly.

"No, Monsieur; for perhaps the second trial would kill you."

Of all the guests, Madame Dubarry, who had already tested the virtue of the elixir, seemed most deeply interested while old Taverney's youth seemed thus to renew itself. As by degrees youth and life flowed through the arteries of the old man, the eyes of the countess eagerly followed the changes in his appearance. She laughed and applauded, and appeared regenerated simply by watching him.

When the success of the elixir was at its height the countess was about to seize the hand of Cagliostro, for the purpose of snatching from him the precious bottle. But at the moment when Taverney became old again, so much more suddenly than he had become young, "Alas! I see plainly," said she, sorrowfully, "all is vanity and deception; the effect of this marvellous secret lasts thirty-five minutes."

"That is to say," said the Comte de Haga, "in order to resume your youth for two years, you would have to drink a river."

Every one laughed.

"No," said Condorcet, "the calculation is simple; as thirty-five drops last thirty-five minutes, it would require only a mere nothing of three million one hundred and fifty-three thousand drops for one year's youth."

"An inundation," said Lapeyrouse.

"However, Monsieur," continued Madame Dubarry, "according to you, I have not needed so much; as a small bottle of about four times the size of that you hold, given me by your friend Joseph Balsamo, has been sufficient to arrest the march of time for ten years."

"Precisely, Madame, and you alone approach this mysterious truth. The man who has already grown old needs this large quantity to produce an immediate and powerful effect; but a woman of thirty years, like you, Madame, or a man of forty years, — which was my age when I began to drink this elixir, — still full of life and youth, needs but ten drops at each period of decay; and with these ten drops may eternally continue life and youth at the same point of attractiveness and force."

"What do you call the periods of decay?" asked the Comte de Haga.

"The natural periods, Monsieur le Comte. In a state of nature man's strength increases until he is thirty-five years of age. It then remains stationary until forty; and from that time forward it begins to diminish, but almost imperceptibly until fifty; then the process becomes quicker and quicker to the day of his death. In our state of civilization, when the body is weakened by excess, cares, and maladies, increase of strength is arrested at thirty years; the failure begins at thirty-five. The time, then, to take Nature is when she is stationary, so as to combat the tendency to decay at the very moment when it begins to operate. He, who, possessing as I do the secret of this elixir, knows how to seize the happy moment, will live as I live, — always young, or at least always young enough for what he has to do in the world."

"Oh, Monsieur Cagliostro!" cried the countess, "why, if you could choose your own age, did you not stop at twenty years instead of at forty?"

"Because, Madame," said Cagliostro, smiling, "it suits me better to be a man forty years old, healthy and vigorous, than a raw youth of twenty."

"Oh!" said the countess.

"Doubtless, Madame," continued Cagliostro, "at twenty years of age one pleases women of thirty years; at forty years we govern women of twenty and men of sixty."

"I yield, Monsieur," said the countess, "for you are a living proof of the truth of your own words."

"Then I," said Taverney, piteously, "am condemned; it is too late for me!"

"Monsieur de Richelieu has been more skilful than you," said Lapeyrouse, naïvely, with the frankness of a sailor; "and I have always heard that he had a certain receipt —"

"It is a report that the women have spread," laughed the Comte de Haga.

"Is that a reason for disbelieving it, Count?" asked Madame Dubarry.

The old marshal colored, — a rare thing for him, — but replied, "Do you wish, gentlemen, to have my receipt?"

"Oh, by all means!"

"Well, then, it is simply to take care of yourself."

"Oh, oh!" cried all.

"I would contest the receipt," continued the countess, "if I had not seen the effect of that of Monsieur de Cagliostro. So be on your guard, Monsieur the Sorcerer; I am not yet through with my questions."

"Well, Madame."

"You said that when you used your elixir of life for the first time, you were forty years old?"

"Yes, Madame."

"And that since that time, — that is, since the siege of Troy —"

"A little before, Madame."

"You have always remained forty years old?"

"You see me now."

"But, then, Monsieur," said Condorcet, "you prove to us more than your theorem requires."

"What do I prove to you, Monsieur le Marquis?"

"You prove, not only the perpetuation of youth, but the preservation of life; for if since the siege of Troy you have been always forty years old, you have never died."

"True, Marquis; I humbly admit it. I have never died."

"Yet you are not invulnerable, like Achilles; and even Achilles was not invulnerable, for Paris killed him by wounding his heel with an arrow."

"No, I am not invulnerable, and that is my great regret," said Cagliostro.

"Then, Monsieur, you may be killed; you may die a violent death?"

"Alas! yes."

"How, then, have you escaped all accidents for three thousand five hundred years?"

"It is chance, Monsieur le Comte; but will you follow my reasoning?"

"Yes, yes!" cried all, with eagerness; and with these expressions of unusual interest, every one leaned on the table and prepared to listen.

Cagliostro continued: "What is the first requisite to life?" he asked, spreading out his white and beautiful hands, covered with rings, among which Cleopatra's shone conspicuously. "Is it not health?"

"Certainly."

"And the way to preserve health is —"

"Proper diet," said the Comte de Haga.

"You are right, Monsieur le Comte. It is proper diet that produces good health. Well, then, why should not these drops of my elixir constitute the best possible diet?"

"Who knows that?"

"You, Count."

"Yes, without doubt; but —"

"But no others," said Madame Dubarry.

"That, Madame, is a question which we will not discuss now. Well, then, I have always followed the regimen of my drops; and since they fulfil the dream of men of all times, since they are that which the ancients searched for under the name of the 'Water of Youth,' and which the moderns have sought to discover under the name of the 'Elixir of Life,' I have constantly preserved my youth, and consequently my health, and consequently my life. That is clear enough."

"But all things get worn out, Count, — the most excellent body as well as everything else."

"That of Paris, like that of Vulcan," said the countess. "You knew Paris, doubtless, Monsieur de Cagliostro?"

"Perfectly, Madame; he was a fine young man, but really did not deserve all that Homer said of him, and that women think of him. In the first place, he had red hair."

"Red hair? Horrible!"

"Unluckily, Madame, Helen was not of your opinion. But let us return to our elixir."

"Yes, yes!" all exclaimed.

"You say, Monsieur de Taverney, that all things get worn out; but you also know that everything recovers again, is regenerated, or replaced, whichever you please to call it. The famous knife of Saint Hubert, which so often changed both blade and handle, is an example; for through every change it still remained the knife of Saint Hubert. The wine which the monks of Heidelberg preserve so carefully in their cellars still remains the same wine, although each year they pour into it a fresh supply. Therefore, this wine always remains clear, bright, and delicious;

while the wine which Opimus and I hid in the earthen jars was, when I tried it a hundred years after, only a thick mud, which might, indeed, have been eaten, but certainly could not have been drunk. Well, I follow the example of the monks of Heidelberg, and preserve my body by introducing into it every year new elements, which regenerate the old. Every morning a new and fresh atom replaces in my blood, my flesh, and my bones, a worn-out, inert molecule. I stay that ruin which most men allow insensibly to invade their whole being, and I force into action all those powers which God has given to the human constitution as a defence against destruction, — powers which commonly are misdirected, or abandoned to the paralysis of inactivity; those powers I have compelled to continuous labor, which has facilitated, has caused even, the introduction of a stimulant always new. In consequence of that assiduous study of life, my thought, my movements, my nerves, my heart, my soul, have never failed in their operation; and as all things are bound together in this world, — as those succeed best in anything who are always doing that thing, — I have naturally become more skilful than any one else by avoiding the dangers of an existence of three thousand years; and that because I have succeeded in acquiring from everything such an experience that I foresee misfortunes, — I feel the dangers of any situation, be it what it may. Thus, you would not get me to enter a house which is in danger of falling. Oh, no! I have seen too many houses not to tell at a glance the safe from the unsafe. You would not see me go out hunting with a man who managed his gun badly. From Cephalus, who killed his wife Procris, down to the regent who shot the prince in the eye, I have seen too many unskilful people. You could not make me accept, in battle, the post which many a man would take without thinking, because I should have calculated in a moment all the chances of danger at that point. You will tell me that one cannot foresee a stray bullet; but the man who has escaped a million gunshots is inexcusable if he allows himself to be killed by a stray bullet. Ah, you look incredulous! but am I not a living proof? I do not tell you that I am immortal, only that I know better than others how to avoid danger. For instance, I would not remain here now alone with Monsieur de Launay, who is thinking that if he had me in the Bastille he would put my immortality to the test of starvation. Neither would I remain with Monsieur de Condorcet; for he is thinking that he might just empty into my glass the contents of that ring which he wears on his left hand, and which is full of poison, — not with any evil intent, but only as a scientific experiment, to see if I should die."

The two people named made a movement.

"Confess, Monsieur de Launay! We are not in a court of justice; besides, thoughts are not punished. Did you not think what I said? And you, Monsieur de Condorcet, would you not have liked to let me taste the poison in your ring, in the name of your beloved mistress, science?"

"Indeed," said Monsieur de Launay, laughing and blushing, "I confess you are right; it was folly, but that folly did pass through my mind at the very moment when you accused me."

"And I," said Monsieur de Condorcet, "will not be less candid; I did think that if you tasted the contents of my ring, I would not give a farthing for your immortality."

A cry of admiration burst from the rest of the party; these avowals confirming not the immortality, but the penetration of the Comte de Cagliostro.

"You see," said Cagliostro, quietly, "that I divined these dangers; well, it is the same with other things. The experience of a long life reveals to me, at a glance, the past and the future of those whom I meet. My infallibility on this point is such that it extends even to animals and inanimate objects. If I get into a carriage, I can tell from the look of the horses that they are likely to run away; and from that of the coachman that he will overturn me. If I go on board ship, I can see that the captain is ignorant or obstinate, and consequently cannot, or will not, navigate his vessel skilfully. Thereupon I avoid the coachman and the captain, and leave those horses or that ship. I do not deny chance, I only lessen it, and instead of incurring a hundred chances, like the rest of the world, I prevent ninety-nine of them, and endeavor to guard against the hundredth. This is the advantage of having lived three thousand years."

"Then," said Lapeyrouse, laughing, amid the wonder and enthusiasm created by Cagliostro's words, "my dear prophet, you should come with me when I embark to make the tour of the world; you would render me a signal service."

Cagliostro did not reply.

"Monsieur de Richelieu," continued Lapeyrouse, "since the Comte de Cagliostro, — and I understand that, — does not wish to leave so good company, you must permit me to go without him. Excuse me, Comte de Haga, and you, Madame, but it is seven o'clock, and I have promised his Majesty to start at a quarter past. But since Comte de Cagliostro will not be tempted to come with me and see my ships, perhaps he can tell me what will happen to me between Versailles and Brest. From Brest to the Pole, I ask nothing, — that is my own business. But, pardieu! he ought to give me an opinion on what may happen on the way to Brest."

Cagliostro looked at Lapeyrouse with such a melancholy air, so full both of pity and kindness, that the others were struck by it. The navigator himself, however, did not remark it. He took leave of the company; his valet threw over his shoulders a large fur riding-coat, and Madame Dubarry slipped into his pocket some of those exquisite cordials which are so pleasing to the traveller, but which he rarely thinks of providing for himself, and which recall to him his absent friends during the long nights of a journey under wintry skies.

Lapeyrouse, still full of gayety, bowed respectfully to the Comte de Haga, and held out his hand to the old marshal.

"Adieu, dear Lapeyrouse," said the latter.

"No, Monsieur le Duc, au revoir," replied Lapeyrouse. "One would think I was departing for eternity; now I have but to circumnavigate the globe, — five or six years' absence only; it is scarcely worth while to say 'adieu' for that."

"Five or six years," said the marshal; "you might almost as well say five or six centuries; days are years at my age, — therefore I say adieu."

"Bah! ask the sorcerer," returned Lapeyrouse, still laughing, "he will promise you twenty years more life. Will you not, Monsieur de Cagliostro? Oh, Count, why did I not hear sooner of those precious drops of yours? Whatever the price, I should have shipped a tun of them on the 'Astrolabe.' Madame, another kiss of that beautiful hand; I shall certainly not see such another till I return; au revoir," and he left the room.

Cagliostro still preserved the same mournful silence. They heard the steps of the captain as he left the house, his gay voice in the court-yard, and his farewells to the persons assembled there to see him depart. Then the horses shook their heads covered with bells, the door of the carriage shut with some noise, and the wheels were heard rolling along the street.

Lapeyrouse had started on that voyage from which he was destined never to return.

When the last sound had died away all eyes were directed, as if controlled by a superior power, toward Cagliostro. At that moment there was a pythonic illumination in his face which startled all the company. A strange silence lasted some moments. The Comte de Haga was the first to speak. "And why," said he, "did you not reply to him, Monsieur?"

Cagliostro started, as if the question had roused him from a revery. "Because," said he, "I must either have told a falsehood or a sad truth."

"How so?"

"I must have said to him, Monsieur de Lapeyrouse, the duke is right in saying to you 'adieu' and not 'au revoir.'"

"Eh! but," said Richelieu, turning pale, "what the devil, Monsieur Cagliostro, are you saying, then, about Lapeyrouse?"

"Oh, reassure yourself, Monsieur le Maréchal," replied Cagliostro, quickly, "it is not as regards you that the prediction is ominous."

"What!" cried Madame Dubarry, "is poor Lapeyrouse, who has just kissed my hand —"

"Not only, Madame, will never kiss it again, but he will never again see those he has just left," said Cagliostro, looking attentively at his glass full of water, which, from the position in which it was placed, exhibited a luminous surface of an opal tint, crossed by the shadows of surrounding objects.

A cry of astonishment burst from all. The interest of the conversation deepened every moment, and it might have been thought, from the solemn and anxious air with which all regarded Cagliostro, that they were awaiting the infallible predictions of an ancient oracle.

In the midst of this preoccupation, Monsieur de Favras, representing the general feeling, rose, made a sign, and went on tiptoe to listen in the antechamber, and ascertain whether any of the servants were within hearing. But, as we have said, the house of Monsieur le Maréchal de Richelieu was well regulated, and Monsieur de Favras found in the antechamber only an old intendant, who, implacable as a sentinel at an exposed post, defended the approaches to the dining-room at the solemn hour of dessert. He therefore returned to his seat, making a sign to the guests that they were alone.

"In that case," said Madame Dubarry, replying to the assurance of Monsieur de Favras as if it had been uttered aloud, "tell us what is to happen to that poor Lapeyrouse."

Cagliostro still maintained the same ominous silence.

"Oh, yes; let us hear," cried all the rest.

"Well, then, Monsieur de Lapeyrouse intends, as you know, to make the tour of the globe, and continue the researches of poor Captain Cook, who was killed in the Sandwich Islands."

"Yes, yes, we know," said all the company, by signs, rather than in words.

"Everything should foretell a happy termination to this voyage; Monsieur de Lapeyrouse is a good seaman, and his route has been most skilfully traced by the king."

"Yes," interrupted Comte de Haga, "the king of France is a clever geographer; is he not, Monsieur de Condorcet?"

"More skilful than is needful for a king," replied the marquis. "Kings ought to know things only slightly; then they will let themselves be guided by those who know them thoroughly."

"Is this a lesson, Marquis?" said the Comte de Haga, smiling.

Condorcet blushed. "Oh, no, Monsieur le Comte," said he; "only a simple reflection, a general truth."

"Well, he has set out?" said Madame Dubarry, anxious to bring the conversation back to Lapeyrouse.

"Yes, he has set out," replied Cagliostro; "but don't believe, in spite of his haste, that he will soon embark. I foresee much time lost at Brest."

"That would be a pity," said Condorcet; "this is the proper time for sailing; it is even now rather late, — February or March would have been better."

"Oh, do not grudge him these two or three months, Monsieur de Condorcet; he lives, at least, during that time, — he lives and hopes."

"He has good officers, I suppose," said Richelieu.

"Yes, he who commands the second ship is a distinguished officer. I see him — young, adventurous, brave, unhappily."

"Why unhappily?"

"A year later I look for him, and see him no more," said Cagliostro, anxiously consulting his glass. "No one here is related to Monsieur de Langle?"

"No."

"No one knows him?"

"No."

"Well, death will begin with him; I see him no longer."

A murmur of affright escaped from all the guests.

"But he, Lapeyrouse?" cried several voices, eagerly.

"He sails, he lands, he re-embarks; I see one, two years of successful navigation. We hear news of him,[1] and then —"

"Then?"

"Years pass —"

"But at last?"

"The sea is vast, the heavens are clouded. Here and there appear unknown lands, and figures hideous as the monsters of the Grecian Archipelago. They watch the ship, which in a fog is drifting among the rocks, at the mercy of the currents. At last the tempest, the tempest more hospitable than the land, and then — ominous flames. Oh, Lapeyrouse! Lapeyrouse! if you could hear me, I would cry to you. You set out, like Columbus, to discover a world; Lapeyrouse, beware of unknown isles." He ceased, and an icy shiver ran through the assembly.

"But why did you not warn him?" asked the Comte de Haga, submitting like the others to the influence of this extraordinary man, who moved all hearts at his will.

"Yes," cried Madame Dubarry, "why not send after him and bring him back? The life of a man like Lapeyrouse is surely worth the journey of a courier, my dear Marshal."

The marshal understood, and rose to ring the bell. Cagliostro extended his arm to stop him. The marshal returned to his chair.

"Alas!" said Cagliostro, "all advice would be useless. The man who can foresee destiny cannot change it. Monsieur de Lapeyrouse would laugh if he heard my words, as the son of Priam laughed when Cassandra prophesied; and see, you begin to laugh yourself, Monsieur le Comte de Haga, and laughing is contagious, — your companions are catching it. Oh, do not restrain yourself, Monsieur de Favras; I have never yet found a hearer who believed."

[1] The officer who brought the last news received from Lapeyrouse was Monsieur de Lesseps, — the only man on the expedition who returned to France.

"Oh, we believe," said Madame Dubarry and the old Duc de Richelieu.

"I believe," murmured Taverney.

"I, also," said the Comte de Haga, politely.

"Yes," replied Cagliostro, "you believe, because it concerns Lapeyrouse; but if I spoke of you, you would not believe."

"Oh!"

"I am sure of it."

"I confess that what would have made me believe," returned the Comte de Haga, "would have been that you should say to him, 'Beware of unknown isles;' then he would, at least, have had the chance of avoiding them."

"I assure you, no, Monsieur le Comte; and if he had believed me, consider the horrible effect of that revelation. Then in presence of danger, at sight of those unknown isles which were to be fatal to him, the unhappy man, believing in my prediction, would have felt the mysterious approach of death without being able to flee from it. And so he would have suffered not one death but a thousand; for it is suffering a thousand deaths to wander in gloom with despair at one's side. That hope which I should take from him — think of it! — is the last consolation to which the wretched victim still clings under the executioner's knife, when even the knife has touched him, when he feels its sharp edge, when his blood begins to flow. Life is extinguished while still the man is hoping."

"That is true!" said several of the guests, in a suppressed whisper.

"Yes," said Condorcet; "the veil which hides from us our future is the only real good which God has vouchsafed to man."

"Nevertheless," said the Comte de Haga, "did a man like you tell me to shun a certain man, or a certain thing, I would beware, and I would thank you for the counsel."

Cagliostro gently shook his head, with a serious smile.

"I mean it, Monsieur de Cagliostro," continued the Comte de Haga, "warn me, and I will thank you."

"You wish me to tell you what I would not tell Lapeyrouse?"

"Yes; I wish it."

Cagliostro made a movement as if to begin, and then stopped, and said, "Oh no, Monsieur le Comte, no!"

"I beg you."

Monsieur de Cagliostro turned away his head, "Never!" he murmured.

"Take care," said the count, smiling; "you are making me incredulous."

"Incredulity is better than misery."

"Monsieur de Cagliostro," said the count, gravely, "you forget one thing."

"And what is that?" asked the prophet, respectfully.

"It is that though there are men who had better remain ignorant of their destiny, there are others who should know it, as it concerns not themselves alone, but millions of others."

"I must have an order, then. Without an order I will do nothing."

"What do you mean?"

"That if your Majesty commands," said Cagliostro, in a low voice, "I will obey."

"I command you to reveal to me my destiny, Monsieur de Cagliostro," said the king, with an air at once courteous and dignified.

At this moment, as the Comte de Haga had dropped his incognito in giving that order, Monsieur de Richelieu advanced toward him, and humbly saluting the prince, said, "Thanks, Sire, for the honor which the king of Sweden has done my house; will your Majesty assume the place of honor? From this moment it belongs to you alone."

"Let us remain as we are, Marshal; I wish to hear what Monsieur de Cagliostro is about to say."

"One does not speak the truth to kings, Sire."

"Bah! I am not in my kingdom; take your place again, Monsieur le Duc. Proceed, Monsieur de Cagliostro, I beg."

Cagliostro looked again in his glass. Globules like those seen in champagne rose from the bottom to the surface. The water seemed to be attracted by his powerful gaze, and to become agitated at his will. "Sire," said he, "tell me what you wish to know; I am ready to answer."

"Tell me by what death I shall die."

"By a gunshot, Sire."

The eyes of Gustavus grew bright. "Ah, in a battle," said he; "the death of a soldier! Thanks, Monsieur de Cagliostro, a hundred times I thank you. Oh, I foresee battles! and Gustavus Adolphus and Charles XII. have shown me how a king of Sweden should die."

Cagliostro drooped his head, without replying.

The Comte de Haga frowned. "Oh, oh!" said he, "is it not in battle that the gunshot will be discharged?"

"No, Sire."

"In a sedition? Yes, that is possible."

"No, not in a sedition, Sire."

"But where, then?"

"At a ball, Sire."

The king remained silent, and Cagliostro buried his head in his hands.

Every one looked pale and frightened; and all watched the author of the prophecy and him whom it chiefly concerned. Then Monsieur de Condorcet took the glass of water, in which the fatal augury had been read, and raising it to his eye, examined carefully the glittering facets of the glass and its mysterious contents. His look seemed to be inquiring of both the solid and liquid crystal the solution of the problem, which his reason reduced to the import of a purely physical speculation.

In fact, the scientist was trying to compute the water's depth, luminous refractions, and microscopic play. He was asking himself the cause and explanation of this jugglery, practised upon men so enlightened as those who surrounded the table, by a man to whom he could not deny the possession of extraordinary power. Doubtless he found no solution of his problem, for he ceased his examination of the glass, returned it to the table, and amid the stupefaction caused by the prediction of Cagliostro, "Well, I also," he said, "will beg our illustrious prophet to consult for me his magic mirror. Unfortunately, I am not a powerful lord; I cannot command, and my obscure life concerns no millions of people."

"Monsieur," said the Comte de Haga, "you command in the name of science, and your life belongs not only to a nation, but to all mankind."

"I thank you, Monsieur le Comte!" said Condorcet; "but perhaps your opinion on this subject is not shared by Monsieur de Cagliostro."

Cagliostro quickly raised his head. "Yes, Marquis," said he, with a beginning of nervous irritability, which in ancient times would have been attributed to the presence of the god that inspired him, "you are indeed a powerful lord in the kingdom of intelligence; look me, then, in the face, and tell me seriously if you also wish that I should prophesy to you."

"Seriously, Monsieur le Comte, — upon my honor."

"Well, Marquis," said Cagliostro, in a hollow voice, and closing his eyelids, "you will die of that poison which you carry in your ring; you will die — "

"Oh! but if I throw it away?"

"Throw it away."

"You allow that it is very easy?"

"Then throw it away, I tell you."

"Oh, yes, Marquis!" cried Madame Dubarry; "throw away that horrid poison, — throw it away, if it be only to falsify this prophet of evil who threatens us all with his prophecies. For if you throw it away you cannot die by it, as Monsieur de Cagliostro predicts; so there, at least, he will have been wrong."

"Madame la Comtesse is right," said the Comte de Haga.

"Bravo, Countess!" said Richelieu. "Come, Marquis, throw away that poison, for now that I know you carry it, I shall tremble every time we drink together; the ring might open of itself, and — "

"And two glasses touched together come very close," said Taverney. "Throw it away, Marquis, — throw it away!"

"It is useless," said Cagliostro, quietly; "Monsieur de Condorcet will not throw it away."

"No," returned Condorcet, "I will not throw it away, — not that I wish to aid my destiny, but because this is a unique poison, prepared by Cabanis, which chance has completely hardened, and that chance might never occur again; therefore I will not throw it away. Triumph if you will, Monsieur de Cagliostro!"

"Destiny," replied Cagliostro, "ever finds faithful agents to aid in the execution of her decrees."

"Then I shall die by poison!" said the marquis.

"Well, so be it. It is an admirable death, I think, — a little poison on the tip of the tongue, and I am gone. That is not death; it is only minus life, as we say in algebra."

"It is no wish of mine that you should suffer, Monsieur," said Cagliostro, coldly; and he made a sign indicating that he desired to say no more regarding Monsieur de Condorcet.

"Then, Monsieur," said Monsieur de Favras, "we have a shipwreck, a gunshot, and a poisoning; they make my mouth water. Will you not do me the favor to predict to me, also, some little catastrophe of the same kind?"

"Oh, Marquis!" replied Cagliostro, beginning to grow warm under this irony, "it would be wrong in you to envy these gentlemen, for I assure you that you will have still better."

"Better!" said Monsieur de Favras, laughing; "that is pledging yourself to a great deal. Better than the sea, fire, poison, — that is difficult."

"There remains the rope, Monsieur le Marquis," said Cagliostro, bowing.

"The rope! Oh, oh! what are you telling me?"

"I am telling you that you will be hanged!" replied Cagliostro, with a sort of prophetic rage, which he could no longer control.

"Hanged! The devil!" cried the guests.

"Monsieur forgets that I am a nobleman," said Monsieur de Favras, coldly; "or if he means to speak of a suicide, I warn him that I shall respect myself sufficiently, even in my last moments, not to use a rope while I have a sword."

"I do not speak of a suicide, Monsieur."

"Then you speak of a punishment?"

"Yes."

"You are a foreigner, Monsieur, and therefore I pardon you."

"For what?"

"Your ignorance, Monsieur. In France we decapitate noblemen."

"You will arrange that matter with the executioner," replied Cagliostro, crushing his interlocutor with that rough answer.

There was a moment's hesitation among those present.

"Do you know that I begin to tremble?" said Monsieur de Launay; "my predecessors have had so bad luck that I am afraid I shall find only evil if I plunge my hand into the same bag."

"Then you are more reasonable than they, and do not seek to know the future. You are right. Be it good or bad, let us respect the secret of God."

"Oh, Monsieur de Launay!" said Madame Dubarry, "I hope you will not be less courageous than the others have been."

"I hope so too, Madame," said the governor, bowing. Then turning to Cagliostro, "Monsieur," he said, "favor me in my turn with my horoscope, if you please."

"It is easy," replied Cagliostro; "a blow on the head with a hatchet, and all will be over."

A cry of terror sounded through the hall. Richelieu and Taverney begged Cagliostro to say no more, but feminine curiosity prevailed.

"To hear you talk, Count," said Madame Dubarry, "one would think the whole universe must die by violence. Here we are, eight of us, and five are already condemned by you."

"Oh, you understand that it is all a prearranged affair, and that we laugh at it, Madame," said Monsieur de Favras, trying to laugh in fact.

"Certainly we will laugh at it," said the Comte de Haga, "be it true or false."

"Oh, I will laugh too, then," said Madame Dubarry; "I will not dishonor the assembly by my cowardice; but alas! I am only a woman, and shall not have the honor to be ranked with you by a tragical death; a woman dies in her bed. Alas, my death, that of a sorrowful old woman abandoned by every one, will be the worst of all. Will it not, Monsieur de Cagliostro?"

She stopped and seemed to wait for the prophet to reassure her. Cagliostro did not speak; so her curiosity obtaining the mastery over her fears, she went on, "Well, Monsieur de Cagliostro, will you not answer me?"

"How can I answer you, Madame, when you ask me no questions?"

"But —" said she.

"Decide," said Cagliostro; "do you question me, — yes, or no?"

The countess made an effort, and drawing courage from the smiles of the company, "Yes," she cried, "I will run the risk. Tell me the fate of Jeanne de Vaubernier, Comtesse Dubarry."

"On the scaffold, Madame," replied the prophet of evil.

"A jest, Monsieur, is it not?" stammered she, looking at him with a supplicating air.

Cagliostro did not observe that look. "Why do you think I jest?" said he.

"Oh, because to die on the scaffold one must have committed some crime, — stolen, or committed murder, or done something dreadful; and it is not likely I shall do that. It was a jest, was it not?"

"Oh, my God! yes," said Cagliostro; "all I have said is but a jest."

The countess laughed, but a skilled observer would have thought her laugh too noisy to be quite natural. "Come, Monsieur de Favras," said she, "let us order our funeral coaches."

"Oh, that will be needless for you, Madame," said Cagliostro.

"Why so, Monsieur?"

"Because you will go to the scaffold in a cart."

"Oh, how horrible! oh, the dreadful man! Marshal, for Heaven's sake choose more cheerful guests next time, or I will never visit you again."

"Excuse me, Madame," said Cagliostro; "but you, like all the rest, would have me speak."

"I, like all the rest. At least, you will grant me time to choose my confessor?"

"It will be superfluous, Countess."

"Why?"

"The last one to mount the scaffold with a confessor will be—"

"Will be?" asked all the company.

"Will be the king of France;" and Cagliostro said these words in a voice so hollow and melancholy that it was to the company like a blast of death, and it chilled them to the bottom of their hearts.

Then ensued a silence which lasted several minutes. Meantime, Cagliostro raised to his lips the glass of water in which he had read these fearful prophecies; but scarcely had it touched his mouth when he set it down, and pushed it from him with a movement of disgust. He turned his eyes to Monsieur de Taverney.

"Oh," cried the latter in terror, "do not tell me anything, I do not wish to know."

"Well, then, I will ask in his place," said Richelieu.

"You, Marshal, be happy; you are the only one of us all who will die in his bed."

"Coffee, gentleman, coffee!" cried the marshal, enchanted with the prediction.

Every one rose.

But before passing into the salon, the Comte de Haga, approaching Cagliostro, said: "Monsieur, I have no idea of trying to escape my destiny; but tell me what I ought to distrust."

"A muff, Sire," replied Cagliostro.

Monsieur de Haga withdrew.

"And I?" said Condorcet.

"An omelette."

"Good, I renounce eggs;" and he followed the count.

"And I?" said Monsieur de Favras, — "what must I fear?"

"A letter."

"Very good; I thank you."

"And I?" asked De Launay.

"The taking of the Bastille."

"Oh, you quite reassure me;" and he went away, laughing.

"Now for me, Monsieur," said the countess, with anxiety.

"You, beautiful Countess, beware of the Place Louis XV."

"Alas!" said the countess, "one day already, I lost myself there; that day I suffered much; I nearly lost my head."

"Well, Countess, this time it will be lost never to be regained."

Madame Dubarry uttered a cry, and fled to the salon to join the other guests. Cagliostro was about to follow her, when Richelieu stopped him. "One moment," said he. "There remain only Taverney and I, to whom you have predicted nothing, my dear sorcerer."

"Monsieur de Taverney begged me to say nothing, and you, Monsieur le Maréchal, have asked me nothing."

"Oh, I still entreat you to tell me nothing," said Taverney, clasping his hands.

"But come, to prove your power, tell us something that only Taverney and I know," said Richelieu.

"What?" asked Cagliostro, smiling.

"Tell us what makes Taverney come to Versailles, instead of living quietly in his beautiful house at Maison-Rouge, which the king repurchased for him three years ago."

"Nothing more simple, Marshal," said Cagliostro. "Ten years ago, Monsieur de Taverney wished to give his daughter, Mademoiselle Andrée, to the King Louis XV.; but he did not succeed."

"Oh! oh!" groaned Taverney.

"Now Monsieur wishes to give his son, Philippe de Taverney, to the Queen Marie Antoinette; ask him if I speak the truth."

"On my word," said Taverney, trembling, "this man is a sorcerer; devil take me if he is not."

"Oh, oh! do not speak so cavalierly of the Devil, my old comrade," said the marshal.

"Frightful! frightful!" murmured Taverney; and he turned to implore Cagliostro to be discreet, but he had disappeared.

"Come, Taverney, to the salon," said the marshal; "or they will drink their coffee without us." But when they arrived there the room was empty; not one of the guests had courage to face again the author of these terrible predictions.

The wax lights burned in the candelabra, the coffee was smoking in the urn, the fire burned on the hearth, — but all for nothing.

"Faith, old friend, it seems we must take our coffee tête-à-tête. Why, what the devil has become of you?" Richelieu looked all round him, but Taverney had vanished like the rest. "Never mind," said the marshal, chuckling as Voltaire might have done, and rubbing his withered though still white hands; "I shall be the only one to die in my bed. Eh, eh! in my bed. Well, Comte de Cagliostro, at least I believe. In my bed, that was it; I shall die in my bed, and I trust not for a long time. Hola! my valet and my drops."

The valet entered with the bottle, and the marshal went with him into the bed-room.

CHAPTER I.

TWO UNKNOWN LADIES.

THE winter of 1784, that monster which devoured a sixth part of France, we could not see, although he growled at the doors, while at the house of Monsieur de Richelieu, shut in, as we were, in that warm and comfortable dining-room.

A little frost on the windows seems but the luxury of Nature, added to that of man. Winter has its diamonds, its powder, and its silver embroidery for the rich man wrapped in his furs, or packed in his carriage, or snug among the wadding and velvet of a well-warmed room. Hoar-frost is a beauty, ice a change of decoration by the greatest of artists, which the rich admire through their windows. He who is warm can admire the withered trees, and find a charm in the sombre perspective of the snow-covered plain. He who finds mounting to his brain the savory odors of the dinner awaiting him, can inhale from time to time, through the partly opened window, the sharp, perfume of the north wind and the icy vapor of the snows which are refreshing to his mind. He, in short, who after a day without suffering, when millions of his fellow-creatures are enduring dreadful privations, throws himself on his bed of down, between his fine and well-aired sheets, may find out that all is for the best, in this best of all possible worlds.

But he who is cold sees nothing of all these splendors of Nature, — as richly clad in her white as in her green mantle. He who is hungry looks toward the earth, and avoids looking at the sky, — the sky without a sun, and therefore without a smile for the unhappy.

Now, at the time of which we write, — that is, about the middle of the month of April, — three hundred thousand miserable beings, dying from cold and hunger, groaned in Paris alone: in Paris, where, in spite of the boast that scarcely another city contained so many rich people, nothing had been prepared to prevent the poor from perishing of cold and want.

For the last four months a sky of brass had driven the poor from the villages into the town, as in winter wolves are driven from the woods into the villages.

No more bread; no more wood. No more bread for those who felt this cold; no more wood to cook bread. All the provisions which had been collected, Paris had devoured in a month. The provost, shortsighted and incapable, did not know how to procure for Paris, which was under his care, two hundred thousand cords of wood which might be obtained within a radius of ten leagues. He gave as an excuse, when it was cold, that the ice hindered the horses; if it thawed, he pleaded the insufficient number of horses and conveyances. Louis XVI., ever good and humane, always ready to attend to the physical wants of his people, although he overlooked their social wants, began by contributing a sum of two hundred thousand francs for the hiring of horses and carts, and insisting on their immediate use.

Still the demand continued greater than the supply. It was necessary to restrict the purchaser. At first, no one was allowed to carry away from the public timber-yard more than a cart-load of wood; then they were limited to half this quantity. Soon long lines of applicants might be seen waiting outside the doors, as they were afterwards seen at the bakers' shops. The king gave away the whole of his private income in charity. He raised three million francs on the impost receipts, and applied them to the relief of the sufferers, declaring that every other need must give way before that of cold and famine. The queen, on her part, gave five hundred louis from her purse. The convents, the hospitals, and the public buildings were thrown open as places of asylum for the poor; every gate to the larger houses was thrown open by order of their owners, who followed the example given at the royal residences, to admit into their court-yards the suffering poor, who came to crouch around the large fires burning there.

Thus they hoped to reach the period of the desired thaw. But the sky was unrelenting. Every evening a copper-colored veil extended up from the horizon; the stars shone bright and cold, like funeral torches, and the frosts of the night congealed anew into a lake of diamonds the pale snow which the noon-day sun had for a moment melted.

During the day thousands of workmen, with spades and shovels, cleared away the snow from before the houses; so that on each side of the streets, already too narrow for the traffic, rose a high, thick wall, blocking up the way. Heavy carriages with wheels slipping, horses stumbling and falling, crowded the foot-passengers against these icy walls, and exposed them to the threefold risk of falling, of being run over, and of being covered by the snow. Soon these masses of snow and ice became so large that the shops were obscured by them; the passage-ways were obstructed, and it was found necessary to suspend the removal of it, — the means at command were insufficient.

Paris could do no more. She yielded, and allowed the winter to do its worst. December, January, February, and March passed thus, although now and then a few days' thaw changed all Paris, whose sewers were blocked up, into an ocean. Horses were drowned, and carriages destroyed in the streets, some of which could be traversed only in boats. Paris, faithful to its character, sang through this destruction by the thaw, as it had done through that by famine. Processions were made to the markets to see the fisherwomen serving their customers with immense leather boots on, inside which their trousers were pushed, and with their petticoats tucked round their waists, all laughing, gesticulating, and splashing each other as they stood in the water. These thaws, however, were but transitory; the frost returned, harder and more obstinate than ever, and recourse was had to sledges, pushed along by skaters, or drawn by rough-shod horses along the causeways, which were like polished mirrors. The Seine, frozen many feet deep, had become the rendezvous for all idlers, who assembled there to skate or slide, until, warmed by exercise, they ran to the nearest fire, lest the perspiration should freeze upon them. The time seemed to be approaching when the water communications being stopped, and the roads impassable, provisions could no longer be sent in, and Paris, that gigantic body, would perish for want of food, — like those cetaceous monsters of the polar regions which, having devoured everything within their reach, remain enclosed in the polar ice, and die of starvation; since they are not able, like the smaller fish on which they prey, to escape by the fissures, and seek more temperate zones and waters more productive.

The king, in this extremity, assembled his council. It was decided to effect a removal of a portion of the population, — that is to say, to request the bishops, the abbés, and the monks, too careless of their residential duties, to return to their homes; also the governors, the intendants of provinces, who had made Paris their seat of government, and the magistrates who preferred the opera and Parisian society to their official chairs. Indeed, all these persons used large quantities of wood in their hôtels, and consumed no small amount of food. There were still the noblemen from places in the provinces, who were also to be requested to leave. But Monsieur Lenoir, lieutenant of police, observed to the king that as none of these were criminals, and as they could not therefore be compelled to leave Paris in a day, they would probably delay their departure, partly by reason of their unwillingness to go at all, and partly on account of the state of the roads; so that the thaw would arrive before any advantage could be gained from that measure, while all the inconveniences of it would have been produced.

Meantime that pity on the part of the king, who had emptied his private coffers, and that compassion of the queen, who had exhausted her personal resources, had awakened the ingenious gratitude of the people, who commemorated by monuments as ephemeral as the calamity, and as the benefits conferred, the charities which Louis XVI. and the queen had bestowed upon the poor. As in other times soldiers raised trophies to the victorious general, constructed of the arms of the conquered enemy, so the Parisians, upon the field of battle where they had fought against the winter, raised obelisks of snow and ice in honor of the king and queen. Every one helped. The workman gave the strength of his arm, the artisan his industry, the artist his talent, and at the crossings of the principal streets the obelisks arose, elegant, bold, and solid. The poor man of letters whom the king's benevolence had sought out in his attic chamber, brought the offering of an inscription which expressed the feelings of his heart even more than it did the power of his mind.

At the end of March came a thaw, but it was partial only, and unsettled. Returns of cold weather prolonged the misery, the hunger, and suffering of the Parisian population, while preserving, upright and solid, the obelisks of snow. Never had the misery of the people been so profound as in this latter period. The intermittent warmth of the sun made the cold and windy nights even more unendurable. Great masses of ice were melted, and flowing into the Seine caused it to overflow its banks. But in the early days of April, one of those returns of cold weather of which we have spoken, declared itself. The obelisks, down whose sides coursed already the gathering moisture, presage of destruction, — the obelisks, half-melted, were solidified anew, deformed, and reduced in size. A fine mantle of snow covered the boulevards and the quays, and sledges reappeared there, with their prancing horses. They went well upon the quays and the boulevards; but in the streets the coaches and the rapid cabriolets were the terror of pedestrians, who, not hearing their approach and hindered by the walls of ice, were unable to get out of their way, and frequently fell under the wheels while trying to escape.

In a few days there were in Paris many persons wounded or dying. There were legs broken by a fall on the ice, ribs broken by the shafts of cabriolets which, in the rapidity of their course, could not be stopped upon the icy surface. Then the police gave attention to the task of preserving from the carriage-wheels those who had been spared by cold, hunger, and inundation. The rich who injured the poor were compelled to pay damages. In those days, during the reign of aristocracies, there was even an aristocratic way of driving horses. A prince of the blood rode at full speed and with no cry of warning; a duke, a gentleman, or an opera-girl drove at a fast trot; a president or a financier at a trot; the dandy drove himself in his cabriolet, and his footman, standing behind, cried, "Take care!" when his master had run against or run over some unfortunate pedestrian; and then, as Mercier says, he got up again who was able to do so.

But while the Parisian could see beautiful swan-necked sledges coursing on the boulevards; while he could admire the lovely ladies of the court, flying like meteors over the ice, in their sable and ermine cloaks; while the gilded bells, the purple netting, and the horses' plumes amused the children, standing in rows to gaze at all these fine sights, — the Paris citizen forgot the carelessness of the police and the brutality of the coachmen, and the poor forgot their misery, for the moment at least, accustomed as they were to be patronized by the rich or by those who pretended to be rich.

It was under the circumstances we have just described, a week after the dinner given at Versailles by Monsieur de Richelieu, that one might have seen, on a bright, cold day, four elegant sledges gliding over the hardened snow which covered the ground. Outside of Paris the snow can long keep its virginal whiteness, there are so few to soil it with their footsteps; but in Paris a hundred thousand steps an hour soon darken and spoil the splendid mantle of winter.

The sledges, which glided easily over the road till they came to the city, stopped first at the boulevard, — that is to say, where mud began to take the place of snow. In fact, the noon-day sun had softened the atmosphere, and a temporary thaw had set in, — we say "temporary" because the clearness of the atmosphere gave promise that with the night would come that cold north wind which ruthlessly destroys in April the early leaves and the budding flowers.

In the foremost sledge were two men in brown riding-coats with double capes; the only difference in the coats was that on one the buttons and embroidery were of gold, and on the other they were of silk. They were drawn by a black horse with smoking nostrils, and turned from time to time as if to watch the sledge that followed them, and which contained two ladies so enveloped in furs that it was impossible to see their faces. It might even have been difficult to distinguish their sex, if the height of their head-dresses, on which were little hats with nodding plumes, had not proclaimed them to be women. From these colossal edifices, covered with ribbons and jewels, escaped, occasionally, a cloud of white powder, as in winter the wind shakes the snow from the branches of the trees.

These two ladies, seated side by side, were conversing so earnestly as scarcely to see the numerous spectators who watched their progress along the boulevards. One of them, taller and more majestic than the other, and holding to her mouth a finely embroidered cambric handkerchief, carried her head erect and stately, in spite of the wind made by the rapid motion of the sledge.

It had just struck five by the clock of the Church Saint Croix d'Antin, and night was beginning to descend upon Paris, and with the night the cold. They had just reached the Porte Saint Denis, when the lady who held a handkerchief to her mouth made a sign to the men in front, who thereupon quickened the pace of their horse, and soon disappeared among the evening mists, which were fast thickening around the colossal structure of the Bastille.

This signal she then repeated to the other two sledges, which also vanished along the Rue Saint Denis. Meanwhile the one in which she sat, having arrived at the Boulevard de Menilmontant, stopped.

In this place few people were to be seen; night had dispersed them. Besides, in this out-of-the-way quarter not many citizens would trust themselves without torches and an escort, since winter had sharpened the teeth of three or four thousand beggars who might easily become thieves.

The lady whom we have already designated to our readers as giving the orders, touched with her finger the shoulder of the coachman who was driving her, and said, "Weber, how long will it take the cabriolet to reach — you know where?"

"Matame will go in de gabriolet?" asked the coachman, with a strong German accent.

"Yes, I shall return by the streets, to see the fires. Now the streets are still more muddy than the boulevards, and we should not get on in the sledge. Besides, I begin to feel the cold; do not you, little one?" said the lady, addressing her companion.

"Yes, Madame," replied the latter.

"You understand, Weber, where to take the cabriolet?"

"Ferry vell, Matame."

"How much time will you need?"

"Alf ein hour."

"Good. What is the time, little one?"

The young lady looked at her watch, which however she could hardly see as it was growing dark, and said, "A quarter to six, Madame."

"Then at a quarter to seven, Weber." And saying these words the lady leaped lightly from the sledge, gave her hand to her friend, and walked away quickly, while the coachman, with gestures of respectful despair, murmured, loud enough for his mistress to hear, —

"Oh, mein Gott, vot imprutence!"

The two ladies laughed, drew closely around them their cloaks, the collars of which reached even to the tops of their ears, and crossed the foot-path on the boulevard, amusing themselves by crunching the snow under their little feet shod with well furred shoes.

"You have good eyes, Andrée," said the lady who seemed the elder of the two, although she could not have been more than thirty or thirty-two years of age; "try to read the name at the corner of that street."

"Rue du Pont-aux-Choux, Madame," said the young lady, smiling.

"Rue du Pont-aux-Choux! Ah, mon Dieu! we must have lost our way. They told me the second street on the right — but what a smell of hot bread, Andrée!"

"That is not astonishing," said her companion, "for here is a baker's shop."

"Well, let us ask here for the Rue Saint Claude," said the elder lady, moving toward the door.

"Oh, do not go in, Madame; allow me," said Andrée.

"The Rue Saint Claude, my pretty ladies?" said a cheerful voice. "Are you asking for the Rue Saint Claude?"

The two ladies turned round at the same moment, and looking in the direction of the voice they saw, leaning against the door of the shop, a man with a jacket over his shoulders, but with legs and breast quite bare, notwithstanding the intense cold.

"Oh! a naked man!" cried the young lady, half hiding behind her companion; "are we, then, in Oceanica?"

"You are looking for the Rue Saint Claude?" repeated the baker's man, who did not understand the movement of the younger lady, and who, accustomed to his costume, was far from attributing to it the centrifugal force, the result of which we have just seen.

"Yes, my friend, the Rue Saint Claude," said the elder lady, hardly able to keep from laughing.

"Oh, it is not difficult to find; besides, I will conduct you there myself," replied the jolly, flour-sprinkled youth, who, suiting the action to the words, began to move his long bony legs, which terminated in two old shoes as large as boats.

"No, no!" cried the elder lady, who did not fancy such a guide; "do not disturb yourself. Tell us the way, and we shall easily find it."

"First street to the right, Madame," replied the guide, discreetly withdrawing.

"Thanks," said the ladies, simultaneously; and they set off, running in the direction indicated, stifling their laughter in their muffs.

CHAPTER II.

AN INTERIOR.

If we have not calculated too much on the memory of our reader, we may hope that he already knows the Rue Saint Claude, the eastern end of which joins the boulevard, and the western, the Rue Saint Louis; indeed, he has seen more than one of the personages who have played or will play a part in this history, passing through it in former times, — that is, when the great physician Joseph Balsamo lived there with his sibyl Lorenza and his master Althotas. In 1784 as in 1770, the time at which we first introduced our readers to the place, the Rue Saint Claude was a respectable street, rather dark, it is true, certainly not very clean; in short, not much frequented, not much built up, and little known. But it had its name of a saint and its rank as a street of the Marais; and as such it sheltered in the three or four houses of which it consisted, several gentlemen of small property, several poor trades-people, and several paupers omitted in the parish lists.

Besides these three or four houses, there was at the corner of the boulevard a hôtel of grand appearance of which the Rue Saint Claude might have been proud, as of an aristocratic building; but this house whose high windows would on festal days have illuminated the whole street merely by the reflection of its candelabra and chandeliers, — this house, we say, was the darkest, the most silent, and the most completely closed of all the houses in that quarter.

The gate was never opened; the windows, lined with leather cushions, had on each leaf of the window-blind, upon every moulding of the shutters, a coating of dust which physiologists or geologists would have said had been accumulating for ten years.

Sometimes an idle passer-by, some curious person, or a neighbor approached the gate, and through the huge key-hole examined the interior of the court-yard; all he could see, however, was masses of weeds growing between the stones, and green moss spreading itself over everything. Occasionally, an enormous rat, sovereign of this deserted domain, quietly crossed the yard and disappeared in the cellar, — superfluous modesty, when he had the choice of so many fine sitting-rooms where he need never fear the intrusion of a cat.

If it happened to be a passer-by or a curious person, after having established for himself the fact of the solitude of this hôtel, he would go on his way; but if it was a neighbor, since the interest which he took in the hôtel was much greater, he remained almost always long enough to be joined by a second neighbor, attracted by curiosity like his own; and then almost always a conversation took place of which we are very sure that we can recall the substance, if not the details.

"Neighbor," said the one who was not looking to the one who looked, "what do you see in the house of Monsieur le Comte de Balsamo?"

"Neighbor," replied the latter, "I see the rat."

"Ah, will you allow me?" and the second curious person placed himself in his turn at the key-hole.

"Do you see him?" said the dispossessed neighbor to the one in possession.

"Yes," replied the latter, "I see him. Ah, Monsieur! he has grown fat."

"You think so?"

"Yes, I am sure of it."

"I believe you! He has nothing to trouble him."

"And certainly, whatever they may say, there must be some good tid-bits in the house."

"Good tid-bits, you say?"

"Why, Monsieur de Balsamo disappeared too suddenly not to have forgotten something."

"Indeed, neighbor, you may be right."

And after having looked again at the rat, they separated, alarmed at having said so much on a matter so mysterious and delicate.

Indeed, after the burning of this house, or rather a part of it, Balsamo had disappeared, no repairs had been made, and the hôtel was unoccupied.

We will leave it, rising sombre and damp in the darkness, with its terraces covered with snow, and its roof destroyed by the flames, — this old hôtel which we did not wish to pass without stopping before it, as before an old acquaintance; then crossing the street from left to right, we shall see, adjoining a little garden enclosed by a high wall, a narrow and high house, rising like a tall white tower against the deep gray-blue of the sky. At the top of the house a chimney rises like a lightning-rod, and right over the top of this chimney a brilliant star shines and sparkles.

The upper story of the house would be lost unseen in space except for a ray of light which illuminates two of the three windows in the front. The other stories are dark and gloomy. Are the tenants already asleep? Are they economizing, beneath their blankets, both the candles which are so dear, and the wood which is so scarce this year? Whatever the cause, the four stories give no sign of life; while the fifth not only lives, but even shines forth with some ostentation.

Let us knock at the door and ascend the dark staircase which terminates at this fifth story, where our business calls us. A common ladder placed against the wall leads to the garret. A deer's foot hangs by the door; a straw mat and wooden coat-rack furnish the staircase. The first door being opened we enter a dark and unfurnished room; it is the one whose window is not lighted. It serves as antechamber and leads into a second room, the appearance and furniture of which deserve all our attention.

The floor is of tiles, instead of being inlaid; the doors are coarsely painted; there are three armchairs of white wood, upholstered in yellow velvet, and a poor sofa, whose cushions have become thin and creased by long use. Two portraits hung on the wall first attract our attention. A candle and a lamp, placed the one on a three-legged stand, the other on the mantel-piece, combine their rays so as to make these two portraits two centres of light. The first of these was a well-known and strikingly correct likeness of Henri III. king of France and Poland — with a cap on his head, face long and pale, pointed beard, and a ruff round his neck. Under it is inscribed in black letters, on a frame poorly gilded, "HENRI DE VALOIS."

The other portrait, more recently gilded, as fresh-looking as the other was ancient, represented a young woman with black eyes, a nose straight and delicately formed, high cheek-bones, and a mouth expressing circumspection. Her head was dressed, or rather crushed, by an edifice of hair and ribbons in comparison with which the cap of Henri III. was like a mole-hill beside a pyramid. Under this portrait could be read in black letters, "JEANNE DE VALOIS."

If you wish, after inspecting the fireless hearth, the cheap cotton bed-curtains, ornamented with yellowed green damask, — if you wish to know what connection there may be between those portraits and the occupants of that fifth story, it is necessary only to turn toward a small oak table upon which a woman, plainly dressed, rests her left arm while she examines several sealed letters, and takes note of their addresses. That young woman is the original of the portrait.

A few steps off, in an attitude half-curious, half-respectful, stands a little old woman, apparently about sixty years old.

"JEANNE DE VALOIS," says the inscription; but if this lady be indeed a Valois, one wonders how ever the portrait of Henri III., the sybarite king, the ruffed voluptuary, could endure, observing it only from his portrait, the sight of so much poverty suffered by a person not only of his race, but bearing his name.

In her person, however, this lady of the fifth story did no discredit to the origin which she claimed. She had white and delicate hands, which from time to time she warmed by placing them under her crossed arms; her feet also, which were encased in rather coquettish velvet slippers, she endeavored to warm by stamping on the tiled floor, shining and cold as the ice that covered Paris.

The wind whistled through all the old doors, and penetrated the crevices of the shaking windows; and the old servant sadly shrugged her shoulders as she looked at the fireless hearth. As to the lady, the mistress of the apartment, she continued counting the letters and reading their addresses. After reading each address she made a little calculation.

"Madame de Misery," she murmured; "first lady of the bedchamber to her Majesty, — I cannot expect more than six louis from her, for she has already given to me once;" and she sighed. "Madame Patrix, lady's maid to her Majesty, two louis; Monsieur d'Ormesson, an audience; Monsieur de Calonne, some good advice; Monsieur de Rohan, a visit, — at least we will try to induce him," said she, smiling. "Well, then, I think I may hope for eight louis within a week." Then looking up, "Dame Clotilde," she said, "snuff this candle."

The old woman did as she was bid, and then resumed her place.

This kind of inquisition seemed to annoy the young woman, for she said, "Do go, my dear, and see if you cannot find the end of a wax candle for me; this tallow is odious."

"There is none," replied the old woman.

"But just look."

"Where?"

"In the antechamber."

"It is very cold there."

"Eh, stop! some one is ringing," said the young woman.

"Madame is mistaken," replied the obstinate old woman.

"I thought I heard it, Dame Clotilde;" then, abandoning the attempt to move the old woman, she turned again to her calculations. "Eight louis! three I owe for the rent." She took her pen and wrote. "Three louis; five promised to Monsieur de La Motte, to enable him to endure his stay at Bar-sur-Aube. Poor fellow, our marriage has not enriched him as yet, but patience!" and she smiled again, and looked at herself in the mirror that hung between the two portraits. "Well, then," she continued, "I want one louis for fares from Versailles to Paris and back again." And she wrote that additional figure in the column of expenses. "Living for a week, one louis; dress, and gifts to the porters of the houses where I go, four louis. Is that all? Let me add." But in the midst of her addition she interrupted herself: "Some one is ringing, I tell you."

"No, Madame," replied the old woman. "It is below, on the next floor."

"Four, six, eleven, fourteen louis; there are six less than I need, — and my entire wardrobe is to be renewed, and this old brute to be paid off and dismissed." Then, suddenly, "But I tell you some one is ringing, you miserable creature!" she cried out angrily.

Even the old woman could deny it no longer; she hobbled off to open the door, while her mistress, agile as a squirrel, rapidly cleared away all the papers, and after a rapid glance about the room, to assure herself that everything was in order, seated herself on the sofa, assuming the humble and melancholy attitude of a person resigned but suffering.

It was, however, only her body that reposed; her eyes, restless and unquiet, questioned the mirror in which the door was reflected, and her ears were quickened to catch the smallest sound.

At last the door was opened, and she heard a young and sweet voice saying, "Is it here that Madame la Comtesse de La Motte lives?"

"Madame la Comtesse de La Motte Valois," replied Clotilde, with a nasal tone.

"It is the same person, my good woman; is Madame de La Motte at home?"

"Yes, Madame; she is too ill to go out."

During this colloquy, the pretended invalid saw reflected in the glass the figure of a lady talking to Clotilde, unquestionably belonging to the higher ranks. She immediately left the sofa, and seated herself in an armchair, so that the stranger might have the seat of honor. While accomplishing this movement, she saw her visitor turn round, and heard her say to some one behind, "You can enter, Madame; this is the place." And the two ladies we have before seen asking the way to the Rue Saint Claude prepared to enter the room.

"Whom shall I announce to the countess?" said Clotilde.

"Announce a sister of charity," said the elder lady.

"From Paris?"

"No, from Versailles."

Clotilde entered the room, and the strangers followed her.

Jeanne de Valois seemed to rise with difficulty from her seat to receive her visitors. Clotilde placed chairs for them, and then withdrew so slowly that one could easily see that she intended to remain near the door, in order to hear what might follow.

CHAPTER III.

JEANNE DE LA MOTTE DE VALOIS.

THE first care of Jeanne de La Motte, when she could with propriety raise her eyes, was to examine the face of her visitors, so as to gather what she could of their character. The elder lady, who might have been, as we have said, about thirty-two years of age, was remarkably beautiful, although at first sight an air of hauteur detracted slightly from the charm of her expression; at least, so Jeanne thought, from the little she could see of her face. For the lady, preferring one of the armchairs to the sofa, had placed herself beyond the range of the rays of light emitted by the lamp, and sat in a corner of the room, having drawn over her forehead the hood of her cloak, which thus shaded her face. But she held her head so proudly, her eyes were so expressive and so naturally dilated, that all details were effaced, and at a cursory glance she was to be recognized as of a good family, and even of a noble family.

Her companion, less timid, in appearance at least, although four or five years younger, was not less beautiful. Her complexion was charming; her hair drawn back from her temples showed to advantage the perfect oval of her face. Two large blue eyes, calm and serene; a well-formed mouth, indicating great frankness of disposition, but to which discretion had been added by education; a nose, which in form rivalled that of the Venus de Medicis, — such was the other face which presented itself to the gaze of Jeanne de Valois.

She inquired gently to what happy circumstance she owed the honor of their visit.

The elder lady signed to the younger, who thereupon said, "Madame, for I believe you are married — "

"I have the honor to be the wife of Monsieur le Comte de La Motte, Madame, an excellent gentleman."

"Well, Madame la Comtesse, we are at the head of a charitable institution, and having heard concerning your condition things that interest us, we wished to have more precise details on the subject."

Jeanne paused a moment before making a reply. "Ladies," she said, noticing the reserve of the second visitor, "you see there the portrait of Henri III., — that is to say, of the brother of my ancestor; for I am truly of the race of Valois, as you doubtless have been told." And she waited for the next question, looking at her visitors with a sort of proud humility.

"Madame," said the grave and sweet voice of the elder lady, "is it true, as we have also heard, that your mother was housekeeper at a place called Fontette, near Bar-sur-Seine?"

Jeanne colored at this question, but replied at once, and without embarrassment, "It is true, Madame; and," she went on, "as Marie Fossel, my mother, was possessed of rare beauty, my father fell in love with her, and married her. It is by my father that I am nobly descended; he was a Saint Remy de Valois, direct descendant of the Valois who were on the throne."

"But how have you been reduced to this degree of poverty, Madame."

"Alas! that is easily told. You are not ignorant that after the accession of Henri IV., by which the crown passed from the house of Valois to that of Bourbon, there still remained many branches of the fallen family, obscure doubtless, but incontestably springing from the same root as the four brothers who all perished so miserably."

The two ladies made a sign of assent.

"Then," continued Jeanne, "these remnants of the Valois fearing, in spite of their obscurity, to be obnoxious to the reigning family, changed their name of Valois into that of Remy, which they took from the name of an estate; and they may be traced under this name down to my grandfather, who, seeing the monarchy so firmly established, and the old branch forgotten, thought he need no longer deprive himself of his illustrious name, his only inheritance. He resumed, therefore, the name of Valois, and bore that name in poverty and obscurity in a distant province, while no one at the court of France dreamed that beyond the radiance of the throne there vegetated a descendant of the ancient kings of France, who, if not the most glorious in the history of the monarchy, were at all events the most unfortunate."

Jeanne paused after saying these words. She had spoken with a simplicity and mildness which created a favorable impression.

"You have, doubtless, your proofs already arranged, Madame," said the elder lady, with kindness, but at the same time looking fixedly at her who claimed to be descended from the Valois.

"Oh, Madame!" she replied, with a bitter smile, "proofs are not wanting. My father arranged them, and left them to me as his sole legacy. But of what use are proofs of a truth which no one is willing to recognize?"

"Your father is, then, dead?" asked the younger lady.

"Alas! yes."

"Did he die in the provinces?"

"No, Madame."

"At Paris, then?"

"Yes."

"In this room?"

"No, Madame; my father, Baron de Valois, great-nephew of King Henri III., died of want and hunger."

"Impossible!" cried both ladies, at the same time.

"And not here," continued Jeanne; "not in this poor retreat, — not in his own bed, poor as that might be. No, my father died side by side with misery and suffering. My father died in the Hôtel Dieu!"

The ladies uttered an exclamation of surprise and distress.

Satisfied with the effect produced by her story on her visitors, and with the skill she had used in leading up to the denouement, Jeanne sat with her eyes lowered, her hands hanging motionless. The elder of the strangers regarded her attentively, and seeing nothing affected or vulgar in her grief, which appeared so simple and natural, she said: "From what you tell me, Madame, you have experienced, it is evident, great misfortunes; and the death of your father, especially — "

"Oh, if you heard all the story of my life, Madame, you would see that my father's death does not rank among its greatest misfortunes."

"What, Madame! you regard as a minor evil the loss of a father?" said the elder lady, with a frown.

"Yes, Madame; and in saying that I speak as an affectionate daughter, for my father in dying was delivered from all the ills which he experienced in this life, and which continue to assail his unhappy family. I feel, therefore, in the midst of the grief which his loss causes me, a certain joy in knowing that my father is dead, and that the descendant of kings is no longer obliged to beg his bread."

"To beg his bread?"

"Yes, Madame; I say it without shame, for in all our misfortunes there was no fault in my father or myself."

"But you do not speak of your mother?"

"Well, with the same frankness with which I told you just now that I blessed God for taking my father, I complain to him because he left my mother alive."

The two ladies looked at each other, almost shuddering at these strange words.

"Would it be indiscreet, Madame, to ask you for a more detailed account of your misfortunes?" asked the elder lady.

"The indiscretion, Madame, would be in me, if I fatigued your ears with a recital of sorrow which can have no interest for you."

"I listen, Madame," said the elder lady, so commandingly that her companion looked at her as if to warn her to be more guarded. Indeed, Madame de La Motte had been struck with this imperious accent, and stared at her with some astonishment.

"I listen, Madame," the lady repeated in a more gentle tone, "if you will do me the favor to begin;" and yielding to a sense of discomfort, caused doubtless by the cold, the lady who had just spoken restlessly moved her feet, chilled by contact with the damp floor. The younger lady thereupon pushed toward her a sort of foot-carpet which happened to be near her chair, — an attention which drew from her companion a warning glance. "Keep that carpet, sister," said she, pushing it back again, "you are more delicate than I."

"Indeed, Madame," said Jeanne, "it grieves me much to see you suffer from the cold; but wood is six francs higher than ever, and is now sold at seventy francs a cord. My stock was exhausted a week ago."

"You said, Madame, that you were unhappy in having a mother," said the elder lady, returning to the subject.

"Yes, Madame. Doubtless such a blasphemy shocks you much, does it not?" said Jeanne; "but hear my explanation, since you desire it. I have already had the honor to tell you that my father married beneath his rank."

"Yes, in marrying his housekeeper."

"Well, Marie Fossel, my mother, instead of feeling gratified and proud of the honor he had done her, began by ruining my father, which certainly was not difficult, while she satisfied with the little that her husband possessed the hunger of her caprices. Then having compelled him to sell everything, down to his last bit of ground, she induced him to go to Paris to claim the rights to which his name entitled him. My father was easily persuaded; perhaps he hoped in the justice of the king. He came, then, having first turned all he possessed into money. He had, besides me, another daughter and a son. The son, unfortunate like me, vegetates in the lowest ranks of the army; the daughter, my poor sister, was abandoned on the evening of our departure before the house of a neighboring farmer, her godfather.

"The journey exhausted our little resources. My father wore himself out in fruitless appeals. We scarcely ever saw him at home; and in his absence my mother, to whom a victim was necessary, vented her discontent and ill-humor upon me. She even reproached me with what I ate, and I came by degrees to prefer to eat only bread, or even not to eat at all, rather than sit down at our poor table. But my mother found no lack of pretexts for punishment; for the slightest fault I was unmercifully beaten. The neighbors, thinking to serve me, told my father of the treatment I experienced. He endeavored to protect me against my mother, and did not know that by his interference he changed my enemy of the moment into an unrelenting tormentor. Alas! I could not warn him of what was for my interest; I was too young, too childish. I comprehended nothing; I experienced effects without seeking to know the cause. I knew the hardship, and that was all.

"At last my father fell ill, and was confined first to the house, and then to his bed. My mother banished me from his room on the pretext that I disturbed him. She made me now learn a sentence which she emphasized with blows and bruises; and when I knew that sentence by heart, — which instinctively I was unwilling to learn, — though my eyes were red with tears, she would drive me out into the street with blows, ordering me to repeat it to each passer-by if I did not wish to be beaten to death."

"Horrible! horrible!" murmured the younger of the two ladies.

"And what was this sentence?" asked the elder lady.

"It was this, Madame: 'Have pity on a little orphan who descends in a direct line from Henri de Valois.'"

"What a shame!" cried the elder lady, with a gesture of disgust.

"But what effect did this sentence have on those to whom it was addressed?" inquired the younger.

"Some listened and pitied me; others were angry and threatened me; others, more compassionate than the first, warned me that I ran a great risk in repeating such words, — but I knew no other danger than that of disobeying my mother."

"And what was the result?"

"Mon Dieu! Madame, that which my mother had desired; I brought back to the house a little money, and the frightful prospect which my father had before him — the hospital — receded for a few days."

The features of the elder of the two young women became contracted; tears came to the eyes of the younger.

"At length, Madame, notwithstanding the relief it brought my father, this hideous trade became revolting to me. One day, instead of repeating my accustomed phrase, I sat on the doorstep all the time, and returned in the evening empty-handed. My mother beat me so that the next day I fell ill; then my poor father, deprived of all resources, was obliged to go to the Hôtel Dieu, where he died."

"Oh, what a horrible history!" murmured the two ladies.

"What became of you after your father's death?" asked the younger lady.

"God took pity upon me. A month after my father's death my mother ran away with a soldier, her lover, abandoning my brother and myself."

"You found yourselves orphans?"

"Oh, Madame, we, unlike others, were orphans only because we had a mother. Public charity adopted us. But as begging was repugnant to us, we begged only enough to procure the necessities of life. God commands his creatures to endeavor to live."

"Alas!"

"What shall I tell you, Madame? One day I saw a carriage going slowly along toward the Faubourg Saint Marcel. There were four footmen behind, and a beautiful lady inside; I held out my hand to her for charity. She questioned me, and my reply and my name seemed to strike her with surprise, and then with incredulity. She asked for my address, and the next day made inquiries, and finding that I had told her the truth, she took charge of my brother and myself; she placed my brother in the army and me with a dressmaker. We were both saved from starvation."

"Was not this lady Madame de Boulainvilliers?"

"It was."

"She is dead, I believe?"

"Yes, and her death plunged me again into the abyss."

"Her husband still lives, and is rich."

"Ah, Madame, it is to him that I owe my later misfortunes, as to my mother I owe the miseries of my childhood. I had grown tall and perhaps attractive, and he wished to put a price upon his benefits, which I refused to pay. It was at just this time that Madame de Boulainvilliers died; and I — I, whom she had married to a brave and loyal soldier, Monsieur de La Motte — found myself, separated as I was from my husband, more desolate after her death than I had been after that of my father.

"This is my story, Madame. I have made it short. A tale of suffering is always tedious, and is not to be inflicted on those who are happy, though they be as benevolent as you, ladies, seem to be."

A long silence followed this conclusion of Madame de La Motte's story. The elder lady was the first to speak. "Where, then, is your husband?" she asked.

"He is in garrison, at Bar-sur-Aube; he serves in the gendarmerie, and is waiting, like myself, in hopes of better times."

"But you have laid your case before the court?"

"Certainly."

"The name of Valois must have awakened some sympathy?"

"I know not, Madame, what sentiments it may have awakened, for I have received no answer to any of my petitions."

"And yet you have seen the ministers, the king, the queen?"

"No one. Everywhere I have failed."

"You cannot beg, however."

"No, Madame; I have lost the habit, but — "

"But what?"

"But I can die of hunger, like my poor father."

"You have no child?"

"No, Madame; and my husband, by getting killed in the service of his king, will find for himself at least a glorious end to our miseries."

"Can you, Madame, — I beg pardon if I seem intrusive, — but can you bring forward the proofs of your genealogy?"

Jeanne rose, opened a drawer, and drew out some papers which she presented to the lady, who rose to come nearer the light that she might examine them; but seeing that Jeanne eagerly seized this opportunity to observe her more clearly than she had yet been able to do, turned away as if the light hurt her eyes, thus turning her back to Madame de La Motte. In this position she examined all the papers, one after the other.

"But," said she, at last, "these are only copies. I do not find a single original."

"Oh, Madame, I have the originals safe, and am ready to produce them — "

"If any important occasion should present itself, you mean?" said the lady, smiling.

"It is, doubtless, Madame, an important occasion which procures me the honor of your visit; but these papers are so precious — "

"That you cannot show them to every stranger. I understand you."

"Oh, Madame!" cried the countess, who at last had obtained a clear view of her protectress's face, full of dignity, "I cannot think of treating you as a stranger; you shall see them;" and opening a secret drawer above the other, she drew out the originals, which were enclosed in an old portfolio, on which were the arms of the Valois.

The lady took them, and after examining them said, "You are right; these papers are perfectly regular, and I advise you to exhibit them without fail to the proper authorities."

"And what, in your opinion, Madame, should I gain by that?"

"Why, without any doubt, a pension for yourself, and advancement for Monsieur de La Motte, if he prove worthy of it."

"My husband is an honorable man, Madame, and has never failed in his military duties."

"It is enough, Madame," said the sister of charity, drawing her hood still more over her face. Madame de La Motte anxiously watched her every movement. She saw her feel in her pocket and draw out first the embroidered handkerchief with which she had shielded her face when in the sledge, then a small roll about an inch in diameter, and three or four in length, which she placed on the chiffonniere, saying, "The treasurer of our charity authorizes me, Madame, to offer you this small assistance, until you shall obtain something better."

Madame de La Motte threw a rapid glance at the little roll. "Three-franc pieces," thought she, "and there must be fifty, or even a hundred of them. So here are a hundred and fifty, perhaps three hundred, francs fallen from the sky. The roll is somewhat short for a hundred pieces, but it is also too long for fifty."

While she was thus thinking, the two ladies moved quickly into the outer room, where Clotilde had fallen asleep in her chair.

The candle was burning out in the socket, and the smell which came from it made the ladies draw out their smelling-bottles. Jeanne woke Clotilde, who seized the remnant of the candle and held it like a beacon light over the gloomy staircase, notwithstanding the protests of the two strangers, whom she lighted and at the same time poisoned.

"Au revoir, Madame la Comtesse," they cried, as they hurried downstairs.

"Where may I have the honor of coming to thank you?" asked Jeanne.

"We will let you know," replied the elder lady, going down as fast as possible.

Madame de La Motte ran back into her room, impatient to examine her rouleau, but her foot struck against something which rolled from the mat on to the floor. On picking it up and holding it to the lamp, she found it to be a gold box, round, flat, and plainly ornamented. There were some chocolate confections in it, and evidently it also contained a secret compartment. The countess at last found the spring, and the lid to the secret compartment flew open and disclosed the portrait of a woman of masculine beauty and imperious majesty. The coiffure was German, and she wore a collar like that of an order. A monogram, composed of an M and a T encircled by a laurel wreath, ornamented the inside of the box. Madame de La Motte did not doubt, from the resemblance of the portrait to the lady who had just left her, that it was that of her mother or grandmother. She ran to the stairs to call to the ladies, but hearing the street-door shut, she ran back thinking to call them from the window, but arrived there only in time to see a cabriolet going rapidly away.

The countess, no longer hoping to recall her two protectresses, looked again at the box, and concluded that she would send it to Versailles. Then seizing the roulean, which was lying on the chiffonniere, "I was not mistaken," she said; "there are only fifty crowns here." When she opened it, she uttered a cry of joy, "Double louis! fifty double louis! two thousand and four hundred francs!" and transported at the sight of more gold than she had ever seen before in her life, she remained with clasped hands and open lips. "A hundred louis!" she repeated; "these ladies are, then, very rich. Oh, I will find them again!"

CHAPTER IV.

BÉLUS.

MADAME DE LA MOTTE was not wrong in thinking that the cabriolet which she saw going away contained the two sisters of charity. They had, in fact, found waiting for them near the house a cabriolet, of the style common at that period, — that is to say, with high wheels, a light body, elevated dasher, and a convenient seat for the groom who rode behind.

This cabriolet drawn by a magnificent bay horse of Irish breed, short-tailed and plump, had been brought to the Rue Saint Claude by the same servant who had driven the sledge, and whom the sister of charity had called Weber, as we have stated above.

Weber was holding the horse by the bit when the ladies arrived, and was trying to restrain the impatience of the spirited animal who with nervous foot pawed the snow, gradually hardening since the coming on of night. When the two ladies appeared, —

"Matame," said Weber, "I hat intented to pring Scibio, who is ferry gentle and eassy to manage. But Scibio hort von of his legs last efening. Only Pélus vas left, and Pélus, he pe hart to manage."

"Oh, for me, Weber," said the elder of the two ladies, "you know that is of no consequence; I have a strong hand, and am used to driving."

"I know dat Matame trives ferry vell, but de roats be ferry pad. Vere is Matame going?"

"To Versailles."

"Py de poolfards, den?"

"By no means, Weber. It freezes, and the boulevards will be covered with ice. The streets will be better, thanks to the thousands of pedestrians who keep the snow from freezing. Come, quick, Weber, quick!"

Weber held the horse for the ladies to get in, then jumped up behind, and they set off at a rapid pace.

"Well, Andrée, what do you think of the countess?" asked the elder lady.

"I think, Madame," she replied, "that Madame de La Motte is poor and unfortunate."

"She has good manners, has she not?"

"Yes, doubtless."

"You are somewhat cold about her, Andrée."

"If I must speak sincerely, there is a look of cunning in her face that does not please me."

"Oh, you are always difficult to please, Andrée; to please you, one must have every good quality. Now I find the little countess interesting and simple, both in her pride and in her humility."

"It is fortunate for her, Madame, that she has succeeded in pleasing your —"

"Take care!" cried the lady, at the same time endeavoring to check her horse, which nearly ran over a street porter at the corner of the Rue Saint Antoine.

"Dake gare!" shouted Weber with the voice of a stentor, and the cabriolet continued its course, followed by the imprecations of the man who had so narrowly escaped; and several other voices being added to his, a furious clamor was raised. But in a few seconds Bélus placed between his mistress and these blasphemers all the distance between the Rue Sainte Catherine and the Place Baudoyer.

There the street divides, and the skilful driver continued her rapid course down the Rue de la Tixéranderie, a narrow street, crowded, and not at all aristocratic. And therefore, notwithstanding her often repeated, "Take care!" notwithstanding Weber's loud roars of warning, one could hear only the furious cries of the foot-passengers, "Oh, the cabriolet! Down with the cabriolet!"

Bélus kept his course, and his driver, though her hand was delicate as a child's, urged him, rapidly and skilfully, through the pools of melted snow or over the more dangerous ice. And yet not the slightest accident had happened. A brilliant lantern threw its light forward upon the course, though this was an excess of precaution which the police had not yet required. No accident, we say, had happened. No passing carriage had been hit, not a post grazed, not a foot-passenger hurt. It was wonderful driving, and yet cries and threats were constantly vociferated.

The cabriolet passed with the same rapidity and the same good fortune through the Rue Saint Médéric, the Rue Saint Martin, and the Rue Aubry-le-Boucher.

It may seem to our readers that in the more civilized quarters of the city the hatred shown toward the aristocratic equipage would become less ferocious. On the contrary, Bélus had but just entered the Rue de la Ferronerie when Weber, always pursued by the vociferations of the populace, noticed that groups were formed as the cabriolet went by. Some had even the appearance of running after it as if to stop it.

But Weber was unwilling to disturb his mistress. He observed her steadiness and skill, and how adroitly she glided through among all those obstacles, animate and inanimate, which are at once the despair and the triumph of the Parisian coachman. As to Bélus, steady on his limbs of steel, he had not once slipped, so careful was the guiding hand in directing his course among the inequalities of the surface.

The vociferations of the people increased. The lady who held the reins, attributing that hostility to some trivial cause, such as the severity of the weather and the general discontent, resolved to get through with the annoyance as soon as possible. She clicked with her tongue, and on that signal Bélus jumped, and changed his pace to a rapid trot. The shops seemed to fly by them; the foot-passengers leaped aside. The warning shouts, "Take care! Take care!" were continued.

The cabriolet had almost reached the Palais-Royal, and had just passed the end of the Rue du Coq-Saint Honoré where one of the finest of the snow obelisks still proudly stood, though its top was narrowed by the thaw, — it was like a stick of candy which children draw to a sharp point by sucking. This obelisk was surmounted by a glorious ornament of ribbons, — somewhat faded, to be sure, — which supported a placard on which the scrivener of that quarter had written in large characters the following quatrain, hung between two lanterns: —

"Queen, whose beauty is beyond thy grace,
Near a good king take here thy proper place.
If this frail structure be of snow and ice,
Our love for thee is not at all like this."

It was there that Bélus encountered the first serious obstacle. The obelisk, which they were just then lighting up, had attracted a crowd of spectators, who had massed themselves so that it was impossible to go through them at a trot. Bélus was obliged to walk.

But the crowd had seen Bélus coming on at lightning-speed; they had heard the pursuing cries; and although in presence of this obstacle he had stopped short, the sight of the cabriolet seemed to produce upon the crowd the worst possible effect. However, this time the crowd opened and gave way.

The next obstacle was at the gates of the Palais-Royal, where, in a court-yard which had been thrown open, were a host of beggars crowding round fires which had been lighted there, and receiving soup, which the servants of Monsieur le Duc d'Orleans were distributing to them in earthen basins. But as in Paris a crowd collects to see everything, the number of the spectators of this scene far exceeded that of the actors.

The cabriolet, having surmounted the first obstacle, was obliged to stop at the second, like a ship in the midst of breakers. At the same time the cries which till then the two women had heard only as a vague, confused noise, came to them distinctly from the midst of the mob: "Down with the cabriolet! Down with those that crush the poor!"

"Can it be that those cries are addressed to us?" said the elder lady to her companion.

"Indeed, Madame, I fear so," replied the latter.

"Have we, then, run over any one?"

"I am sure we have not."

"Down with the cabriolet! Down with the crushers!" cried the mob, furiously.

A crowd soon gathered round them, and some even seized Bélus by the reins, who but little pleased by the touch of those rude hands pawed the ground and foamed with rage.

"To the commissary! to the commissary!" cried a voice.

The two ladies looked at each other in terror. Then a thousand voices repeated: "To the commissary! to the commissary!"

Curious heads peeped under the hood of the cabriolet. Remarks began to circulate through the crowd.

"Hold! they are women," said one.

"Yes; Soubise's dolls, D'Hennin's mistresses."

"Opera girls, doubtless," said others, "who think they have a right to crush the poor, because they receive ten thousand francs a month to pay hospital expenses."

A general shout hailed these words.

The two ladies manifested different emotions in that confusion.

The younger lady sank back trembling with fear; the other bent resolutely forward, with frowning brows and compressed lips.

"Oh, Madame!" cried her companion, drawing her back, "for Heaven's sake, take care!"

"To the commissary! to the commissary!" the mob continued crying furiously. "Let us know who they are."

"Ah, Madame, we are lost!" said the younger to her companion.

"Courage, Andrée! courage!" replied the other.

"But they will see you, will recognize you, perhaps."

"Look through the windows, and see if Weber is still there."

"He is trying to get down, but the mob surrounds him. Ah, here he comes."

"Weber," said the lady, in German, "help us to get out."

The man vigorously pushed aside those nearest the carriage, and opened the door. The ladies sprang lightly to the ground. Meantime the mob gave its attention to the horse and the cabriolet, the body of which they began to destroy.

"What, in Heaven's name, does it all mean? Do you understand it, Weber?" said the elder lady, still in German.

"Upon my word, no, Matame," he replied, much more at ease while speaking in his native tongue, and struggling to free a passage for them to pass.

"But they are not men, they are wild beasts," continued the lady; "with what can they reproach me?"

She was answered by a voice, whose polite and gentlemanly tone contrasted strangely with the savage murmurs of the people, and which said, in excellent German, "They reproach you, Madame, with having braved the police order which appeared this morning, and which prohibited, until spring, the use of cabriolets, which are always dangerous, but are especially fatal in this frost, when people can hardly escape being run over."

The lady turned around to see whence came that courteous voice in the midst of all those threatening cries. She perceived a young officer, who, in order to approach her, must have battled as valiantly as Weber had done to maintain his position. The graceful and distinguished appearance, the lofty stature and the martial air of the young man pleased the lady, who hastened to reply, in German, "Oh, mon Dieu! Monsieur, I was entirely ignorant of this order."

"You are a foreigner, Madame?" inquired the young officer.

"Yes, Monsieur; but tell me what I must do? They are destroying my cabriolet."

"You must let them destroy it, Madame, and take advantage of that time to escape. The people are furious just now against the rich, who display their luxury in presence of the general misery; and on the pretext of your breaking this regulation, would conduct you before the commissary."

"Oh, never!" cried Andrée.

"Then," said the officer, laughing, "profit by the space which I shall make in the crowd and vanish."

These words were spoken in an easy manner which enabled the strangers to understand that the officer had heard the remarks made about the mistresses of Soubise and D'Hennin. But it was not a time to be punctilious.

"Give us your arm, then, Monsieur, to the nearest place where we can hire a carriage," said the elder lady, in a voice full of authority.

"I was going to make your horse rear, and thereby clear you a passage," said the young man, who did not much wish to take the charge of escorting them through the crowd; "the people will become yet more enraged if they hear us speaking in a language unknown to them."

"Weber," cried the lady, in a firm voice, "make Bélus rear to disperse the crowd."

"And then, Matame?"

"Remain till we are gone."

"Bud dey vill destroy de garriage."

"Let them; what does that matter? Save Bélus if you can, but yourself above all."

"Yes, Matame;" and at the same moment he tickled the irritable Irish horse, who sprang into the midst of the crowd, and overturned the most eager among them, who were clinging to the bridle and to the shafts. At that moment the terror and confusion were very great.

"Your arm, Monsieur!" again said the lady, to the officer. "Come on, little one," turning to Andrée.

"Let us go then, courageous woman," murmured, in a low voice, the young officer, who immediately gave his arm, with real admiration, to her who asked for it.

In a few minutes he had conducted them to a cab-stand; but the men were all asleep on their seats, and the horses, with drooping heads and half-closed eyes, were awaiting their meagre evening rations.

CHAPTER V.

THE ROAD TO VERSAILLES.

THE ladies were free from the crowd for the present; but there was some danger that they might be followed and recognized, when the same tumult would doubtless be renewed, and escape a second time more difficult. The young officer knew this, and therefore hastened to awaken a coachman, held to his seat by the cold even more than by sleep. The cold was so intense that, contrary to the custom of coachmen generally on the alert to rob one another of customers, not one of the automedons at twenty-four sous an hour made any movement, — not even the one to whom the officer addressed himself. He seized the coachman by the collar of his poor overcoat, and shook him so violently that at last he roused him from his stupor.

"Holloa! Ho!" cried the young man in his ear, seeing that he gave signs of life.

"Here, Master, here," said the coachman, dreaming still, and reeling on his box like a drunken man.

"Where do you wish to go, ladies?" asked the officer.

"To Versailles," said the elder lady, still speaking German.

"To Versailles!" cried the coachman; "you said 'to Versailles'?"

"Certainly."

"Oh, to Versailles!" repeated the coachman; "four miles and a half over this ice. No, I would rather not."

"We will pay well," said the lady.

This was repeated to the coachman, in French, by the young officer.

"But how much?" said the coachman; "you see it is not only going, I must come back again."

"A louis; is that enough?" said the younger lady, to the officer, who, turning to the coachman, said, "These ladies offer you a louis."

"Well, that will do, though I risk breaking my horses' legs."

"Why, you rascal, you are entitled to only three francs for going from here to the Château de la Muette, which is half-way. You can see by a little calculation that if you are paid for going and for returning you are entitled to only twelve francs, and you are offered twenty-four."

"Oh, do not stop to bargain!" said the elder lady; "two louis, three louis, twenty louis, provided he will start at once and go on without stopping."

"One is enough, Madame," replied the officer; and then, turning to the coachman, "Come down, you rogue, and open the door."

"I will be paid first," said the man.

"You will!" said the officer, fiercely.

"It is my right."

The officer made a forward movement.

"Oh, let us pay!" said the lady, putting her hand in her pocket. She turned pale. "Oh, mon Dieu!" she said, in a low tone, "I have not my purse!"

"Really?"

"And you, Andrée, have you yours?"

The young woman searched, in her turn, with the same anxiety.

"I — I have not mine either!"

"Search all your pockets."

"It is useless!" cried the young woman, with vexation, for she saw that the officer was observing them, and that the coachman was opening his big mouth in a grin of self-congratulation over his precaution. The two ladies searched themselves in vain. Neither of them could find a sou. The officer saw them get impatient, turn red, and grow pale. The situation was becoming complicated.

The ladies were about to offer a gold chain as a pledge, when the young officer, to spare them that humiliation, drew out a louis and offered it to the man, who thereupon got down and opened the door.

The ladies thanked him warmly, and got in.

"And now, you rascal, drive these ladies carefully and honestly."

The ladies looked at each other in terror; they could not bear to see their protector leave them.

"Oh, Madame!" said Andrée, "do not let him go away."

"But why not? We will ask for his address, and return him his louis to-morrow, with a little note of thanks, which you shall write."

"But, Madame, suppose the coachman should not keep faith with us, and should turn us out half-way, what would become of us?"

"Oh, we will take his number!"

"Yes, Madame, I do not deny that you could have him punished afterwards; but meanwhile you would not reach Versailles, and what would they think?"

The elder of the two ladies reflected. "It is true," she said.

The officer advanced to take leave.

"Monsieur," said Andrée, "one word more, if you please."

"At your orders, Madame," replied the officer, visibly annoyed, but maintaining in his manner, in his tone, and even in the accent of his voice, the most exquisite politeness.

"Monsieur," Andrée continued, "you cannot refuse us one more favor after serving us so much?"

"What is it, Madame?"

"We are afraid of the coachman, who seems so unwilling to go."

"You need not fear," replied he; "I have his number, and if he does not behave well, apply to me."

"To you, Monsieur?" said Andrée, in French, forgetting herself; "we do not even know your name."

"You speak French!" exclaimed the young man, stupefied; "and you have been condemning me all this time to blunder on in German. Oh, really, Madame, that was unkind!"

"Excuse us, Monsieur," said the other lady, coming to Andrée's rescue; "but you must see that, though not perhaps foreigners, we are strangers in Paris, and above all, out of place in a hired carriage. You are sufficiently a man of the world to see that we are in an unfamiliar situation. To oblige us half-way would be only to disoblige us. To be less discreet than you have been up to the present moment would be indiscreet. We judge well of you, Monsieur; be pleased not to judge us unkindly. If you can do us a service do it without reserve, or permit us to thank you and apply elsewhere."

"Madame," said the officer, struck with the tone of the unknown lady, at once charming and noble, "dispose of me."

"Then, Monsieur, have the kindness to get into the carriage with us and accompany us to Versailles."

The officer instantly placed himself opposite to them, and directed the man to drive on.

After proceeding in silence for some little time he began to feel himself surrounded with delicate and delicious perfumes, and gradually began to think better of the ladies' position. "They are," thought he, "ladies who have been detained late at some rendezvous, and are now anxious to regain Versailles, a little frightened and a little ashamed. But, then, how does it happen that these ladies," continued the officer, speaking to himself, "if indeed they are ladies of some distinction, are found riding in a cabriolet, and driving? Oh, to that there is an answer! The cabriolet was too narrow for three persons, and two ladies would not incommode themselves to place a lackey between them. But no money upon either of them! — a serious objection which calls for reflection. However, there was a servant behind, and probably he carried the purse. The carriage, which by this time is broken in pieces, was certainly a very elegant one; and the horse could not have been worth less than one hundred and fifty louis, — therefore they must be rich, so that the accidental want of money proves nothing. But why speak a foreign language when they must be French? However, that at least shows a good education. It is not common for women of intrigue to speak so pure German, and French like native Parisians; besides, there is an air of distinction about them. The supplication of the younger one was touching, and the request of the other was nobly imperious. Indeed, I begin to feel it dangerous to pass two or three hours in a carriage with two such pretty women, — pretty and discreet also; for they do not speak, but wait for me to begin."

On their part the ladies were doubtless thinking of the young officer as he was thinking of them; for just as he had arrived at these conclusions, the elder lady said to her companion, but this time in English, —

"Really, my dear, this coachman crawls along; we shall never reach Versailles. Our poor companion must be bored to death."

"Particularly," answered Andrée, smiling, "as our conversation has not been very amusing."

"Do you not think he has a most distinguished air?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Besides, he wears the uniform of a naval officer, and all naval officers are of good family. He looks well in it too, for he is very handsome, is he not?"

The young lady was about to reply, and doubtless in the same flattering strain, when she was stopped by a gesture of the officer, who said, in excellent English, "Your pardon, ladies, but I must tell you that I understand English perfectly. I do not, however, know Spanish; therefore if you are acquainted with and like to speak in that language, you at least will be sure of not being understood."

"Oh, Monsieur," replied the elder lady, laughing, "we had no harm to say of you, as you must have perceived; we will therefore not be too ceremonious, and if we have anything to say we will say it in French."

"Thanks, Madame; but if my presence be irksome to you —"

"You cannot suppose that, Monsieur, since we begged you to accompany us."

"Exacted it, even," said the younger of the two ladies.

"Oh, Madame, you make me ashamed. Pardon me my momentary hesitation; but you know Paris, do you not? Paris is full of snares and deceptions."

"You, then, took us for — Come, be frank."

"Monsieur took us for snares, that is all."

"Oh, ladies!" said the young man, quite humiliated, "I assure you, no such thought entered my mind."

"But what is the matter? The coach stops."

"I will see, Madame."

"Oh! I think we are overturning; take care, Monsieur!"

And the hand of the younger lady, suddenly extended, fell on the young man's shoulder. The pressure of the hand thrilled him, and by a movement quite natural, he tried to take hold of it; but Andrée, who had yielded to a momentary impulse of fear, had already thrown herself back again in the carriage. He therefore got out and found the coachman engaged in raising one of his horses, which had fallen on the ice.

The horse, with his aid, was soon on its legs again, and they pursued their way. It seemed, however, that this little interruption had destroyed the intimacy which had begun to spring up, for after the ladies had asked and been told the cause of their detention, silence again fell upon the trio of travellers.

The officer, moved by the touch of that warm and palpitating hand, wished at least to have a foot as a substitute; he therefore extended his leg, but with all his skill he encountered nothing, or rather he had the mortification of perceiving that what he touched was withdrawn from him. Once when he had barely grazed the foot of the elder lady, she said to him, with the greatest coolness, "Pardon me, Monsieur, I am very much in your way, am I not?"

He colored up to the ears, and felt thankful to the darkness, which hid his blushes. After this he desisted, and remained perfectly still, as if he were in a church, fearing even to breathe, and shrinking back into the corner of the carriage. But by degrees, and in spite of himself, a strange impression invaded his thought, his whole being. He felt the presence of the two charming women without touching them; he saw them without looking at them. Gradually becoming accustomed to their proximity, it seemed to him that a portion of their existence had united with his. He would have given the world to renew the conversation; which, however, he did not dare to do, for he was afraid of uttering platitudes, — he, who on their departure from Paris even disdained to utter one of the commonplace phrases current in the language of society. He was afraid of appearing simple or impertinent in the eyes of these women, whom but an hour before he thought he was honoring too much by giving them a louis and showing them ordinary politeness.

In a word, as all sympathies in this life are explained by the affinities of fluids brought into contact at the right time, a powerful magnetism, emanating from the perfumes and youthful warmth of those three bodies brought together by chance, controlled the young man, and filled his thoughts while dilating his heart. Thus sometimes the most real, the sweetest, the most ardent passions are born, live, and die in the space of a few moments. They have charm because ephemeral; they have strength because they are restrained.

The officer said not another word. The ladies conversed in whispers.

However, as he was all the time listening, he now and then caught a word to which his imagination lent some sort of meaning. This was what he heard: "The late hour . . . the gates . . . pretext for the journey — "

The carriage stopped again. This time it was not on account of a fallen horse or a broken wheel. After three hours of courageous effort the worthy coachman had succeeded in warming his hands, — that is to say, he had lashed his horses into a foam and had reached Versailles, whose long avenues appeared gloomy and deserted under the reddish rays of the street-lamps, which, whitened by the frost, looked like a double file of ghosts.

The young man understood that they had reached the end of their journey. By what magic, then, had the time seemed to him so short?

The coachman bent down to the front window. "Master," said he, "we are at Versailles."

"Where do you wish to go, ladies?" asked the officer.

"To the Place d'Armes."

"To the Place d'Armes!" the young man called out to the coachman.

"I must drive to the Place d'Armes?" said the latter.

"Yes, certainly, since you are so directed."

"There will be a little tip for that?" asked the Auvergnese, sniggering.

"Go on."

The cracking of the whip-lash was heard again.

"I must certainly say something," thought the officer. "I shall be taken for an imbecile, after having been considered impertinent."

"Ladies," he said, with some hesitation still, "you have reached home."

"Thanks to your generous aid."

"What trouble we have given you!" said the younger of the two ladies.

"Oh, I have more than forgotten it, Madame."

"Well, Monsieur, we shall not forget. Your name, if you please, Monsieur."

"My name? Oh!"

"It is the second time you have been asked for it. Take care! And you do not mean to bestow a louis upon us, do you?"

"Oh, Madame, if that is it," said the young man, rather piqued, "I yield; I am the Comte de Charny, and as Madame has already remarked, a naval officer."

"Charny," repeated the elder lady, in a tone that meant, "Very good; I shall not forget it."

"Georges, Georges de Charny," the officer added.

"Georges!" the younger lady murmured.

"And you live —"

"Hôtel des Princes, Rue de Richelieu."

The coach stopped. The elder lady opened the door and jumped out quickly, holding out a hand to her companion.

"But at least," said he, preparing to follow them, "take my arm, ladies; you are not yet at your own home, and the Place d'Armes is not a residence."

"Do not stir!" said both ladies, speaking together.

"What! I must not stir?"

"No; remain in the coach."

"You cannot walk alone at this time of night; it is impossible!"

"Now, you see," said the elder lady, gayly, "after almost refusing to oblige us, you wish to be too obliging."

"But, Madame —"

"Monsieur, remain to the end a loyal and gallant cavalier. We thank you, Monsieur de Charny, with all our hearts; and since you are, as I just said, a loyal and gallant cavalier, we will not even ask your word —"

"To do what, Madame?"

"To shut the door, and order the man to drive back to Paris; which you will do, — will you not? — without even looking back at us."

"You are right, ladies, and my word would be useless. Driver, we will return, my friend;" and he put a second louis into the coachman's brawny hand.

The worthy Auvergnese trembled with joy. "Morbleu!" said he, "the horses may founder if they choose!"

"To be sure; they are paid for," murmured the officer.

The carriage rolled on, and rapidly. The noise of the wheels covered the young man's sigh, — a voluptuous sigh; for the sybarite had stretched himself on the cushions still warm with the contact of the two lovely, unknown ladies.

As to them, they remained motionless till the carriage was out of sight, and then took their way toward the castle.

CHAPTER VI.

LAURENT.

JUST at the moment when the travellers were starting on their way, gusts of wind bore to their ears, from the church of Saint Louis, the striking of a clock.

"Oh, mon Dieu! a quarter to twelve," they both cried out together.

"See, all the gates are shut," said the younger.

"Oh, that is nothing, dear Andrée; for if they were open, we would not go in here. Come, quick! quick! Let us go by way of the reservoirs." And they turned to the right, where there was a private entrance to the gardens.

When they arrived there, "The door is shut, Andrée," said the elder lady, rather uneasily.

"Let us knock, Madame."

"No, we will call. Laurent must be waiting for me; I told him that perhaps I should return late."

"Well, then, I will call," said Andrée, approaching the door.

"Who is there?" said a voice from inside.

"Oh, that is not Laurent's voice!" said the younger lady, in alarm. "No, indeed!"

The other lady advanced, and called softly, "Laurent!"

No answer.

"Laurent!" again she called, knocking.

"There is no Laurent here," replied the voice, rudely.

"But," said Andrée, peremptorily, "whether you are Laurent or not, open the gate."

"I will not open it."

"But, my friend, you should know that Laurent always opens to us."

"I have nothing to do with Laurent; I have my orders."

"Who are you, then?"

"Who am I?"

"Yes."

"Who are you?" said the voice.

The question was rudely put, but it was no time for ceremony; they must answer.

"We are ladies of her Majesty's suite; we lodge in the castle, and we wish to get home."

"Well, I, mesdames, am a Swiss of the Salischamade company, and I shall do just the opposite of what Laurent would do; for I shall leave you outside the gate."

"Oh!" murmured the ladies, one of whom pressed the hands of the other, with a movement of anger. Then making an effort over herself, she said: "My friend, I understand that you are obeying orders, and I do not quarrel with you for that, — it is a soldier's duty; only, do me the favor to call Laurent. He cannot be far away."

"I must not leave my post."

"Then send some one."

"I have no one to send."

"For pity's sake!"

"Eh, mordieu! Madame, sleep in the town. That is no great matter. Oh, if they should shut the door of the barracks in my face I should soon find a sleeping-place, you may be sure."

"Grenadier, listen," said the elder of the two ladies, with resolution; "twenty louis for you if you open."

"And ten years in irons. No, I thank you; forty-eight francs a year are not enough for that."

"I will have you appointed sergeant."

"Yes; and he who gave me the order will have me shot. I thank you!"

"Who, then, gave you the order?"

"The king."

"The king!" both ladies exclaimed, with terror; "oh, we are lost!" The younger lady seemed almost distracted.

"Let us see, let us see," said the elder, "is there no other gate?"

"Oh, Madame! if they have closed this one they have closed the others. And if we do not find Laurent here, at his usual post, where do you think we can find him? Oh, no! it has been all arranged."

"It is true. You are right. Andrée, Andrée, this is a frightful trick on the part of the king. Oh! oh!" To these last words the lady gave an accent of scorn and threatening.

This gate of the reservoirs was built so far into the thick wall as to make of the recess a sort of vestibule, and on each side of this vestibule there was a stone-bench. The ladies sank down on one of these benches, in a state of agitation bordering on despair. They could see the light under the gate, and could hear the steps of the sentinel, and the noise he made with his gun as he carried it to his shoulder or rested it on the ground. Beyond that thin obstacle of oak, safety; on the outside shame, scandal, almost death.

"Oh, to-morrow, to-morrow, when all will be discovered!" murmured the elder lady.

"But you will need only to state the truth."

"Will any one believe it?"

"You have proofs. Madame, the soldier will not stay here all night," said the younger lady, who seemed to gain courage in proportion as her companion lost it; "at some time during the night he will be relieved, and his successor will perhaps be more considerate. Let us wait."

"Yes, but the patrol will come at midnight, and I shall be found waiting outside the gates, — hiding myself. It is infamous! See, Andrée, the blood mounts to my face; I am suffocating!"

"Oh, take courage, Madame! — you who are always so brave. I, just now so weak, I am supporting you."

"There is some plot under all this, Andrée, and we are the victims of it. This never happened before; this gate has never been closed. It will kill me, Andrée; I am dying!" And she threw herself back as if she were really suffocating.

At this moment a step resounded upon the dry, white pavement of Versailles, so little trodden in these days. At the same time the gay and joyous voice of a young man was heard singing one of those songs the affected style of which belongs particularly to the period we are endeavoring to describe.

"That voice!" cried the two ladies, at the same time.

"I recognize it," said the elder.

"It is that of —"

The young man continued his song.

"It is he!" whispered the lady who had been so much agitated, into the ear of Andrée; "it is he! he will save us."

A young man, wrapped up in a fur riding-coat, came quickly up, and without noticing them knocked at the door and called, "Laurent."

"Brother," said the elder lady, touching him on the shoulder.

"The queen!" cried he, starting back and taking off his hat.

"Hush! Good-evening, brother."

"Good-evening, Madame; good-evening, sister. You are not alone?"

"No; I am with Mademoiselle de Taverney."

"Ah! Good-evening, Mademoiselle."

"Monseigneur," murmured Andrée.

"Are you going out, ladies?" he asked.

"No."

"Then you are going in?"

"We would go in if we could."

"Have you not called Laurent?"

"Certainly we have."

"Well?"

"Just call Laurent and you will see."

The young man, whom the reader has perhaps already recognized as the Comte d'Artois, approached and again called, "Laurent," at the same time knocking on the door.

"Good! the play begins again. I warn you," answered the voice of the guard from within, "that if you trouble me any more, I will go and call my commanding officer."

"Who is this?" asked the count, turning round in astonishment to the queen.

"A guard who has been substituted for Laurent, that is all."

"By whom?"

"By the king."

"The king?"

"Certainly, the man told us so himself."

"And with special instructions?"

"Most strict, apparently."

"Diable! we must capitulate."

"How can we?"

"We will give the fellow some money."

"I have already offered it, and he has refused to take it."

"Offer him promotion."

"I have offered that also, but he would not listen."

"Then there is but one way."

"What?"

"I must make a noise."

"You will compromise us; my dear Charles, I entreat you!"

"Not the least in the world; you keep in the background. I will knock like a deaf man, I will cry out like a blind man; they will open at last, and you can slip in after me."

"Try, then."

The young prince began calling Laurent, knocking at the door and striking with his sword, until at last the guard cried out in a rage, "Ah, well! if you are going to carry on like that, I will call my officer."

"Eh, pardieu! call, you rascal, that is just what I want."

They soon heard other steps approaching on the other side of the door. The queen and Andrée kept close behind the Comte d'Artois, ready to slip in if the door should open; then they heard the guard explain the cause of the noise. "Lieutenant," he said, "there are some ladies with a gentleman who has just called me a rascal. They insist on entering."

"Well, as we belong to the palace," said the count, "what is there surprising in that?"

"It is no doubt a natural wish, Monsieur, but it is forbidden," replied the officer.

"Forbidden! by whom? morbleu!"

"By the king."

"I beg pardon; but the king would not wish an officer of the palace to sleep outside."

"Monsieur, it is not for me to scrutinize the intentions of the king; I must obey his orders, that is all."

"Come, Lieutenant, open the door; we cannot talk through this oak."

"Monsieur, I repeat to you that my orders are to keep it shut; and if you are an officer, as you say you are, you ought to know what an order is."

"Lieutenant, you are speaking to the colonel of a regiment."

"Excuse me then, Colonel, but my order is a formal one."

"But they cannot concern a prince. Come, Monsieur, a prince cannot sleep outside, and I am a prince."

"My prince, I am in despair; but the king has ordered —"

"The king has ordered you to turn away his brother like a beggar or a robber? I am the Comte d'Artois, Monsieur. Mordieu! you run a great risk by keeping me freezing at the gate."

"Monseigneur le Comte d'Artois," said the lieutenant, "God is my witness that I would shed every drop of my blood for your Royal Highness; but the king did me the honor to tell me, when he confided to me the care of this gate, to open it to no one, not even to himself, the king, if he presented himself after eleven o'clock. Therefore, Monseigneur, I ask your pardon humbly; but I am a soldier, and if, instead of you, I should see behind this gate her Majesty the queen benumbed with cold, I should answer her Majesty as I have just had the pain of answering you."

Having said this, the officer, after respectfully bidding the prince good-night, turned away, and went back to his post.

As for the soldier who was standing against the gate itself, he did not dare to breathe, and his heart beat so violently that the Comte d'Artois, by putting his back against the gate, might have felt the pulsations.

"We are lost!" said the queen.

"Do they know that you are out?" asked the count.

"Alas! I know not."

"Perhaps, then, this order is directed against me; the king knows I often go out at night, and stay late. Madame la Comtesse d'Artois must have heard something, and complained to him; hence this tyrannical order."

"Ah, no, brother! I thank you with all my heart for the delicacy with which you try to reassure me; but I feel that it is against me that these precautions are taken."

"Impossible, sister! the king has too much esteem —"

"Meanwhile, I am left at the door; and to-morrow a frightful scandal will be the result of a most innocent affair. I know well I have an enemy near the king."

"It may be so; however, I have an idea."

"An idea? tell it quickly."

"An idea which will make your enemy look more stupid than an ass hung by his own halter."

"Oh, if you can but save us from the ridicule of this position, it is all I ask!"

"If I can save you! of course I can. Oh, I am not more foolish than he, although he is more learned than I!"

"Than who?"

"Ah, pardieu! the Comte de Provence."

"Ah, then, you also see that he is my enemy!"

"Is he not the enemy of all who are young and beautiful, of all who can do — what he is not able to do?"

"Count, I believe you know something about this order!"

"Perhaps; but do not let us stop here, or we shall perish with the cold. Come with me, dear sister."

"Where?"

"You shall see; to some place where at least you will be warm. Come, and on the way I will tell you what I know about this closing of the gate. Ah, Monsieur de Provence, my dear and unworthy brother! Take my arm, sister, and you the other, Mademoiselle de Taverney, and let us turn to the right;" and they began their walk.

"You were saying of Monsieur de Provence —" said the queen.

"Well, this evening, after the king's supper, he came into the grand cabinet. He had been talking all day to the Comte de Haga, and you had not been seen —"

"At two o'clock I left to go to Paris."

"I knew that well. The king, allow me to tell you, dear sister, was thinking no more of you than of Haroun-al-Raschid, or his Vizier Giaffar, and was talking geography. I listened with some impatience, for I also wanted to go out. Ah, pardon me! we probably did not go out for the same purpose; so that I am wrong —"

"Go on; say what you please."

"Let us turn to the left."

"Where are we going?"

"Oh, close by; take care, there is a heap of snow! Mademoiselle de Taverney, if you leave my arm you will certainly fall! But to return to the king; he was thinking of nothing but latitude and longitude, when Monsieur de Provence said to him, 'I should like to pay my respects to the queen.'"

"Ah!" exclaimed Marie Antoinette.

"'The queen has supper in her own apartments,' replied the king. 'Oh, I thought she was at Paris,' added my brother. 'No, she is in her apartments,' said the king, quietly. 'I have just come from there, and been denied to her,' said Monsieur de Provence. Then I saw the king frown. He dismissed my brother and me, and doubtless went to make inquiries. Louis is jealous by fits, you know; he must have asked to see you, and when they refused him admission he suspected something."

"Yes; Madame de Misery had orders to do so."

"That is it; and to assure himself of your absence, the king has given that strict order which turns us out of doors."

"Oh, it is shameful treatment. Confess, is it not?"

"Indeed, I think so; but here we are."

"This house?"

"Does it displease you, sister?"

"Oh, I do not say that, — it is charming, on the contrary. But your servants?"

"Well!"

"Should they see me."

"Come in, sister, and I will guarantee that no one sees you."

"Not even the one who will open the door?"

"Not even that one."

"Impossible!"

"We will try," said he, laughing. And he stretched out his hand to the door.

The queen caught his arm. "I beg you, brother, take care."

The prince pressed with his other hand upon an elegantly sculptured panel. The door opened.

The queen could not repress a movement of fear.

"Enter, I pray you," said he; "there is no one near."

The queen looked at Andrée with the expression of one who faces a danger; then she crossed the threshold, with one of those gestures so charming among women, and whose meaning was, "God have mercy!" And the door closed after them.

She found herself in a stuccoed vestibule with marble columns, small, but in perfect taste. The floor was of mosaic work, representing bouquets of flowers, while numerous rose-trees on marble brackets scented the air with a perfume as delicious as at that time of the year it was rare.

A gentle heat and delicate odors so captivated the senses that when they reached the vestibule, the two ladies forgot not only a portion of their fears but also a portion of their scruples.

"So far well; we are under shelter," said the queen; "and it must be confessed the shelter is quite commodious. But there is one thing, brother, you had better attend to at once."

"What is that?"

"The removal of your servants."

"Oh! nothing easier." And the prince, seizing a bell-pull placed in the fluting of a column, a single stroke was immediately heard, which vibrated mysteriously through the lower part of the house.

The two ladies uttered a cry of terror.

"Is that the way in which you send away your servants, brother?" asked the queen. "On the contrary I should think that you were calling them."

"If I should ring a second time, yes, some one would come; but as I touched the bell only once, be easy, sister, no one will come."

The queen began to laugh.

"Well, you are a man of precaution," said she.

"Now, dear sister," continued the prince, "you cannot live in a vestibule; will you take the trouble to walk up stairs?"

"We obey," said the queen; "the genius of the house does not seem very malevolent." And she followed the prince upstairs.

Their steps could not be heard on the Aubusson carpet which covered the stairs. Having reached the first story the prince touched another bell, the sound of which again startled the queen and Mademoiselle de Taverney, who were taken by surprise. But they were doubly astonished when they saw the doors of this story open of their own accord.

"Really, Andrée," said the queen, "I am beginning to tremble; how is it with you?"

"Oh, Madame, I shall follow fearlessly wherever your Majesty goes."

"Nothing can be more simple, sister, than that which is happening," said the young prince; "the door opposite you is the door of your apartment. See." And he pointed out to the queen a charming apartment of which we cannot avoid giving a description.

A little antechamber finished in rosewood, with two dressing-tables by Boule, ceiling painted by Boucher, and a floor of rosewood, led to a boudoir hung with white cashmere embroidered in flowers by the most skilful artists. The furniture of this boudoir was a tapestry worked in silk, and shaded with that art which rendered a Gobelins tapestry of that period equivalent to a picture by a master. Beyond the boudoir was a beautiful bedchamber in blue, hung with curtains of lace and silk, a sumptuous bed in a dark alcove, a bright fire in the fire-place of white marble, twelve perfumed candles burning in the candelabra of Clodion, a screen of blue lacquer with Chinese figures in gold, — such were the marvels which met the eyes of the ladies as they timidly entered this elegant apartment.

Not a living being was to be seen; everywhere warmth, light, without their being able to discover the causes of such delightful effects.

The queen, who had entered the boudoir with reserve, now paused a moment on the threshold of the bedchamber.

The prince apologized in a very polite manner for the necessity which required him to confide to his sister a secret unworthy of her.

The queen replied by a half-smile, which expressed more than any words she could have spoken.

"Sister," added the Comte d'Artois, "this apartment is my bachelor home; I alone enter here, and I always enter alone."

"Almost always," said the queen.

"No, always."

"Ah!" said the queen.

"Moreover," he continued, "there are in this boudoir a sofa and an easy-chair upon which many times, when night overtakes me at the chase, I have slept as well as in my bed."

"I understand now," said the queen, "why Madame la Comtesse is sometimes uneasy."

"Confess, however, that if she is uneasy about me to-night, it will be without reason."

"Of to-night I say nothing, but other nights — "

"He who is wrong once is always wrong."

"Let us stop talking," said the queen, sitting down in an easy-chair. "I am very tired," she said, "are not you, Andrée?"

"Oh! I can scarcely stand, and if your Majesty permits — "

"Indeed, you look pale, Mademoiselle," said the count.

"Do not stand on ceremony, my dear," said the queen; "sit down, or even go to bed. Monsieur le Comte gives us up this room, — do you not, Charles?"

"For your exclusive use, Madame."

"One moment, Count. If you go away, how can we recall you?"

"You will not need me, sister; once established, you are mistress of this house."

"But there are other rooms?"

"Certainly, there is a dining-room which I advise you to visit."

"With a table ready spread, doubtless."

"Why, certainly; and Mademoiselle de Taverney, who seems to me to need it much, will find there soup, the wing of a chicken, and a glass of wine, — and you, my sister, a collection of those preserved fruits you like so much."

"And all this without servants?"

"Not one."

"We will see; but afterwards?"

"Well?"

"Why, our return to the palace."

"You must not think of returning to-night. At six o'clock the gates will be opened, and you must leave here at a quarter before six. You will find in these drawers mantles of all colors and all shapes, if you wish to disguise yourselves. Return, then, to the palace, regain your rooms, go to bed, and all will be right."

"But you, what will you do?"

"Oh, I am going away."

"What! we turn you out, my poor brother?"

"It would not be proper for me to remain in the same house with you, sister."

"But you must sleep somewhere."

"Do not fear; I have three other houses like this."

The queen laughed. "And he pretends Madame la Comtesse has no cause to be anxious! Oh, I will tell her," said she, with a charming gesture.

"Then I will tell the king everything," replied the prince, in the same tone.

"He is right, we are in his power."

"Entirely. It is humiliating; but what can you do?"

"Submit. So you say that in order to go away to-morrow morning without seeing any one —"

"A single pull at the bell-cord on the column below —"

"On which, — the one on the right hand or on the left?"

"It makes no difference."

"The door will open?"

"And will close again."

"Of itself?"

"Of itself."

"Thanks. Good-night, brother."

"Good-night, sister." He bowed and disappeared, Andrée closing the door after him.

CHAPTER VII.

THE QUEEN'S BEDCHAMBER.

THE next day, or rather the same morning, for our last chapter brought us to two o'clock, King Louis XVI., in a violet-colored morning dress, wearing no orders, and with no powder in his hair, knocked at the door of the queen's antechamber.

A waiting-woman partly opened the door, and recognizing the king, "Sire!" said she.

"The queen?" asked Louis XVI., in a brusque manner.

"Her Majesty is asleep, Sire."

The king made a sign to the woman to move, but she did not stir.

"Well!" cried the king, "will you move? You see very well that I wish to pass."

The king had at times a promptness of action which his enemies called brutality.

"But the queen is asleep, Sire," objected the woman, timidly.

"I told you to let me pass," answered the king, going in as he spoke.

When he reached the door of the bedroom the king saw Madame de Misery, first lady-in-waiting to the queen, reading in her prayer-book.

This lady rose on perceiving the king. "Sire," she said, in a low voice and with a profound reverence, "her Majesty has not yet called me."

"Really!" said the king, in a mocking tone.

"But, Sire, it is only half-past six o'clock, and her Majesty never rings before seven."

"And you are sure that her Majesty is asleep in bed?"

"I cannot affirm that she is asleep, Sire, but I am certain that she is in bed."

"She is there, then?"

"Yes, Sire."

The king could contain himself no longer, but went straight to the door, and turned the gilded door-knob with obstreperous haste.

The queen's chamber was as dark as in the middle of the night; shutters, blinds, and curtains, hermetically closed, shut out the light of day. A night-lamp, burning on a small table in the most remote corner of the room, left the queen's alcove in shadow, where the large white silk curtains embroidered with fleurs de lis in gold, fell in waving folds around her.

The king walked rapidly toward the bed.

"Oh, Madame de Misery!" said the queen, "how noisy you are! You have awakened me!"

The king stopped, astounded.

"It is not Madame de Misery," he murmured.

"Ah, it is you, Sire!" added Marie Antoinette, raising herself on one elbow.

"Good morning, Madame," said the king, rather sharply.

"What good wind brings you, Sire?" asked the queen. "Madame de Misery! Madame de Misery! come and open the windows."

The women came in, and in accordance with the custom the queen had made them adopt, they opened both doors and windows to admit the fresh air, which Marie Antoinette took pleasure in breathing on first awaking.

"You sleep well, Madame," said the king, sitting down near the bed, after casting scrutinizing glances round the room.

"Yes, Sire; I read late, and consequently, if your Majesty had not awakened me, I should be asleep still."

"How was it that you did not receive yesterday, Madame?"

"Receive, and whom, — your brother, Monsieur de Provence?" said the queen, with presence of mind, anticipating the suspicions of the king.

"Precisely, — yes, my brother; he wished to pay his respects to you, and was refused."

"Well?"

"They told him you were away."

"Did they say that?" asked the queen, carelessly. "Madame de Misery! Madame de Misery!"

The first lady-in-waiting appeared at the door, bringing on a golden salver a number of letters addressed to the queen. "Did your Majesty call me?" asked Madame de Misery.

"Yes. Was Monsieur de Provence told yesterday that I was away from the palace?"

Madame de Misery, in order not to pass before the king, went behind him, and held out the salver on which were the letters to the queen. She kept under her thumb one of these letters, the hand-writing of which the queen recognized.

"Tell his Majesty," continued Marie Antoinette, with the same indifferent manner, "what reply was given Monsieur de Provence yesterday when he presented himself at my door. I do not remember myself what it was."

"Sire," said Madame de Misery, while the queen was opening the letter, "Monseigneur le Comte de Provence called yesterday to pay his respects to her Majesty, and I told him that her Majesty was not receiving."

"And by whose order?"

"By order of the queen."

"Ah!" said the king.

Meantime the queen had opened the letter, and read these two lines: "You returned from Paris yesterday, and entered the palace at eight o'clock in the evening. Laurent saw you."

With the same air of indifference the queen had opened a half-dozen notes, letters, and petitions, which were scattered over the quilt of eider-down. "Well?" she said, turning to look at the king.

"I thank you, Madame," said the latter to Madame de Misery, who withdrew from the room.

"Pardon, Sire!" said the queen, "but will you answer me one question?"

"And what is that, Madame?"

"Am I, or am I not, at liberty to see Monsieur de Provence only when it pleases me?"

"Oh, perfectly at liberty, Madame; but —"

"Well, his conversation wearies me; besides, he dislikes me, and I certainly return the compliment. I expected his visit, and went to bed at eight o'clock to avoid it. But you look disturbed, Sire."

"Nothing, nothing!"

"One would imagine that you doubted."

"But —"

"But what?"

"I believed you to be in Paris, yesterday."

"At what time."

"At the time at which you pretend to have gone to bed."

"Doubtless, I went to Paris. Well, do not people return from Paris?"

"Of course. But all, Madame, depends on what time they return."

"Ah, ah! you wish to know at what time exactly I returned from Paris, then?"

"Why, yes."

"Nothing can be more easy, Sire. Madame de Misery!"

The lady reappeared.

"What time was it when I returned from Paris yesterday?" asked the queen.

"About eight o'clock, your Majesty."

"I do not believe it!" said the king; "you are mistaken, Madame de Misery. Inquire."

The lady-in-waiting, erect and unmoved, turned toward the door, "Madame Duval!" said she.

"Yes, Madame," replied a voice.

"At what time did her Majesty return from Paris yesterday?"

"About eight o'clock, Madame," replied the second lady-in-waiting.

"You must be mistaken, Madame Duval," said Madame de Misery.

Madame Duval put her head out of the window of the antechamber and cried, "Laurent!"

"Who is Laurent?" asked the king.

"The porter at the gate where her Majesty entered," said Madame de Misery.

"Laurent," said Madame Duval, "what time was it when her Majesty came home last evening?"

"About eight o'clock," answered Laurent, from the terrace below.

The king bent his head.

Madame de Misery dismissed Madame Duval, who dismissed Laurent.

The king and queen were left alone.

Louis XVI. felt very much ashamed, and was making every effort to conceal this feeling.

But the queen, instead of triumphing over the victory she had just won, said coldly, "Well, Sire, is there anything else you wish to know?"

"Oh, nothing," cried he, taking her hand in his, "forgive me; I do not know what came into my head. See my joy; it is as great as my repentance. You will not be angry, will you? I am in despair at having annoyed you."

The queen withdrew her hand from that of the king.

"Well! what are you doing, Madame?" asked Louis.

"Sire, a queen of France must not tell a falsehood."

"What do you mean?" asked the astonished king.

"I mean that I did not return at eight o'clock last evening."

The king drew back in surprise.

"I mean," continued the queen, in the same cold manner, "that I returned only at six o'clock this morning."

"Madame!"

"And that but for the kindness of Monsieur le Comte d'Artois, who gave me an asylum, and lodged me, out of pity, in one of his houses, I should have been left all night at the gate of the palace like a beggar."

"Ah, you had not then returned!" said the king, gloomily; "then I was right."

"I beg your pardon, Sire; but you are drawing from what I have just said an arithmetical conclusion, not the conclusion of a gentleman."

"In what, Madame?"

"In this,—that if you wish to know whether I return late or early, you have no need to close the gates, with orders not to open them, but simply to come to me and ask, 'Madame, at what time did you return?'"

"Oh!" cried the king.

"You are no longer permitted to doubt, Monsieur. Your spies have been deceived, your precautions nullified, and your suspicions dissipated. I saw you ashamed of having used violence toward a woman in the exercise of her right, and I might have continued to triumph in my victory; but I think your proceedings shameful for a king, and unworthy of a gentleman, and I would not refuse myself the satisfaction of telling you so.

"Oh, do what you will, Sire," she continued, seeing the king about to speak; "nothing can excuse your conduct toward me."

"On the contrary, Madame," he replied, "nothing is more easy. Not a single person in the chateau suspected that you had not already returned; therefore no one could think that my orders referred to you. That they may have been attributed to the dissipations of Monsieur le Comte d'Artois — for that I care nothing."

"Go on, Sire."

"Well, then, I recapitulate, and I say: If I have been careful of appearances with regard to you, Madame, I am right, and I tell you that you are wrong in not having done the same with regard to me; and if I wished simply to give you a private lesson, if you profit by this lesson as you will, to judge from your irritation, — well, I am still right, and I am not sorry for what I have done."

The queen had listened to the reply of her august husband, by degrees becoming calm; not that she was the less irritated, but she wished to reserve all her strength for the struggle which, in her opinion, instead of being finished had scarcely begun.

"Then, Sire," she said, "you think you need no excuse for keeping outside your palace-gate the daughter of Maria Theresa, your wife and the mother of your children? No!

it is in your eyes a pleasantry worthy of a king, the morality of which doubles its value. It is nothing to you, to have forced the queen of France to pass the night in a house where the Comte d'Artois receives the ladies of the Opera and the adventurous women of your court. Oh, no; that is nothing! A king — a philosopher-king, especially — is above all such considerations. And you are a philosopher, — you, Sire. But on this occasion I have reason to thank Heaven that my brother-in-law is a dissipated man, as his dissipation has saved me from disgrace, and his vices have sheltered my honor."

The king colored and moved uneasily on his chair.

"Oh, yes!" continued the queen, with a bitter laugh, "I know that you are a moral king; but your morality produces strange effects. You say that no one knew that I was out. Will you tell me that Monsieur de Provence, your instigator, did not know it, or Monsieur le Comte d'Artois; or my women, who, by my orders, told you falsehoods this morning; or Laurent, — bought by Monsieur d'Artois and myself? Let us continue this habit, Sire, — you, to set spies and guards; and I, to buy them over, and cheat you, — and in a month we will calculate together how much the dignity of the throne and of our marriage has gained by it."

It was evident that these words had made a great impression on him to whom they were addressed.

"You know," said the king, in an altered voice, "that I am always sincere, and willing to acknowledge if I have been wrong. Will you prove to me that you were right to go into Paris in a sledge attended by a gay party of gentlemen, which in the present unhappy state of things is likely to give offence? Will you prove to me that you were right to disappear with them in Paris, like maskers at a ball, and only to reappear scandalously late at night, when every one else was asleep? You have spoken of the dignity of the throne, and of marriage, and of your position as a mother; think you that it befits a queen, a wife, and a mother, to act thus?"

"I will reply in a few words, Sire; for it seems to me that such accusations merit nothing but contempt. I left Versailles in a sledge, because it is the quickest way of going to Paris at present. I went with Mademoiselle de Taverney, whose reputation, thank God! is certainly one of the purest in our court. I went to Paris, I repeat, to verify the fact that the king of France, — that father of the great family, that royal philosopher, that moral support of all consciences, who takes care of the poor, warms the beggars, and earns the gratitude of the people by his charities, — that the king leaves dying of hunger, exposed to every attack of vice and misery, one of his own family, one who is as much as himself a descendant of the kings who have reigned in France."

"What!" cried the king, in surprise.

"I mounted," continued the queen, "into a garret, and there saw, without fire, almost without light, and without money, the granddaughter of a great prince; and I gave one hundred louis to this victim of royal forgetfulness and neglect. Then as I was detained late there, reflecting on the vanity of all our grandeurs, — for I also am a philosopher sometimes, — and as the cold was severe, and horses go slowly over ice, particularly the horses of a fiacre — "

"The horses of a fiacre!" cried the king. "You returned in a fiacre?"

"Yes, Sire, — in number one hundred and seven."

"Oh, oh!" said the king, with every sign of vexation.

"Yes, and only too happy to get it," said the queen.

"Madame!" interrupted the king, "you have done well; you always have noble impulses, — too easily excited, perhaps, but the fault belongs to the warmth of generosity for which you are distinguished."

"Thank you, Sire," said the queen, ironically.

"Observe," continued the king, "I never suspected you of anything that was not perfectly pure and honest; it is the expedition itself and the queen's adventurous spirit which annoy me. You have, as usual, been doing good; but the way you set about it makes it injurious to yourself. This is what I reproach you with. You say that I have faults to repair, — that I have failed in my duty to a member of my own family. Tell me who the unfortunate is, and he shall no longer have reason to complain."

"The name of Valois, Sire, is sufficiently illustrious, I should imagine, not to have escaped your memory."

"Ah!" cried Louis, with a shout of laughter, "I know now whom you mean. The little Valois, is it not? — a countess of something or other."

"De La Motte, Sire."

"Precisely, De La Motte;" said the king, "her husband is a gendarme?"

"Yes, Sire."

"And the woman is an intriguer? Oh, don't get angry. She moves heaven and earth; she worries my ministers; she teases my aunts; she overwhelms me with supplications, memorials, and genealogies."

"Eh, Sire! that proves that until now she has applied in vain."

"I do not deny it."

"Is she, or is she not, a Valois?"

"Oh, I believe she is, really."

"Well, then, I ask an honorable pension for her, and a regiment for her husband, — in short, a decent position for this branch of a royal family."

"Oh, gently, Madame, Diable! how fast you get on! The little Valois is well able to pluck feathers from me without your help. She has a good beak, I can tell you."

"Oh, I have no fear for you, Sire; your feathers are hard to pluck!"

"An honorable pension? Mon Dieu! what are you thinking of, Madame? Do you know what a terrible hole this winter has made in my funds? A regiment for this little gendarme who speculated in marrying a Valois? Why, I have no regiments to give, even to those who deserve them, or who can pay for them. An income befitting a Valois for these people? — when we, monarchs as we are, have not one befitting a rich gentleman! Why, Monsieur d'Orléans has sent his horses and mules to England for sale, and has cut off a third of his establishment. I have put down my wolf-hounds, and given up many things. We are all on the privation list, — great and small, my dear."

"But, nevertheless, Sire, these Valois must not die of hunger!"

"Have you not just given them one hundred louis?"

"And what is that?"

"A royal gift."

"Then give another like it."

"I shall be very careful not to; what you have given is enough for both of us."

"Then a small pension."

"No, I will not bind myself to anything fixed; they will not let us forget them, — they belong to the rodent species. I will give when I have money to spare, but without committing myself to anything for the future. I do not think much of this little Valois."

Saying these words, Louis held out his hand to the queen, who, yielding to her first impulse, began raising it to her lips. Then suddenly pushing it away, "No," she said.

"You bear malice against me?" said the king, — "you? Well, I on the contrary — "

"Oh, yes; say that you are not angry with me, — you, who order the gates of Versailles to be closed against me! you, who come to my room at half-past six in the morning, and force open the door in a passion, furiously rolling your eyes."

The king laughed. "No," said he; "I am not angry with you."

"You are not now, you mean."

"What will you give me if I prove that I was not, even when I came in?"

"Let me see the proof, in the first place."

"Oh, it is very easy; I have it in my pocket."

"Bah!" said the queen, — but curious, nevertheless. She sat up on the bed. "You have brought something to give me? Oh, really! you are, then, very kind. But I warn you I shall not believe you, unless you show it to me at once. Oh, no subterfuge. I will wager that you are about to give me another promise."

Then with a smile full of kindness, the king began searching in his pockets, with that slowness which makes the child doubly impatient for his toy, the animal for his food, and the woman for her present. At last he drew out a box of red-morocco leather, artistically ornamented with gold.

"A casket!" cried the queen.

The king laid it on the bed. The queen eagerly pounced upon it, and drew it toward her. She opened the casket, and intoxicated, dazzled by the sight, she exclaimed, "Oh, how beautiful it is! mon Dieu! how beautiful it is!"

The king smiled with delight. "Do you think so?" said he.

The queen could not answer; she was breathless with admiration. Then she drew out of the box a necklace of diamonds so large, so pure, so glittering, and so skilfully assorted that it seemed to her as if a stream of phosphoric flame glided over her beautiful hands. The necklace undulated like the rings of a serpent, emitting flashes of light from every scale.

"Then you are pleased?" said the king.

"Enchanted, Sire! You make me too happy."

"Really?"

"See this first row; the diamonds are as large as filberts, and so equal in size you could not tell one from another. Then how beautifully the gradation of the rows is managed! The jeweller who made this necklace is an artist."

"They are two."

"Then I wager it is Boehmer and Bossange."

"You have guessed right."

"Indeed, no one but they would risk making such a thing. How beautiful it is, Sire! how beautiful it is!"

"Madame, take care," said the king, "you are paying too much for this necklace!"

"Oh, Sire!" cried the queen, — all the delight fading from her countenance.

That change came so quickly, and was effaced so suddenly, that the king did not have time to notice it. "Come," said he, "grant me a pleasure."

"What is it?"

"That of putting this necklace around your neck."

The queen stopped him, saying, in a tone of sadness, "But, Sire, it is very costly, is it not?"

"Faith, yes!" said the king, laughing. "I have just told you that you were paying for it more than it is worth; and it will attain to its full value only when in its place, — that is, around your neck."

In saying these words Louis approached the queen, holding in his hands the two ends of the magnificent necklace, to fasten it by the clasp, which was made of a large diamond.

"No, no!" said the queen, "let us not be childish. Put the necklace in your casket, Sire."

"You refuse, then, to allow me to be the first to see it on you?"

"God forbid that I should refuse you that pleasure, Sire, if I were to take the necklace; but —"

"But —" said the king, surprised.

"Neither you, nor any one else, shall see a necklace of this price round my neck."

"You will not wear it?"

"Never!"

"You refuse me?"

"I refuse to wear a million, or a million and a half, of francs around my neck; for this necklace cost fifteen hundred thousand francs, did it not?"

"I do not say it did not," said the king.

"Then I refuse to wear around my neck a million and a half when the king's coffers are empty, when he is forced to stint his charities, and to say to the poor, 'God help you! for I have no more to give.'"

"Are you serious in saying this?"

"Listen, Sire! Monsieur de Sartines told me a short time since that with that sum we could build a ship of the line; and in truth, Sire, the king of France has more need of a ship of the line than the queen of France has need of a necklace."

"Oh!" cried the king, joyfully, and with his eyes full of tears, "what you have just done is sublime! Thanks, thanks, thanks, Antoinette! you are a good woman;" and to worthily crown this cordial and commonplace demonstration, the good king threw his arms round her neck and kissed her. "Oh, how France will bless you!" he continued, "when it shall hear what you have said."

The queen sighed.

"You regret," said he; "it is not too late."

"No, Sire; it was a sigh of relief. Shut this case, and return it to the jewellers."

"But listen, first; I have arranged the terms of payment, and I have the money. Come, now, what shall I do with it? Do not be so disinterested, Madame."

"No; I have decided. I will not have the necklace; but I want something else."

"Diable! then my sixteen hundred thousand francs are gone, after all."

"Sixteen hundred thousand francs! See, now, was it really so costly as that?"

"Faith, Madame! I let the word slip, but I will not take it back."

"Reassure yourself; what I ask is much less costly."

"What do you wish for?"

"That you will permit me to go again to Paris."

"Oh, that is easy enough, and not costly."

"But wait —"

"Diable!"

"To Paris, to the Place Vendôme."

"Oh, the deuce!"

"To the house of Monsieur Mesmer."

The king scratched his ear. "Well, as you have denied yourself a trifle of sixteen hundred thousand francs, I suppose I must let you go, — but on one condition."

"What is it?"

"You must be accompanied by a princess of the blood."

The queen reflected. "Shall it be Madame de Lamballe?" said she.

"Yes, if you like."

"It is agreed."

"Then I consent."

"Thanks, Sire."

"And now," said the king, "I shall order my ship of the line, and call it 'The Queen's Necklace.' You shall stand godmother, and then I will send it out to Lapeyrouse;" and kissing his wife's hand, he went away very happy.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE QUEEN'S MORNING HOUR.

No sooner was the king gone than the queen rose and went to the window to breathe the pure and frosty morning air. The day advanced, brilliant and full of that charm which the coming of spring imparts to certain days in April. To the frost of the night had succeeded the pleasing warmth of the sun, already to be felt. The wind had gone round to the east during the night, and if it remained in that quarter this terrible winter of the year 1784 was at an end. Already, in fact, could be seen on the rosy horizon that grayish vapor which is only moisture fleeing before the sun. In the gardens the frost was falling from the branches, and the little birds began to light upon the buds.

"If we wish to profit by the ice," cried the queen, "I believe we must make haste; for look, Madame de Misery, the spring seems to have begun."

"Your Majesty has long purposed to make up a party for the Swiss Lake."

"Very well, this very day we will make that party, for to-morrow it may be too late."

"Then at what hour will your Majesty wish to dress?"

"Immediately; I will take a light breakfast and then go."

"Are there any other orders, Madame?"

"See if Mademoiselle de Taverney has risen, and tell her I wish to speak to her."

"She is already waiting for you in the boudoir, Madame."

"Already?" said the queen, who knew at what time Andrée had gone to bed.

"She has been there more than twenty minutes, Madame."

"Ask her to come in."

Andrée entered as the clock was striking nine. She was dressed with care, as was required of every lady of the court in presence of her sovereign, and presented herself smiling, though somewhat anxious.

The queen's answering smile quite reassured her.

"Go, my good Misery," said the queen, "and send me Léonard and my tailor."

When the door had closed behind Madame de Misery, the queen said to Andrée, "The king has been charming; he has laughed, and is quite disarmed."

"But does he know, Madame?"

"You understand, Andrée, that a woman does not tell falsehoods when she has done no wrong and is the queen of France."

"Certainly, Madame."

"Still, my dear Andrée, it seems we have committed an error."

"An error, Madame? Oh, more than one, no doubt!"

"Possibly; but this is the first, — the error of pitying Madame de La Motte; the king dislikes her, but I confess she pleased me."

"Oh, your Majesty is too good a judge for me not to agree with you."

"Here is Léonard," said Madame de Misery, returning.

The queen seated herself before her silver-gilt toilet-table, and the celebrated hairdresser began his operations. She had the most beautiful hair in the world, and was especially pleased with those who admired it. Léonard knew this, and therefore with her was always slow in his movements, that she might have time to look at herself.

That morning Marie Antoinette was pleased, even happy, and was more beautiful than usual. Her hair finished, she turned again to Andrée. "You have not been scolded," she said; "you are free and proud, — you, of whom every one is a little afraid, because, like Minerva, you are too wise."

"I, Madame?" stammered Andrée.

"Yes, you, the kill-joy of the court; but oh, mon Dieu! how happy you are to be unmarried, and especially in being contented that you are so."

Andrée blushed and tried to smile. "It is a vow that I have made," said she.

"And which you will keep, my beautiful vestal?"

"I hope so."

"By the way," said the queen, "I remember that although unmarried, you have a master since yesterday morning."

"A master, Madame?"

"Yes, your dear brother; what do you call him? Philippe, is it not?"

"Yes, Madame."

"Has he arrived?"

"He came yesterday, as your Majesty did me the honor to say."

"And have you not yet seen him? I took you away to Paris, — egotist that I was; it was unpardonable."

"Oh, Madame!" said Andrée, smiling, "I pardon you heartily, and so does Philippe."

"Are you sure?"

"I answer for both of us."

"How is he?"

"As usual, beautiful and good, Madame."

"How old is he now?"

"Thirty-two years."

"Poor Philippe! Do you know that it is fourteen years since I first met him? But I have not seen him now for nine or ten."

"Whenever your Majesty pleases to receive him, he will be but too happy to assure you that this long absence has not altered the sentiments of respectful devotion which he has ever felt for his queen."

"Can I see him immediately?"

"In a quarter of an hour he will be at your Majesty's feet."

"Very well, I permit it, — I even wish it."

The queen had hardly finished speaking when some one entered, bounded in a lively manner over the carpet, and placed his face, laughing and mocking, before the same mirror where Marie Antoinette was smiling at her own. "My brother D'Artois!" cried the queen; "how you frightened me!"

"Good-morning, your Majesty!" said the young prince; "how did your Majesty pass the night?"

"Very badly, thank you, brother."

"And the morning?"

"Very well."

"That is the important point. I guessed that all had gone right, for I have just met the king, and he smiled on me most graciously. What a good thing is confidence!"

The queen laughed, and he, knowing no more than she had told him, laughed also, but from a different cause.

"But how thoughtless I am," he said; "I did not even ask Mademoiselle de Taverney how she had passed her time."

The queen was looking in her mirror, and nothing could happen in the room without her seeing it. Léonard having finished his work, she exchanged her dressing-gown of India muslin for a morning-dress.

The door opened.

"Stay!" said the queen to the Comte d'Artois; "if you have anything to say to Andrée, here she is."

Andrée entered at that moment, leading by the hand a handsome man, with a brown complexion, noble black eyes profoundly expressive of melancholy, and a soldier-like carriage. He looked like one of Coypel's or Gainsborough's admirable portraits.

Philippe de Taverney was dressed in a dark-gray coat embroidered in silver, a white cravat, and a dark waistcoat; and this rather sombre style of dress seemed to suit the manly energy expressed in his complexion and his features.

Philippe advanced, one hand in his sister's, the other holding his hat.

"Your Majesty," said Andrée, "here is my brother."

Philippe bowed gravely and deliberately. When he raised his head the queen was still looking in her mirror. It is true that she saw him there as plainly as if she were looking at him face to face.

"Good-day, Monsieur de Taverney!" said the queen; and she turned toward him. She was beautiful, with that royal beauty which made all around her not only partisans of the throne, but adorers of the woman. She possessed the power of beauty; and if we may make use of the inversion, the beauty of power. Philippe, seeing her smile, and feeling those limpid eyes, at once soft and proud, fixed upon him, turned pale, and could hardly restrain his emotion.

"It appears, Monsieur de Taverney," continued the queen, "that you pay me your first visit. I thank you for it."

"Your Majesty deigns to forget that it is I who should give thanks."

"How many years have passed since we last met, Monsieur! Alas, the most beautiful part of life!"

"For me, Madame; but not for your Majesty, to whom all days are happy days."

"You must have been pleased with America, Monsieur de Taverney, since you remained there after every one else returned."

"Madame," answered Philippe, "Monsieur de Lafayette, when he left the New World, had need of an officer in whom he could place confidence to take command of the French auxiliaries. He proposed me, therefore, to General Washington, who was pleased to accept me."

"It seems," said the queen, "that this New World, of which you speak, sends us home many heroes."

"Your Majesty does not mean that for me?" asked Philippe, laughing.

"Why not?" Then turning to the Comte d'Artois, "See, brother," she said, "has not Monsieur de Taverney a fine bearing and a martial air?"

Philippe seeing himself thus introduced to Monsieur le Comte d'Artois, whom he did not know before, advanced a step toward him, asking of the prince permission to salute him.

The count making a sign with his hand, Philippe bowed.

"A fine officer!" cried the young prince; "a noble gentleman, whose acquaintance I am happy to make. What are your intentions in returning to France?"

Philippe looked at his sister.

"Monsieur," said he, "my sister is my first consideration; whatever she wishes, I shall do."

"But she has a father, I believe?" said the count.

"Never mind him!" said the queen, quickly; "I prefer Andrée under her brother's protection, and he under yours, Count. You will take charge of Monsieur de Taverney, will you not?"

The count bowed an assent.

"For, do you know," continued she, "that very strong ties bind me to Monsieur de Taverney?"

"Very strong ties, — you, sister? Oh, tell me about that!"

"Yes, Monsieur de Taverney was the first Frenchman who presented himself to my eyes when I arrived in this country; and I had made a very sincere vow to promote the happiness of the first Frenchman I should meet."

Philippe felt the blood rush to his face. He bit his lips to control himself, and Andrée looked at him sadly.

The queen observed this interchange of glances between the brother and sister. But what could she know of all the sorrowful secrets concealed in that look, — not being aware of the events narrated in the previous chapters of this history?

She attributed the apparent sorrow which she perceived to another cause. And why was it not probable that Monsieur de Taverney had suffered a little from the epidemic of love for her which had pervaded all France when she was dauphiness, in 1774? There was nothing to render this supposition improbable, not even her reflection in the glass, which still reminded her of the beauty of the young girl, though she was now a wife and queen.

Marie Antoinette, therefore, attributed Philippe's sigh to some confidence of this kind which the brother had made to the sister; and therefore she smiled still more upon him, and redoubled her kindness toward Andrée. She had not divined everything, neither was she altogether mistaken; and let no one see a shadow of crime in this innocent coquetry. The queen was a true woman, and gloried in being loved. The most generous souls feel the most deeply these aspirations for the love of all who surround them. Alas! a time is coming for thee, poor queen, when those smiles toward those who love thee, with which thou hast been reproached, thou shalt vainly bestow on those who love thee not!

The Comte d'Artois approached Philippe, while the queen consulted Andrée about the trimming for a hunting dress, and said, "Do you think Monsieur de Washington a great general?"

"Certainly a great man, Monseigneur."

"And what effect did the French produce out there?"

"As much good as the English did harm."

"Granted. You are a partisan of the new ideas, my dear Monsieur Philippe de Taverney; but have you reflected on one thing?"

"What, Monseigneur? I assure you that out there, encamped in the fields and in the savannas on the borders of the great lakes, I had plenty of time for reflection on many things."

"On this, — that in making war out there, it was neither against the Indians nor against the English, but against us that you were fighting."

"Ah, Monseigneur, I do not deny that that is possible."

"You admit — "

"I admit the unluckly reaction of an event by which the monarchy was saved."

"Yes; but to those who have survived the first attack of the disease, a reaction might be fatal."

"Alas! Monseigneur."

"Therefore I do not admire so much these victories of Monsieur Washington, and of the Marquis de Lafayette. It is egotism, perhaps, but excuse me, it is not egotism for myself alone."

"Oh, Monseigneur!"

"But do you know why I will still aid you with all my power?"

"Monseigneur, whatever may be your reason, I shall feel the most lively gratitude toward your Royal Highness."

"It is, my dear Monsieur de Taverney, because you are not one of those whose heroism has been trumpeted forth in public places. You have done your duty bravely, but your name has not incessantly flowed from the trumpet's mouth; you are not known in Paris, that is why I like you, unless — ah! upon my word, Monsieur de Taverney — unless — but I am an egotist you see."

The young prince then kissing the queen's hand, and bowing to Andrée with an affable and more respectful manner than he generally showed to ladies, left the room.

Then the queen turned again to Philippe, saying, "Have you seen your father, Monsieur?"

"Yes, Madame, I found him in the antechamber; my sister had sent for him."

"Why did you not go to see him in the first place?"

"I had sent home my valet and my luggage; but my father sent the servant back again, with orders for me to present myself first to the king or to your Majesty."

"And you have obeyed?"

"With joy, Madame, for it gave me a chance to embrace my sister."

"It is a lovely morning," said the queen, with a gesture of delight. "Madame de Misery, to-morrow the ice will be melted; I must have a sledge instantly, — and send my chocolate to me here."

"Will not your Majesty take breakfast? You had no supper last night."

"You mistake, my good Misery, we had supper last night. Had we not, Andrée?"

"A very good one, Madame."

"It shall not prevent me from taking my chocolate," added the queen. "Quick, quick, my good Misery; this fine weather tempts me, and the Swiss Lake will be crowded."

"Your Majesty is going to skate?" asked Philippe.

"Ah, you will laugh at us, Monsieur American, — you who have traversed lakes that are measured by miles, while ours here are measured by feet."

"Madame," replied Philippe, "here your Majesty amuses yourself with the cold, but there they die of it."

"Ah, here is my chocolate; Andrée, take a cup with me."

Andrée bowed, coloring with pleasure.

"You see, Monsieur de Taverney, I am always the same, with the same horror of etiquette as in old times. Do you remember those old days? Are you changed since then, Monsieur Philippe?"

These words went to the young man's heart. Often the regret of a woman is like the thrust of a knife to one who is interested.

"No, Madame," replied the young man; "I am not changed, at least not in heart."

"Then if your heart is the same," said the queen, playfully, "and as the heart was a good one, we will thank you in our own way; a cup for Monsieur de Taverney, Madame de Misery."

"Oh, Madame!" cried Philippe, overwhelmed; "you cannot mean it; such an honor for a poor, obscure soldier like me!"

"An old friend," said the queen. "This day seems to remind me of my youth; I am again happy, free, proud, and yet foolish. This day recalls to me that happy time at my dear Trianon, and all the frolics we had there, Andrée and I. This day brings back to my memory my roses, my strawberries, and my birds that I was so fond of, — all, even to my good gardeners, whose happy faces often announced to me a new flower or a delicious fruit; and Monsieur de Jussieu, and that original old Rousseau, who is since dead. But what is the matter, Andrée? You are red. What is the matter, Monsieur Philippe? You are pale."

The faces of the brother and sister plainly expressed the effect of these bitter recollections; but at the last words of the queen they regained their self-control.

"I have burned my mouth with the chocolate," said Andrée; "excuse me, Madame."

"And I," said Philippe, "cannot reconcile myself to the fact that your Majesty honors me as if I were the greatest nobleman in France."

"Come," interrupted Marie Antoinette, pouring the chocolate into his cup, "you are a soldier, and accustomed to fire; so burn yourself gloriously with this chocolate, for I am in a hurry."

She laughed, but Philippe, taking the matter seriously, heroically swallowed the hot chocolate.

The queen saw him, and laughing still more, said, "You have a perfect character, Monsieur de Taverney." She then rose, and her women brought her bonnet, ermine mantle, and gloves. Andrée's toilet was completed with the same rapidity. Philippe took his hat under his arm and followed them.

"Monsieur de Taverney, I do not mean you to leave me," said the queen. "Come round to my right."

They went down the great staircase; the drums were beating, the clarions of the body-guard were playing, and this whole scene, together with the enthusiasm everywhere shown toward the beautiful queen by whose side he was walking, completed the intoxication of the young man. The change was too sudden, — after so many years of exile and regret, to such great joy and honor.

Standing in the crowd outside was a little old man, who, forgetting all etiquette, kept his eyes fixed upon the queen and Taverney. When they had passed from view, and the crowd began to break up, he was seen to run off as fast as his little legs, which had supported him for seventy years, would permit.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SWISS LAKE.

EVERY one knows that rectangular body of water, greenish and changeable in summer, white and rough in winter, which still goes by the name of the Swiss Lake. An avenue of linden-trees skirts each bank, and these avenues are on this day thronged with pedestrians, of all ranks and ages, who have come to enjoy the sight of the sledges and the skating. The toilets of the ladies present a brilliant spectacle of luxury and gayety. Their high coiffures, gay bonnets with the veils half-down, fur mantles, and brilliant silks with deep flounces, mingling with the orange or blue coats of the gentlemen, form an interesting scene.

Gay lackeys also, in blue and red, pass among the crowd, looking like poppies and blue-bells waving in the wind among ears of corn or in a field of clover.

Now and then a cry of admiration bursts from the crowd as Saint-Georges, the celebrated skater, executes some circle so perfect that a geometrician could scarcely have found a fault in it.

While the banks of the lake are thus crowded, the ice itself presents a scene not less gay, and much more animated. Here may be seen a sledge drawn by three enormous bloodhounds. These dogs, caparisoned with velvet that is richly emblazoned with armorial bearings, and wearing flowing plumes upon their heads, somewhat resemble those chimerical animals in the extravagant creations of Callot or of Goya. Their master, Monsieur de Lauzun, carelessly seated in the sledge, which is lined with tiger-skins, leans over the side to breathe more freely than he perhaps could do facing the wind.

Here and there sledges of less striking appointments appear to seek retirement. A lady, masked, probably on account of the cold, is seated in one of these sledges, while a handsome skater, in a velvet riding-coat, hangs over the back, to assist and direct her progress. Whatever they may be saying to each other is quite inaudible amid this busy hum of voices; but who can blame a rendezvous which takes place in the open air and under the eyes of all Versailles? As to what they are saying, how can it concern any one else, since they are in sight; and what is it to them that they are in sight, since no one can hear what they say? It is evident that in the midst of the crowd they are alone by themselves; they pass through the multitude like two migratory birds. Whither go they? — to that unknown world which every soul is seeking, and which is called Happiness.

Suddenly there is a general movement which quickly becomes a great tumult. The queen has appeared upon the border of the lake, and has been recognized. All are preparing to leave the place to her, when she makes a sign with her hand for them to remain. The cry, "Long live the queen!" resounds, and taking advantage of the permission given, the skaters and the sledge-drivers, as if by an electric movement, form a great circle around the place where the august visitor has paused. The general attention is fixed upon her. Then the men draw near by skilful manœuvres, and the women stand with respectful bearing; there is a general endeavor to mingle with the groups of noblemen and officers of rank who hasten to pay homage to the queen.

Among the principal personages noticed by the public, there is one of high distinction who, instead of following the general impulse and drawing near to the queen, immediately on recognizing her and her companions, leaves his sledge and throwing himself into a by-path, disappears, together with his suite.

The Comte d'Artois, who had been remarked as one of the most elegant and accomplished among the skaters, hastened to the queen, and while kissing her hand said to her in a low tone: "Do you see how our brother Monsieur de Provence flies from you?" And he pointed with his finger toward a thicket through which Monsieur de Provence was hastening to his carriage.

"He does not wish me to reproach him," said the queen.

"Oh, as to the reproaches he expects, that is my affair; it is not on that account he fears you."

"It is his conscience, then," said the queen, gayly.

"Not even that, sister."

"What then?"

"I will tell you. He has just learned that Monsieur de Suffren, the glorious conqueror, will arrive this evening, and as the news is important he wishes to leave you in ignorance of it."

The queen observed that some curious persons in the crowd, forgetting their respect, had drawn so near as to overhear their conversation.

"Monsieur de Taverney," said she, "will you have the kindness to order my sledge? and if you find your father, I give you leave of absence for a quarter of an hour to pay your respects to him."

The young man bowed and made way through the crowd to execute the order of the queen. The crowd had understood, — it has sometimes marvellous instincts; it drew back, and the queen and the Comte d'Artois were left to themselves.

"Brother," then said the queen, "explain to me what my brother would gain by trying to keep from me the news of the arrival of Monsieur de Suffren."

"Oh, sister! is it possible that you, a woman, a queen, and an enemy, do not immediately see the intention of this scheming politician? Monsieur de Suffren arrives; no one at court knows it. Monsieur de Suffren is the hero of the Indian seas and consequently is entitled to a magnificent reception at Versailles. Well, Monsieur de Suffren arrives; the king is ignorant of his arrival; the king neglects him without knowing it, and therefore without intention; you do the same, sister. Meantime, on the contrary, Monsieur de Provence, who knows of the arrival of Monsieur de Suffren, welcomes the admiral, smiles upon him, courts him, makes verses in his honor, and by attaching himself to the hero of the Indies, becomes himself the hero of France."

"That is clear," said the queen.

"Pardieu!" said the count.

"You forget one single point, my dear gazetteer."

"What is that?"

"How do you know all about this fine project of our dear brother and brother-in-law?"

"How do I know it? As I know everything that he does. It is very simple; having seen that Monsieur de Provence keeps a watch on all my motions, I have agents who keep me informed as to his. Oh, this will be useful to us both, sister."

"Thank you for your alliance, brother; but the king?"

"Oh, the king is forwarned."

"By you?"

"Oh, not at all; but by his Minister of the Navy whom I have sent to him. I have nothing to do with all this, you understand; I am too frivolous, too dissipated, too wild, to be interested in things of such importance."

"And was the Minister of the Navy also ignorant of the arrival in France of Monsieur de Suffren?"

"Ah, good Heavens! my dear sister, have you not learned enough of ministers during the fourteen years you have lived here, as dauphiness and queen, to know that they are always ignorant of precisely what they ought to know? However, I have told him about this, and he is extravagant in his expressions of gratitude."

"I should think so," said the queen.

"You see, dear sister, that this man will be grateful to me all his life; and I have need of his grateful service."

"And for what?"

"To negotiate a loan."

"Oh," cried the queen, laughing, "how disinterested you are!"

"Sister," said he, "you must want money. On the word of a son of France I offer you half of what I am going to receive."

"Oh, no, brother, keep it, keep it; thank Heaven! I want nothing just now."

"Diable! do not wait too long to claim the fulfilment of my promise."

"Well, in that case I must endeavor to find out some State secret for myself."

"Sister, you are taking cold," said the prince, "your cheeks are blue."

"Well, here is Monsieur de Taverney returning with my sledge."

"Then you do not want me any longer?"

"No."

"Then send me away, I beg."

"Why, do you imagine you will be in my way?"

"No; it is I, on the contrary, who want my liberty."

"Adieu, then."

"Au revoir, dear sister."

"Until when?"

"Until this evening."

"What takes place this evening?"

"Nothing, but something will take place."

"Well, then, what will take place?"

"Everybody will be at the king's card-party."

"And why so?"

"Because this evening the minister will bring Monsieur de Suffren there."

"Very well, then, — till this evening;" and the young prince, bowing with his habitual elegance, disappeared among the crowd.

The elder Taverney, who was one of the nearest spectators of all this, had been watching his son eagerly, and felt almost chagrined at this conversation between the queen and her brother-in-law, as it interrupted the familiar intercourse which his son had before been enjoying; therefore, when the young man returned with the queen's sledge, and seeing his father, whom he had not met for ten years, advanced toward him, the latter motioned him away, saying, "We will talk afterward, when you have left the queen."

Philippe, therefore, moved away, and the baron saw with joy that Monsieur le Comte d'Artois had taken leave of the queen.

The latter entered her sledge, and made Andrée get in with her, and as two tall attendants approached to push it, she said, "No, no; I do not wish to go in that way. You skate, Monsieur de Taverney, do you not?"

"Pardon me, Madame," replied Philippe.

"Give some skates to the chevalier," ordered the queen; then turning to him, "I do not know what gives me the idea that you skate as well as Saint-Georges," she said.

"Philippe used to skate with much elegance," said Andrée.

"And now you acknowledge no rival; is it not so, Monsieur de Taverney?"

"I will do my best to justify your Majesty's opinion," said he; and putting on his skates he placed himself behind her sledge, and they started on their course.

Then might have been seen a curious spectacle.

Saint-Georges, the king of gymnasts; Saint-Georges, the elegant mulatto, the man who was the fashion, the man superior to all in bodily exercises, — Saint-Georges saw a rival in this young man who dared to compete with him. So he began immediately to fly about the queen's sledge with salutations so respectful, so full of charm, that no courtier upon the floor at Versailles could have executed them more skilfully; he described around the sledge the most rapid and most perfect circles, weaving them into a wonderful chain of rings joined together in such a way that each new curve always preceded the arrival of the sledge which left him behind; then, with a vigorous stroke of his skate he elliptically regained what he had lost. No one could observe this manœuvre without being dazzled and wonder-struck.

Then Philippe, moved to emulation, adopted a measure full of boldness: he pushed the sledge with such fearful rapidity that twice Saint-Georges, instead of finding himself in advance, finished his circle behind him; and as the velocity of the sledge was so great that many of the spectators uttered cries of terror which might alarm the queen, Philippe said, "If your Majesty desires it, I will stop, or at least go more slowly."

"Oh, no, no!" cried the queen, with that impetuous ardor with which she entered into everything, business as well as pleasure; "no, I am not afraid; faster, if you can, Chevalier, faster!"

"Oh, so much the better; thanks for the permission, Madame. I hold you firmly, — rely on me."

And as his strong hand closed again upon the back of the sledge, it trembled throughout with the vigorous motion. He seemed to have raised it with his extended arm. Then placing upon the sledge his other hand, which he had disdained to use before, he drove forward the machine, which was a toy in his hands of iron.

From that moment he crossed each one of the circles of Saint-Georges by circles larger still, so that the sledge moved like the most agile man, turning again and again, notwithstanding its length, as quickly as could Saint-Georges upon his plain skates. In spite of its size and weight, it lived, it flew, it whirled like a dancer. Saint-Georges, more graceful, more adroit, more correct in his windings, soon began to be anxious. He had already been skating an hour. Philippe, noticing the perspiration on his face, and the efforts of his trembling knees, determined to conquer him through fatigue. He changed his method, and abandoning the circles, the making of which compelled him to lift the sledge, he pushed the equipage straight before him. The sledge flew forward with the rapidity of an arrow.

Saint-Georges with a single effort would have overtaken it at once, but Philippe seized the moment when the second stroke of the skate multiplies the velocity gained by the first, and pushed the sledge over a bit of ice as yet unmarred, with such force that he himself was left behind. Saint-Georges darted forward to catch the sledge, but Philippe, mustering all his strength, glided so skilfully on the outer edge of his skate that he passed before Saint-Georges and placed his hands on the sledge. Then by an herculean effort he turned the sledge quickly, and sent it forward in another direction, while Saint-Georges, carried on by his momentum, and unable to check his speed, lost an irrecoverable space and remained completely distanced.

The air resounded with such acclamations that Philippe blushed in confusion. But he was much surprised when the queen, after clapping her hands, turned toward him, and with the accent of a voluptuous excitement, said to him, "Oh, Monsieur de Taverney! now that the victory is yours, mercy! mercy! you will kill me."

CHAPTER X.

THE TEMPTER.

PHILIPPE, at this order, or rather this request of the queen, compressed his muscles of steel, and the sledge stopped abruptly.

"And now rest yourself," said she, coming out of the sledge, trembling all over. "Indeed, I never could have believed there was such intoxication in speed. You have nearly driven me out of my senses;" and she leaned for support on Philippe's arm. A shudder of stupefaction which ran through that gilded and decorated company warned her that she had again committed one of those breaches of etiquette so culpable in the eyes of jealousy and servility.

As for Philippe, overwhelmed by this great honor, he felt more ashamed than if his sovereign had insulted him publicly; he lowered his eyes, and his heart beat as though it would burst.

A singular emotion, arising no doubt from her rapid ride, agitated the queen also; for she withdrew her arm almost immediately, taking that of Mademoiselle de Taverney, and asked for a seat. They brought her one.

"Thanks, Monsieur de Taverney," said she; then in a lower tone, "mon Dieu! how disagreeable it is to be always surrounded by spying fools!"

A number of ladies and gentlemen soon crowded round her, and all looked at Philippe with no little curiosity, who, to hide his confusion, stooped to take off his skates, and then fell into the background.

The queen remained thoughtful a few moments; then raising her head, "Oh!" said she, "I shall take cold if I sit here, — I must take another turn;" and she remounted her sledge.

Philippe waited, but in vain, for another order.

Twenty gentlemen soon presented themselves, but she said, "No, I thank you; I have my attendants."

Then when the servants had taken their places, "Gently," she said, "gently;" and closing her eyes she gave herself up to meditation.

The sledge moved away slowly, as the queen had ordered, followed by an eager crowd of the curious and the jealous.

Philippe remained alone, wiping drops of perspiration from his face. He looked about for Saint-Georges to console him for his defeat by some compliment; but he had received a message from his patron the Duc d'Orléans, and had left the place.

Philippe, therefore, rather tired, somewhat melancholy, and half-frightened at all that had occurred, remained stationary, following with his eyes the queen's sledge, which was now at some distance, when he felt some one touch him; he turned round and saw his father.

The little old man, more shrunken than ever, enveloped in furs like a Laplander, had touched his son with his elbow, that he might not be obliged to take his hands out of the muff that hung from his neck.

"Will you not embrace me, my son?" said he; and he pronounced these words in the tone in which the father of a Greek athlete would thank his son for a victory gained on the arena.

"My dear father, I do it with all my heart;" but there was no harmony between the tone in which these words were spoken and their actual meaning.

"And now," said the old man, — "now that you have embraced me, go, — go quickly;" and he pushed him away.

"Where do you wish me to go, Monsieur?"

"Why, morbleu! over there."

"Over there?"

"Yes, to the queen."

"Oh, no, father! no, I thank you."

"What! No, I thank you! Are you mad? You will not go after the queen?"

"My dear father, it is impossible!"

"Impossible to join the queen, who is expecting you?"

"Who is expecting me, — me?"

"Yes; who wishes for you."

"Wishes for me? Indeed, father," added he, coldly, "I think you forget yourself."

"It is astonishing!" said the old man, stamping his foot. "Ah, bah, Philippe! do me the pleasure to inform me whence you have come."

"Monsieur," said his son, sadly, "I fear to reach either one of two conclusions."

"What?"

"Either that you are laughing at me, or else — excuse me — that you are losing your senses!"

The old man seized his son by the arm so energetically that he made him start. "Listen, Monsieur Philippe!" said he; "America is, I am aware, a country distant a long way from here."

"Yes, father, very distant," replied Philippe; "but I don't know what you mean. I beg you to explain."

"A country where there is neither king nor queen."

"Nor subjects."

"Nor subjects, Monsieur Philosopher. I do not deny it; that point does not interest me. But what does interest me, what pains me, what humiliates me, is that I also fear to reach a conclusion."

"What is it, father? In any case, I think our conclusions must be very different."

"Mine is that you are a simpleton, my son! Just trouble yourself to look over there."

"Well, Monsieur?"

"Well, the queen looks back, and it is the third time she has done so. There! she turns again; and whom do you think she is looking for but for you, Monsieur Simpleton, Monsieur Puritan, Monsieur American — Oh!" and the old man, in his rage, bit his glove, which would have enclosed two such withered hands as his.

"Well, Monsieur," said the young man, "if it were true, which it probably is not, that the queen is looking for me —"

"Oh!" interrupted the old man, angrily, "he says, 'if it were true!' Why, the fellow is not of my blood; he is not a Taverney!"

"I am not of your blood?" murmured Philippe; then, in a low voice, raising his eyes toward heaven, "Ought I not to thank God for it?"

"Monsieur," said the old man, "I tell you that the queen wants you! Monsieur, I tell you that the queen is looking for you!"

"You have good sight, father," said his son, dryly.

"Come," said the old man, more gently, and trying to moderate his impatience, "trust my experience; are you, or are you not, a man?"

Philippe lightly shrugged his shoulders, and made no reply.

The old man, seeing that he would receive no answer, hazarded a contemptuous look at his son, and perceived, for the first time, all the dignity, impenetrable reserve, and steadfast will, that his face expressed.

He suppressed his sense of disappointment, applied his muff to the end of his red nose, and with a voice as sweet as that with which Orpheus addressed the Thessalian rocks, "Philippe, my son," said he, "listen to me!"

"Eh!" replied the young man, "it seems to me that I have done nothing else the last quarter of an hour, father."

"Oh!" thought the old man, "I will draw you down from your majesty, Monsieur American. You have your weak side, Colossus; let me, with my old claws, get hold of you on that side, and you will see!" Then aloud, "You have overlooked one thing, Philippe."

"What is that?"

"A matter that it is creditable to your simplicity not to have suspected."

"Come, speak, Monsieur!"

"It is a simple matter. You have come from America. You left here at a time when there was only a king, — no queen except the Dubarry, whose majesty was not very imposing. You come back; you find we have a queen, and you say, 'Let us respect her person.'"

"Doubtless."

"Poor child!" said the old man, stifling with his muff the outbreak of a cough, and a burst of laughter.

"What, Monsieur! you pity me for respecting the monarchy, — you, a Taverney-Maison-Rouge, one of the real noblemen of France!"

"Mark you, I do not speak of the monarchy, but of the queen."

"And you make a distinction?"

"I should think so! What is royalty? A crown; peste! that must not be touched. What is the queen? A woman; oh, it is different with a woman, — she may be touched."

"She may be touched?" cried Philippe, blushing with anger and contempt; and he accompanied these words with a gesture so superb that no woman could have seen him without loving him; no queen, without adoration.

"You do not believe me," continued the old man, almost fiercely; "well, ask Monsieur de Coigny, ask Monsieur de Lauzun, ask Monsieur de Vaudreuil."

"Silence, father!" cried Philippe; "or for these three blasphemies, not being able to strike you three blows with my sword, I swear to you I will pierce my own body, and that immediately."

Taverney recoiled a step, turned on his heel as Richelieu might have done at thirty years of age, and shaking his muff, "Oh, verily!" he said, "the animal is stupid. The horse is an ass, the eagle a goose, the cock a capon. Good-by; you have made me happy. I thought I was the old man, the Cassandra; but it seems that it is I who am Adonis, it is I who am Apollo. Good-by." And he pirouetted again upon his heels.

Philippe had become gloomy. He stopped the old man.

"You did not speak seriously, did you, father?" said he. "It is impossible that a gentleman of good blood like you should give ear to these calumnies, spread by the enemies, not only of the woman, not only of the queen, but of royalty itself."

"He will not believe, the double brute!" cried Taverney.

"You have spoken to me as you would speak before God?"

"Yes, truly."

"Before God, to whom you draw nearer every day?"

The young man had continued the conversation which he had himself so disdainfully interrupted. This was a point gained by the old man, and he came toward him.

"It seems to me, my son," replied he, "that I am a gentleman, and that I do not lie — always."

That "always" was slightly humorous, but Philippe did not smile.

"It is, then, your opinion that the queen has had lovers?"

"Certainly."

"Those whom you have named?"

"And others for ought I know. Ask all the town and the court. One must have just returned from America, to be ignorant of all that is said about the queen."

"And who says this, Monsieur, — vile pamphleteers?"

"Oh! do you, then, take me for a pamphleteer?"

"No; and therein lies the evil, — that men like you repeat such calumnies, which but for that would melt away like the unwholesome vapors which sometimes obscure the most brilliant sunshine; but you and others like you, repeating them, give them a terrible stability. Oh, Monsieur! in the name of religion, do not repeat such things!"

"I do repeat them, however."

"And why do you repeat them?" cried Philippe, stamping his foot.

"Eh!" said the old man, seizing his son's arm and leering at him with his devilish smile, "to prove to you that I was not wrong when I said, 'Philippe, the queen looks back; she is looking for you. Philippe, the queen wishes for you; run to her.'"

"Oh!" cried the young man, hiding his face in his hands, "for God's sake, not another word, father; you will drive me mad!"

"Really, Philippe, I do not understand you. Is it a crime to love? It shows that one has a heart; and in the eyes of this woman, in her voice, in her motions, — is not her heart to be perceived? She loves, she loves, I tell you. But you are a philosopher, a Puritan, a Quaker, an American; you do not love. Well, then, let her look; let her turn around; let her wait, — insult her, despise her, repulse her, Philippe, that is to say, Joseph, de Taverney."

Having spoken these words, accentuated with a savage irony, the little old man, seeing the effect he had produced, fled like the serpent who was the first tempter into crime.

Philippe remained alone, — his heart swelling and his blood boiling. He was hardly aware that he remained for half an hour fixed to one spot; that the queen had finished her ride upon the lake; that she was returning; that she looked at him, and from the midst of her cortège called out in passing, "You must be rested now, Monsieur de Taverney; come, then, for there is no one like you to guide a queen royally. Make way, gentlemen."

Philippe ran to her, dazzled, stunned, intoxicated. He placed his hand on the back of the sledge, but started as though he had burned his fingers; the queen had thrown herself negligently back in the sledge, and the fingers of the young man touched the locks of Marie Antoinette.

CHAPTER XI.

THE "SUFFREN."

CONTRARY to the usual habits of a court, the secret had been faithfully kept by Louis XVI. and the Comte d'Artois. No one knew at what time or in what manner Monsieur de Suffren would arrive.

The king had announced a card party for the evening; and at seven o'clock he entered with the princes and princesses of his family. The queen came, holding by the hand the Princess Royal, then only seven years old. The assembly was numerous and brilliant. During the preliminaries of the meeting, while all were taking their places, the Comte d'Artois softly approached the queen, and said, "Look around you carefully, sister."

"Well?"

"What do you see?"

The queen looked all around, and seeing friends everywhere, among them Andrée and her brother, said, "I see only very agreeable faces, — the faces of friends."

"Rather, then, whom do you not see?"

"Ah, it is indeed true!" she cried.

The Comte d'Artois laughed.

"Again absent," resumed the queen. "Ah! shall I always thus put him to flight?"

"It is not that," said the Comte d'Artois; "it is only a continuation of the joke. Monsieur de Provence has gone to wait at the barrier for Monsieur de Suffren."

"Well, I do not see why you laugh at that; he has been the most cunning after all, and will be the first to receive, and pay his compliments to this gentleman."

"Come, dear sister," replied the young prince, laughing, "you have a very mean opinion of our diplomacy. Monsieur de Provence has gone to meet him at Fontainebleau, but we have sent some one to meet him at Villejuif; so that my brother will waste his time at the barrier, while our messenger will conduct Monsieur de Suffren straight to Versailles, without passing through Paris at all."

"That is excellently imagined."

"It is not bad, I flatter myself; but make up your game, sister."

There were at that moment in the card-room at least a hundred persons of the highest rank, — including Monsieur de Condé, Monsieur de Penthièvre, Monsieur de Trémouille, and the princesses.

The king alone noticed that Monsieur d'Artois was making the queen laugh, and guessing what it was about, gave them a significant glance, to show that he shared their amusement.

The news of the arrival of Monsieur de Suffren had been suppressed, as we have said; but there was a general, undefined anticipation of some unusual event, and all minds were preoccupied and expectant. Even the king, who was in the habit of playing six-franc pieces, in order to moderate the play of the court, placed on the table all the money he had in his pockets, without intending to do so. The queen, however, playing her part with more skill, diverted attention by her pretended interest in the game.

Philippe, admitted to the party, and placed opposite his sister, was absorbed in thoughts of the astounding, stupefying degree of favor unexpectedly shown to him. The words of his father recurred to his mind. He asked himself if, indeed, this old man who had seen so much of courts was not right. He asked himself if that puritanism which confines itself to a religious adoration was not an additional absurdity which he had brought from a foreign land. This queen, so charming, so beautiful, and so friendly toward him, was she indeed only a terrible coquette, anxious to add one lover more to her list, as the entomologist transfixes a new insect or a butterfly, without thinking of the tortures of the poor creature whose heart he is piercing? "Coigny, Vaudreuil," he repeated to himself, "they have loved the queen, and have been loved by her; oh, why does this calumny haunt me so, or why will not some ray of light illumine that profound abyss, a woman's heart, — still more profound when it is the heart of a queen?"

Then Philippe turned his eyes to the other end of the table, where, by a strange chance, these gentlemen were sitting side by side, and both apparently forgetful of, and insensible to, the presence of the queen. He said to himself that it was impossible that these men could have loved and be so calm, or that they could have been loved, and could be so forgetful. Oh, were it he the queen loved, he should go wild with joy; if after loving him she were to forget him, he would kill himself in despair. From Messieurs de Coigny and de Vaudreuil, Philippe turned to look at Marie Antoinette herself. He interrogated that brow so pure, that mouth so imperious, that look so majestic; he sought in the charms of the woman to discover the secret of the queen. "Oh, no! calumnies, calumnies! only vague rumors, beginning to circulate among the people, to which the hatreds, the interests, and the intrigues of the court alone give any stability."

Philippe was at this point in his reflections when the clock in the guard-room struck a quarter to eight. At the same moment a loud noise was heard; there were hurried steps; the butts of muskets struck the floor; a confusion of voices heard through the half-open door attracted the attention of the king, who threw back his head to listen, and then made a sign to the queen. She understood the sign, and immediately broke up the game. The players, gathering up the money, awaited some indication from the queen. The queen entered the large reception-hall, whither the king had already gone.

An aide-de-camp of Monsieur de Castries, Minister of the Navy, approached the king and said a few words to him in a low voice.

"Very well," replied the king. Then turning to the queen, he added, "All goes well."

Every one questioned his neighbor with a glance, — the "All goes well" giving them much to think of.

Suddenly Monsieur le Maréchal de Castries entered the hall, saying, in a loud voice, "Will your Majesty receive Monsieur le Bailli de Suffren, who has just arrived from Toulon?"

At that name, uttered in a loud, joyous, and triumphant tone, an indescribable tumult arose in the assembly.

"Yes, Monsieur," replied the king; "and with great pleasure."

Monsieur de Castries left the hall. The whole company made a movement toward the door by which he had disappeared.

To explain this interest in Monsieur de Suffren, and why king, queen, princes, and ministers contended who should be the first to receive him, a few words will suffice.

Suffren is a name essentially French, like Turenne, like Catinat, like Jean Bart. Since the last war with England, Monsieur de Suffren had fought seven great naval battles, without sustaining a defeat. He had taken Trincomalee and Gondalore, assured the French possessions, scoured the seas, and taught the nabob Hyder Ali that France was the first power in Europe. He had carried into his profession all the skill of an able diplomatist, all the bravery and all the strategy of a soldier, and all the prudence of a wise ruler. Hardy, indefatigable, and proud when the honor of the French flag was in question, he had harassed the English, by land and by sea, till even those proud sailors never dared to complete a victory partially won, or to try an attack on Suffren when the lion showed his teeth. But after the battle in which he risked his life like the meanest sailor, he ever showed himself humane, generous, and compassionate. We will not attempt to describe the noise and enthusiasm which his arrival at Versailles elicited from the gentlemen invited to this assembly.

Suffren was now about fifty-six years of age, stout and short, with an eye of fire, and a noble carriage; like a man accustomed to surmount all difficulties, he had dressed in his travelling-carriage. He wore a blue coat embroidered with gold, a red waistcoat, and blue trousers. He had retained the military stiff cravat over which his massive chin rounded itself as the necessary complement of his colossal head. When he had entered the guard-room, some one whispered a word to Monsieur de Castries, who was impatiently walking back and forth, and who immediately cried out, "Monsieur de Suffren, gentlemen!" Immediately the guards, seizing their muskets, drew themselves up in line as if to receive the king of France; and De Suffren having passed them, they formed behind him, in good order, four by four, as if to serve him as an escort. He, pressing the hands of Monsieur de Castries, sought to embrace him. But the Minister of the Navy gently repelled him. "No, no, Monsieur," said he; "no,

I will not take the pleasure of first embracing you from one who is more worthy of that honor than myself." And he conducted Monsieur de Suffren into the presence of Louis XVI.

"Monsieur de Suffren!" cried the king, with a radiant countenance. "Welcome to Versailles. You bring to it glory; you bring to it all that heroes give to their contemporaries on earth. I do not speak to you of the future; that is your property. Embrace me, Monsieur de Suffren."

Monsieur de Suffren had already bent his knee. The king raised him and embraced him so cordially that a prolonged murmur of joy and triumph ran through the assembly. But for the respect due to the king, all present would have broken out in shouts of applause.

The king turned toward the queen. "Madame," said he, "this is Monsieur de Suffren, the conqueror of Trincomalee and of Gondalore, the terror of the English, — my own Jean Bart."

"Monsieur," said the queen, "I wish you to know that you have not fired a shot for the glory of France, but my heart has beat with admiration and gratitude."

When she ceased, the Comte d'Artois approached with his son, the Duc d'Angoulême. "My son," said he, "you see a hero; look at him well, for it is a rare sight."

"Monseigneur," replied the young prince, "I have read about the great men in Plutarch, but I could not see them; I thank you for showing me Monsieur de Suffren."

The young duke might know, from the murmur of approbation which he heard around him, that he had said something that would not soon be forgotten.

The king now took the arm of Monsieur de Suffren, in order to lead him to his study, and talk to him of his travels; but he made a respectful resistance.

"Sire," said he, "will you permit me, since your Majesty has shown me so much goodness —"

"Oh, whatever you wish, Monsieur."

"Sire, one of my officers has committed so grave a fault against discipline, that I thought your Majesty ought to be sole judge of the offence."

"Oh, Monsieur de Suffren, I hoped your first request would be for a favor, and not for a punishment."

"Your Majesty, as I have had the honor to say, shall judge what ought to be done. In the last battle the officer of whom I speak was on board the 'Sévère.'"

"Oh, the ship that struck her flag," cried the king, frowning.

"Yes, Sire, the captain of the 'Sévère' had indeed struck his flag, and already the English admiral had despatched a boat to take possession of his prize, when the lieutenant in command of the guns of the middle deck, perceiving that the firing above had ceased, and having received orders to stop his own fire, went on deck. He saw the flag lowered, and the captain ready to surrender. I ask your Majesty's pardon, Sire; but at this sight all his French blood revolted. He seized the flag, which lay within reach, caught up a hammer, ordered all hands to resume firing, and climbing aloft, nailed the flag to the mast, close under the pennant. It was by this action, Sire, that the 'Sévère' was preserved to your Majesty."

"A splendid action!" cried the king and queen, at once.

"Yes, Sire; yes, Madame; but a grave fault against discipline. The order had been given by the captain, and the lieutenant ought to have obeyed; I, however, ask for the pardon of the officer, and with the greater earnestness, as he is my own nephew."

"Your nephew!" cried the king, "and you have never mentioned him?"

"Not to you, Sire, but I made my report to the Minister of the Navy, begging him not to speak of the matter to your Majesty until I had obtained pardon for the offender."

"Granted! granted!" exclaimed the king; "and I promise my protection to every disobedient person who shall thus vindicate the honor of the flag and of the king of France. You should have presented that officer to me, Monsieur de Suffren."

"He is here," said De Suffren; "and since your Majesty permits —" He turned around. "Approach, Monsieur de Charny," he said.

The queen started. This name awakened in her mind a recollection too recent to be effaced.

Then a young officer stepped forth from a group formed near Monsieur de Suffren, and suddenly appeared before the king.

The queen had made a movement to go forward to meet the young man, roused to enthusiasm as she was by the recital of his noble action. But when she saw the officer whom Monsieur de Suffren was presenting to the king, and heard his name, she paused, turned pale, and uttered a slight murmur.

Mademoiselle de Taverney also turned pale and looked anxiously at the queen.

As for Monsieur de Charny, without seeing anything, without showing any other emotion but that of respect, he bowed before the king, who gave him his hand to kiss; then he returned, modest and trembling, to the circle of officers, who loudly congratulated him and overwhelmed him with attentions.

There was, then, a moment of silence and emotion, during which one might have seen the king radiant, the queen smiling and undecided, Monsieur de Charny with downcast eyes, and Philippe, who had not failed to notice the emotion of the queen, anxious and inquiring.

"Come, come," said the king, at last,— "come, Monsieur de Suffren, come and talk with me; I am eager to hear you and prove to you how much I have thought of you."

"Sire, so much goodness —"

"Oh, you shall see my charts, Monsieur de Suffren; you shall see that every phase of your expedition was foreseen or planned in advance, in my solicitude. Come, come." Then after going a few steps, dragging Monsieur de Suffren with him, he suddenly turned to the queen, "By the by, Madame," he said, "I am about to have built, as you know, a vessel of one hundred guns; I have changed my mind as to its name. Instead of calling it as we had agreed, is it not, Madame —"

Marie Antoinette, being somewhat restored to self-possession, instantly caught the king's idea. "Yes, yes," said she, "we will call it the 'Suffren,' and I will stand sponsor, together with Monsieur de Suffren."

Shouts, until then restrained, burst forth wildly, "Long live the king! long live the queen!"

"And long live the 'Suffren!'" added the king, with exquisite delicacy; for no one could shout, "Long live Monsieur de Suffren!" in presence of the king, while the most careful observers of etiquette might cry, "Long live his Majesty's ship!"

"Long live the 'Suffren!'" repeated, therefore, the whole assemblage with enthusiasm.

The king made a sign to thank them for having so quickly caught his meaning, and led Monsieur de Suffren away with him.

CHAPTER XII.

MONSIEUR DE CHARNY.

As soon as the king had disappeared, all the princes and princesses in the room grouped themselves about the queen.

Monsieur de Suffren had made a sign requesting his nephew to await his return; and with a low bow of assent, he remained in the group as before.

The queen, who had exchanged with Andrée many significant glances, hardly lost sight of the young man, and every time she looked at him she said to herself, "It is he, certainly."

To which Mademoiselle de Taverney replied in pantomime in such a way as to leave no doubt in the queen's mind, for it meant, "Oh, good Heavens! yes, Madame; it is he, it is certainly he!"

Philippe, as we have before said, noticed this preoccupation of the queen; he saw it, and if he did not actually understand its cause, at least he had a vague sense of it.

Those who love are never mistaken in the impression they receive from those they love. He guessed therefore that the queen had just been affected by some mysterious event unknown to everybody but herself and Andrée.

Indeed, the queen had been confused, and sought refuge behind her fan, — she who usually made every one lower their eyes before her.

While the young man was wondering what this preoccupation of the queen could mean; while he was trying to read the countenances of Coigny and Vaudreuil to assure himself that they were not concerned in the mystery, and observing that they were very much occupied in talking with Monsieur de Haga, who had come to Versailles to present himself to their Majesties,—a personage, clothed in the majestic robe of a cardinal, followed by officers and prelates, entered the salon.

The queen recognized Monsieur Louis de Rohan; she saw him crossing the room, and immediately she turned away her head without even taking the trouble to conceal the frown upon her brow.

The prelate passed by the whole company without saluting any one, and came straight to the queen, before whom he bowed, as a man of the world saluting a lady rather than as a subject saluting a queen. Then he addressed a very gallant compliment to her Majesty, who scarcely turned her head, murmured two or three cold words of ceremony, and resumed her conversation with Madame de Lamballe and Madame de Polignac.

Prince Louis appeared not to notice the chilling reception of the queen. He made his bows, turned away without haste, and with the grace of a perfect courtier addressed himself to the aunts of the king, with whom he conversed a long time, receiving from them a reception as cordial as that of the queen had been cold.

Cardinal Louis de Rohan was a man in the prime of life, of imposing figure, and of noble bearing; his face shone with intelligence and gentleness; his mouth was well cut and handsome; and his hands were beautiful. A premature baldness indicated either a man of pleasure or a man devoted to study,—and he was both. He was much sought after by women, who liked his gallantry, dignified and quiet; he was noted for his magnificence. He had, indeed, found a way to feel himself poor with an income of sixteen hundred thousand francs.

The king liked him because he was learned; the queen, on the contrary, hated him. The reasons for this hate were twofold: first, when ambassador to Vienna, he had written to Louis XV. letters so full of sarcasm on Maria Theresa that her daughter had never forgiven him; and he had also written letters opposing her marriage, which had been read aloud by Louis XV. at a supper at Madame Dubarry's. The embassy at Vienna had been taken from Monsieur de Breteuil and given to Monsieur de Rohan. The former gentleman, not strong enough to avenge himself alone, had procured copies of these letters, which he had laid before the dauphiness, thus making her the eternal enemy of Monsieur de Rohan.

This hatred rendered the cardinal's position at court not a little uncomfortable. Every time he presented himself before the queen he met with the same discouraging reception. In spite of this he neglected no occasion of being near her, for which he had frequent opportunities, as he was chaplain to the court; and he never complained of the treatment he received. A circle of friends, among whom the Baron de Planta, a German officer, was the most intimate, helped to console him for these royal rebuffs, not to speak of the ladies of the court, who by no means imitated the severity of the queen toward him.

The cardinal had just passed as a shadow over the pleasing picture which the queen saw in imagination. When he was gone therefore, Marie Antoinette recovered her serenity, and said to Madame de Lamballe, "Do you not think that this action of the nephew of Monsieur de Suffren is one of the most remarkable during the war? By the way, what is his name?"

"Monsieur de Charny, I believe," replied the princess; "was it not, Mademoiselle de Taverney?" she said, turning to Andrée.

"Yes, your Highness," replied Andrée.

"Monsieur de Charny shall describe it to us himself," said the queen; "is he still here? Let him be sought for."

An officer who stood near hastened to obey her. At the same instant, on looking round, she saw Philippe, and said impatiently, "Monsieur de Taverney, why do you not search?"

Philippe colored, and went to find the happy officer; as he had not lost sight of him since his presentation, his task was not difficult.

Monsieur de Charny appeared immediately between the two messengers, and the circle around the queen made room for him to approach; the queen had then an opportunity to examine him more attentively than had been possible the evening before.

He was a young man, about twenty-eight years of age, tall, and well made; his face, animated and yet sweet, took a character of singular energy when he spoke and dilated his large blue eyes; and he was, strange to say of one who had been fighting in India, as fair as Philippe was dark.

When he approached the group, in the centre of which stood the queen, De Charny gave not the slightest intimation that he recognized either Mademoiselle de Taverney or the queen herself. Surrounded by officers asking all sorts of questions, to which he civilly replied, he seemed to forget that there was a king who had spoken to him, or a queen who had looked favorably upon him.

That politeness, that reserve, was of a kind to elicit still further interest on the part of the queen, herself so careful in all that related to social usages. It was not only that he concealed from others his surprise on meeting so unexpectedly the lady of the fiacre; he even rose to that height of gallantry that he would, if he could, allow the lady to believe herself unrecognized.

"Monsieur de Charny," said the queen, "these ladies have the wish — a wish quite natural, which I share with them — to hear about the affair of the ship in all its particulars. Tell us about it, I beg of you."

"Madame," replied the young officer, in the midst of a profound silence, "I beg your Majesty to spare me the recital, not from modesty, but from humanity. What I did as lieutenant of the 'Sévère' a dozen other officers doubtless wished to do, only I was the first to put it in execution; and it is not worthy being made the subject of a narration to your Majesty. Besides, the captain of the 'Sévère' is a brave officer, who on that day lost his presence of mind. Alas, Madame! we all know that the most courageous are not always equally brave. He wanted but ten minutes to recover himself; my determination not to surrender gave him this breathing time. His natural courage returned to him, and from that moment he showed himself the bravest of us all. Therefore, I beg your Majesty not to exaggerate the merit of my action, and thereby crush this deserving officer, who deplores incessantly the forgetfulness of a single moment."

"Right!" said the queen, touched, and radiant with joy at hearing the murmur of satisfaction which the generous words of the young officer had raised about her; "you are a true gentleman, Monsieur de Charny, and such I already know you to be."

The young man colored, and looked almost frightened at Andrée, fearing what the queen's rash generosity might lead her to say.

"For," continued the intrepid queen, "I must tell you all that this is not the first time I have heard of Monsieur de Charny, who deserves to be known and admired by all ladies." It was at once perceived that the queen was about to relate a story, from which every one might glean either some petty scandal or some little secret. They made a circle, therefore, and listened in silence.

"You must know," said the queen, "that Monsieur de Charny is as considerate toward the ladies as he is pitiless toward the English. I have heard a little story about him which, I tell you in advance, does him the greatest honor, in my opinion."

"Oh, Madame!" stammered the young man, who felt as if he would have given a year of his life to be back in India.

It may readily be imagined that the words of the queen, uttered in the presence of him whom they concerned, only redoubled curiosity.

"This, then, is it," continued the queen, to her eager listeners: "Two ladies, whom I know, were detained out late, and became embarrassed in a crowd; they ran a great risk, a real danger threatened them. Happily, Monsieur de Charny passed by at the moment; he dispersed the crowd, and although the two ladies were unknown to him, and it was impossible to recognize their rank, he took them under his protection and escorted them a long way, — ten leagues from Paris, I believe."

"Oh, your Majesty exaggerates!" said Monsieur de Charny, laughing, and now quite reassured.

"Well, we will call it five," said the Comte d'Artois, suddenly joining in the conversation.

"Let it be five, then, brother," said the queen; "but the most admirable part of the story is that Monsieur de Charny did not seek even to know the names of these ladies whom he had served; but left them at the place where they wished to stop, and went away without even looking back, so that they escaped from his protecting hands without even a moment's disquietude."

All exclaimed, admired. Charny was complimented by twenty ladies at once.

"This was noble, was it not?" added the queen; "a knight of the Round Table could not have done better."

"It was superb!" exclaimed the chorus.

"Monsieur de Charny, as the king will doubtless take upon himself to reward Monsieur de Suffren, your uncle, I, for my part, wish to do something for the nephew of that great man."

As she spoke she held out her hand to him, and Charny, pale with joy, pressed his lips to this beautiful hand, while Philippe, pale with grief, looked on from an obscure corner.

Andrée had also turned pale, and yet she could not conceive all that her brother was suffering.

The voice of Monsieur d'Artois interrupted this scene, saying loudly, "Ah, Provence! you come too late! you have missed a fine sight, the reception of Monsieur de Suffren. Really, it was one that a Frenchman can never forget. How the devil did it happen that you were not here, — you, brother, who are noted for your punctuality?"

Monsieur de Provence bit his lips with vexation, bowed absently to the queen, and replied in words without special significance. Then he whispered to Monsieur de Favras, his captain of the guards, "How does it happen that Monsieur de Suffren is at Versailles?"

"Ah, Monseigneur! I have been asking myself that question for the last hour, and have not yet found an answer."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE HUNDRED LOUIS.

Now that we have introduced to our readers the principal characters of this history, or rather have renewed their acquaintance with them; now that we have taken them, both into the pleasure-house of the Comte d'Artois, and into the king's palace at Versailles, — we will return to that house in the Rue Saint Claude where we saw the queen enter incognito, accompanied by Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney.

We left Madame de La Motte counting over, in great delight, the fifty double louis which had fallen to her so miraculously from the sky, — fifty beautiful double louis, each worth forty-eight francs, which spread out on the poor table seemed by their aristocratic presence to intensify the power of the humble garret. After the pleasure of possessing, Madame de La Motte knew no greater than that of displaying. The possession was of no value if it did not excite envy. For some time it had been repugnant to her feelings that her maid was acquainted with her poverty; she now hastened to confide to her this good fortune. She called Dame Clotilde, who was still in the antechamber, and placed the lamp in such a position that the gold would shine with brilliancy on the table.

When she entered, "Come and look here!" said her mistress.

"Oh, Madame!" cried the old woman, clasping her hands in astonishment.

"You were uneasy about your wages," said the countess.

"Oh, Madame! I never said that; I only asked Madame if she could pay me, which was very natural, as I had received nothing for three months."

"Do you think there is enough there to pay you?"

"Oh, Madame! if I had all that I should be rich for the rest of my life."

Madame de La Motte looked at the old woman, shrugging her shoulders with a movement of inexpressible disdain.

"It is very fortunate," she said, "that certain persons have some recollection of the name I bear, while those who ought to remember it seem to forget it."

"But in what way will Madame spend all this money?"

"In every way."

"The first thing, I think, Madame, will be to furnish the kitchen; for you will have good dinners cooked now, will you not, — now that you have money?"

"Listen!" said Madame de La Motte; "some one knocks."

"Madame is mistaken," said the old woman, always economical of her steps.

"But I tell you it is so; go at once."

"I heard nothing."

"Yes; as you heard nothing a little while ago. Well! suppose the two ladies had gone away without entering?"

This reasoning seemed to convince Clotilde, who started for the door.

"Do you hear now?" cried Madame de La Motte.

"Ah, it is true; I am going, I am going."

Madame de La Motte hastily gathered up her money, and put it into a drawer, murmuring, "Oh if Providence will but send me another hundred louis!" And these words were spoken with an expression of such irreverent cupidity that they would have made Voltaire smile. Then she heard the steps of a man below, but could not distinguish what he said. Soon, however, the door opened, and Clotilde came in with a letter.

The countess examined it attentively, and asked, "Was this brought by a servant?"

"Yes, Madame."

"In livery?"

"No, Madame."

"I know these arms," said Jeanne to herself, glancing again at the seal. Then, bringing it to the lamp, — "Gules with nine mascles or. Who, then, bears gules with nine mascles or? But the letter will tell," and opening it, she read: "Madame, the person whom you have solicited will see you to-morrow evening, if it be agreeable to you to open your door." And that was all.

"I have written to so many people," thought the countess. "Let me reflect a little; to whom have I written? To every one. Is this a man or a woman? The writing is no guide, nor is the style; it might come from either." Then she repeated, "'the person whom you have solicited' — the phrase shows a purpose to humiliate, — it is certainly from a woman. '— If it be agreeable to you to open your door.' A woman would have said, 'Will expect you to-morrow evening,' — it is a man. And yet those ladies came here yesterday, and certainly they were of high rank. No signature — Who, then, bears gules with nine mascles or? Oh!" she broke out, "have I lost my head? — the Rohans, pardieu! Yes, I wrote to Monsieur de Guémenée, and to Monsieur de Rohan; one of them has answered. But the shield is not quartered, — it is therefore the cardinal. Ah, Monsieur de Rohan! the man of gallantry, the ladies' man, the man of ambition.

He will come to see Madame de La Motte, if Madame de La Motte will open her door to him. Good! he need not be anxious; the door will be open. And when? To-morrow evening." She paused and reflected. "A sister of charity, who gives a hundred louis, may be received in a garret, freeze in my cold room, and suffer on my chairs, as hard as Saint Lawrence's gridiron, though without fire; but a clerical prince, a ladies' man, — that is quite another thing. The misery visited by such an almoner must be attended by more luxury than some among those called rich can easily afford."

Then turning to Clotilde, who was getting her bed ready, she said, "Be sure to call me early to-morrow morning." Then doubtless that she might meditate more quietly, she made a sign to the old woman to leave her.

Clotilde stirred up the fire, which had been covered with ashes to give the room a more miserable appearance, and retired to the loft in which she slept.

Jeanne de Valois, instead of sleeping, was making plans all night long. She took notes in pencil by the light of the night-lamp; then having arranged her programme for the next day, she allowed herself, toward three o'clock in the morning, to sink into a sleep from which Clotilde, who had slept very little more than she, came, in obedience to her orders, to rouse her at break of day. Toward eight o'clock she had finished her toilet, which consisted of an elegant silk gown and a tasteful head-dress. Her shoes were such as were suitable both for the lady of rank and for the pretty woman; she wore a patch on her left cheek. She sent to the Rue Pont-au-Choux for a two-wheeled chaise. She would have preferred a sedan-chair, but it would have been necessary to send to a great distance for one.

This rolling chair was drawn by a robust Auvergnese, who was ordered to leave Madame at the Place Royale, where, under the arcades on the southern side, on the ground-floor of an old deserted mansion was the shop of Monsieur Fingret, an upholsterer, who had second-hand furniture for sale and to let at the lowest prices.

The Auvergnese wheeled his customer rapidly from the Rue Saint Claude to the Place Royale; so that ten minutes after setting out the countess reached the warehouses of Monsieur Fingret, where we shall find her presently admiring and choosing, in a kind of pandemonium of which we will endeavor to give a sketch.

Let the reader imagine warehouses fifty feet long by thirty feet wide, with a height of seventeen feet; upon the walls tapestries of the reign of Henri IV. and Louis XIII.; the ceilings hidden by the number of objects suspended, — chandeliers of the seventeenth century side by side with stuffed lizards, church lamps, and flying fishes.

On the floor were piles of carpeting and matting, furniture with twisted pillars and square feet, buffets of carved oak, Louis XV. consoles with gilt claws, sofas covered with rose-colored damask or Utrecht velvet, couches, capacious easy-chairs of leather, such as Sully liked, ebony wardrobes with panels in relief and brass mouldings, Boule tables with porcelain or enamelled tops, complete toilet-sets, desks inlaid with designs of musical instruments or flowers, and bedsteads in rosewood or in oak, with canopies. Curtains of every shape, of every design, of every kind of stuff, are hanging in confusion, their colors harmonizing or contrasting in every part of the warehouse. There were harpsichords, spinnets, harps, lyres, upon a table, and one might see the dog of Malborough, stuffed, with eyes of enamel. Then there was linen of every quality; dresses were to be seen hanging side by side with velvet coats, and swords with hilts of steel, silver, or mother-of pearl. There were candlesticks, ancestral portraits, engravings, and all the imitations of Vernet, who was then in vogue, — that Vernet to whom the queen said so gracefully and so wittily, "Decidedly, Monsieur Vernet, you are the only one in France who can make both rain and fine weather."

CHAPTER XIV.

MONSIEUR FINGRET.

MADAME DE LA MOTTE, once admitted to view all these riches, understood for the first time how much she needed in the Rue Saint Claude. She needed a drawing-room to hold sofas and easy-chairs; a dining-room for tables and sideboards; a boudoir for Persian curtains, screens, and pretty tables; in short, what she needed most, if she had the drawing-room, dining-room, and boudoir, was money to buy furniture to put in this new apartment.

But with the upholsterers of Paris there has always been an opportunity for easy transactions, and we have never heard it said that a young and pretty woman had died on the threshold of a door which she was unable to get opened for her. In Paris, what one cannot buy he can hire, and it is the renters of furnished apartments who have given rise to the proverb, "To see is to have."

Madame de La Motte, in the hope of securing a suitable apartment, chose, after measuring some of the articles, a set of furniture of yellow silk with gilt nails, which had pleased her at first sight. She was a brunette.

But this set of furniture of ten pieces could never find room in the fifth story in the Rue Saint Claude. In order to arrange everything it would be necessary to hire the third story, — consisting of an antechamber, dining-room, parlor, and bedroom. She might, she thought, receive on the third story the alms of cardinals, and on the fifth those of the bureaux of charity, — that is to say, receive in luxury those who give from ostentation, and in poverty the offerings of prejudiced persons who prefer giving to those only who are in need.

The countess, having made her decision, turned her eyes toward the obscurer portion of the warehouse, — that is, toward the place where the most splendid things were displayed. There she saw, standing hat in hand, with an impatient manner, the figure of a Parisian citizen, who twirled a key with his fingers and looked at her with a slight smile of condescension. That worthy man was no other than Monsieur Fingret himself, to whom his clerks had announced her arrival.

The same clerks might now be seen in the court-yard, occupied in the renovating of old furniture. Monsieur Fingret, fearing that his customer might observe the operations of his clerks and thus gain an insight into his methods prejudicial to his interests, closed the door which opened into the court-yard, — "for fear the dust might blind Madame — "

That "Madame — " was an interrogation.

"Madame la Comtesse de La Motte Valois," replied Jeanne, carelessly.

Monsieur Fingret, on hearing this high-sounding title, put his key in his pocket and approached the countess. "Oh!" said he, "there is nothing here suitable for Madame; I have furniture that is new, beautiful, magnificent. Madame la Comtesse must not imagine that the house of Fingret has not as handsome furniture as the king's upholsterer. Leave all this, Madame, if you please, and let me show you the other warehouse."

Jeanne colored. All this had seemed so splendid to her, — too splendid even to hope to possess it; and Monsieur Fingret's exalted opinion of her perplexed her not a little. She regretted that she had not announced herself as a simple bourgeoise; but a skilful mind can withdraw with advantage from the most awkward situations.

"Nothing new, Monsieur," she said; "I do not want it."

"Madame has doubtless some friend's apartments to furnish."

"Precisely," she replied, "a friend's apartment. Now, you understand that for a friend's apartment — "

"Certainly, — if Madame will but choose," said Monsieur Fingret, who had no pride to prevent his selling old furniture instead of new, if he could make as much money on it.

"This set," said Jeanne, pointing to the one in yellow silk.

"Oh, but that is such a small set, Madame; there are only ten pieces."

"The chamber is not large," replied the countess.

"It is nearly new, as Madame may see."

"Yes, — for second-hand."

"Certainly," said Monsieur Fingret, smiling; "but, in short, such as it is, it is worth eight hundred francs."

That price made the countess tremble; and how was she to confess that the heiress of the Valois was content with second-hand things, and then could not afford to pay eight hundred francs for them. She thought the best thing to do was to appear angry. "Why," she said, "who thinks of buying, Monsieur? How could you imagine that I would buy such trash? I only want to hire."

Fingret made a grimace, — his customer began gradually to lose her value in his eyes. It was no longer a question of selling new furniture, or even old; the transaction had dwindled to a mere hiring. "You wish it for a year?" he asked.

"No, for only a month. It is for some one coming from the country."

"It will be one hundred francs a month."

"You jest, surely, Monsieur; why, in eight months I should have paid the full price of it."

"Granted, Madame la Comtesse."

"Well, and what then?"

"Why, then, Madame, if it belongs to you it will no longer belong to me; and I shall not have the trouble of repairing it, and making it new again,—which costs money."

Madame de La Motte reflected: "One hundred francs a month is very dear, certainly; but either I can return it at the end of that time, and say it is too dear, or I shall then perhaps be in a situation to buy. I thought of spending five, or six, hundred francs; let us do things in style, and spend three hundred."

"I will take it," she said, "with curtains to match."

"Yes, Madame."

"And carpets?"

"Here they are."

"What can you give me for another room?"

"These oak chairs, this table with twisted legs, and green damask curtains."

"Good; and for a bedroom?"

"A large and handsome bed, a counterpane of velvet, embroidered in rose-color and silver, excellent mattresses, blue curtains, and chimney ornaments in the Gothic style, but richly gilt."

"And for the dressing-room?"

"A toilet-table, hung with Mechlin lace; a chest of drawers, delicately ornamented with inlaid wood; a chiffonniere to match; sofa and chairs, covered with tapestry, and elegant fire-irons from the bedroom of Madame de Pompadour at Choissy."

"All this for what price?"

"For a month?"

"Yes."

"Four hundred francs."

"Come, Monsieur Fingret, do not take me for a grisette, to be dazzled by your fine descriptions. Please to reflect that you are asking at the rate of four thousand eight hundred francs a year, and for that I can take a house all furnished."

Monsieur Fingret scratched his ear.

"You disgust me with the Place Royale," continued the countess.

"I am very sorry, Madame."

"Prove it, then; I will give only three hundred francs for all that furniture."

Jeanne pronounced these words with so much authority that the merchant began again to think she might be worth conciliating.

"So be it, then, Madame."

"And on one condition, Monsieur Fingret."

"What, Madame?"

"That everything be arranged in its proper place by three o'clock."

"But consider, Madame, it is now ten."

"Can you do it, or not?"

"Where are they to go?"

"To the Rue Saint Claude in the Marais."

"Ah, two steps from here?"

"Precisely."

The upholsterer opened a door, and called, "Sylvain! Landry! Rémy!"

Three of the apprentices came running in, delighted to have a pretext for leaving their work, as well as a chance to see the fine lady.

"The carts and the trucks instantly. Rémy, you may take this yellow furniture; Sylvain, you take that for the dining-room; and you, Landry, that for the bedroom. We will make out the list, and if you please, Madame, I will receipt it."

"Here are six double louis, and a single louis," said the countess; "give me the change."

"Here are twelve francs, Madame."

"Of which I will give six to these gentlemen, if they do their work well;" and having given her address she returned to her wheeled chair.

An hour later she had rented the apartment on the third floor, and in less than two hours the work of furnishing the salon, the antechamber, and the bedroom was progressing rapidly. Messieurs Landry, Rémy, and Sylvain earned their six francs, with ten minutes to spare.

The lodgings thus transformed, the windows cleaned, and the fires lighted, Jeanne applied herself to making her toilet, and for two hours she was happy. She felt under her feet a thick carpet; around her were walls fittingly adorned; and she breathed a warm and perfumed atmosphere. Nothing had been forgotten; there were gilded branches from the walls for wax-lights, and glass lustres on each side of the mirror. Jeanne had also added flowers, to complete the embellishment of the paradise in which she intended to receive his Eminence. She took care even to leave the door of the bedroom a little open, through which the light of a bright fire gave a glimpse of the luxuries within.

Jeanne's coquetry went farther than this. If the light of the fire revealed the interior of that mysterious chamber, if the perfumes declared the woman, the woman herself showed signs of high birth, beauty, intelligence, taste, to make her worthy the attention of a cardinal. Her toilet was arranged with so much elegance that Monsieur de La Motte, her absent husband, might have asked of her some explanation.

After a light repast, Jeanne buried herself in a large easy-chair near the fire in her bedroom. With a book in her hand, and one foot resting on a stool, she waited, listening to the ticking of the clock and the rumbling of distant carriages. The clock struck nine, ten, and eleven; no one came, either in a carriage or on foot.

Eleven o'clock! That is the hour for gallant prelates, who, having quickened their charity by a supper in the suburbs, can then make their way easily to the Rue Saint Claude, and thus may congratulate themselves on being humane, philanthropic, and pious at slight cost.

Midnight sounded solemnly from the steeple of the Filles-du-Calvaire. No prelate, no carriage. The wax-lights began to wane; the fire, often renewed, was reduced to ashes; the heat in the two chambers was torrid.

The old servant lamented the damage to her cap, bedecked with ribbons, which as she nodded in her sleep came in contact with the flame or the melting wax of the candles.

At half-past twelve Jeanne rose, furious, from her easy-chair, which more than a hundred times she had left during the evening to open the window and search the dimly-lighted street. The neighborhood was as quiet as before the creation of the world. She directed Clotilde to undress her, refused supper, and dismissed the old woman, who was beginning to ask disagreeable questions. Left alone, amid her silken draperies, under her fine curtains, in her excellent bed, she slept no better than she had the night before.

However, in the course of her reflections, Jeanne found excuses for the cardinal. In the first place, this excuse:

the cardinal, being grand-almoner of the court, had in hand a thousand perplexing affairs, more important than a visit to the Rue Saint Claude. And then this other excuse: "He does not know this little Comtesse de Valois," — an excuse very comforting to Jeanne. Oh, certainly she would have been inconsolable if Monsieur de Rohan had failed in an appointment after making her a first visit! This excuse Jeanne wished to test, for her complete satisfaction. She sprang from her bed, lighted the candles, and in her white night-dress looked at herself a long time in the mirror. Then she smiled, blew out the lights, and jumped into bed. She had found this second excuse a good one.

CHAPTER XV.

CARDINAL DE ROHAN.

THE next evening Jeanne without any feeling of discouragement renewed all her preparations of the night before; and on this occasion she had no time to grow impatient, for at seven o'clock a carriage drove up to the door, from which a gentleman alighted while the carriage was driven into a neighboring by-street there to await his return. At the sound of the door-bell Jeanne's heart beat so loud that its pulsations might almost have been heard; however, she composed herself, arranged some embroidery upon the table, placed a new piece of music on her harpsichord, and a newspaper on a corner of the mantel-piece. In a few minutes Clotilde opened the door and announced "The person who wrote the day before yesterday."

"Let him come in," said Jeanne; and a gentleman, dressed in silk and velvet, and with a lofty carriage, entered the room.

Jeanne, who was displeased at the incognito which he tried to preserve, decided to take all the advantage which she had gained by her reflections. She made a step forward, "To whom have I the honor of speaking?" she said, with the manner of one who patronizes rather than of one who is patronized.

"I am the Cardinal de Rohan," he replied; at which Madame de La Motte, feigning to be overwhelmed with the honor, made a reverence as though he were a king.

Then she drew forward an easy-chair for him, and placed herself in another.

The cardinal, observing this freedom from ceremony, laid his hat on the table, and looking at Jeanne, began, "It is true, then, Mademoiselle —"

"Madame," interrupted Jeanne.

"Pardon me, I forgot. It is true, then, Madame —"

"My husband is called the Comte de La Motte, Monseigneur."

"Oh, yes; a gendarme, is he not?"

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"And you, Madame, are a Valois?"

"Valois; yes, Monseigneur."

"A great name," said the cardinal, crossing his legs, "but rare — believed extinct."

Jeanne divined the cardinal's doubt.

"Not extinct, Monseigneur, since I bear it myself and have a brother, Baron de Valois."

"Recognized?"

"That has nothing to do with it. Recognized or unrecognized, rich or poor, he is still what he was born, — Baron de Valois."

"Madame, please explain to me this descent; you interest me."

Jeanne repeated all that the reader already knows.

The cardinal listened and looked. He did not take the trouble to conceal his impressions. And why should he? He did not believe either in her rank or her merit; but she was poor and pretty. "So that," he said carelessly, when she had finished, "you have really been unfortunate."

"I do not complain, Monseigneur."

"Indeed, I had heard a most exaggerated account of the difficulties of your position. This lodging is commodious and well furnished."

"For a grisette, no doubt," replied Jeanne, impatient to begin the attack.

"What! do you call these rooms fit for a grisette?"

"I do not think you can call them fit for a princess," replied Jeanne.

"And you are a princess," said he, in that tone of nearly imperceptible irony which so very few persons know how to impart to their utterance without becoming impertinent.

"I was born a Valois, Monseigneur, as you were a Rohan," said Jeanne, with so much dignity that the feelings of the prince were not wounded and the feelings of the man were touched.

"Madame," said he, "I forgot that my first words should have been an apology. I wrote to you that I would come yesterday; but I had to go to Versailles, to assist at the reception of Monsieur de Suffren. I was therefore obliged to forego the pleasure of visiting you."

"Monseigneur does me too much honor in remembering me to-day, and my husband will more than ever regret the exile to which poverty compels him, since it prevents him from sharing this favor with me."

The word "husband" caught the attention of the cardinal. "You live alone, Madame?" he asked.

"Entirely alone."

"That is praiseworthy in a young and pretty woman."

"I should be out of place, Monseigneur, in all society but that from which my poverty debars me."

"The genealogists do not contest your claim?"

"No; but what does that avail me," said Jeanne, disdainfully, raising with a charming gesture the little powdered curls on her temples.

The cardinal drew his chair nearer to the fire, "Madame," continued he, "I shall be glad to know in what I can serve you."

"In nothing, Monseigneur," she said.

"What! in nothing? Be more frank."

"I cannot be more frank than I am, Monseigneur."

"You were complaining just now."

"Certainly, I complain."

"Well, then?"

"Well, then, Monseigneur, I see that your Eminence wishes to bestow charity on me."

"Oh, Madame!"

"Nothing else. I have taken charity, but I will receive it no more."

"What can you mean?"

"Monseigneur, for some time past I have been very much humiliated; I can endure it no longer."

"Madame, you are wrong; there is no humiliation in misfortune."

"Not even with the name I bear! Come, would you beg, Monsieur de Rohan?"

"I do not speak of myself," said he, with embarrassment mingled with hauteur.

"Monseigneur, I know only two ways of begging, — in a carriage, or at a church door; in velvet, or in rags. Well, just now, I did not expect the honor of this visit; I thought you had forgotten me."

"Oh, you knew, then, that it was I who wrote?" said the cardinal.

"Were not your arms on the seal of the letter which you did me the honor to write me?"

"However, you feigned not to know me."

"Because you did not do me the honor to announce yourself."

"Well! this pride pleases me," said the cardinal, and he regarded with attention the animated eyes and haughty countenance of Jeanne.

"I was saying, then," continued Jeanne, "that before seeing you I had taken the resolution of throwing off all this flimsy parade, which covers the nakedness of my name, and of going in rags, like other mendicants, to beg my bread from the passers-by."

"You are not at the end of your resources, I trust, Madame?"

Jeanne did not reply.

"You have some property, even if it be mortgaged? Some family jewels? — this, for example;" and he pointed to a box, with which the delicate fingers of the lady had been playing. "A singular box, upon my word! Will you permit me to look? Oh, a portrait!" he continued, with a look of great surprise.

"Do you know the original of this portrait?" asked Jeanne.

"It is that of Maria Theresa."

"Of Maria Theresa?"

"Yes, the Empress of Austria."

"Really!" cried Jeanne, "Are you sure, Monseigneur?"

The cardinal looked at the box more attentively than before. "Where did you get this?" he asked.

"From a lady who came the day before yesterday."

"To see you?"

"Yes."

"From a lady —" and the cardinal examined the box with minute attention.

"I am mistaken, Monseigneur, there were two ladies," continued Jeanne.

"And one of them gave you this box?" said he, with evident suspicion.

"No; she dropped it here."

The cardinal remained thoughtful for some time, — so thoughtful that the Comtesse de Valois was puzzled, and thought that it would be well for her to be on her guard.

Then the cardinal looked up, carefully observing the countess, and said, "What was the name of this lady? I beg pardon for being inquisitive. I am ashamed of seeming to play the part of a judge."

"Indeed, it is a somewhat strange question."

"Indiscreet, perhaps, but not strange."

"Yes, very strange; for if I had known the name of the lady who left this little box here, I should have returned it long before this."

"Then you know not who she is?"

"I know only that she is the head of some charitable institution."

"In Paris?"

"No; in Versailles."

"From Versailles? the head of a charitable house?"

"Monseigneur, I accept charity from ladies; that does not so much humiliate a poor woman; and this lady, who had heard of my wants, left with me a hundred louis when she went away."

"A hundred louis!" said the cardinal in surprise; then fearing lest he might wound Jeanne's susceptibility, he added, "I am not astonished, Madame, that they should give you such a sum. You deserve, on the contrary, all the solicitude of charitable persons, and your name makes it a duty to help you. What surprises me is that it was brought to you by the head of a charitable institution; they are not in the habit of giving such donations. Could you describe this lady to me, Countess?"

"Not easily, Monseigneur," replied Jeanne, to whet the curiosity of the cardinal.

"How so, since she came here?"

"Because, probably not wishing to be recognized, she hid her face in a very large hood, and was, besides, enveloped in furs." The countess had the air of trying to remember.

"However," repeated the cardinal.

"I thought I saw — but I do not affirm it, Monseigneur."

"What did you think you saw?"

"Blue eyes."

"The mouth?"

"Small, though the lips were rather thick, — the lower one, particularly."

"Tall or short?"

"Of middle height."

"Her hands?"

"Perfect."

"Her neck?"

"Long and slender."

"Her countenance?"

"Grave and noble."

"Her manner of speaking?"

"Somewhat embarrassed. But you, perhaps, know this lady, Monseigneur?"

"Why should you think so, Madame?" demanded the prelate, quickly.

"From the manner in which you question me; besides, there is a sympathy which all doers of good works have for one another."

"No, Madame, I do not know her."

"But Monseigneur, if you had some suspicion?"

"How should I?"

"Oh, suggested by this portrait, perhaps?"

"Yes, certainly, the portrait," said the cardinal, rather uneasily, fearing that he had not been cautious enough.

"Well, Monseigneur, this portrait — "

"Oh, this portrait still appears to me to be that of — "

"That of Maria Theresa, is it not so?"

"I believe so, certainly."

"Then you think — "

"That you have received a visit from some German lady who has founded a charitable institution — "

"At Versailles?"

"At Versailles; yes, Madame." And the cardinal was silent. But it was evident that he doubted, and that the presence of this box in Jeanne's apartment renewed his distrust.

Jeanne did not wholly understand what foundation the prince could have for his suspicion — so unfavorable to her, certainly — that she was spreading a snare for him under false appearances.

Indeed, any one might have known the interest which the cardinal took in the queen's affairs; it was a court rumor which was by no means a secret, and we have already remarked upon the efforts of certain enemies to maintain the animosity between the queen and her grand-almoner.

This portrait of Maria Theresa, this box which the queen constantly carried with her, and which the cardinal had seen a hundred times in her hands, — how could it have come into the hands of Jeanne the mendicant? Had the queen really been to see her in this poor apartment? If so, was she indeed unknown to Jeanne? Was the latter, with some secret motive, concealing the honor which had been bestowed upon her?

The prelate doubted; he had already doubted the evening before. The name of Valois had cautioned him to be on his guard; and if the queen had really been there, it was no longer a poor woman he had to deal with, but a princess succored by a queen who bestowed her gifts in person. Was Marie Antoinette charitable to this degree?

While the cardinal was thus pondering over his doubts, Jeanne, who watched him constantly, whom not an emotion of the prince escaped, was in agony. It is indeed real martyrdom for a conscience burdened with some mental reservation to be suspected by those whom one wishes to convince by the actual truth.

The silence was embarrassing to both.

At last, however, the cardinal broke the silence by saying, "And the other lady?"

"Oh, I could see her plainly! She is tall and beautiful, with a determined expression, a brilliant complexion, and a fine form."

"And the other lady did not call her by name?"

"Yes, once; but by her Christian name."

"What was it?"

"Andrée."

"Andrée!" repeated the cardinal, with a start which did not pass unnoticed by the countess.

The cardinal now knew everything; the name of Andrée put an end to all his doubts. It was known that the queen had gone to Paris on that day with Mademoiselle de Taverney.

The cardinal breathed again. There was neither snare nor plot in the Rue Saint Claude. Madame de La Motte appeared to him beautiful and pure as the angel of truth. Still, he would try one more test; the prince was a diplomatist.

"Countess," he said, "one thing astonishes me, — that you have not addressed yourself to the king."

"But Monseigneur, I have sent him twenty petitions."

"Without result?"

"Yes."

"Then, if the king failed you, any of the princes of the blood would have listened to your claim. Monsieur le Duc d'Orléans is charitable, and often likes to do what the king refuses to do."

"I have solicited his Highness the Duc d'Orléans, Monseigneur, but uselessly."

"That astonishes me."

"Oh, when one is poor, and not supported by any one — "

"There is still the Comte d'Artois; sometimes dissipated men perform more generous actions than charitable ones."

"It was the same with him as with the others."

"But the princesses, the aunts of the king, Madame Elisabeth particularly, would refuse assistance to no one."

"It is true, Monseigneur, her Royal Highness, to whom I wrote, promised to receive me; but I know not why, after having received my husband, she never deigned to notice me."

"It is strange, certainly," said the cardinal; then, as if the thought had just struck him, he cried, "But, good Heavens! we are forgetting the person to whom you should have addressed yourself first of all."

"And to whom ought I to have applied?"

"To the dispenser of all favors, to her who never refuses help where it is deserved, — to the queen. Have you seen her?"

"Never," answered Jeanne, with perfect simplicity.

"You have never presented your petition to the queen?"

"Never."

"You have not tried to obtain an audience of her?"

"I have tried, but did not succeed."

"At least, you must have tried to throw yourself in her way, that she might remark you, and send for you to court. That would have been a method worth trying."

"I have not employed it."

"But that is very strange!"

"I have been only twice to Versailles, and then saw but two persons there; one was Doctor Louis, who had attended my poor father at the Hôtel Dieu, and the other was Monsieur Baron de Taverney, to whom I had an introduction."

"What did Monsieur de Taverney say to you? He might have brought you to the queen."

"He told me that I was very unwise."

"How so?"

"To bring forward as a claim to the benevolence of the king a relationship which would be sure to displease him, as nobody likes poor relations."

"I recognize the egotistical and rude old baron." Then, reflecting on Andrée's visit to the countess, "It is very strange!" he thought. "The father rejects the solicitor, and the queen takes the daughter to her. Something must result from that singular contradiction." Then, aloud, "Upon my word, it surprises me to hear that you, a lady of the first rank, have never seen the king or queen!"

"Except in a portrait," replied Jeanne, smiling.

"Then," said the cardinal, "I will conduct you myself to Versailles, and will open the doors for you."

"Oh, Monseigneur, how good you are!" cried Jeanne, overwhelmed with joy.

The cardinal approached her, and said, "It is impossible but that before long everybody must become interested in you."

"Alas, Monseigneur!" said Jeanne, with an adorable sigh, "do you think so?"

"Oh, I am sure of it!"

"I fear you flatter me," she said, looking earnestly at him, for she could hardly believe in his sudden change of manner, who ten minutes before had treated her with the levity of a prince.

This look of Jeanne, thrown as if by the arrow of the archer, wounded the cardinal either in the heart or in his sensual being, awakening either the fire of ambition or the fire of desire, — fire in either case.

Monsieur de Rohan, who was a connoisseur in women, acknowledged to himself that he had seen few so seducing. "Ah, upon my word!" said he to himself, with the eternally scheming spirit of a man used to diplomacy, "it would be too extraordinary, and too fortunate, that at the same time I should meet a virtuous woman with the appearance of an intriguer, and should find in this state of poverty an all-powerful protectress."

"Monseigneur, your occasional silence disquiets me. Pardon me for saying so."

"Why so, Countess?"

"Because a man like you fails in politeness to only two kinds of women."

"Oh, good Heavens, Countess! what are you about to say? Upon my word, you frighten me!" and he took her hand.

"I repeat it," said she, — "with women whom you love too much, or with women for whom you have but little respect."

"Countess, Countess! you make me blush. Have I, then, failed in politeness toward you?"

"Certainly."

"Do not say that, — it would be terrible!"

"It is serious, indeed, Monseigneur; and yet you cannot love me too much, and I have given you no reason for not respecting me."

The cardinal took Jeanne's hand.

"Oh, Countess! you speak as if you were angry with me."

"No, Monseigneur, for you have not yet merited my anger."

"And I never will, Madame, from this day in which I have had the pleasure of making your acquaintance."

"Oh, my mirror! my mirror!" thought Jeanne.

"And from this day, my solicitude for you will not cease."

"Oh, no more, Monseigneur," said the countess, who had not withdrawn her hand; "that is enough."

"What do you mean?"

"Monseigneur, do not speak to me of your protection."

"God forbid that I should pronounce that word 'protection!' Ah, Madame, it is not you that it would humiliate, but myself."

"Then Monsieur le Cardinal, let us admit one thing which will flatter me exceedingly."

"If so, Madame, let us admit that thing."

"Let us admit that you have paid a visit to Madame de La Motte Valois, — nothing more."

"But nothing less, at least," replied the gallant cardinal, and raising Jeanne's hand to his lips he kissed it with some ardor.

The countess withdrew her hand.

"Oh, politeness, only," said the cardinal, with a graceful delicacy.

Jeanne restored to him her hand, which the cardinal now kissed very respectfully.

"Ah, that is as it should be, Monseigneur."

The cardinal bowed.

"To know," continued the countess, "that I shall have a place, small though it be, in the mind of a man so occupied and so eminent, — I assure you, it is a year's consolation."

"A year? that is a short time; let us hope for more, Countess."

"Very well, I do not say no, Monsieur le Cardinal," said she, smiling.

This "Monsieur le Cardinal," was a familiarity of which Madame de La Motte was guilty for the second time. The prelate, sensitive in his pride, might have been astonished at it; but the affair had gone so far that not only was he not astonished, he was even pleased, as if he had received a favor. "Ah, this seems like confidence," he said, drawing still nearer to Jeanne. "So much the better; so much the better."

"I have confidence, yes, Monseigneur; because I perceive that your Eminence —"

"You said 'Monsieur' just now, Countess."

"You must pardon me, Monseigneur; I am not acquainted with court usage. I say, then, that I have confidence in you because you are capable of understanding a mind like mine, adventurous and brave, and a heart still pure in spite of the trials of poverty, in spite of attacks upon me by vile enemies. Your Eminence will know how to appreciate in me — that is, in my conversation — whatever you may find that is worthy of you; as to all the rest your Eminence will grant indulgence."

"We are, then, friends, Madame; it is agreed?"

"I, indeed, wish it."

The cardinal rose and advanced toward Madame de La Motte; but as his arms were rather more widely extended than the occasion required, the countess glided lightly beyond their reach.

"A friendship of three!" she said, with an inimitable accent of raillery and innocence.

"What do you mean by 'friendship of three'?" asked the cardinal.

"Why, is there not, somewhere in the world, a poor gendarme, an exile, called the Comte de La Motte?"

"Oh, Countess, what an unseasonable memory you have!"

"But I must speak to you of him, since you do not speak of him to me."

"Do you know why I do not speak of him to you, Countess?"

"Tell me, if you please."

"It is because he will always speak for himself quite enough; believe me, husbands are not easily silenced."

"And if he speaks for himself?"

"Then others will speak of you, — will speak of us."

"How is that?"

"They will say, for example, that Monsieur le Comte de La Motte was pleased, or was displeased, because Monsieur le Cardinal de Rohan came three, four, or five times a week to visit Madame de La Motte in the Rue Saint Claude."

"Ah! but do you mean that, Monsieur le Cardinal? — three, four, or five times a week!"

"What, then, means our friendship, Countess? I said 'five times;' I was wrong. I should have said six or seven times, without counting the bissextile days."

Jeanne laughed. The cardinal observed that, for the first time, she appreciated his pleasantry, and he felt flattered.

"Can you keep people from talking?" she said. "You know well that it is impossible."

"Yes; I can," he replied.

"And how?"

"Oh, very easily. With, or without, reason, I am well known to the Parisians."

"Oh, certainly, and with reason, Monseigneur."

"But you, they have the misfortune not to know."

"Well?"

"Let us reverse the situation."

"Reverse it? You mean —"

"If you should be willing — if, for instance —"

"Go on."

"If you should go out, instead of making me go out?"

"You mean that I should go to your hôtel, — I, Monseigneur?"

"You would go readily enough to call on a minister."

"A minister is not a man, Monseigneur."

"You are adorable. Well, I am not speaking of my hôtel; I have a house —"

"A pleasure-house, to speak plainly."

"By no means, — a house of yours."

"Ah!" said the countess, "a house of mine? And where is that house? I know nothing of it."

"To-morrow morning at ten o'clock you shall have the address."

The countess blushed, and the cardinal gallantly took her hand. This time the kiss that he impressed upon it was at once respectful, tender, and bold. They then bowed to each other, smiling, with that attenuated ceremoniousness which indicates an approaching intimacy.

"A light for Monseigneur!" cried the countess.

The old woman appeared with a light, and the prelate departed.

"Well, well!" thought Jeanne; "it seems to me that I have made a great step in the world."

"Come, come!" said the cardinal to himself, as he got into his carriage; "I have made a double stroke. That woman is bright enough to catch the queen as she has caught me."

CHAPTER XVI.

MESMER, AND SAINT-MARTIN.

THERE was a time when Paris, free from business, with plenty of leisure, was entirely engrossed with questions which in our day are the monopoly of the rich, who are called useless, and of the scholars, who are called idle.

In 1784, the period which we have reached, the fashionable topic, the topic which superseded all others, was mesmerism, — a mysterious science, badly defined by its discoverers, who, not feeling the necessity of rendering a discovery democratic from its birth, had allowed it to assume the name of a man, — that is, an aristocratic title, instead of one of those scientific names taken from the Greek, by the aid of which the bashful modesty of modern scholars popularizes every scientific subject.

Indeed, of what use would it have been in 1784 to popularize a science? Did the people, who for more than a century and a half had not been consulted by the governing power, count for anything in the State? No; the people were the fertile soil, which produced, — a rich harvest to be reaped; but the lord of the soil was the king, the harvesters were the nobility.

In our day all this is changed. France is like a secular hour-glass: for nine hundred years it has marked the hour of royalty; the powerful hand of the Lord has turned it: for centuries to come it will mark the era of the people.

In 1784 the name of a man was a recommendation. In these days success depends upon the names of things.

But let us leave to-day and look back upon yesterday.

Doctor Mesmer was in Paris, as we have already heard from Marie Antoinette. This Doctor Mesmer deserves a few words from us, as his name was then on everybody's lips. He had, in 1777, brought from Germany, the land of mysteries, a science inflated with clouds and lightning. By the flashes of this lightning the man of science saw but the clouds forming above him a dark canopy; the vulgar saw only the lightning. He had begun his career in Germany by writing a thesis upon the influence of the planets. He had endeavored to prove that these celestial bodies, by virtue of that power which produces their mutual attraction, exercised an influence over living bodies, and particularly over the nervous system, by means of a subtle fluid which exists everywhere in the universe. But this first theory was too abstract; one must, to understand it, be initiated in the science of the Galileos and the Newtons; and in order that this theory should become popular, it would have been necessary for the whole body of the nobility to be converted into a scientific society. He therefore abandoned this theory, and as the basis of his doctrine, gave his attention to the magnet, which was then awakening much interest, and was supposed to be efficacious in curing disease.

Mesmer therefore added the action of magnets to his first system, and tried to see what he could derive from this combination. Unfortunately for Mesmer, on arriving at Vienna, he found a rival, named Hall, already established there; and this rival pretended that Mesmer had robbed him of his discoveries. Thereupon Mesmer — a man of imagination — announced that he had abandoned the magnet as useless, and that he effected cures not by mineral, but by animal, magnetism.

This, although called by a new name, was not in reality a new science. Traditions in regard to it had been handed down from the ancient Greeks and Egyptians, and it had been revived from time to time by the sorcerers of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, many of whom had paid for their knowledge with their lives.

Urbain Grandier was nothing more than an animal magnetizer.

Mesmer had heard of the miracles of this science.

Joseph Balsamo, the hero of one of our books, had left some traces of his work in Germany and especially in Strasburg.

Mesmer set out in search of these fragments of knowledge, — scattered and fluttering like those will-o'-the-wisps which hover at night over stagnant pools, — and condensed them into a science to which he gave the name of mesmerism. He then communicated his system to the Academies of Science in Paris, London, and Berlin. The first two did not deign to reply to him; the third said that he was mad.

Mesmer recalled the Grecian philosopher who denied that there was such a thing as motion, and whom his antagonist confounded by walking away. He came to France, and took out of the hands of Doctor Storck, and of the oculist Wenzel, a young girl seventeen years old, who had disease of the liver and amaurosis, and after three months of his treatment, restored her health and her sight.

This cure convinced many people, — among them a doctor called Deslon, who, at first an antagonist, became his disciple.

From this time the reputation of Mesmer rapidly increased. The Academy declared against the innovator; the court was in his favor. Negotiations were opened by the ministry to induce Mesmer to enrich humanity by the publication of his doctrine. The doctor fixed his price. There was some haggling, and at last the government offered him, in the king's name, an income for life of twenty thousand francs for public lectures, and ten thousand more for the instruction in his system of three persons to be chosen by the government.

Mesmer, however, indignant at the royal parsimony, refused, and set out for the Baths at Spa with one of his patients; but while he was gone Deslon, his pupil, possessor of the secret which he had refused to sell for thirty thousand francs a year, opened a public establishment for the treatment of patients.

Mesmer was informed of this disastrous fact; he denounced Deslon's conduct as treacherous and thievish; he was near going mad. Then one of his patients, Monsieur de Bergasse, conceived the idea of forming a company. A capital of three hundred and forty thousand francs was raised on the condition that the secret should be revealed to the shareholders. Mesmer agreed to this, and with the money returned to Paris.

The time was propitious. France was in that state when as often happens in communities where there is nothing of an excitable nature to occupy the minds of the people, every one feels dimly that a crisis is approaching. Under the apparent calmness there prevailed a general uneasiness, and all were seeking for something that would create excitement. They had lost all interest in questions of national import, and a new opera was to them of more moment than a treaty of peace with England, or the recognition of the independence of the United States. In fact, every one was ready to be carried away by anything so mysterious and strange as this theory, which proposed to cure invalids, restore intelligence to fools, and amuse the wise.

Everywhere Mesmer was talked of. What had he done? On whom had he performed these miracles? To what great lord had he restored sight or health? What lady's nerves, worn out by dissipation, had he soothed? What young girl had he compelled to predict the future in a magnetic trance?

The future! — that great word of all ages, that word of absorbing interest for all minds, the solution of all problems. But what, then, was the present?

A royalty without radiance, a nobility with authority, a country without commerce, a people without rights, a society without confidence. From the royal family, uneasy and isolated on its throne, to the plebeian family starving in its hovel, there was misery, shame, and fear everywhere.

To forget others while thinking of self, to draw from new, unknown sources the assurance of long life and unalterable health, to snatch something from avaricious fate, — was not this the object of an aspiration, easy to be understood, toward that unknown good from which Mesmer would lift the veil?

Voltaire was dead, and there was no longer in France a single burst of laughter, except the laugh of Beaumarchais, more bitter than that of the master. Rousseau was dead; there were no more religious philosophers in France. Rousseau had wished to sustain belief in God; but since Rousseau was no more, no one dared to venture that undertaking for fear of being crushed under its weight.

War had formerly been a serious occupation for the French people; but now the only war in which they were engaged was in America, where the people fought for what they called "independence," and what the French call by the more abstract word "liberty." And even this distant war — this war carried on not only in another country, but in another world — had come to an end. All things considered, was it not better worth while to give attention to Mesmer, — that German doctor who, for the second time within six years, created an excitement in France, — than to Lord Cornwallis or Monsieur Washington, who were so far away that probably the people of Paris would never see either of them? Mesmer was there; they could see him, touch him, and — supreme ambition of three quarters of Paris — could be touched by him.

And so this man, who on his arrival in Paris had not been sustained by any one, not even by the queen, his compatriot, who aided so willingly those who came from her country; this man, who but for Doctor Deslon who betrayed him would have remained in obscurity, — this man reigned supremely over public opinion, leaving far behind the king, of whom the public had never talked, Monsieur de Lafayette, of whom they did not yet speak, and Monsieur Necker, of whom they spoke no longer.

And as if this age had undertaken the task of giving to every mind according to its aptitude, to every heart according to its sympathy, to every body according to its need, — in contrast with Mesmer arose Saint-Martin, the teacher of spiritualism, whose doctrine came to comfort the souls wounded by the positivism of the German doctor.

Imagine an atheist with a religion more attractive than religion itself; a republican full of consideration and respect for kings; a gentleman belonging to the privileged class, tender and loving toward the people, — endowed with the most logical, the most charming eloquence, attacking the religions of the world which he calls senseless, for the sole reason that they are divine!

Imagine Epicurus, powdered, in embroidered coat, spangled waistcoat, satin small-clothes, silk stockings and red shoes, — Epicurus, not content with overthrowing gods in whom he does not believe, but attacking governments, which he treats like religions, because they can never agree among themselves, and almost always cause unhappiness to mankind, arguing against social law, which he attacks by saying: "It punishes in the same way crimes of different degrees; it punishes the effect without considering the cause."

Suppose now that this tempter, who calls himself "the unknown philosopher," instead of saying, "All men are equal," which is an absurdity, invents this formula: "Intelligent beings are all kings." And then conceive the effect of such a sentiment, falling on a society without hope, without direction. Remember that at this time women were tender and foolish, and men were eager after power, honor, and pleasure; that it was a time when kings allowed their crowns to rest lightly on their heads, — crowns toward which, for the first time, curious and threatening looks were cast from places of obscurity. It will not then seem strange that such a doctrine should find proselytes, — a doctrine which said: "Choose from among yourselves a superior soul, — superior in love, in charity, in the capability of loving well, of making others happy; then when this soul of a man shall be clearly revealed to you, bend the knee, humiliate yourselves, annihilate yourselves, inferior souls, in order to leave room for the dictatorship of this soul, whose mission it is to restore you to your normal condition, — that is, to an equality of suffering amid unequal gifts and opportunities."

Add to this that the unknown philosopher surrounded himself with mystery; that he sought the deepest obscurity to discuss in peace, far from spies and parasites, the grand social theory which might become the policy of the world.

"Listen to me," he said, "faithful souls, believing hearts, — listen, and try to understand me; or rather do not listen, unless you have sufficient interest and desire for knowledge to understand me, for you will find it difficult, and I will not impart my secrets to any who will not tear away the veil from before them. I say things that I do not wish to seem to say, therefore I shall often appear to say what I really do not say."

Thus worked for the glorification of soul and of matter, while dreaming of the annihilation of God and the destruction of the religion of Christ, these two men, who had divided the more serious portion of the French people into two camps.

To the vat of Mesmer, from which flowed forth health and happiness, was drawn the sensual life, the elegant materialism of this degenerate nation; while for the study of truth and error were united the pious, charitable, loving souls, thirsting for realities after their long familiarity with delusions.

If within these privileged spheres ideas either diverged, or became confused, it must be remembered in what a crude state the citizens and the people — since called "the third estate" — still remained; they only guessed that something was being done for them, and in their impatience burned with a desire to steal the sacred fire, like Prometheus, to animate a world all their own in which they should manage their own affairs.

Conspiracies in the forming stage of conversations, associations in the form of clubs, social meetings in the form of quadrilles, — that is, civil war and anarchy, — would be discerned under all this by the thoughtful observer.

Alas! now that the veils have been torn away, now that the people have been ten times overthrown by the Promethean fire which they stole, tell us what the thinker could have seen at the end of this strange eighteenth century, if not the decomposition of a world, if not something like that which happened after the death of Cæsar and before the eccassion of Augustus. Augustus was he who separated the Pagan from the Christian world, as Napoleon is he who has separated the feudal from the democratic world.

Perhaps we have led our readers into a digression which has seemed to them somewhat long; but indeed it would have been difficult to treat of that epoch without touching upon the serious problems which pertained to its very life and character.

Now the effort has been made, — the effort of a child who with his nails scratches off the rust from an antique statue, in order to read beneath the rust an inscription almost effaced.

Let us return to our story. If we continue to occupy ourselves with real events, we shall say too much for the romancer, too little for the historian.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE VAT.

We have endeavored to give an idea, in the last chapter, of the interest and enthusiasm which drew such crowds of people to see the cures publicly performed by Mesmer.

The king, as we know, had given permission to the queen to go and see what all Paris was talking of, accompanied by one of the princesses. It was two days after the visit of Monsieur de Rohan to the countess. The weather was fine. The thaw had come, and hundreds of sweepers were employed in cleaning away the snow from the streets. The clear blue sky was just beginning to be illumined by its first stars, when Madame de La Motte, elegantly dressed, and presenting every appearance of opulence, arrived in a coach which Clotilde had carefully chosen as the best-looking at the Place Vendôme, and stopped before a brilliantly lighted house. This house was the one occupied by Doctor Mesmer. Numbers of other carriages were waiting at the door, and a crowd of people had collected to see the patients arrive and depart. These spectators, when they saw some rich invalid, enveloped in furs and satins, carried in by footmen, seemed to find some consolation in the evident proof it afforded that God made men healthy or unhealthy without reference to their purses or their genealogies. A general murmur would arise when they recognized some duke paralyzed in an arm or leg, or some marshal whose feet refused their office, less in consequence of military fatigues and marches than of halts made with the ladies of the opera or of the Comédie Italienne. Sometimes it was a lady, carried in by her servants, with drooping head and languid eye, who, weakened by late hours and an irregular life, came to demand from Doctor Mesmer the health she had vainly sought to regain elsewhere.

Many of these ladies were as well known as the gentlemen, and their names circulated noisily through the crowd; but a great many — doubtless those whose names would have created the most scandal — avoided public gaze, on this evening at least, by wearing satin masks, for there was a ball at the Opera that night, and many of these ladies intended to go to it immediately on leaving the Place Vendôme.

Through this crowd Madame de La Motte walked erect and firm, with a mask on her face; she elicited from them only the exclamation, "Ah, that one cannot be very ill!"

But it is not to be supposed that this phrase implied the total absence of comments. For if Madame de La Motte was not sick, why should she come to Doctor Mesmer's? If the crowd had been acquainted, as we are, with the events we have before related, it would have seen that nothing was more natural than this visit.

Indeed, Madame de La Motte had been reflecting upon her conversation with Monsieur le Cardinal de Rohan, and especially upon the particular attention with which the cardinal had honored that box containing the picture, which had been left in her house. And as in the name of the owner of this box lay the secret of the sudden change to graciousness in the manner of the cardinal, Madame de La Motte had decided upon two methods by which she might try to discover this name.

In the first place, she had resorted to the more simple of the two. She had gone to Versailles to inquire at the bureau of charity for the German ladies. There, as we may imagine, she had received no information. There were a great many German ladies living at Versailles, on account of the avowed sympathy of the queen for her country-women; there were supposed to be one hundred and fifty or two hundred of them. They were very benevolent, but there was no bureau of charity supported by them.

Therefore Jeanne's inquiries about the two ladies who had come to visit her had proved fruitless. In vain did she say that one of them was called Andrée; no one knew in Versailles a lady of that name, which moreover was not German. To ask Monsieur de Rohan himself what name he suspected, would show him that she was interested in the subject; it would, moreover, detract from the pleasure and merit of a discovery made in spite of the whole world and apparently beyond the bounds of possibility.

Now, since there had been mystery in the conduct of these ladies at her house, mystery in the astonishment and reserve of Monsieur de Rohan, it was by way of mystery that she must reach the solution of these enigmas. Moreover, Jeanne found an enticing attractiveness in this struggle with the unknown.

She had heard that in Paris for some time past there had been a man of learning, a worker of miracles, who had discovered the means of expelling from the human body disease and pain, as Christ drove out demons from the bodies of the possessed. She learned that this man not only cured physical ills, but wrested from the soul the wretched secret which was destroying it. The most obstinate will of his patients had been seen to soften and change to the docility of the slave under his singular influence.

And then, in the sleep which succeeded the pain, — after the learned physician had quieted the most disturbed organization by plunging it into complete forgetfulness, — the soul, delighted with the rest it owed to the enchanter, gave itself up wholly to the control of this new master. From that moment he directed all its workings; it was subservient to him; and every thought of this grateful soul was transmitted to him in a language which had over ordinary language the advantage, or disadvantage perhaps, of being absolutely truthful.

Moreover, issuing from the body which served as its prison, at the first order of him who for the moment controlled it, this soul would roam through the world, mingle with other souls, probe them incessantly, search them pitilessly; and then like the hound who forces the game from the thicket where it is hiding, as it thinks in safety, it would finally drive this secret from the heart where it was buried, pursue it, overtake it, and bring it to the feet of the master.

Hence came the revelation of many marvellous secrets. Madame de Duras had recovered in this way a child stolen when out at nurse; Madame de Chautoné, an English dog no larger than her hand, for which she would have given all the children in the world; and Monsieur de Vaudreuil, a lock of hair for which he would have given half his fortune. These revelations had been made by clairvoyants, operated upon magnetically by Doctor Mesmer.

Thus persons could choose, in the house of the illustrious doctor, the secrets the best calculated to test this faculty of supernatural divination; and Madame de La Motte expected, in being present at one of the assemblies, to meet this phœnix, and by his means to discover the owner of the box which was for the time being the object which occupied all her attention. With this purpose in mind she entered in great haste the room where the patients were assembled.

This apartment was divided into two principal salons. After crossing the antechambers and exhibiting the necessary passport to the ushers, the visitor was admitted to a salon, the windows of which were hermetically closed, excluding light and air during the day-time, and noise and air during the night. In the middle of the salon, under a chandelier whose candles gave a feeble and almost dying light, could be seen a large vat closed with a cover. It was not of elegant shape; it was not ornamented; no drapery concealed the nakedness of its metal sides. This vat was known as "Mesmer's tub."

What virtue did this vat contain? Nothing can be more easy to explain. It was almost entirely filled with water, impregnated with sulphur; and porous jars, arranged methodically on the bottom of this vat, inverse to one another in alternation, were saturated with this solution. Thus were established the mysterious cross-currents by the power of which cures were effected.

To the cover was attached, by an iron ring, a long rope. The patients were seated on chairs ranged around the vat, — men and women together, some indifferent, some serious, some anxious, awaiting the result of the experiment. A servant wound this rope around the diseased limbs of the patients, so that all should receive at the same time the charge of electricity from the vat. And besides, in order that the action of the animal fluids, transmitted from one to another, might not be interrupted, the patients were instructed to put themselves in contact with one another, shoulder to shoulder, elbow to elbow, or foot to foot, in such a manner that the warming and regenerating influence should pass through all at the same moment.

This medicinal performance was indeed a curious spectacle, and it is not strange that Parisians were excited by it to a high degree.

Twenty or thirty patients were seated around the vat. A servant silently wound the cord about them, and then quietly withdrew, after indicating to them certain iron rods which, passing through holes in the vat, would conduct the healing fluid to any selected portion of the body.

Then a mild and penetrating warmth pervaded the room; the air was filled with delicate perfumes, under the influence of which the most rebellious brain must yield its force of will. Soon the invalids abandoned themselves to the voluptuous impressions induced by this atmosphere; and then was heard music, soft and thrilling, coming from invisible sources, rising and dying away again amid the perfumes and the warmth. It struck upon the nerves with irresistible power. It seemed like one of those mysterious, inexplicable sounds in Nature by which even animals are surprised and charmed, — like a wailing of the wind among the crevices of the rocks.

Upon all faces, at first animated by surprise, soon appeared signs of physical enjoyment, induced by all these sensuous influences. The soul yielded, and came forth from the refuge to which it resorts when attacked by bodily ills, and expanded itself in joy and freedom, controlling and transforming the material frame.

The invalids took in their hands the iron rods, and applied them to breast, heart, or head, according to the location of the special malady to be treated.

Imagine, then, on all these faces, happiness succeeding to suffering and anxiety; imagine the drowsy content resulting from these all-absorbing sensations; imagine the heavy silence, interrupted only by sighs, which brooded over that assembly, — and you will have an exact idea of the scene which, two thirds of a century after it occurred, we have now endeavored to sketch.

The actors in this scene were divided into two classes. There were in the first place the invalids, but little concerned for what is called "respectability," — a barrier much regarded by the average citizen, but easily overstepped by the very high or by the very low, — who had come to that salon only to be healed, and who gave all their attention to the fulfilment of that purpose. Besides these, there were the sceptical, or simply curious, who, not suffering with any infirmity, had visited Mesmer's house as they would have gone to the theatre, wishing either to witness the effect produced on those who were seated around the enchanted vat, or as spectators, to study this new system of physics. These persons were chiefly interested in the patients, and in those who shared in the operation, though in good health.

Among those of the first class, zealous disciples of Mesmer, might be distinguished a young woman of fine form and beautiful face, somewhat extravagantly dressed, who, submitting herself to the action of the fluid, and by means of an iron rod applying to her person — to her head and the lower part of her chest — the strongest doses of the fluid that could be obtained, began soon to roll her lovely eyes, as if overcome with languor, while her hands trembled under those first titillations which indicate the invasion of the magnetic influence. When her head was leaning on the back of the easy-chair every one could examine at leisure that pale brow, those convulsed lips, and that beautiful neck, taking on by degrees the appearance of marble, as her blood circulated more rapidly.

The spectators looked at the young woman with astonishment, and two or three among them, leaning toward one another, uttered words which doubtless had some strange significance, and which had the effect to increase the attention which these persons were bestowing on the woman.

Among the visitors of the second class above mentioned — the curious spectators — was Madame de La Motte, who, without fearing to be recognized, or caring much if she was, held in her hand the satin mask which she had worn while going through the crowd. She stood near the door, leaning against a pillar, and being veiled by a curtain she could see without being seen. And in all that scene what seemed to her most worthy of observation was the face of the young woman agitated by the magnetic fluid. In fact, that face had interested her to such a degree that for several minutes she had stood motionless, riveted to the spot by her eagerness to see, and her desire to ascertain something further. "Oh!" she murmured, without taking her eyes from the lovely patient, "there can be no doubt about it. It is the sister of charity who visited me, and who has occasioned all Monseigneur de Rohan's interest in me." Firmly convinced that she could not be mistaken, and eager to take advantage of the chance which had procured for her the information she had vainly sought, she left her place and went nearer to the young woman.

At that moment the person in question closed her eyes, contracted her lips, and beat the air feebly with her hands, — which, it must be admitted, were not precisely those delicate hands with tapering fingers, those hands white as wax, which Madame de La Motte had so much admired a few days before.

The contagion of the crisis suddenly seized upon the greater number of the patients, moved as they were already by the music and the perfumes. Every nervous susceptibility had been addressed. Men and women, carried away by the example of their young companion, began to utter sighs, murmurs, shouts, and moving their arms, legs, and heads, gave themselves up, openly and irresistibly, to that paroxysm which the master called a "crisis."

At that moment a man appeared in the salon, without any one knowing how he had entered. He might have sprung from the vat, or perhaps was condensed from the perfumed atmosphere of the room. His lilac-colored coat, and his handsome face, pale, calm, and intellectual, were quite in harmony with the mystery of his apparition. He held in his hand a long wand, which was plunged, so to speak, into the famous vat. He made a sign; the doors opened, twenty robust servants rushed in, and with skilful address seized the patients as they wavered in their arm-chairs, and bore them into the neighboring hall.

While this was going on, and the young woman already referred to, abandoned herself to a paroxysm of delight, Madame de La Motte, who, with other curious spectators, had moved toward the hall intended for the patients, heard a man cry out: "It is she; it is certainly she!"

Madame de La Motte was about to ask, "She! who?" when suddenly two ladies entered the farther end of the first salon, leaning upon each other, and followed at a respectful distance by a man, who, though disguised as a bourgeois, had still the appearance of a servant.

The tournure of these ladies, one of them especially, struck Jeanne so forcibly that she made a step toward them, when a cry from the young woman near her startled every one. The same man whom Jeanne had heard speak before now called out, "But look, gentlemen, it is the queen."

At these words, Jeanne started.

"The queen!" cried many voices in surprise. "The queen here? The queen in that state? Impossible!"

"But look," said he again; "do you know the queen, or not?"

"Indeed," said many, "the resemblance is incredible."

Madame de La Motte had replaced her mask, and could therefore ask questions without fear of being recognized. "Monsieur," said she to the speaker, who was a stout man with quick, observant eyes, "did you say the queen?"

"Oh, Madame, there is no doubt of it."

"And where is she?"

"Why, that young lady that you see there, on the violet cushions, and in such a state that she cannot moderate her transports, is the queen."

"But on what do you found such an idea, Monsieur?"

"Why, simply upon this fact, Madame, that that woman is the queen," replied the accuser, imperturbably. And he left Jeanne to go and spread his news among the rest.

She turned from the almost revolting spectacle, and going near to the door, found herself face to face with the two ladies she had seen enter. When she saw the face of the elder one she uttered a cry of surprise.

"What is the matter?" asked the lady.

Jeanne quickly took off her mask, and asked, "Do you recognize me, Madame?"

The lady made, but quickly suppressed, a movement of surprise, and said, with a slight agitation, "No, Madame."

"Well, Madame, I recognize you, and will give you a proof."

On hearing these words the two ladies drew nearer together in fright. Jeanne drew the box from her pocket, saying, "You left this at my house."

"But supposing this to be true, what makes you so agitated?"

"I am agitated by the danger that your Majesty is incurring here."

"Explain yourself."

"Not before you have put on this mask, Madame;" and she offered hers to the queen, who hesitated, thinking herself sufficiently concealed by her hood.

"I beg your Majesty; there is not an instant to lose."

The queen put on the mask; "And now, come, come!" said Jeanne; and she drew away the two ladies so eagerly that they stopped only at the street-door, which they reached in a few seconds.

"But what is the matter?" said the queen, taking breath.

"Your Majesty has not been seen by any one?"

"I believe not."

"So much the better."

"But, in short, will you explain to me —"

"Will not your Majesty believe your humble servant when she tells you that you are incurring the greatest danger?"

"Still — that danger — what is it?"

"I shall have the honor to tell your Majesty whenever you will grant me an hour's audience; but it is a long story, and your Majesty might be seen and recognized." Then seeing that the queen looked displeased, "Oh, Madame!" said she, turning to the Princess Lamballe, "join your petitions to mine, and persuade the queen to leave this place, and to leave it immediately."

The princess made a gesture of entreaty.

"Then let us go," said the queen, "since it is your wish." Then turning to Madame de La Motte, "You ask for an audience?" she said.

"I beg for that honor, that I may explain my conduct to your Majesty."

"Well, bring this box with you, and apply to Laurent, the door-keeper; he will have his orders." Then going into the street, she called in German, "Kommen sie da, Weber!"

A carriage immediately drove up; they got in, and were soon out of sight.

When they were gone, Madame de La Motte said to herself, "I have done right so far; as to the future, I must reflect."

CHAPTER XVIII.

MADEMOISELLE OLIVA.

During this time the man who had pointed out the fictitious queen to the people, touched on the shoulder another man who stood near him, in a threadbare coat, and whose eyes were eagerly observant, and said, "For you, who are a journalist, here is a fine subject for an article."

"How so?" replied the man.

"Would you like an abstract of it?"

"Certainly."

"Here it is: The danger of being born the subject of a king governed by a queen who indulges in such paroxysms as these."

The journalist laughed. "But the Bastille?" he said.

"Nonsense, are there not anagrams, by the aid of which all royal censors can be avoided? Who can interfere with you, if you retail the history of Prince Silou and the Princess Etteniotna, queen of Narfec? What do you say to that?"

"It is an admirable idea!" said the journalist, with enthusiasm.

"And I do not doubt that an article entitled 'The Paroxysms of the Princess Etteniotna at the House of the Fakir Remsen' would have great success."

"I believe it would."

"Then go and write it with your best ink."

The journalist pressed the hand of the unknown. "Shall I send you some copies, Monsieur?" said he.

"I will do so with pleasure, if you will give me your name."

"Certainly, yes! The idea pleases me; and written out by you its value will be increased a hundred fold. What is the usual circulation of your journal?"

"Two thousand."

"Then do me a favor. Take these fifty louis, and publish six thousand."

"What! Monsieur, you overwhelm me; may I not know the name of so generous a patron of literature?"

"You shall know it when I call for one thousand copies at two francs each. Will they be ready in a week?"

"I will work night and day, Monsieur."

"Let it be amusing."

"It shall make all Paris laugh until the tears come, except one person."

"Who will weep tears of blood, will she not?"

"Oh, Monsieur, how witty you are!"

"You are very good. By the way, date the publication from London."

"As usual."

"Monsieur, I am your humble servant;" and the stout man dismissed the journalist, who, with his fifty louis in his pocket, hurried away silently, like a bird of evil omen.

The unknown again turned to look at the young woman, who had now subsided into a state of exhaustion. He noticed the fine and voluptuous lines in that delicate beauty, her noble grace in the unconscious attitude assumed in sleep; then retracing his steps, "Really," he said to himself, "the resemblance is frightful! God had his motives in creating it, and has no doubt condemned her to whom the resemblance is so strong."

While he made these reflections, the young woman rose slowly from the midst of the cushions, leaning on the arm of a neighbor already roused from the ecstasy, and began to arrange her somewhat disordered toilet. She blushed a little on seeing the attention she attracted from the spectators, answered with coquettish politeness the grave but kindly questions of Mesmer; then stretching her round arms and pretty legs, like a cat waking out of sleep, she walked across the three rooms, meeting bravely the looks, whether of mockery, lust, or alarm, which the spectators fixed upon her. She was somewhat astonished, however, when she found herself saluted with deep and respectful bows by a group which had already been assembled by the indefatigable stranger, who placed himself behind them, and whispered, "Never mind, gentlemen, never mind, she is not the less the queen of France, — let us salute her."

The little person who was the object of so much respect hastened with some anxiety through the last vestibule, entered the court-yard, and looked about for a coach or chair. Seeing none, she was about to set off on foot, when a groom approached, and said, "Shall I call Madame's carriage?"

"I have none," she replied.

"Madame came in a coach?"

"Yes."

"From the Rue Dauphine?"

"Yes."

"I will take Madame home."

"Do so, then," said she, deliberately, feeling only for a moment the uneasiness which this unexpected proposal would have caused any other woman.

The man made a sign, and a carriage drove up. He opened the door for her, and then said to the coachman, "To the Rue Dauphine." They set off, and when they had reached the Pont Neuf, the little lady, who liked very much this way of travelling, regretted that she did not live as far off as the Jardin-des-Plantes. They soon stopped, however; the footman handed her out, held out his hand for the key, opened the door to spare the little lady's fingers, and after seeing her safely inside the dark passage, bowed, and immediately drove off again.

"Really," said she to herself, "this is an agreeable adventure; it is very polite in Monsieur Mesmer. Oh, I am very tired! and he must have seen that. He is a great doctor;" saying these words, she mounted to the second story, and knocked at a door, which was quickly opened by an old woman.

"Oh, good-evening, mother! Is supper ready?"

"Yes, and growing cold."

"Has he come?"

"No, not yet; but the gentleman —"

"What gentleman?"

"He who was to speak to you this evening."

"To me?"

"Yes."

This colloquy took place in a kind of antechamber, with a glazed door, which opened into a large room fronting on the street. Through the glass could be distinctly seen the lamp which lighted this room, the aspect of which, if not exactly pleasant, was at least comfortable. Old curtains of yellow silk, faded in places, a few chairs covered with green Utrecht velvet, and an old yellow sofa, — such was the magnificence of this apartment.

The young girl abruptly opened the glazed door, and saw seated upon the sofa a man of good appearance, rather stout than thin, who with a handsome white hand was toying with a very elegant lace frill. Although she did not recognize him, it was the same man whom we have seen taking so much interest in her at Mesmer's.

She had not time to question him, for he began immediately, "I know all that you are going to ask, and will tell you without asking. You are Mademoiselle Oliva, are you not?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"A charming person, highly nervous, and much interested in the system of Monsieur Mesmer."

"I have just left there."

"All this, however, your beautiful eyes are saying plainly, does not explain what brings me here, and that is what you wish most particularly to know?"

"You are right, Monsieur."

"Will you not do me the favor to sit down, or I shall be obliged to get up also, and in that way we could not talk at our ease."

"Really, Monsieur, you have very extraordinary manners," replied the young woman, whom we shall henceforth call Mademoiselle Oliva, since she deigned to answer to that name.

"Mademoiselle, I saw you just now at Monsieur Mesmer's, and found you to be all I could wish."

"Monsieur!"

"Do not alarm yourself, Mademoiselle! I do not tell you that I found you charming, — that would seem like a declaration of love, and I have no such thing in my mind. Do not draw back, I beg, or you will oblige me to scream like a deaf man."

"What do you want, then?" said Oliva, innocently.

"I know," continued the stranger, "that you are accustomed to being called beautiful; but I, who also think that you are so, have other things to talk to you about."

"Really, Monsieur, the manner in which you speak to me —"

"Do not get angry before you have heard me. Is there any one that can overhear us?"

"No, Monsieur, no one. But still —"

"Then if no one can hear, we can converse at our ease. What do you say to a little partnership between us?"

"A partnership? You must know —"

"Do not misunderstand; I do not say 'liaison' — I say 'partnership.' I am not talking of love, but of business."

"What kind of business?" said Oliva, with astonishment and at the same time with curiosity.

"What do you do all day long?"

"Why —"

"Do not be afraid; I am not here to accuse you; tell me what you please."

"I do nothing, or, at least, as little as possible."

"You are indolent."

"Oh!"

"That is right."

"Ah, you say it is right?"

"Certainly. What is it to me if you are indolent? Do you like walking?"

"Very much."

"To see sights, and go to balls?"

"Exceedingly."

"To live well?"

"Above all things."

"If I gave you twenty-five louis a month, would you refuse me?"

"Monsieur!"

"My dear Mademoiselle Oliva, now you are beginning to doubt me again, and it was agreed that you were to listen quietly. I will say fifty louis if you like."

"I like fifty louis better than twenty-five; but what I like better than either is to be able to choose my own lover."

"Morbleu! but I have already told you that I do not desire to be your lover. Set your mind at ease about that."

"'And I say, morbleu! too; what am I to do to earn my fifty louis?"

"You must receive me at your house, and always be glad to see me. Walk out with me whenever I desire it, and come to me whenever I send for you."

"But I have a lover, Monsieur."

"And what then?"

"What do you mean by 'what then'?"

"Well, dismiss him, pardieu!"

"Oh, Beausire cannot be sent away like that."

"Do you wish me to help you?"

"No; I love him."

"Oh!"

"A little."

"That is just a little too much."

"I cannot help it."

"Then Beausire can stay."

"You are very obliging, Monsieur."

"Well, — but do my conditions suit you?"

"Yes; if you have told me all."

"Listen, my dear; I have said all I wish to say now."

"On your honor?"

"On my honor. But there is one thing you must understand."

"And that is —"

"That should it be necessary, you must really be my mistress."

"Ah, you see; there can never be any necessity for that, Monsieur."

"But you will need only to appear to be so."

"Oh, as to that, I agree to it."

"Then that is settled; and here is the first month's pay in advance."

He held out the money, and as she still seemed to hesitate a little, slipped it himself into her pocket without even grazing that round and lithe form which the great connoisseurs of Spain would not have disdained as he did.

Scarcely had he done so, when a knock at the door made Oliva spring to the window. "Good God!" she cried; "escape quickly, — here he is!"

"Who?"

"Beausire, — my lover. Be quick, Monsieur!"

"Ah, upon my word, so much the worse!"

"What do you mean by 'so much the worse'? Why, he will tear you in pieces."

"Bah!"

"Do you hear how he knocks?"

"Well, open the door. Why the devil do you not give him a pass-key?" And he sat down again on the sofa, saying to himself, "I must see this fellow, and judge what he is like."

The knocks became louder, and were mingled with oaths.

"Go, mother, and open the door," cried Oliva, in rage. "As for you, Monsieur, if any harm happens to you, it is your own fault."

"My own fault, as you say," observed the imperturbable unknown, without stirring from the sofa.

Oliva listened at the head of the stairs, with a palpitating heart.

CHAPTER XIX.

MONSIEUR BEAUSIRE.

OLIVA threw herself before the new-comer, a furious man, who with hands extended before him, pale face, and clothes in disorder, rushed into the room uttering hoarse imprecations.

"Beausire! Come, now, Beausire!" said she, in a tone that betrayed but little fear on the part of that courageous woman.

"Let me alone!" cried the man, roughly breaking loose from her. And lashing himself into greater fury, "Ah!" he said, "it is because there is a man here that the door was not opened! Ah! ah!"

The unknown remained on the sofa, calm and motionless. His attitude seemed to Beausire to betray indecision or even fright. He went up to him, grinding his teeth in a threatening manner. "I suppose you will answer me, Monsieur?" he said.

"What is it that you would like to have me tell you, my dear Monsieur Beausire?" replied the unknown.

"What are you doing here; and in the first place, who are you?"

"I am a quiet man at whom you are just now glaring terribly, and I was conversing with Madame, very properly."

"Certainly," murmured Oliva, "very properly."

"Hold your tongue!" shouted Beausire.

"There, there!" said the unknown, "don't be so rude to Madame, who has done no wrong; and if you are angry —"

"Yes, I am angry!"

"He must have lost at cards," said Oliva, in a low tone.

"Death of all the devils!" bawled Beausire, "I am cleaned out!"

"And you would not be sorry to clean out some one else?" said the unknown, laughing. "That is easily understood, dear Monsieur Beausire."

"No more of your impudent pleasantry! Do me the favor to get out of this."

"Oh, Monsieur Beausire, indulgence!"

"Death of all the devils of hell! get up and be off, or I will smash the sofa and everything on it!"

"You did not tell me, Mademoiselle, that Monsieur Beausire was subject to these fits. Good Lord! what ferocity!"

Beausire, exasperated, made a theatrical gesture, and in drawing his sword, described with his arms and the blade a circle at least ten feet in circumference.

"Once more," he said, "get up, or I will nail you to the back of the sofa."

"Really you could not be more disagreeable," replied the unknown, quietly, and with his left hand drawing from its sheath a small sword which he had hidden behind the sofa.

Oliva uttered piercing shrieks.

"Ah, Mademoiselle, be quiet," said the man, calmly, holding his sword in his hand without rising from his seat, — "be quiet, or two things will happen: in the first place, you will confuse Monsieur Beausire, and he will be run through by my sword; in the second place, the watch will come up and carry you straight off to Saint Lazare."

Oliva exchanged her shrieks for a most expressive pantomime.

The scene that ensued was curious. Beausire, with his breast uncovered, half-drunk, and furious with rage, was making wild and unskilful passes at his adversary, who, still seated on the sofa, parried them with the utmost ease, laughing in a way to terrify Saint-Georges himself.

Beausire began to grow tired, and his anger had given place to an involuntary terror; for he reflected that if this man, who was now content to stand on the defensive, were to attack instead, he, Beausire, would be done for in a moment. Suddenly, however, the man by a skilful movement, sent Beausire's sword flying across the room; it went through an open window and fell into the street. Beausire did not know which way to look.

"Oh, Monsieur Beausire," said the unknown, "you should be more careful; if your sword should fall point downward on any one he would be a dead man."

Beausire, recalled to himself, ran down at his utmost speed to get his sword, and prevent an accident which would have got him into trouble with the police. Meanwhile Oliva, seizing the hand of the victor, said, "Oh, Monsieur, you are very brave, but Monsieur Beausire is treacherous, and you compromise me by remaining; when you are gone he will certainly beat me."

"Then I will remain."

"Oh, no; when he beats me I beat him in return, and I always get the best of it, because I am not obliged to use any restraint; so if you would but go, Monsieur —"

"But my pretty one, if I go now, I shall meet Monsieur Beausire on the stairs; probably we shall fight again, and as I shall not feel inclined to stand on the staircase, I shall have to kill Monsieur Beausire or be killed by him."

"Mon Dieu! it is true; what a scandalous thing that would be!"

"Well, then, to avoid that, I will remain here."

"For the love of Heaven! go away; go up to the next story, and as soon as he returns, I will lock the door and take the key, and you can walk away while we fight it out."

"You are a charming girl; au revoir."

"Au revoir! until when?"

"To-night, if you please."

"To-night! are you mad?"

"Pardi! yes, to-night. Is there not a ball at the Opera to-night?"

"But it is now midnight."

"I know it, but what matters that to me?"

"We must have dominos."

"Beausire will procure them, — when you have beaten him."

"You are right," said Oliva, laughing.

"And here are ten louis to buy them with."

"Adieu! Adieu! Thanks!" And she pushed him toward the landing.

"Good! he is just closing the door below," said the unknown.

"There is only a latch and a bolt inside. Adieu! he is coming up."

"But if by chance he should beat you, how will you let me know?"

She reflected a moment. "You have a servant?"

"Yes."

"Send him here, and let him wait under the window till I let a note fall."

"I will; adieu;" and he went upstairs.

Nothing could be easier, the stairway was dark, and Oliva drowned the sound of his footsteps by calling loudly to Beausire, "Are you coming back, madman?" Beausire while coming up the stairs was reflecting seriously upon the moral and physical superiority of this intruder, so insolently established in a stranger's house. He at last reached the landing-place where Oliva was waiting for him. His sword was in its scabbard, and he was thinking up a speech.

Oliva seized him by the shoulders, pushed him into the antechamber and double-locked the door as she had promised.

The unknown, before leaving the house, could hear the beginning of the combat, in which might be distinguished by their sharp sound, like brass instruments in an orchestra, that kind of blows called vulgarly and by onomatopœia, slaps. With these slaps were mingled screams and reproaches.

"Indeed," said the unknown, moving away, "I would not have believed that this woman, so terrified just now at the return of the master, possessed such power of resistance."

The unknown lost no time in awaiting the conclusion of the scene. "There is too much heat in the beginning for it to last long," he said, and he turned into the Rue Anjou Dauphin where he found his carriage awaiting him. He spoke a word to one of his servants, who left the carriage and took up a position opposite Oliva's windows, hiding himself in the deep shadow of a small piazza overhanging the entrance of an old house.

In this position the servant could see, on the curtains of the window, two shadows which at first were greatly agitated, and gave him some idea of what was going on inside. The shadows became quieter by degrees, and at last only one remained.

CHAPTER XX.

GOLD.

We must now return to the interior of the room. Beausire was much surprised to see Oliva lock the door, and still more so, not to see his adversary. He began to feel triumphant, for if he was hiding from him, he must, he thought, be afraid of him. He therefore began to look for him, but Oliva forced him to stop and answer her questions.

Beausire, feeling himself ill-treated, began to talk loud.

Oliva, who knew that she was no longer to blame, as the cause of offence had disappeared, — "Quia corpus delicti aberat," as the text has it, — cried out so loud that to silence her Beausire put his hand to her mouth, or tried to do so.

But he was mistaken; Oliva understood differently the very persuasive and conciliatory movement of Beausire. To this hand coming so swiftly in the direction of her face, she opposed a hand as adroit, as quick, as lately had been the sword of the unknown. This hand parried carte and tierce, thrust forward, downward, and gave Beausire a slap in the face.

Beausire gave back, by a side thrust with the right hand, a blow which beat down both hands of Oliva and with a scandalous noise reddened the left cheek.

Oliva replied to this blow of Beausire with a projectile heavy and dangerous, a pitcher of earthen-ware; and Beausire's answer was the whirling of a cane, which broke several cups, cut down a wax candle, and ended by hitting the shoulder of the young woman. She, furious, flew at him and seized him by the throat, and he, trying to free himself, tore her dress.

Then with a cry she pushed him from her with such force that he fell in the middle of the room. He got up foaming with rage.

But as the valor of an enemy is measured by the defence made, and as a good defence must always be respected, even by the conqueror, Beausire, who had conceived much respect for Oliva, took up the conversation where he had left it.

"You are a wicked creature, you ruin me," he said.

"On the contrary, it is you who ruin me."

"Oh, I ruin her! — her who has nothing!"

"Say that I have nothing now; say that you have eaten, and drunk, and played away all that I had."

"You reproach me with my poverty?"

"Yes; for it comes from your vices."

"I will correct all yours at a single blow."

"By beating me?" and Oliva brandished a very heavy pair of tongs, the sight of which made Beausire start back.

"Do not talk of vices; it only remained for you to take a lover."

"And what do you call all those wretches who sit by you in the gambling den, where you pass your days and nights?"

"I play to live."

"And nicely you succeed — we die of hunger; charming profession, on my word!"

"And you with yours are obliged to cry if you get your dress torn, because you have not the means to buy another; a fine profession, pardieu!"

"Better than yours!" cried Oliva, furious, "and there is the proof of it!" And putting her hand in her pocket, she drew out some gold and threw it across the room.

The louis began to roll upon their edges, and tumble on their faces, some hiding under the furniture, others continuing their sonorous evolutions even under the doors. The others fell flat from fatigue, their faces shining like sparks of fire.

When Beausire heard this metallic ring upon the furniture and upon the floor, he was seized with a vertigo, or we ought rather to say, with remorse. "Louis! double louis!" cried he, astounded.

She took out some more, and threw them in his face.

"Oh," cried he, "Oliva has become rich!"

"This is the proceeds of my profession," cynically replied the creature, kicking vigorously both the gold which strewed the floor, and Beausire who was picking it up.

"Sixteen, seventeen, eighteen," counted he, joyfully.

"Miserable wretch!" muttered Oliva.

"Nineteen, twenty, twenty-one, twenty-two."

"Coward!"

"Twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five."

"Villain!"

Beausire got up. "And so, Mademoiselle, you have been saving money, while you deprived me of necessaries. You let me go about in an old hat, darned stockings, and patched clothes, while you had all this money. Where does it come from? Why, from the sale of my furniture, when I joined my sad destiny to yours."

"Scoundrel!" murmured Oliva, looking at him with contempt, which did not disturb him.

"I pardon you, not your avarice, but your economy," he continued.

"You would have killed me just now," said Oliva.

"Just now I was right; now I should be wrong to do it."

"Why, if you please?"

"Because now you are a good housekeeper, and contribute to our expenses."

"You are a base wretch!"

"My little Oliva!"

"Give me back my money."

"Oh, my darling!"

"If you do not, I will pass your own sword through your body."

"Oliva!"

"It is either yes or no."

"It is no, Oliva; I will never consent to be run through the body."

"Do not stir, or I run you through. The money!"

"Give it to me."

"Ah, coward! ah, degraded creature! you beg, you solicit the fruits of my bad conduct! Ah, this is what is called a man! I have always despised you, — have despised you all, do you hear? — and more still him who gives than him who receives."

"He who can give is fortunate. I have also given you, Nicole," replied Beausire, gravely.

"Do not call me Nicole."

"Pardon, then, Oliva; but is it not true?"

"Fine presents, certainly, — some silver buckles, six louis d'or, two silk dresses, and three embroidered handkerchiefs."

"It is a great deal for a soldier."

"Hold your tongue! The buckles you stole from some one else; the louis d'or you borrowed and never returned; the silk dresses —"

"Oliva! Oliva!"

"Give me back my money."

"What shall I give you instead?"

"Double the quantity."

"Well," said the rogue, "I will go to the Rue de Bussy, and play with it, and bring you back, not the double, but the quintuple;" and he made two steps to the door.

She caught him by the skirt of his too tender coat.

"There," said he, "you have torn my coat."

"So much the better, you shall have a new one."

"Six louis! Oliva, six louis! Luckily, at the Rue de Bussy they are not particular about dress."

Oliva seized hold of the other coat-tail and tore it off. Beausire became furious.

"Death of all the devils!" he cried; "you will make me kill you at last. See how this vixen has undressed me. Now I cannot go out."

"On the contrary, you must go out immediately."

"Without a coat?"

"Put on your great-coat."

"All holes and patches."

"Then do not put it on, if you like that better; but you must go out."

"Never."

She took out of her pocket another handful of gold, and jingled it between her hands.

Beausire was almost wild; he kneeled at her feet and cried, "Order, and I will obey."

"Go quickly to the Capucin, Rue de Seine, where they sell dominos for the ball, and buy me one complete, mask and all."

"Good."

"And one for yourself, black; but for me a white satin one, and I give you only twenty minutes to do it in."

"Are we going to the ball?"

"Yes, if you are obedient."

"Oh, always, always!"

"Go, then, and show your zeal."

"I am going."

"What! are you not gone yet?"

"But the money?"

"You have twenty-five louis."

"What! I have twenty-five louis! And how do you make that out?"

"Why, those you picked up."

"Oh, Oliva, I thought you meant to give me those."

"You shall have more another time; but if I give you them now, you will stop and play. Go, and come back quickly."

"She is right," said he to himself; "that is just what I intended to do."

"Twenty-five minutes, do you hear?" cried Oliva.

"I obey."

As soon as he was gone Oliva wrote rapidly these words: "The peace is signed, the division made, and the ball decided on. At two o'clock we shall be at the Opera; I shall wear a white domino, with a blue ribbon on my left shoulder." Then rolling this round a bit of the broken vase, she went to the window and threw it out.

The valet picked it up, and made off immediately.

In less than half an hour Monsieur Beausire returned, followed by two journeymen tailors, who had brought, for the sum of eighteen louis, two beautiful dominos, such as could be found only at the Capucin-Magique, the establishment of a celebrated tailor, costumer of her Majesty and the maids of honor.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE PLEASURE-HOUSE.

We left Madame de La Motte at Monsieur Mesmer's door, watching the queen's carriage as it drove off. As soon as it was out of sight she went home for the purpose of procuring a domino and another mask, and at the same time to see if anything had occurred there while she was away. She had promised herself, for that happy night, some enjoyment after all the emotions of the day. She would go alone to the Opera and enjoy the charm of adventure. Therefore it was a disappointment to her to find a man waiting at her door with a note from the Cardinal de Rohan. She opened it and read as follows: —

"Madame la Comtesse, — You have doubtless not forgotten that we have business together; even if you have a short memory, I never forget what has pleased me. I shall have the honor to wait for you at a place to which my messenger will conduct you, if you please to come."

This letter was signed by a pastoral cross.

Jeanne, although somewhat annoyed, immediately reentered the coach, and told the messenger to get on the box with the coachman. Ten minutes sufficed to bring her to the entrance of the Faubourg Saint Antoine, where, in a hollow and completely hidden by great trees, was one of those pretty houses, built in the time of Louis XV., with all the taste of the sixteenth century, with the comfort of the eighteenth.

"Oh, oh! a pleasure-house," murmured the countess. "It is very natural on the part of Monsieur de Rohan, but very humiliating for a Valois. But, patience!"

That word, which resignation makes a sigh, or impatience an exclamation, betrayed the devouring ambition of her dreams and the mad cupidity of her desires. But as she crossed the threshold of the house she determined on her course of action.

She was led from room to room till she came to a small dining-room, fitted up with exquisite taste. There she found the cardinal waiting for her. He was looking over some pamphlets, but rose immediately on seeing her.

"Ah, here you are. Thanks, Madame la Comtesse," and he approached to kiss her hand; but she drew back with a reproachful and indignant air.

"What is the matter, Madame?" he asked.

"You are, doubtless, not accustomed, Monseigneur, to receive such a greeting from the women whom your Eminence is in the habit of summoning here."

"Oh, Madame!"

"We are in your pleasure-house, are we not, Monsieur?" continued she, looking disdainfully around her.

"But, Madame —"

"I had hoped, Monseigneur, that your Eminence would have deigned to remember in what rank I was born. I had hoped that you would have been pleased to consider that if God has made me poor, he has at least left me the pride of my race."

"Come, come, Countess, I took you for a woman of intellect."

"You call a woman of intellect, it appears, Monseigneur, every one who is indifferent to, and laughs at, everything, even dishonor. To these women — pardon me, your Eminence — I have been in the habit of giving a different name."

"No, Countess, you deceive yourself; I call a woman of intellect one who listens when you speak to her, and does not speak before having listened."

"I listen, then."

"I had to speak to you of serious matters, Countess."

"Therefore you receive me in a dining-room."

"Why, would you have preferred my receiving you in a boudoir?"

"The distinction is delicate," said she.

"I think so, Countess."

"Then I am simply to sup with you?"

"Nothing else."

"I trust your Eminence is persuaded that I feel the honor as I ought."

"You are quizzing, Countess."

"No; I only laugh."

"You laugh?"

"Yes. Would you prefer to see me angry. You are difficult to please, Monseigneur."

"Oh, you are charming when you laugh, and I ask nothing better than to see you always doing so; but at this moment you are not laughing. Oh, no! there is anger in that smile which shows your beautiful teeth."

"Not the least in the world, Monseigneur; the dining-room reassured me."

"That is good."

"And I hope you will enjoy your supper."

"What! — that I shall enjoy my supper? And you?"

"Oh, I am not hungry."

"What, Madame, you refuse to give me a supper?"

"What do you say?"

"You drive me out?"

"I do not understand you, Monseigneur."

"Listen, dear Countess; if you were less in a passion I would tell you that it is useless to behave like this, — you cannot appear otherwise than charming; but as at each compliment I fear to be dismissed, I abstain."

"You fear to be dismissed? Really, I beg pardon of your Eminence, but you become unintelligible."

"What I say is, however, quite clear. The other day, when I came to see you, you complained that you were lodged unsuitably to your rank. That compelled me to shorten my visit; and besides it made you somewhat cold toward me. I thought, therefore, that to restore you to your proper place would be like restoring air to the bird whom the experimenter has placed under his air-pump."

"And then?" said the countess, anxiously, for she began to comprehend.

"Then, beautiful Countess, that you might receive me with pleasure, and that I, on my part, might visit you without compromising either you or myself —" He stopped and looked at her.

"Well?" she said.

"I hoped that you would deign to accept this small residence; you observe I do not call it a pleasure-house."

"Accept! you give me this house, Monseigneur?" said Jeanne, her heart beating with pride and eagerness.

"A very small gift, Countess; but if I had offered you more, you would have refused."

"Oh, Monseigneur, it is impossible for me to accept such a gift."

"Impossible, why? Do not say that word to me, for I do not believe in it. The house belongs to you; the keys are here on this silver plate. I treat you as if you were a conqueror; do you find any humiliation in this?"

"No, but — "

"Then accept."

"Monseigneur, I have told you — "

"How is this, Madame? You write to the ministers for a pension; you accept a hundred louis from an unknown lady — "

"Oh, Monseigneur, it is different. Who receives — "

"Who receives, obliges," said the cardinal, nobly. "Come, I have waited for you in your dining-room. I have not yet seen the boudoir, nor the drawing-room, nor the bed-rooms; but I suppose there are all these."

"Oh, Monseigneur, forgive me! You force me to confess that you are the most delicate of men;" and the countess, who had so long kept her feelings under control, blushed with pleasure at the thought that she would be able to say, "My house." But she perceived, by the appearance of the cardinal, that she had betrayed herself too freely. "Monseigneur," she said, drawing back a step, "I beg your Eminence to give me a supper."

The cardinal took off his cloak, which he had not yet removed, and entered on his duties as major-domo. The supper was speedily served. As the servants were coming through the antechamber Jeanne put on her mask.

"It is I who ought to wear a mask," said the cardinal, "for here you are at home, among your own servants. It is I who am the stranger."

Jeanne began to laugh, but retained her mask nevertheless; and in spite of her pleasure and surprise, which choked her, she did honor to the repast.

The cardinal, as we have already said on several occasions, was a man of a noble heart and of strong intelligence. A long-continued acquaintance with the most civilized courts of Europe, with courts governed by queens; familiarity with the society of women, who at that period complicated, but also often decided, political questions; the experience transmitted to him, so to speak, by inheritance, and increased by personal observation, — all these advantages, so rare to-day, and already rare at that time, made the prince an extremely difficult man for rival diplomatists, or women who were his mistresses, to circumvent. And besides, his polished manners and dignified courtesy were a shield which nothing could penetrate.

The cardinal, therefore, considered himself very superior to Jeanne. That provincial, swollen with pretensions, who had been unable to conceal her avarice under her false pride, seemed to him an easy conquest, desirable, doubtless, by reason of her beauty, her wit, and a certain piquant charm which is especially seductive to men whose sensibilities have been dulled by experience. This time, perhaps, the cardinal, less penetrating than impenetrable, was in error; but Jeanne, beautiful as she was, inspired him with no distrust.

This was the ruin of that superior man. He not only made himself seem less than he was, — he made himself a pygmy. When once the struggle had begun, Jeanne, who was aware of her apparent inferiority, was careful to conceal her real superiority. She played the part of a country coquette, and made herself seem trivial and silly, so that her adversary, still confident in his strength, might be correspondingly feeble in his attacks.

The cardinal, who had observed all the signs of emotion which Jeanne had been unable to repress, thought her intoxicated by the present he had made her, — as indeed she was, for it was beyond her hopes, and even beyond her pretensions. What the cardinal overlooked was that the ambition and pride of a woman like Jeanne would soar to a height beyond his own. Jeanne's first intoxication was already somewhat abated by a succession of new desires.

"Come," said the cardinal, pouring some Cyprus wine into a small cup starred with gold, — "come, now that you have made a contract with me, do not be out of humor toward me, Countess."

"Out of humor toward you? Oh, no!"

"You will sometimes, then, receive me here without aversion?"

"I shall never be so ungrateful as to forget that here you are in your own house, Monseigneur."

"My house? Nonsense!"

"Yes, yours, — yours only."

"Ah, if you contradict me, beware!"

"Well, what will happen?"

"I shall impose on you other conditions."

"Ah, in your turn, beware!"

"Of what?"

"Of everything."

"Tell me."

"I am in my own house — "

"And — "

"And if I find your conditions unreasonable I shall call my servants."

The cardinal began to laugh.

"There, you see!" she said.

"I see nothing at all."

"Oh, yes! you see that you are making fun of me."

"Why do you say that?"

"You laugh — "

"And with reason, it seems to me."

"Yes, with reason, for you know that if I call my servants, they will not come."

"Oh, yes, they would, — the devil take me!"

"Fie, Monseigneur!"

"What, then, have I done?"

"You swore, Monseigneur."

"I am no longer a cardinal while I am here, Countess. I am simply your guest, — that is to say, in good luck;" and he laughed again.

"Come," said the countess to herself; "decidedly, he is a charming man!"

"By the way," said the cardinal, suddenly, as if something quite foreign to his thoughts had occurred to him, "what were you saying to me the other day of two sisters of charity, — two German ladies?"

"Of those two ladies with the portrait?" said Jeanne, who, having seen the queen, was ready with her parry and thrust.

"Yes, the ladies with the portrait."

"Monseigneur," said the countess, looking at him intently, "I am sure you know those ladies better than I do."

"I? Oh, Countess, you do me an injustice! Did you not express a desire to know who they were?"

"Certainly; it is natural to wish to know one's benefactors."

"Well, then, had I known who they were I should have told you."

"Monsieur le Cardinal, I tell you that you know those ladies."

"No."

"Repeat that 'no,' and I shall call you a liar!"

"And I shall take revenge for the insult."

"And how, if you please?"

"By kissing you."

"It is strange that the ambassador to the court of Vienna, the intimate friend of the Empress Maria Theresa, should not recognize the portrait of his friend, unless, indeed, it were very unlike."

"What! Really, Countess, it was the portrait of Maria Theresa?"

"Oh, yes; pretend ignorance!"

"Well, then, suppose that I recognized the portrait, — what would you infer from that?"

"That on recognizing the portrait of Maria Theresa you must have some suspicion as to its owner."

"But why do you insist on my knowing that?" asked the cardinal, with some anxiety.

"Why, because ordinarily one finds the portrait of the mother only in the hands of —"

"Go on."

"Of the daughter."

"The queen!" cried the cardinal, with so truthful a tone of surprise that it duped even Jeanne. "Do you really think the queen came to see you?"

"And you did not suspect it?"

"Mon Dieu! no; how should I? I, who speak to you, am neither son, daughter, nor relation in any degree of Maria Theresa, yet I have a portrait of her about me at this moment. Look!" said he, — and he drew out a snuff-box and showed it to her. "If I, who am in no way related to the imperial house, carry about such a portrait, another might do the same, and yet not be of the august house of Austria."

Jeanne was silent; she had all the instincts of diplomacy, but was deficient in practice.

"Then, it is your opinion," he continued, "that you have had a visit from the queen, Marie Antoinette?"

"The queen and another lady."

"Madame de Polignac?"

"I do not know."

"Perhaps Madame de Lamballe?"

"A young lady, very beautiful and very serious."

"Oh, perhaps Mademoiselle de Taverney."

"It is possible; I do not know her."

"Well, if her Majesty has really come to visit you, you are sure of her protection. It is a great step toward your fortune."

"I believe it, Monseigneur."

"And her Majesty was generous to you?"

"She gave me a hundred louis."

"And she is not rich, — especially at this moment."

"That doubles my gratitude."

"Did she show much interest in you?"

"Very great."

"Then all goes well," said the prelate, thoughtfully, and overlooking the protégé in thinking of the possible protectress; "there remains now but one thing for you to do."

"What is it?"

"To gain admission at Versailles."

The countess smiled.

"Ah, Countess, let us not deceive ourselves; that is not so easy."

She smiled again, more significantly than before.

"Really, you provincials," said the cardinal, "doubt nothing; because you have seen Versailles with doors which open, and stairs for ascending, you think any one may open those doors, and ascend those stairs. Have you seen the monsters of brass, of marble, and of lead, which adorn the park and the terraces?"

"Why, yes, Monseigneur."

"Griffins, gorgons, ghouls, and other ferocious creatures. There are hundreds of them. Well, you will find ten times as many wicked living animals between you and the favor of sovereigns."

"Your Eminence will aid me to pass through the ranks of these monsters."

"I will try, but it will be difficult. And if you pronounce my name, if you show your talisman, after two visits it will be useless to you."

"Happily, then, I am guarded by the immediate protection of the queen, and I shall enter Versailles with a good key."

"What key, Countess?"

"Ah, Monsieur le Cardinal, that is my secret, — or rather it is not; for if it were mine I should feel bound to tell it to my generous protector."

"There is, then, an obstacle, Countess?"

"Alas, yes, Monseigneur. It is not my secret, and I must keep it. Let it suffice you to know that to-morrow I shall go to Versailles; that I shall be received, and I have every reason to hope, well received."

The cardinal looked at her with wonder. "Ah, Countess," said he, laughing, "I shall see if you will get in."

"You will push your curiosity so far as to follow me."

"Exactly."

"Very well."

"Be careful what you do from to-morrow, for your honor is committed to your entrance at Versailles."

"Yes, and into the private apartments, Monseigneur."

"Really, Countess, you are a living enigma."

"One of those monsters who inhabit the park of Versailles?"

"Oh, you believe me a man of taste, do you not?"

"Certainly, Monseigneur."

"Well, here I am at your knees, and I take your hand and kiss it. Should I do that if I thought you a monster?"

"I beg you, Monseigneur, to remember," said Jeanne, coldly, "that I am neither a grisette nor an opera girl, — that I am my own mistress, except as belonging to my husband, and am equal in rank to any man in this kingdom. I will accept freely and spontaneously, when it shall please me, the man who shall have gained my affections. Therefore, Monseigneur, respect me a little, and in me the noble rank to which we both belong."

The cardinal rose. "I see," said he, "you wish me to love you seriously."

"I do not say that; but I wish to be able to love you. When that day comes — if it does come — you will easily find it out, believe me. If you do not, I will let you know it; for I am young enough, and attractive enough, not to mind making the first advances, nor to fear a repulse."

"Countess, if it depends upon me, you shall love me."

"We shall see."

"You have already a friendship for me; have you not?"

"More than that."

"Really? then we are at least half-way."

"Let us not measure the road, but go forward."

"Countess, you are a woman whom I should adore, if —" He stopped and sighed.

"Well," said she, in surprise, "if —"

"If you would permit it," the cardinal hastened to reply.

"Monseigneur, I will permit it, perhaps, when fortune shall have smiled on me sufficiently to persuade you to dispense with falling at my feet, and so prematurely kissing my hands."

"What do you mean?"

"Yes; when I shall be independent of your kindness you will no longer suspect that I welcome your visits through sordid motives. Then you will have a higher opinion of me; I shall gain by it, and you will not lose."

"Then you forbid me to pay my court now?"

"Not at all; but there are other ways besides kneeling and kissing hands."

"Well, Countess, let us hear; what will you permit?"

"All that is compatible with my tastes, my duties —"

"Oh, that is vague indeed."

"Stop; I was going to add, and my caprices."

"I am lost!"

"You draw back?"

The cardinal was at that moment controlled less by his inward thought than by the charm of that provoking enchantress. "No," said he; "I do not draw back."

"Not before my duties?"

"Nor before your tastes and caprices."

"Well, then, I want a proof."

"Speak."

"I want to go to the ball at the Opera."

"Well, Countess, that only concerns yourself. Are you not free as air to go where you wish?"

"Ah, but you have not heard all. I want you to go with me."

"I, to the Opera, Countess?" said he, with a start of horror.

"See, then, how much your desire to please me is worth."

"A cardinal cannot go to a ball at the Opera, Countess. It is as if I proposed to you to go into a — public-house."

"Then a cardinal does not dance, now-a-days?"

"Oh, no!"

"But I have read that Monsieur le Cardinal de Richelieu danced a saraband."

"Yes; before Anne of Austria."

"Before a queen, that is true," said Jeanne, looking at him intently. "Perhaps you would do as much for a queen?"

The cardinal could not help blushing, dissembler as he was. Jeanne, either because she pitied his confusion or because for policy's sake she was unwilling to prolong it, hastened to add, —

"Is it not natural that I should feel hurt when, after all your protestations, you will not do as much for me as you would for a queen, — especially when I only ask you to go concealed in a domino and a mask; and when it would shorten by a gigantic step that road you were measuring a little while ago, — for I could not be too grateful to you."

The cardinal, pleased with being let off so easily, and rejoicing especially in the continuing victory which Jeanne's address allowed him to derive from every one of her caprices, seized the countess's hand and pressed it tenderly. "For you," said he, "everything, — even the impossible."

"Thanks, Monseigneur; you are really amiable. But now that you have consented, I will release you."

"No, no! he who does the work can alone claim the reward. Countess, I will attend you, but in a domino."

"We shall pass through the Rue Saint Denis, close to the Opera," said the Countess; "I will go, masked, into a store, buy a domino and a mask for you, and you can put them on in the carriage."

"Countess, that is a capital idea of yours."

"Oh, Monseigneur, your goodness covers me with confusion. But now I think of it, perhaps at the Hôtel Rohan you might find a domino more to your taste than the one I should buy."

"Now, Countess, that is unpardonable malice. Believe me, if I go to the Opera, I shall be as surprised to find myself there, as you were to find yourself supping tête-à-tête with a man not your husband."

Jeanne had nothing to reply to this. Soon a carriage without arms drove up; they both got in, and drove off at a rapid pace.

CHAPTER XXII.

SOME WORDS ABOUT THE OPERA.

THE Opera, that temple of pleasure at Paris, was burned in the month of June, 1781. Twenty persons had perished in the ruins; and as it was the second time within eighteen years that this had happened, it created a prejudice against the place where it then stood in the Palais Royal, and the king had ordered its removal to a less central spot. The place chosen was the Porte Saint Martin.

The king, vexed to see Paris deprived of its Opera, became as sorrowful as if the arrivals of grain had ceased, or bread had risen to more than seven sous the quartern loaf. It was melancholy to see the nobility, the army, and the citizens without their after-dinner amusement; and to see the promenades thronged with the unemployed divinities, from the chorus singers to the prima donnas.

To console the king, — and the queen too was somewhat interested, — Monsieur Lenoir, an architect, was introduced to their Majesties; he promised to do wonderful things. The worthy man had new devices, including a system of ventilation so perfect that even in case of fire no one could be smothered. He would make eight doors for exit, besides five large windows, placed so low that any one could jump out of them without danger of worse harm than a sprained ankle. To replace the beautiful hall built by Moreau he was to erect a building, with ninety-six feet of frontage toward the boulevard, ornamented with eight caryatides, on pillars forming three entrance doors; with eight columns resting on the foundation, a bas-relief above the capitals, and a gallery with three windows. The stage was to be thirty-six feet wide; the theatre, seventy-two feet deep, and eighty-four across from one wall to the other. There were to be ante-rooms adorned with mirrors, and decorated in a plain and noble style; under the hall an immense reservoir was to be provided, with two series of pumps, to the service of which twenty soldiers of the guards were to be detailed. And to crown all, the architect asked for only seventy-five days and nights to get the building ready for the reception of the public.

This appeared to all a mere gasconade, and was much laughed at. The king, however, went over the estimates with Monsieur Lenoir, and concluded the agreement with him.

Monsieur Lenoir applied himself to the work, and fulfilled his promise; the hall was finished at the appointed time.

Then the public, naturally distrustful, reflected that the structure was built of wood, and that having been built so rapidly, it could not be very stable; so that after longing for its erection, and watching with admiration the daily progress of the work, they were unwilling to enter it, when at last it was completed. A few foolhardy persons took tickets for the performance of "Adèle de Ponthieu," the music by Piccini, but at the same time made their wills.

On seeing this, the architect in his despair had recourse to the king, who gave him an idea.

"The cowards in France," said the king, "are those who have money. They might be willing to give you an income of ten thousand francs, or to be stifled in a crowd; but they will not take the risk of being crushed under falling ceilings. Give them no further attention; address yourself to the worthy citizens who cannot pay for admission. The queen has presented me with a dauphin, and the city is wild with joy. Have it announced that to celebrate the birth of my son, the Opera will be thrown open to the public for a gratuitous performance. If twenty-five hundred persons crowded together — that is an aggregate of three hundred thousand pounds — do not sufficiently test the solidity of the structure, ask those good people to jump about a little; you know Monsieur Lenoir, that weight is quintupled in a fall of four inches. Your twenty-five hundred spectators will weigh fifteen hundred thousand pounds if you make them dance; give a ball, then, after the spectacle."

"Sire, I thank you," said the architect.

"But in the first place, reflect; that crowd will be heavy."

"Sire, I am sure of my work, and I shall go to the ball."

"And I," replied the king, "will attend the second representation."

The architect followed the king's advice. They played "Adèle de Ponthieu" before three thousand plebeians, who applauded louder than kings. They were willing enough to dance after the performance, and to enjoy themselves. Their weight was increased tenfold instead of fivefold. The structure stood unshaken.

Had there been anything to fear it would have been at the subsequent performances, when the timorous nobles crowded the hall, — that hall to which, three years after its opening, Monsieur le Cardinal de Rohan and Madame de La Motte were going to attend a ball.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE OPERA-BALL.

THE ball was at its height when the Cardinal de Rohan and Madame de La Motte glided in stealthily — the prelate, at least — among thousands of dominos and masks of every kind. They were soon lost in the crowd. Two persons had taken refuge from the pressure under the queen's box; one of them wore a white domino and the other a black one. They were talking with great animation. "I tell you, Oliva," said the black domino, "that I am sure you are expecting some one. Your head is no longer a head, but a weathercock, and turns round to look after every new-comer."

"Well! is it astonishing that I should look at the people, when that is what I came here for?"

"Oh, that is what you came for?"

"Well, Monsieur; and for what do people generally come to the Opera?"

"A thousand things."

"Men, perhaps, but women only for one, — to see and be seen by as many persons as possible. You have brought me to the Opera-ball. I am here; you must be resigned."

"Mademoiselle Oliva!"

"Oh, do not speak in that big voice. You know it does not frighten me; and above all, do not call me by name. You know there is nothing in worse taste than to call people by name at the Opera-ball."

The black domino made an angry gesture; it was interrupted by a blue domino who approached them.

"Come, Monsieur," said he, "let Madame amuse herself. It is not mid-Lent every day, and it is not at every mid-Lent that one comes to the Opera-ball."

"Mind your own business," replied the black domino, rudely.

"Eh, Monsieur! learn once for all," said the blue domino, "that a little courtesy is never out of place."

"I do not know you, and why the devil should I have anything to do with you?"

"No; you do not know me, but I know you, Monsieur de Beausire."

At hearing his name thus pronounced, the black domino trembled, and betrayed his agitation by the shaking of his silken hood.

"Oh, do not be afraid, Monsieur de Beausire," continued the mask; "I am not what you think I am."

"Eh, pardieu! what do I think you are? Are you not content with guessing names? Must you pretend also to guess what one thinks?"

"Why not?"

"Then, tell me what I thought. I have never seen a sorcerer, and shall enjoy meeting one."

"Oh, what you ask is not difficult enough to entitle me to that name, which you seem to grant so readily."

"Tell me at all events."

"Well, then, you took me for an agent of Monsieur de Crosne."

"Monsieur de Crosne!" he repeated.

"Oh, yes; you do not know him, pardieu! Monsieur de Crosne, the lieutenant of police."

"Monsieur!"

"Softly, Monsieur de Beausire, you really look as if you were feeling for your sword."

"Certainly I was feeling for it."

"Good Heavens! what a warlike disposition; but I think, dear Monsieur Beausire, you left your sword at home, and you did well. But to speak of something else, will you let me have Madame's arm for a little while?"

"Madame's arm?"

"Yes, Monsieur; that is not uncommon, I believe, at a ball at the Opera, — or have I but just arrived from the Indies?"

"Certainly not, when it is agreeable to the lady's cavalier."

"It suffices sometimes, dear Monsieur Beausire, that it is agreeable to the lady."

"Do you ask it for a long time?"

"Really, Monsieur Beausire, you are too curious. Perhaps for ten minutes, perhaps for an hour, perhaps for all the evening."

"You are laughing at me, Monsieur."

"Dear Monsieur, answer, Yes or No. Yes or no, will you give me Madame's arm?"

"No."

"Come, come, do not be ill-tempered, — you, who were so pleasant a little while ago."

"A little while ago?"

"Yes; at the Rue Dauphine."

"Rue Dauphine!" exclaimed Beausire, stupefied.

Oliva laughed.

"Hold your tongue, Madame," said the black domino, grinding his teeth. Then to the stranger, "I do not understand you. Play your game honestly, if you can."

"My dear Monsieur, it seems to me that nothing can be more honest than the truth. Am I not right, Mademoiselle Oliva?"

"What, you know me also?" said she.

"Did not Monsieur just speak your name aloud?"

"And the truth," continued Beausire, — "the truth is —"

"That you were on the point of killing this poor lady, but stopped at the sound of twenty louis."

"Enough, Monsieur!"

"Well, then, if you have had enough, give me Madame's arm."

"Oh, I see; you and she have an understanding together."

"I swear to you it is not so."

"How can any one say such a thing?" cried Oliva.

"And if it were so," said the stranger, "it would be only for your benefit."

"For my benefit?"

"Certainly."

"When one asserts a thing he proves it," said Beausire, cavalierly.

"Willingly."

"Ah! I should be curious to know —"

"I will prove to you that your presence here is as injurious to you as your absence would be profitable. You are a member of a certain academy, are you not?"

"I?"

"Oh, do not get angry, dear Monsieur de Beausire. I am not speaking of the French Academy."

"Academy — academy —" muttered Beausire.

"In the Rue du Pot-de-Fer, in the second story, is it not, my dear Monsieur de Beausire?"

"Hush!" said Beausire.

The blue domino drew out his watch, which was studded with diamonds that made Beausire's eyes water to look at them. "Well!" continued he, "in a quarter of an hour they are going to discuss there a little project, by which they hope to secure two million francs among the twelve members, of whom you are one, Monsieur de Beausire."

"And you must be another; if you are not —"

"Pray go on."

"A member of the police."

"Oh, Monsieur de Beausire, I thought you had more sense; but I am sorry to see that you are a fool. If I were of the police I should have taken you long ago, for some little affairs less honorable than this speculation of two millions which they are going to discuss in the academy in a few minutes."

Beausire reflected a moment.

"The devil! You must be right." Then still reflecting, "So, Monsieur, you wish to send me to the Rue du Pot-de-Fer; but I know why, — that I may be arrested there; I am not such a fool."

"More foolishness. If I had the power to do as you say; the power, greater still, of guessing what is going on at your academy, — I should have had you arrested at once, and we should have been rid of you, Madame and I; but on the contrary, my motto is 'with gentleness and persuasion,' dear Monsieur de Beausire."

"Oh, I know now," said Beausire, "you are the man who was on the sofa two hours ago, are you not?"

"What sofa?" inquired the blue domino, whose little finger Oliva pinched slightly; "the only sofa I know of is that of Monsieur Crébillon, junior."

"Never mind; you have induced me to go, and if you are sending a worthy man into harm, you will pay for it some day."

"Be tranquil," said the blue domino, laughing at this epithet "worthy;" "by sending you there, I give you one hundred thousand francs at least, for you know the rule of this society is that whoever is absent loses his share."

"Well, then, good-by!" said Beausire, and vanished.

The blue domino took possession of Oliva's arm, left at liberty by Beausire.

"Now!" said she, "I have let you manage poor Beausire at your ease, but I warn you, you will not find me, who know you, so easy to talk over; therefore, find something pretty to say to me, or — "

"I know nothing prettier in the world than your own history, dear Mademoiselle Nicole;" said he, pressing the pretty round arm of the little woman, who uttered a low cry at hearing this name, which the mask whispered in her ear, but recovering herself with marvellous quickness said:

"Oh, mon Dieu! what a name! Is it I whom you call Nicole? If so, you are shipwrecked on leaving port; you founder on the first rock, for that is not my name."

"At present I know that you call yourself Oliva. Nicole was too provincial. I know that there are two women in you, — Oliva and Nicole. We will talk afterward of Oliva; at present I want to speak of Nicole. Have you forgotten the time when you answered to that name? I do not believe it, my dear child; for the name that one bears as a young girl is ever the one enshrined in the heart, although one may have been forced to take another to hide the first. Poor Oliva! Happy Nicole!"

At that moment a swarm of maskers, pushing by them, obliged Oliva to cling closely to her companion to keep from being swept away.

"See," he said, "all this motley crowd. See how these groups form and separate, some with joyous laughter, and others with reproaches. All these people have, perhaps, as many names as you; and I might astonish many of them by speaking to them names which they remember themselves, but think forgotten by all others."

"You said 'Poor Oliva!' Do you, then, think that I am not happy?"

"It would be difficult to be happy with a man like Beausire."

Oliva sighed and said, "Indeed, I am not."

"You love him, however?"

"Oh, a little!"

"If you do not love him much, leave him."

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because I should no sooner have done so than I should regret it."

"Do you think so?"

"I am afraid I should."

"What could you have to regret in a drunkard, a gambler, a man who beats you, and a blackleg who will one day come to the gallows."

"You would not understand me if I told you."

"Try."

"I should regret the excitement with which he surrounds me."

"I ought to have guessed it; that comes of passing your youth with such silent people."

"You knew about my youth?"

"Perfectly."

"Ah, my dear Monsieur!" said Oliva, laughing, and shaking her head with an air of distrust.

"You doubt it?"

"Really, I do."

"Then we will talk a little about your youth, Mademoiselle Nicole."

"Very well; but I warn you, I will answer you nothing."

"I do not wish it. I do not mean your childhood. I begin at the time when you first perceived that you had a heart capable of love."

"Love for whom?"

"For Gilbert."

At this word, this name, a shudder ran through her whole body, and the blue domino felt her trembling on his arm. "Ah, my God!" she cried, "how do you know?" and she darted through her mask, with an indescribable emotion, a searching glance at the blue domino. Then with a sigh, she said, "Oh, Monsieur! you have pronounced a name indeed fertile in recollections. You knew Gilbert?"

"Yes, since I speak to you of him."

"Alas!"

"A charming lad, upon my word. You loved him?"

"He was handsome. No, perhaps not; but I thought him so. He was full of intelligence, my equal in birth; but Gilbert thought no woman his equal."

"Not even —"

"Not even who?"

"Not even Mademoiselle de Ta——"

"Oh, I know whom you mean, Monsieur! You are well informed. Yes, Gilbert loved higher than the poor Nicole. You are possessed of terrible secrets, Monsieur! Tell me, if you can," she continued, looking earnestly at him, "what has become of him?"

"You should know better than any one."

"Why, in Heaven's name?"

"Because, if he followed you from Taverney to Paris, you followed him from Paris to Trianon."

"Yes, that is true; but that is ten years ago, and I wish to know what has happened since the time when I ran away, and since he disappeared. Oh, how much can happen in ten years!"

Her companion looked at her in silence.

"I beg of you," persisted Nicole, almost supplicatingly, "tell me what has become of Gilbert! You turn away your head, and are silent. Perhaps the remembrances pain you."

The blue domino remained with his head bowed down, as if burdened by the weight of his recollections.

"When Gilbert loved Mademoiselle de Taverney —" continued Nicole.

"Speak lower when you mention names. Have you not noticed that I do not speak them?"

"When he loved her so much that every tree at Trianon was witness to his love —"

"You loved him no longer, then?"

"On the contrary, I loved him more than ever; and this love was my ruin. I am beautiful, proud, and when I please, insolent, and would allow my head to be cut off rather than confess myself despised."

"You have a heart, Nicole?"

"I had then," she said, sighing.

"This conversation makes you sad?"

"No; it does me good to speak of my youth. It is with life as with rivers; the most turbid stream has a pure source. Go on, and pay no attention to any poor, stray sigh which may issue from my breast."

"Oh," said the blue domino, with a gentle nod, which betrayed a smile hidden under the mask, "I know of you, of Gilbert, and another person, my poor child, all that you can possibly know yourself."

"Then," cried Oliva, "tell me why Gilbert fled from Trianon; and if you tell me —"

"You will be convinced? Well, I will not tell you, and you will be more thoroughly convinced still."

"How can that be?"

"In asking me why Gilbert left Trianon, you do not wish me to confirm a suspicion, but to tell you something which you do not know."

"That is true."

Then shuddering more violently than she had yet done, she seized both his hands in hers, "My God!" said she, "my God!"

"Well, what does this mean?"

Nicole appeared to recover herself, and to dismiss the idea which had produced this demonstration.

"Nothing," she said.

"Yes, you wished to ask me something."

"Yes; tell me frankly what has become of Gilbert?"

"Have you not heard that he was dead?"

"Yes; but —"

"Well, he is dead."

"Dead!" said Nicole, with an air of doubt. Then shuddering as before, "For mercy's sake, Monsieur, grant me one favor!"

"Two, ten, as many as you like, my dear Nicole."

"I saw you two hours ago, — for it was you, was it not?"

"Certainly."

"You did not, then, try to disguise yourself?"

"Not at all; on the contrary, I did all I could to make you see me."

"Oh, mad, mad woman that I am, — I who looked at you so much! Mad, mad, stupid woman, — only a woman! as Gilbert said."

"Well, now, spare your beautiful hair. Spare yourself."

"No; I wish to punish myself for having looked at you without seeing you."

"I do not understand."

"Do you know what I am going to ask of you?"

"No."

"Take off your mask."

"Here? Impossible!"

"Oh, you cannot fear being seen by others! Here, behind this column, you will be quite hidden, except from me. You fear that I should recognize you."

"Me!"

"And that I should cry, 'It is you; it is Gilbert!'"

"You did well to say, 'Mad! mad!'"

"Take off your mask."

"Yes, on one condition, — that you will take off yours if I ask it."

"I will take it off. If I do not, you may tear it off."

The blue domino yielded to Nicole's request. He went into the dark corner pointed out by her, and taking off his mask placed himself before Oliva, who looked earnestly at him for a whole minute.

"Alas, no!" she said, stamping her feet, and wounding the palms of her hands with her finger-nails. "Alas, it is not Gilbert!"

"And who am I?"

"Oh, I do not care, since you are not he!"

"And if it had been Gilbert?" said he, as he put on his mask again.

"Ah, if it had been!" she cried, passionately, "and he had said to me, 'Nicole, do you remember Taverney-Maison-Rouge?' oh, then —"

"Then?"

"There would have been, for me, no longer a Beausire in the world."

"But I have told you, my dear child, that Gilbert is dead."

"Ah, perhaps, then, it is for the best!" said Oliva, with a sigh.

"Yes; he would never have loved you, beautiful as you are."

"Do you, then, think he despised me?"

"No; he feared you, rather."

"That is possible. I was something like him; and he knew himself so well that I made him afraid."

"Then, as you said just now, it is better that he is dead."

"Do not repeat my words; in your mouth they hurt me. Why is it better that he is dead? Speak!"

"Because to-day, Mademoiselle Oliva, — you observe that I abandon Nicole, — because to-day, my dear Oliva, you have before you a future, happy, rich, and brilliant."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes; if you will resolve to do everything to attain the end I promise you."

"You may rest easy on that score."

"But you must give up sighing, as you were just now."

"Very well! I sighed for Gilbert; and as he is dead, and there are not two Gilberts in the world, I sigh no more."

"Gilbert was young then; he had the faults and good qualities of youth. But now — "

"Gilbert is not now older than he was ten years ago."

"No, undoubtedly, since he is dead."

"You see, then, he is dead; the Gilberts do not grow old, — they die."

"Oh," cried the unknown, "O Youth! O Courage! O Beauty! — eternal springs of love, heroism, and devotion, — he who loses you loses life itself. Youth is paradise, heaven, everything. What God bestows upon us afterward is but a sad compensation for the loss of our youth. The more generous he has been to a man in his youth, the greater should be the compensation when that youth has fled. But nothing can replace, great God! the treasures which that youth lavished on the man."

"Gilbert would have thought what you have so eloquently uttered," said Oliva. "But enough of this subject."

"Yes; we will speak of yourself. Why did you run away with Beausire?"

"Because I wished to leave Trianon, and I was obliged to go with some one. I could no longer remain after having been rejected by Gilbert."

"Ten years of fidelity through pride," said the blue domino. "Oh, how dearly have you paid for that vanity!"

Oliva laughed.

"Oh, I know what you are laughing at! You laugh because a man who pretends to know everything accuses you of having been ten years faithful, when you think you have not exposed yourself to that ridiculous reproach. However, I know all about you. I know that you went to Portugal with Beausire, where you remained two years; that you then left him, and went to the Indies with the captain of a frigate, who hid you in his cabin, and who left you at Chandernagor when he returned to Europe. I know that you had two million rupees to spend in the house of a nabob who kept you shut up, and that you escaped through the window on the shoulders of a slave. You were then rich, for you had carried away two beautiful pearl bracelets, two diamonds, and three large rubies. You came back to France, and, on landing at Brest your evil genius made you encounter Beausire on the quay, who almost fainted on recognizing you, bronzed and emaciated as you were on your return, poor exile!"

"Oh, mon Dieu!" cried Oliva, "who are you, then, who know all this?"

"I know, further, that Beausire carried you off again, persuaded you that he loved you, sold your jewels, and reduced you to poverty. Still you say you love him; and as love is the source of all happiness, of course you must be the happiest woman in the world."

Oliva hung her head, and covered her eyes with her hands; but two large tears might be seen forcing their way through her fingers, — liquid pearls, more precious, perhaps, than those in her bracelets, but which no one, alas! would have wished to purchase of Beausire.

"And this woman," at last she said, "so proud and so happy, you have bought this evening for fifty louis."

"I know it is too little, Madame," said the unknown, with that exquisite grace and perfect courtesy which never leaves the gentleman, even when addressing the lowest class of courtesans.

"No; on the contrary, I am surprised that a woman like me should be worth so much."

"You are worth much more than that, as I will show you. Oh, do not answer, for you do not understand; and besides," added the unknown, leaning toward her.

"And besides?"

"Just now I want all my attention."

"Then I will be silent."

"No; talk, on the contrary, — of anything, it does not matter what, so that we seem occupied."

"Be it so; but you are a very strange man."

"Take hold of my arm, and let us walk."

They walked on among the various groups, Oliva attracting the gaze of every connoisseur to her fine figure, elegantly shaped head, and flexible neck which her domino could not conceal; for in those days at the Opera-ball the passers-by followed the movements of a woman with as much curiosity as in our days the lovers of horse-flesh watch the paces of a fine horse.

At the end of some moments Oliva ventured to ask a question.

"Silence!" said the unknown; "or rather, talk as much as you like, only do not ask questions at present, for I cannot answer now. When you speak, disguise your voice, hold your head up, and scratch your neck with your fan."

She obeyed. In a moment they passed a highly perfumed group, in the centre of which a very elegant-looking man was talking fast to three companions, who were listening respectfully.

"Who is that young man in that beautiful gray domino?" asked Oliva.

"Monsieur le Comte d'Artois," replied the unknown; "but do not speak just now, for mercy's sake!"

At this moment, when Oliva, astounded at the high-sounding name pronounced by her companion, stepped to one side to get a better view of its owner, two other dominos passed them and took refuge from the crowd in a place under the boxes, where there were no benches.

"Lean on this pillar, Countess," said one of them in a low voice, which was overheard by the blue domino, who started at its sound.

Almost at the same moment a yellow domino, whose bold manner revealed the useful man rather than the agreeable courtier, came up to the blue domino and said, "It is he."

"Very good," replied the other, dismissing the yellow domino by a gesture.

"Now, then," said Oliva's companion, turning to her; "we will begin to enjoy ourselves a little."

"I hope so, for you have twice made me sad, — first by taking away Beausire, who always makes me laugh, and then by speaking of Gilbert, who has made me weep so many times."

"I will be both Gilbert and Beausire to you," said the unknown, gravely.

"Oh!" sighed Oliva.

"I do not ask you to love me, remember; I only ask you to accept the life I offer you, — that is, the accomplishment of all your fancies, provided you occasionally help me with mine. Just now I have one."

"What is it?"

"That black domino is a German of my acquaintance who refused to come to the ball with me, under the pretext of a headache."

"And to whom you also said that you would not come."

"Precisely."

"He has a lady with him?"

"Yes."

"Who is she?"

"I do not know; we will approach them. I will pretend that you are a German; you must not speak, lest he should recognize you by your accent as a native Parisian."

"Very well. And you will mystify him?"

"Oh, I will answer for that. Now, pretend to point him out to me with the end of your fan."

"Like that?"

"Yes, very well; now whisper to me."

Oliva obeyed with a docility and intelligence which charmed her companion.

The black domino, who had his back turned to them, did not see all this; but his companion did. "Take care, Monseigneur," said she; "there are two masks watching us."

"Oh, do not be afraid, Countess, they cannot recognize us. Do not mind them; but let me assure you that never form was so enchanting as yours, never eyes so brilliant; permit me to tell you —"

"All that one can say under the mask."

"No, Countess, all that one can say under —"

"Do not finish; you will condemn yourself. And besides, — danger greater still, — our spies would hear."

"Two spies!" cried the cardinal, with agitation.

"Yes, they have made up their minds to come to us."

"Disguise your voice, Countess, if they make you speak."

"And you, yours, Monseigneur."

Oliva and her blue domino indeed approached; the latter came up to the cardinal, and said, "Mask —"

"What do you want?" said the cardinal, in a voice as unlike his natural one as he could make it."

"The lady who accompanies me desires me to ask you some questions," replied the blue domino.

"Ask quickly," said Monsieur de Rohan.

"And let them be very indiscreet," said Madame de La Motte.

"So indiscreet that you must not hear them," replied the blue domino, and he pretended to whisper to Oliva, who made a sign in answer; then in irreproachable German, he said to the cardinal, "Monseigneur, are you in love with the lady who accompanies you?"

The cardinal trembled, "Did you say Monseigneur?" he asked.

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"You are mistaken, then; I am not the person you think."

"Oh, Monsieur le Cardinal! do not deny it; it is useless. If even I did not know you, the lady who accompanies me assures me she knows you perfectly." And he again whispered to Oliva, "Make a sign for yes. Do so every time I press your arm."

She made the sign.

"You astonish me," said the cardinal, completely taken a-back; "who is this lady?"

"Oh, Monseigneur! I thought you would have already recognized her. She knew you at once. It is true that jealousy —"

"Madame is jealous of me?" cried the cardinal.

"We do not say that," replied the unknown, rather haughtily.

"What are you talking about?" asked Madame de La Motte, who did not like this conversation in German which she could not understand.

"Oh, nothing, nothing!"

Madame de La Motte stamped her foot, impatiently.

"Madame," said the cardinal to Oliva, "one word from you and I promise to recognize you instantly."

Monsieur de Rohan had spoken German; Oliva did not understand a single word, and leaned toward the blue domino.

"Do not speak, Madame, I conjure you," said he.

All this mystery piqued the curiosity of the cardinal.

"One single German word," he said, "could not much compromise Madame."

The blue domino, who feigned to have received orders from Oliva, replied immediately, "Monsieur le Cardinal, these are Madame's words: 'He whose thoughts are not continually on the alert, he whose imagination does not perpetually bring before him the presence of the loved one, does not love, however much he may pretend that he does.'"

The cardinal seemed struck by the sentiment expressed in these words. His whole attitude evinced in the highest degree surprise, respect, and exalted devotion; then his arms fell at his sides.

"It is impossible!" he murmured in French.

"What is impossible?" asked Madame de La Motte, who seized eagerly on these few words she could understand.

"Nothing, Madame, nothing."

"Really, Cardinal, you are making me play but a sorry part," said she, angrily.

The cardinal did not even seem to notice her anger, so great was his preoccupation with the German lady.

"Madame," said he to her, "these words that your companion has repeated to me in your name are some German lines which I have read in a house which is perhaps known to you."

The blue domino pressed Oliva's arm, who thereupon bowed assent.

The cardinal shuddered. "That house," said he, hesitatingly, "is it not called 'Schoenbrunn'?"

"Yes," nodded Oliva.

"They were written on a table of cherry-wood, with a gold bodkin, by an august hand?"

"Yes," bowed Oliva, again.

The cardinal stopped, tottered, and leaned against a pillar for support.

Madame de La Motte stood by, watching this strange scene.

Then the cardinal, touching the blue domino, said, "This is the conclusion of the quotation: 'But he who sees everywhere the beloved object, who recognizes her by a flower, by a perfume, even through the thickest veils, he can still be silent; his voice is in his heart, and to be understood by one other heart is sufficient for his happiness.'"

"Oh, they are speaking German here," said a young voice from an approaching group. "Let us listen. Do you speak German, Marshal?"

"No, Monseigneur."

"But you do, Charny?"

"Yes, your Highness."

"Here is Monsieur le Comte d'Artois," said Oliva, softly, to her companion.

At this moment the orchestra began a noisy prelude, and in the commotion caused by the dancers in hurrying to their places, the new-comer ran against the blue domino.

"Take care, gentlemen," said he, with a tone of authority.

"Monsieur," replied the prince, who continued masked, "the crowd urges us forward; your pardon, ladies."

At this instant some invisible hand pulled Oliva's hood from behind, her mask fell, and for a moment her features were visible. The blue domino uttered a cry of affected anxiety; Oliva a cry of alarm. Three or four cries of surprise responded to this exclamation.

The cardinal nearly fainted, and Madame de La Motte supported him. The pressure of the crowd separated the Comte d'Artois and his party from them. Then the blue domino approached the cardinal and said, "This indeed is an irreparable misfortune; this lady's honor is at your mercy."

"Oh, Monsieur, Monsieur!" murmured Prince Louis, bowing; and he passed over his forehead, streaming with perspiration, a handkerchief which trembled in his hand.

"Let us go quickly," said the blue domino to Oliva; and they moved away.

"Now I know," said Madame de La Motte to herself, "what it was the cardinal thought to be impossible; he took this woman for the queen. But what an effect it has had on him! Another observation to be retained."

"Would you like to leave the ball, Countess?" asked Monsieur de Rohan, in a feeble voice.

"As you please, Monseigneur," replied Jeanne.

"I do not find much interest here; do you?"

"None at all."

They pushed their way through the crowd. The cardinal, who was tall, looked all around him trying to catch another glimpse of the vision which had disappeared; but from that moment blue, red, yellow, green, and gray dominos whirled before his eyes in the luminous vapor like the varied colors of a prism. Everything at a distance was blue to the eyes of the unfortunate prince, but nothing near him was of that color. In this state he regained the carriage which awaited him and his companion. They started on their return, and for five minutes the cardinal did not utter a word.

CHAPTER XXIV.

SAPPHO.

MADAME DE LA MOTTE, who never forgot herself, roused the prelate from his revery. "Where is this carriage taking me, Cardinal?" she said.

"Back to your own house, Countess."

"My house! — in the faubourg?"

"Yes, Countess; a very small house to contain so many charms!" and saying this, the cardinal took one of her hands and kissed it gallantly.

The carriage stopped before the little house where so many charms were to try to find room. Jeanne alighted, and the cardinal was preparing to follow her.

"It is not worth the trouble, Monseigneur," whispered this female demon.

"What, not worth the trouble to spend a few hours with you, Countess?"

"And sleep, Monseigneur," said Jeanne.

"I believe there are several sleeping rooms in your house, Countess."

"For me, yes; but for you —"

"None for me?"

"Not yet," said she, with an air so gracious and so provoking that the refusal was equal to a promise.

"Adieu, then," replied the cardinal, so stimulated by the play in hand that for a moment he forgot the scene at the ball.

"Au revoir, Monseigneur."

"Well, I like it better so," said he, as the carriage drove off.

Jeanne entered her new house alone. Six lackeys waited for her in the hall, and she looked at them with that air of quiet superiority which fortune does not bestow upon all the rich.

"Where are my attendants?" she said.

One of the men advanced respectfully. "Two women wait for Madame in her room," said he.

"Call them."

The valet obeyed. A few minutes later two women entered.

"Where do you usually sleep?" said Jeanne.

"We have no place as yet," said one of them; "we can sleep wherever Madame pleases."

"Where are the keys?"

"Here, Madame."

"Well, for this night you will sleep out of the house."

The women looked at her in surprise.

"You have some place to go to?" said Jeanne.

"Certainly, Madame; but it is late. Still, if Madame wishes to be alone —"

"These men can accompany you," she continued, dismissing the valets also, who seemed rather pleased.

"When shall we return?" asked one of the women, timidly.

"To-morrow at noon."

The six valets and the two women looked at each other for a moment, and then, controlled by Jeanne's commanding appearance, they moved toward the door. Jeanne accompanied them, but before closing the door on them asked, "Is any one else in the house?"

"Mon Dieu! no, Madame; there will be no one. It is impossible that Madame should remain here thus abandoned. Let one of the women stay, — in the servants' hall, in the kitchen, anywhere; but let some one stay and watch."

"I have no need of any one."

"But a fire might break out, — Madame might be ill."

"Good-night; go, all of you." She drew out her purse. "Here," she added, "is something as a welcome to my service."

A joyous murmur — a mode of thanks used by well-bred servants — was the only answer, the last word of the valets. All disappeared, bowing to the floor. Jeanne overheard their remarks as they went away; they were saying to one another that fortune had given them a fanciful mistress. When the noise of their voices and footsteps had died away, Jeanne locked the door, and exclaimed triumphantly, "Here I am, alone in my own house!" She lighted a candle in a three-branched candlestick, and bolted the massive door of the vestibule. Then ensued a silent, extraordinary scene, which would have highly interested one of those nocturnal spectators who, according to the fictions of the poet, hover over cities and palaces.

Jeanne was inspecting her possessions. She admired, room by room, all this house, the least detail of which had acquired in her eyes an immense value, now that to the curiosity of the visitor had succeeded the egotism of the proprietor.

The ground-floor included a bath-room, dining-room, three drawing-rooms, and two reception-rooms. The furniture of these rooms was in keeping with the luxuriousness of its owner. It was not new, and it was more pleasing to Jeanne than it would have been if procured expressly for her. All those rich antiques, disdained by women of fashion, the marvellous pieces of carved ebony, the glass lustres, the gothic clocks masterpieces of chasing and enamel, the screens embroidered with Chinese figures, and the enormous Japanese vases filled with rare flowers, — excited the new proprietress to an ecstasy of delight that cannot be described. On a mantel-piece two gilded tritons bore branches of coral from which were suspended, as fruit, articles of jewelry at that time fashionable. On a gilded table with a white marble top was an immense elephant, sea-green, from whose ears hung pendants of sapphire, supporting a tower filled with the flasks of perfumes. Books for women, gilded and illustrated, were conspicuous on rosewood shelves, the corners of which were ornamented with arabesques of gold. A complete set of furniture covered with Gobelin tapestry, a triumph of patient work, which had cost one hundred thousand francs at the manufactory, adorned a small salon finished in gray and gold, on the walls of which every panel was an oblong canvas painted by Vernet or by Greuze. One small salon was richly ornamented with the best portraits by Chardin, and the finest terra-cottas by Clodion. Everything evinced, not the eagerness of a rich parvenu to gratify his caprices or those of his mistress, but the long and patient labor of those whose riches are of ancient date, who add to the treasures received from their fathers other treasures to be handed down to their children.

Jeanne examined everything in detail. Then as her domino annoyed her, and her whalebone bodice was too tight, she went into her bedroom, quickly undressed, and slipped on a robe of wadded silk. Shivering, half-naked in the silk which caressed her bosom and her waist, her vigorous and finely proportioned leg rounding out the folds of her short robe, she boldly ascended the stairs, carrying her light in her hand. Familiarized with the solitude, and having no fear of encountering the gaze even of a servant, she bounded from room to room, permitting her light robe to flutter in the wind which blew in under the doors, and which, ten times in ten minutes, lifted it to the height of her charming knees. When she raised her arm to open a closet door, and the robe opened sufficiently to disclose the white roundness of the shoulder, of that dazzling tint so familiar in the paintings of Rubens, then the invisible spirits concealed under the draperies, or lurking behind the painted panels, must have rejoiced at having in their possession so beautiful a hostess, who thought that she was their possessor.

At length, after roaming through all the house, exhausted, breathless, her candle nearly consumed, she returned to her bedroom, hung with blue satin, and embroidered with large, fantastic flowers. She had seen everything, had admired everything; there was now nothing else for her to admire but herself. Suddenly her eyes fell on a marble Endymion — a delicate and voluptuous figure by Bouchardon — falling, intoxicated with love, on a block of porphyry. She closed the door and the portières of her chamber, drew the heavy window-curtains, and went back to the statue, devouring with her gaze the beautiful lover of Diana, who had given him a last kiss as she ascended toward the sky.

Jeanne felt under her feet the soft wool of the thick carpet; her legs trembled and bent under her; a languor which was induced neither by fatigue nor by sleepiness pervaded her frame and weighed upon her eyelids, while a heat which did not come from the fireplace ascended from her feet through all her body, and filled her veins with that living electricity which is called love.

At the moment of these extraordinary sensations Jeanne perceived herself in a pier-glass placed behind the statue of Endymion. Her robe had fallen from her shoulders to the carpet. The fine cambric, dragged down by the heavier silk, had fallen to the middle of her white and rounded arms. Two black eyes, soft with languor, brilliant with desire, — the eyes of Jeanne herself, — thrilled her to the depths of her heart. She saw that she was beautiful; she felt that she was young and ardent; she said to herself that in all that surrounded her nothing was so worthy of love, — not even Diana. She approached the marble to see if Endymion would not awake to life, and for the mortal disdain the goddess. She became intoxicated with the transport; she leaned her head toward her shoulder with a strange trembling, and applied her lips to the palpitating flesh. While she still gazed into the reflection of herself in the mirror, suddenly her eyes closed, her head drooped forward upon her breast, and sighing, she fell on the bed, without consciousness and without apparent life.

The candle shot forth a last ray of light from the midst of melted wax, and then yielded its last perfume with its last spark.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE ACADEMY.

Beausire had followed to the letter the advice of the blue domino; he had repaired at once to his academy, as it was called. The worthy friend of Oliva, tempted by the enormous sum of two millions, was greatly alarmed at his apparent exclusion by his companions, who had not communicated to him a scheme promising so great reward. He knew that the associates in the academy did not pride themselves on being scrupulous, which in itself was a reason for haste, since the absent are always at a disadvantage, and especially so if their absence affords to others a chance for gain.

Beausire had acquired among his associates the reputation of a man to be feared. This was neither difficult nor astonishing. He had been a police officer and had worn a uniform. He knew how to draw his sword, and he had a habit of looking very fierce at the slightest word that displeased him, — all which appears rather terrifying to those of doubtful courage, especially when they have reason to shun the notoriety of a duel and the curiosity of the police. Beausire, then, calculated on avenging himself for the contempt with which they had treated him, by frightening his associates in the gaming-house of the Rue du Pot-de-Fer.

It was a long distance from the gate Saint Martin to the Church Saint Sulpice. But Beausire was rich; he jumped into a carriage and promised the driver an extra fare.

The horses started off at a rapid pace. Beausire, having no hat and no sword, since he wore a domino, assumed an expression of ferocity, sufficient to alarm any belated passer-by. His entrance into the academy produced quite a sensation.

There were in the first salon about twenty players, who were drinking beer or syrups, and smiling upon seven or eight women horridly rouged, who were looking on the cards.

They were playing faro at the principal table; the stakes were low, and the excitement small in proportion.

On the arrival of the domino, who shook his hood and moved his arms about underneath his dress, some women began to titter, half mockingly and half coquettishly. Monsieur de Beausire was a favorite, and the ladies never ill-treated him. Meantime he advanced as if he had neither heard nor seen anything, and when he had reached the table, he awaited in silence some remark upon his ill-humor.

One of the players — an old financier of doubtful character, a fellow apparently good-natured — said to him, "Corbleu! Chevalier, you come from the ball looking out of sorts."

"That is true," said the ladies.

"Does your domino hurt your head?" said another.

"It is not my domino that hurts me," replied Beausire, harshly.

"Oh!" said the banker, who had just raked toward him a dozen louis, "Monsieur le Chevalier de Beausire has been unfaithful to us; do you not see that he has been to the Opera-ball, and that in that neighborhood he has played for a heavy stake and has lost it?"

Every one laughed at or pitied him, according to their dispositions; the women had compassion for him.

"It is not true that I have been unfaithful to my friends," replied Beausire; "I am incapable of infidelity! It is well for certain persons of my acquaintance to be guilty of infidelity toward their friends;" and to give more weight to his words he had recourse to the gesture of striking his hat down over his head. But unfortunately he merely flattened his silk hood, and thus gave it a ridiculous width, producing a very ludicrous effect instead of the serious one he had intended.

"What do you mean, dear Chevalier?" asked two or three of his associates.

"I know what I mean," replied Beausire.

"But that is not enough for us," said the good-natured old man.

"That does not concern you, Monsieur," retorted Beausire, unwisely.

A very expressive glance from the banker warned him that his remark was indiscreet. Indeed, it was necessary in this assembly not to make any distinction between those who paid and those who pocketed the money.

Beausire understood the glance, but his blood was up; those who are really brave control themselves more easily than those who pretend to be courageous.

"I thought I had friends here," he said.

"Why, certainly," replied several voices.

"Well, I was deceived!"

"In what?"

"In this: that many things are done without me."

Another sign from the banker; new protestations from the others.

"It is enough that I know," said Beausire, "and the false friends shall be punished."

He put his hand to his side to feel for his sword, but only touched his pocket, which, being full of louis, yielded a sound which betrayed him.

"Oh, oh!" cried two ladies, "Monsieur de Beausire is well off to-night!"

"Yes, it seems so," said the banker, slyly; "it seems that if he has lost, he has not lost everything; and that if he has been unfaithful to us, it is an infidelity which can be atoned for. Come, put up something, dear Chevalier."

"I thank you!" said Beausire, dryly; "if every one else keeps what he has, I will keep what I have."

"What the devil do you mean?" whispered one of the players.

"We will have an explanation, presently."

"Play then," said the banker.

"Just one louis," said a lady, caressing Beausire's shoulder in order to get as near as possible to his pocket.

"I only play for millions," said Beausire, boldly; "and really I cannot conceive how people can play here for paltry louis. Millions! Come, gentlemen of the Pot-de-Fer, since there is a secret scheme a-foot for gaining millions, have done with pitiable stakes of a louis! Millions, millionnaires!"

Beausire had reached that moment of excitement when a man over-steps the bounds of common-sense. An intoxication more dangerous than that of wine excited him. Suddenly he received from behind a kick on the legs so violent as to make him pause and turn round; he saw by his side a broad, olive-colored face, stiff and rough, with black eyes as luminous as burning coals. To Beausire's gesture of anger, this strange personage replied with a ceremonious bow and a stare as long as a rapier.

"The Portuguese!" said Beausire, astounded at this salutation from a man who had just kicked him.

"The Portuguese!" repeated the ladies, who abandoned Beausire to flutter round the stranger.

This Portuguese was the pet of these ladies, to whom, on the pretext that he did not speak French, he was in the habit of bringing confectionery, sometimes wrapped up in bank-notes of fifty or sixty francs.

Beausire knew that this Portuguese was one of the partners. He always lost his money with the frequenters of the gaming-house. He fixed the amount of his stakes at a hundred louis a week, and these were always lost. He was the decoy of the society. While he allowed himself to be plucked of a hundred golden feathers, the other associates stripped the players thus entrapped. The Portuguese was therefore regarded by the associates as a useful man, and by the frequenters of the place as an agreeable man. Beausire had for him that tacit respect which is always inspired by what is mysterious, even when it inspires some distrust also. Beausire, therefore, on receiving the kick of the Portuguese, became silent and sat down.

The Portuguese took his place at the table, and put down twenty louis, which in about fifteen minutes had all passed into the hands of the other players. The clock struck three. Two servants entered. The banker dropped his money through a hole in the table, for the by-laws of the association were conformed to the degree of confidence which the members had in one another, and did not permit to any one member exclusive control of the common funds. They even provided that the banker should not wear long sleeves, or carry any money about him, — provisions designed to prevent his hiding money in his sleeve, and to reserve to the company the right to search his pockets and take from him whatever money was found.

The lackeys brought in cloaks, overcoats and swords. Some of the fortunate players offered their arms to the ladies; the unlucky ones squeezed themselves into sedan-chairs, still in use in those quiet parts of the town, and the lights in the gambling-room were extinguished.

Beausire also had put on his domino as if to go out; but he did not leave the house, and as soon as the door was closed upon those departing, he returned and entered the salon where eleven of the associates had already assembled. "At last," said he, "we will have an explanation."

"Light your lamp, and do not speak so loud," said the Portuguese, in good French.

Beausire muttered a few words to which no one paid any attention; the Portuguese seated himself in the banker's place. Then they examined the doors and windows to make certain that all was secure, drew the curtain close, and seated themselves.

"I have a communication to make," said the Portuguese; "fortunately, I arrived in good time; for Monsieur Beausire was seized this evening with a most imprudent flow of eloquence."

Beausire tried to speak.

"Silence," said the Portuguese; "let us not waste time in talk. You have uttered words which were more than imprudent. You had become aware of my plan; that is all very good. You are a man of talent and may have guessed it; but it seems to me that vanity should not predominate over interest."

"I do not understand," said Beausire.

"We do not understand," said the respectable assembly.

"Yes; Monsieur de Beausire hoped to be the first to make this proposition."

"What proposition?" cried the rest.

"Concerning the two million francs!" said Beausire, with emphasis.

"Two million francs!" they cried.

"First," said the Portuguese, "you exaggerate; it is not as much as that. I will instantly prove it."

"We do not know of what you are talking," said the banker.

"But are not the less interested," said another.

"Speak first," said Beausire.

"Gladly," returned the Portuguese; and he turned out a large glass of Orgeat which he drank quietly, retaining all the time his cool manner. "You must know, then," he said — "I am not speaking for Monsieur de Beausire's information — that the necklace is not worth more than fifteen hundred thousand francs."

"Oh, then it concerns a necklace?" said Beausire.

"Yes; did you not mean the same thing?"

"Perhaps."

"Now he is going to be discreet after his former folly," and the Portuguese shrugged his shoulders.

"I see with regret that you are taking a tone which displeases me," said Beausire, with the manner of a cock getting ready to fight.

"Mira! Mira!" said the Portuguese, cold as marble; "when I have done you may say what you please; but time presses, and the ambassador will arrive in eight days."

"This matter becomes complicated," said the banker; "a necklace, fifteen hundred thousand francs, and an ambassador! What does all this mean?"

"Here is the whole thing in a nutshell," said the Portuguese: "Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange offered to the queen a diamond necklace worth fifteen hundred thousand francs. She refused it, and now they do not know what to do with it; for none but a royal fortune could buy it. Well, I have found the royal personage who will buy this necklace, and drag it forth from the iron chest of Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange."

"It is —"

"It is my gracious sovereign the queen of Portugal," and he looked very important.

"We understand it less than ever," said the associates.

"And I not at all," thought Beausire; then he said aloud, "Explain yourself clearly, dear Monsieur Manoel; our private differences should give place to the public interests. I acknowledge you the author of the idea, and renounce all claim to its paternity; but for God's sake, speak out!"

"That is as it should be," said Manoel, drinking a second glass of Orgeat.

"We are already assured that there exists a necklace worth fifteen hundred thousand francs," said the banker. "That is an important point."

"And this necklace is in the strong-box of Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange. That is the second point," said Beausire.

"But Don Manoel said that her Majesty the queen of Portugal would buy the necklace. That is what baffles us."

"Nothing can be clearer, however," said the Portuguese. "All you have to do is to pay attention to my words. The embassy is just now vacant. The new ambassador Monsieur de Souza will arrive in eight days, perhaps sooner."

"Good!" said Beausire.

"And what is there to prevent this ambassador, eager to see Paris, from arriving and establishing himself before that time?"

The partners looked at one another, gaping in wonder.

"Do you not understand," said Beausire, "that Don Manoel means that the ambassador who will arrive may be, perhaps, a false one?"

"Exactly," added the Portuguese. "If the ambassador who shall present himself wishes to purchase the necklace for her Majesty the queen of Portugal, has he not the right?"

"Of course he has," said the company.

"And then he negotiates with Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange. That is all."

"Nothing more?"

"Only, that after having negotiated, it will be necessary to pay," observed the banker.

"Certainly; yes," replied the Portuguese.

"Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange will not give the necklace into the hands of an ambassador, even if it were the real Souza, without good security."

"Oh, I have thought of all that!" said the future ambassador.

"And what is your plan?"

"The embassy, as we have said, is now vacant."

"Yes."

"The only person there is a chancellor, a worthy Frenchman who speaks Portuguese as badly as possible, and who is delighted when the Portuguese speak to him in French, because in that language he is at home, and delighted also when Frenchmen speak Portuguese to him, because it is a compliment to his knowledge."

"Well?" said Beausire.

"Well, gentlemen, we will present ourselves to this worthy man with all the appearances of the new legation."

"Appearances are good," said Beausire, "but credentials are much better."

"We shall have them," replied Manoel.

"No one can deny that Don Manoel is an invaluable man," said Beausire.

"Our appearances and our credentials having convinced the chancellor as to the identity of the legation, we will establish ourselves at the embassy."

"Oh, oh, it is bold!" interrupted Beausire.

"It is necessary," continued the Portuguese.

"It is very simple," affirmed the other partners.

"But the chancellor?" objected Beausire.

"We have agreed that he will be convinced."

"If he should become less credulous, ten minutes before he began to doubt, he would be dismissed. I believe that an ambassador has a right to change his chancellor."

"Certainly."

"Then, when we are masters of the hôtel, our first step will be to wait on Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange."

"But you forget one thing," said Beausire; "our first act should be to ask an audience of the king, and there we should break down. The famous Riza Bey, who was presented to Louis XIV. as ambassador from the Shah of Persia, spoke Persian at least, and there were no scholars here capable of discovering how well he spoke it; but we should be found out at once. We should be told directly that our Portuguese was remarkably French, and we should be sent to the Bastille."

"We will escape this danger by remaining quietly at home."

"Then Monsieur Boehmer will not believe in our ambassadorship."

"Monsieur Boehmer will be told that we have come to France merely to buy the necklace. We will show him our order to do this, as we shall before have shown it to the chancellor; only we must try to avoid showing it to the ministers, for they are suspicious, and might find a multitude of little flaws."

"Oh, yes!" cried they all, "let us avoid the ministers."

"But if Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange require money on account?" asked Beausire.

"That would complicate the affair," said the Portuguese, somewhat embarrassed.

"For," continued Beausire, "it is usual for an ambassador to have letters of credit, at least, if not ready money; and here we should fail."

"You find plenty of reasons why the enterprise should fail," said Manoel; "but nothing to make it succeed."

"It is because I wish it to succeed that I speak of the difficulties. But stop; a thought strikes me."

All the heads approached in a circle.

"Every ambassador has a strong-box."

"Yes; a strong-box and a credit."

"We will not speak of credit, for there is nothing so hard to procure," said Beausire. "To obtain credit, one must have horses, carriages, servants, and everything of that sort. Let us consider the strong-box. What do you know of the one belonging to the Portuguese embassy?"

"I have always regarded her Majesty as a magnificent queen. She has probably seen that everything is arranged properly."

"That is for us to verify; but supposing the strong-box to be empty?"

"As is possible," said the others, laughing.

"Well, if it be, we must ask Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange who are their correspondents at Lisbon, and we will sign and stamp for them letters of credit for the sum demanded."

"That will do," said Manoel, majestically. "I was engrossed with the grand idea, but had not sufficiently considered the details."

"Which are exquisite," said the banker, licking his lips.

"Now, let us think of arranging the parts," said Beausire. "Don Manoel will be ambassador."

"Certainly," they all said.

"And Monsieur Beausire my secretary and interpreter," said Manoel.

"Why so?" said Beausire, rather uneasily.

"I am Monsieur de Souza, and must not speak a word of French; for I know that that gentleman when he talks, which is very seldom, speaks nothing but Portuguese. You, on the contrary, Monsieur, who have travelled, who are familiar with Parisian customs, who speak Portuguese also —"

"Very badly," said Beausire.

"Well enough not to be taken for a Parisian; and then, you know," added Don Manoel, fixing his black eyes on Beausire, "the most useful agents will have the largest shares."

"Assuredly," said the others.

"Well, it is agreed, — I am secretary and interpreter."

"Let us settle this at once," interrupted the banker; "how shall we divide the profits?"

"It shall be divided into twelve parts; but I, as ambassador and author of the scheme, shall have a share and a half; Monsieur Beausire the same, as interpreter and because he partly shared my idea, and talked of millions on arriving here."

Beausire gave a sign of approval.

"Finally," said the Portuguese, "a share and a half to him who sells the jewels."

"Oh," said the others, in one voice, "he should have only half a share!"

"And why?" said Don Manoel, in surprise; "it seems to me that he will run a great deal of risk."

"Yes; but he will have a bonus, a premium, and allowances, which will net him an enormous share," said the banker.

At this everybody laughed; these honest people understood one another wonderfully.

"So far, then, it is settled; we will arrange the minor details to-morrow, for it is very late," said Beausire, who was thinking of Oliva, left at the ball with the blue domino, in whom, in spite of his readiness to give away louis d'or, he did not feel implicit confidence.

"No, no; we will finish at once," said the others. "What is to be prepared?"

"A travelling-carriage, with the arms of Monsieur de Souza," said Beausire.

"That would take too long to paint and to dry," said Manoel.

"Then we must say that the ambassador's carriage broke down on the way, and that he was forced to use the secretary's."

"Have you a carriage, then?" asked the Portuguese.

"I shall have the first one I can find."

"But your arms?"

"Whatever may be on it."

"Oh, that simplifies everything. It must be dirty, — splashes of mud on the panels and on the back and all about the arms, so that the chancellor will see nothing but mud."

"But the rest of the embassy?" asked the banker.

"We will arrive in the evening," said Beausire; "it is the best time for a first entrance; and you shall all follow next day, when we have prepared the way."

"Very well."

"But every ambassador, besides a secretary, must have a valet, who will occupy a delicate position!" said Don Manoel.

"You, Captain," said the banker, addressing one of the sharpers, — "you will take the part of valet."

The captain bowed.

"And the money for the purchases?" said Manoel; "I have nothing."

"I have a little," said Beausire; "but it belongs to my mistress."

"What have we in our fund?" asked the members.

"Your keys, gentlemen," said the banker.

Each drew out a key which opened one of twelve locks; these locks secured the drawer under the table in such a manner that none of these honest associates could open it except in the presence of all the others. They proceeded to examine its contents.

"One hundred and ninety-eight louis, besides the reserve fund," said the banker.

"Give them to Monsieur de Beausire and to me; it is not too much," said Manoel.

"Give us two thirds and leave the other third for the rest of the embassy," said Beausire, with a generosity which won all their hearts.

Don Manoel and Beausire received, therefore, one hundred and thirty-two louis, and sixty-six remained for the others. They then separated, after appointing a rendezvous for the next day.

Beausire rolled up his domino under his arm and hastened to the Rue Dauphine, where he hoped to find Oliva in possession of additional louis d'or.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE AMBASSADOR.

On the evening of the next day a travelling-carriage passed through the Barrière d'Enfer, so covered with dust and mud that no one could discern the arms upon it. The four horses that drew it almost flew over the pavement; the postilions were driving at the pace of a prince, as the saying is. The carriage stopped before a hôtel of handsome appearance in the Rue de la Jussienne, at the door of which two men were waiting, one of whom was in full dress, and the other in the livery usually worn by officers connected with foreign embassies in Paris; in other words, the latter looked like a guard in his gala-costume. The carriage entered the court-yard of the hôtel, and the person first-mentioned respectfully approached the carriage-door and began, in somewhat tremulous tones, a speech in the Portuguese language.

"Who are you?" said a voice from the inside, speaking also in Portuguese, but with this difference, that he spoke the language perfectly.

"The unworthy chancellor of the embassy, your Excellency."

"Very well. How badly you speak our language, my dear chancellor; but where are we to alight?"

"Here, Monseigneur, here."

"This is a poor reception," said Don Manoel, who played the grand personage as he got out of the carriage, leaning on the arms of his secretary and valet.

"Your Excellency must pardon me," said the chancellor, "but the courier announcing your arrival reached the hôtel only at two o'clock to-day. I was absent on business of the legation, and when I returned found your Excellency's letter. I have had only time to have the rooms opened; the servants are now lighting them."

"Very good."

"It gives me great pleasure to see the illustrious person of our new ambassador."

"We desire to keep as quiet as possible," said Don Manoel, "until we receive further orders from Lisbon. But show me to my room, if you please, for I am dying with fatigue; my secretary will give you all necessary directions."

The chancellor bowed respectfully to Beausire, who cordially returned the salutation and said with ironical courtesy, "We will speak French, Monsieur; I think it will be easier for both of us."

"Yes," murmured the chancellor, "I shall be more at my ease; for I confess that my pronunciation — "

"Yes; I see," interrupted Beausire, coolly.

"I will take the liberty to say to you, Monsieur, as you seem so amiable, that I trust Monsieur de Souza will not be annoyed at my speaking Portuguese so badly."

"Oh, not at all, not at all, if you speak French well."

"I!" said the chancellor, joyfully; "I, a Parisian of the Rue Saint Honoré!"

"Indeed! that is delightful," said Beausire. "What is your name? Ducorneau, I believe?"

"Yes, Monsieur; an appropriate name, since it has a Spanish termination. It is very flattering to me that Monsieur knew my name."

"Oh, you are well known, — so well, that we did not bring with us a chancellor from Lisbon."

"I am very grateful, Monsieur; what a fortunate thing for me the nomination of Monsieur de Souza proves to be."

"But Monsieur is ringing, I believe."

"Let us go and see."

They found Manoel attired in a magnificent dressing-gown. Several boxes and dressing-cases of rich appearance were already unpacked and lying about. A large fire burned on the hearth.

"Enter, enter, Chancellor," said the ambassador, who had seated himself in a large cushioned arm-chair, in front of the fire.

"Will his Excellency be angry if I answer in French?"

"Oh, no; I am sure of it."

Monsieur Ducorneau therefore paid his compliments in French.

"Ah! why, this is convenient; you speak in French admirably, Monsieur du Corno."

"He takes me for a Portuguese," thought the chancellor, beside himself with joy; and he pressed Beausire's hand.

"Now," said Manoel, "can I have supper?"

"Certainly, your Excellency; the Palais Royal is only two steps from here, and I know an excellent caterer who will bring your Excellency a good supper in a very short time."

"As if it were for yourself, Monsieur du Corno."

"Yes, Monseigneur; and if your Excellency will permit me, I will add to it some bottles of wine from your own country, such as your Excellency can have found only at Oporto itself."

"Oh, our chancellor has a good cellar, then?" said Beausire, jokingly.

"It is my only luxury," replied he. And now, by the wax-lights, they could remark his rather red nose and puffed cheeks.

"Do as you please, Monsieur du Corno; bring your wine and take supper with us."

"Such an honor —"

"Oh, no formality; to-night I am only a traveller. I shall not begin to be ambassador till to-morrow; then we will talk of business."

"Monseigneur will permit me to arrange my toilet?"

"Oh, you are superb already," said Beausire.

"Yes, but this is only a reception-dress."

"Remain as you are, Monsieur, and give the time to expediting our supper."

Ducorneau, delighted, left the room to fulfil his orders. Then the three rogues, left alone in the bedroom, examined the situation.

"Does this chancellor sleep here?" said Manoel.

"No; the fellow has a good cellar, and I doubt not a pretty woman or a grisette somewhere or other. He is an old bachelor."

"And the porter?"

"We must get rid of him. I will see to that."

"And the other servants in the hôtel?"

"We must replace them to-morrow with our own friends."

"Who is in the kitchen department?"

"No one. The old ambassador did not live here; he had a house in the town."

"What about the strong-box?"

"Oh, on that point, we must consult the chancellor; it is a delicate matter."

"I charge myself with it," said Beausire; "we are already capital friends."

"Hush! here he comes."

Ducorneau entered quite out of breath. He had ordered the supper; he brought six bottles of very respectable appearance from his cellar, and his face was radiant with pleasing anticipation. "Will your Excellency descend to the dining-room?" said he.

"No; we will take supper here sociably by the fire."

"Monseigneur fills me with joy. Here is the wine."

"Sit down, Monsieur du Corno," said the ambassador, "my valet will wait upon us. What day did the last despatches arrive?"

"The evening before the departure of your Excellency's predecessor."

"Are the affairs of the embassy in good order?"

"Oh, yes, Monseigneur."

"No money difficulties; no debts?"

"Not that I know of."

"Because if there are, we must begin by paying them. My predecessor is a worthy man, for whom I would become guarantee."

"Oh, your Excellency will have nothing of that sort to do. All the accounts were settled three weeks ago; and the day after the departure of the late ambassador one hundred thousand francs arrived here."

"One hundred thousand francs?" exclaimed both Don Manoel and Beausire, transported with joy.

"Yes, in gold."

"In gold!" repeated the ambassador, the secretary, and even the valet.

"So," said Beausire, concealing his emotion, "the box contains—"

"One hundred thousand three hundred and twenty-eight francs, Monsieur."

"It is not much," said Don Manoel, coldly; "but happily, her Majesty has placed funds at my disposal. I told you," he continued, turning to Beausire, "that I thought we should need it at Paris."

"Your Excellency took wise precautions," said Beausire, respectfully.

After this important communication of the chancellor the hilarity of the party went on increasing. A good supper, consisting of salmon, crabs, game, and roast meats, contributed to their satisfaction. Ducorneau, quite at his ease, ate enough for ten, and demonstrated to his superiors that a Parisian could do honor to port and sherry.

Monsieur Ducorneau was still blessing Heaven for sending him an ambassador who preferred the French language to the Portuguese, and Portuguese wines to French; he was revelling in that state of bliss which a satisfied and grateful stomach communicates to the brain, when Monsieur de Souza told him that it was time to go to bed. He arose and bowed himself out, hitting everything in his way until he reached the street-door.

Beausire and Don Manoel had not done such honor to the wine as to be ready at once to retire to bed. Besides, the valet must now follow the example of his masters by taking his supper.

Arrangements for the next day were then made; and the three associates made a tour of examination through the hôtel, after having assured themselves that the guard was asleep.

CHAPTER XXVII.

BOEHMER AND BOSSANGE.

THE next morning the embassy, thanks to the activity of the hungry Ducorneau, was aroused from its lethargy. Drawers, paper-boxes, desks, horses pawing in the court-yard, indicated bustle and life where the day before everything had seemed listless and dead.

The report spread quickly in the neighborhood that a grand personage had arrived from Portugal during the night. This rumor which ought to have been a credit to our three rascals could not but inspire them with alarm; for the police of Monsieur Crosne had quick ears and Argus eyes. Still they thought that by audacity, combined with prudence, they might easily keep the police from becoming suspicious until they had had time to complete their business.

At daylight, two hired chaises brought to the hôtel a cargo of nine rascals who were to compose the household of the embassy. They were soon installed or rather disposed of by Beausire. One was appointed to the cash department, another was made keeper of the archives, a third took the place of the porter, whom Ducorneau himself dismissed on the ground that he did not speak Portuguese. The hôtel was therefore peopled by this new garrison, whose duty it was to defend it from everything profane.

The police is profane in the highest degree to all those who have political or other secrets.

Toward noon Don Manoel, called Souza, handsomely dressed, entered a very decent carriage which Beausire had hired for five hundred francs a month. He drove to the house of Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange, accompanied by his secretary and his valet.

The chancellor had orders to settle no accounts except with the knowledge of the secretary. The conspirators wished to keep intact the sum of one hundred thousand francs, — the fundamental pivot of the whole scheme.

The ambassador learned that the jewellers of the crown lived on the Quai de l'École. Thither they took their course, and arrived about one o'clock. The valet knocked at the door, which was secured with immense locks, and studded with large-headed nails, like the door of a prison. These nails were arranged in such a way as to form designs more or less agreeable to the eye, and so that no gimlet, saw, or file could touch a particle of the wood without being damaged by encountering a piece of iron.

A latticed wicket was opened, and a voice asked the valet what he wanted.

"His Excellency the Ambassador of Portugal desires to speak to Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange," replied the valet.

A face quickly appeared at the window of the first story, then a hurried step was heard upon the stairs. The door opened.

Don Manoel alighted from the carriage with dignified deliberation, Monsieur de Beausire having first descended to assist his Excellency.

The man who advanced to meet the two Portuguese with so much haste, on hearing the word "ambassador," was Monsieur Boehmer himself, who made all sorts of apologies while they were ascending the stairs.

Monsieur Beausire observed that behind them a strong woman-servant was fastening the bolts and locks. Monsieur Boehmer, seeing that Beausire's attention was attracted in that direction, said: "Your pardon, Monsieur; we are so exposed in our unfortunate business that we are obliged to take every precaution."

Don Manoel remained impassive, seeing which Boehmer repeated to him the remark which Beausire had received with an affable smile, but the ambassador was as silent as before.

"Your Excellency will pardon me," again said Boehmer, disconcerted.

"His Excellency does not speak French," said Beausire, "and does not understand you, Monsieur; you must communicate to him through me, — unless you speak Portuguese."

"No, Monsieur; I do not."

"I will speak for you, then."

Beausire spoke a few Portuguese words to Manoel, who replied in the same language.

"His Excellency Monsieur le Comte de Souza, ambassador from the queen of Portugal, graciously accepts your apologies, Monsieur, and desires me to ask you if you still have in your possession a beautiful diamond necklace?"

Boehmer looked at him scrutinizingly. Beausire met the look with the coolness of a diplomatist.

"A beautiful diamond necklace," said Boehmer, slowly, — "a very beautiful necklace?"

"The one which you offered to the queen of France; its renown has reached our gracious queen."

"Monsieur," said Boehmer, "is an officer of the ambassador?"

"His private secretary, Monsieur."

Don Manoel, with the air of a great personage, had seated himself, and was looking carelessly at the pictures which hung round the room.

"Monsieur," said Beausire, "it seems to me that you have not heard a word that I have said to you."

"And how so, Monsieur?" replied Boehmer, a little startled by the sharp tone of the secretary.

"I see his Excellency is becoming impatient."

"Excuse me, Monsieur," said Boehmer, coloring, "but I cannot show the necklace except in the presence of my partner, Monsieur Bossange."

"Well, Monsieur, call your partner."

Don Manoel approached Beausire, and with a freezing manner, somewhat majestic withal, began a harangue in Portuguese, during which Beausire many times bowed respectfully. Then Manoel turned his back, and gazed out of the window.

"His Excellency says, Monsieur, that he has already waited ten minutes, and that he is not accustomed to be kept waiting, not even by kings."

Boehmer bowed and rang the bell.

A moment later another person entered the room. It was Monsieur Bossange the partner. Boehmer explained the matter to him in a few words. Bossange gave a glance to the two Portuguese, and asked Boehmer for his key to the safe.

"It seems to me that honest men," thought Beausire, "take as many precautions toward one another as if they were thieves."

Ten minutes later Monsieur Bossange returned, carrying in his left hand a jewel-case; his right hand was hidden under his coat. Beausire saw the outline of two pistols.

"However respectable we may appear," said Manoel, gravely, in Portuguese, "these gentlemen evidently take us for thieves, rather than ambassadors." And he looked narrowly at the two jewellers to discover by any indication of emotion whether they understood the Portuguese language. But he saw nothing, — nothing but a diamond necklace of dazzling beauty.

Monsieur Bossange advanced, and with much apparent confidence put the casket into Manoel's hands. Manoel opened it, and immediately said angrily, to his secretary, "Monsieur, say to these fellows that they exceed the shopkeeper's privilege of stupidity. I ask for a diamond necklace, and they bring me paste. Tell them I will complain to the ministers, and in the name of my queen will have thrown into the Bastille impertinent fellows who play tricks upon an ambassador;" and he threw down the case in such a passion that the jewellers needed no interpretation of his remarks. They apologized effusively, and explained that in France it was usual to show only the models of diamonds, so as not to tempt people to robbery, were they so inclined.

Manoel, with an angry gesture, walked toward the door.

"His Excellency desires me to tell you," said Beausire, "that he is sorry that people like Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange, jewellers to the queen, should not know better how to distinguish an ambassador from a rogue, and that he will return to his hôtel."

The jewellers looked at each other with decided uneasiness, and bowed humbly to the retiring ambassador. Beausire proudly followed his master. The old woman unfastened the door.

"To the hôtel of the embassy, Rue de la Jussienne!" cried Beausire to the coachman.

Boehmer, listening at the wicket, heard the order.

"A complete failure!" muttered Manoel.

"A complete success!" said Beausire. "In an hour these men will follow us."

The carriage rolled away as rapidly as if it had been drawn by eight horses.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

AT THE EMBASSY.

On returning to their hôtel, these gentlemen found Ducorneau dining quietly in his office. Beausire desired him, when he had finished, to go up and see the ambassador, and added, "You will see, my dear Chancellor, that Monsieur de Souza is not an ordinary man."

"I have perceived that already."

"His Excellency," continued Beausire, "wishes to take a distinguished position in Paris, and this residence will be insupportable to him. It will therefore be necessary to find a private residence for Monsieur de Souza."

"That will complicate the diplomatic business," said Ducorneau, "we shall have to go so often to obtain his signature."

"His Excellency will give you a carriage, dear Monsieur Ducorneau."

"A carriage for me!"

"It is to be regretted that you have not one already," continued Beausire. "Every chancellor of a great ambassador should have a carriage; but we will talk of that afterward. His Excellency wishes to know where the strong-box is."

"Upstairs in his own room, Monsieur."

"So far from you?"

"For greater safety, Monsieur. Robbers would find greater difficulty in getting to it there, than here on the ground-floor."

"Robbers!" said Beausire, disdainfully, "and for such a little sum?"

"One hundred thousand francs!" said Ducorneau. "It is easy to see that Monsieur de Souza is very rich; there is not so much money in all the other embassies."

"Shall we examine it now?" said Beausire. "I am rather in a hurry to attend to my own business."

"Immediately, Monsieur."

They went up, and found the money as Ducorneau had stated. Ducorneau gave his key to Beausire, who kept it for some time, pretending to admire its ingenious construction, while he cleverly took the impression of it in wax. Then he gave it back, saying, "Keep it, Monsieur Ducorneau, it is better in your hands than in mine; let us now go to the ambassador."

They found Don Manoel drinking the national chocolate, and apparently much occupied with a writing in cipher.

"Do you understand the cipher used in the late correspondence?" said he to the chancellor.

"No, your Excellency."

"I wish you henceforth to understand it; it will save me a great many annoying details. By the way, what about the box?" said he to Beausire.

"In good condition, like everything else under the charge of Monsieur Ducorneau."

"The hundred thousand francs?"

"Intact."

"Well, sit down, Monsieur du Corno; I want you to give me some information."

"At your Excellency's orders," replied the chancellor, delighted.

"The matter in question is an affair of State."

"Oh, I listen, Monseigneur!" and he drew his chair nearer to the ambassador.

"A very grave affair, in which I would take advantage of your experience. Do you know any honest jewellers in Paris?"

"There are Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange, jewellers to the queen."

"But they are precisely the people I do not wish to employ; I have just left them, and will have nothing more to do with them."

"Have they had the misfortune to displease your Excellency?"

"Seriously, Monsieur du Corno."

"Oh, if I might be a little less reserved, I would venture —"

"Speak!"

"I would ask how these people, who bear so high a name —"

"They are perfect Jews, Monsieur du Corno; and their bad behavior will make them lose a million or two."

"Oh!" cried Ducorneau, eagerly.

"I was sent by her gracious Majesty to make an offer to them for a diamond necklace."

"Oh, the famous necklace which had been ordered by the late king for Madame Dubarry, — I know, I know!"

"You are a valuable man, Monsieur; you know everything. Well, I had intended to buy that necklace; but as things are I shall not buy it."

"Shall I interfere?"

"Monsieur du Corno!"

"Oh, only as a diplomatic affair."

"If you knew them at all, it might be well."

"Bossange is a distant relation of mine."

Don Manoel and Beausire looked at each other. A silence followed. The two Portuguese were sharpening their wits.

At this moment a valet opened the door, and announced "Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange." Don Manoel rose quickly, and said, in an angry tone, "Send those men away!"

The valet was about to obey.

"No; dismiss them yourself, Monsieur the Secretary," said the ambassador.

"In the name of Heaven, allow me to execute the order of Monseigneur!" said Ducorneau. "I will dismiss them gently, since it cannot be avoided."

"Certainly, if you wish," said Manoel, carelessly. Beausire approached him as Ducorneau hurried out.

"It seems that this affair is destined to fail," said Manoel.

"No; Ducorneau will arrange it."

"He will spoil it, you unlucky fellow! You said at the jewellers' that I did not understand French, and Ducorneau will let out that I do understand it."

"I will go," said Beausire.

"Perhaps that is equally dangerous."

"Oh, no! only leave me full power to act."

Beausire went down. Ducorneau had found the jewellers much more disposed to politeness and confidence since entering the hôtel; and on seeing an old friend, Bossange was delighted.

"You here?" said he; and he approached to embrace him.

"Ah, ah, you are very amiable to-day, my rich cousin!" said Ducorneau; "you recognize me here. Is it because I belong to the embassy?"

"On my word, yes!" said Bossange. "If we have been a little estranged, forgive, and render me a service."

"I came for that."

"Thanks! you are, then, attached to the embassy?"

"Yes."

"I want to make an inquiry."

"What about?"

"About this embassy."

"I am the chancellor."

"We would speak to the ambassador."

"I come on his behalf."

"On his behalf! to tell us — "

"That he begs you to leave his hôtel as quickly as possible."

The two jewellers looked at each other disconcerted.

"Because," continued Ducorneau, "it seems you have been uncivil to him."

"But listen — "

"It is useless," said Beausire, who suddenly appeared. "Monsieur Ducorneau, his Excellency told you to dismiss them; do it."

"But, Monsieur — "

"Obey!" said Beausire, with disdain. "Dismiss them!" and he went away.

The chancellor took his relation by the shoulder, and pushed him out, saying, "You have spoiled your fortune."

"Mon Dieu! how susceptible these foreigners are," murmured Boehmer, who was a German.

"When one is called Souza, and has nine hundred thousand francs a year, one has a right to be what he pleases," said Ducorneau.

"Ah," sighed Bossange, "I told you, Boehmer, you were too stiff in business matters!"

"Well," replied the obstinate German, "at least, if we do not get his money he will not get our necklace."

Ducorneau laughed. "You do not understand either a Portuguese or an ambassador, bourgeois that you are. I will tell you what they are: one ambassador, Monsieur de Potemkin, bought every year for his queen, on the first of January, a basket of cherries, which cost one hundred thousand crowns, — one thousand francs a cherry. Well, Monsieur de Souza will buy up all the mines of Brazil, and will find a diamond as big as all yours put together. Though it may cost him an amount equal to his income for twenty years, what will he care for that? — he has no children. So!"

As Ducorneau was about to close the door, Bossange stopped him, saying, "Arrange this affair for me, and you shall have —"

"We are incorruptible here!" replied Ducorneau, and closed the door.

That evening the ambassador received the following letter: —

MONSEIGNEUR, — A man who awaits your orders, desiring to present to you our respectful apologies, is at the door of your hôtel; and upon a word from your Excellency, he will place in the hands of one of your attendants the necklace of which you did us the honor to speak to us. Be pleased to receive, Monseigneur, the assurance of our profound respect.

BOEHMER AND BOSSANGE.

"So," said Manoel, on reading this letter, "the necklace is ours."

"Not so," said Beausire; "it will be ours only when we have bought it. We must buy it, therefore."

"But how?"

"Your Excellency does not understand French, — that is settled; and so, first of all, we must get rid of the chancellor."

"How can we do that?"

"Oh, I will send him away on some diplomatic mission."

"You are wrong," said Manoel; "he will be our security with these men."

"But he will say that you know French."

"No, he will not; I will tell him not to do so."

"Very well, then, he can stay. Let the man with the diamonds come in."

The man was introduced. It was Boehmer himself, who made many bows and excuses; after which he presented his diamonds, and seemed to intend leaving them for examination.

Don Manoel desired him to remain.

"Sit down," said Beausire, "and let us converse, since his Excellency pardons you."

"Oh, how much trouble a man must take to make a sale!" sighed Boehmer.

"How much trouble a man takes to steal," thought Beausire.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE BARGAIN.

THEN the ambassador consented to examine the necklace in detail. Monsieur Boehmer showed each individual beauty.

"On the whole," said Beausire, interpreting for Manoel, "his Excellency sees nothing to complain of in the necklace; but there are ten of the diamonds slightly defective."

"Oh!" said Boehmer.

"His Excellency," interrupted Beausire, "knows more about diamonds than you do; the Portuguese nobility play with the diamonds of Brazil as children do here with glass beads."

In fact, Don Manoel placed his finger on some of the diamonds and showed, with great intelligence, faults which were almost imperceptible, and which even a connoisseur might have passed over without noticing.

"Such as it is, however," said Boehmer, somewhat surprised to find so great a nobleman a jeweller also, "this necklace is the finest collection of diamonds in all Europe."

"That is true," said Don Manoel.

Then Beausire went on, "Well, Monsieur Boehmer, her Majesty the queen of Portugal has heard of this necklace, and has given Monsieur de Souza a commission to buy it, if he should be satisfied as to the quality of the diamonds. He is satisfied; now what is the price?"

"Sixteen hundred thousand francs."

Beausire repeated this to the ambassador.

"It is one hundred thousand francs too much," replied Don Manoel.

"Monseigneur," replied the jeweller, "one cannot estimate profits with precision on an article so valuable as this. In getting together this collection it has been necessary to make voyages and researches that are almost beyond belief."

"One hundred thousand francs too dear," repeated the tenacious Portuguese.

"And if his Excellency says this," said Beausire, "it must be his firm conviction, for he never bargains."

Boehmer was shaken. Nothing reassures a suspicious merchant so much as a customer who haggles as to the price. "However," he said, after a minute's thought, "I cannot consent to a deduction which will make all the difference of loss or profit to myself and my partner."

Don Manoel, after hearing Beausire's interpretation, rose. Beausire returned the case to the jeweller.

"I will, however, speak to Monsieur Bossange about it," continued Boehmer. "I am to understand that his Excellency offers fifteen hundred thousand francs for the necklace?"

"His Excellency never retracts anything he has said; but he might refuse the necklace altogether rather than be subjected to the annoyance of bargaining for it."

"But, Monsieur, you understand that I must consult with my partner?"

"Certainly, Monsieur Boehmer."

"Certainly," replied Don Manoel, to whom Boehmer's question had been interpreted; "but I must have a speedy answer."

"Well, Monseigneur, if my partner will consent to that reduction in the price I also will consent."

"Good."

"It then only remains, besides obtaining the consent of Monsieur Bossange, to settle the mode of payment."

"There will be no difficulty about that," said Beausire. "How do you wish to be paid?"

"Oh," said Boehmer, laughing, "if ready money be possible —"

"What do you call ready money?" said Beausire, coldly.

"Oh, I know no one has a million and a half of francs ready to pay down," said Boehmer, with a sigh.

"It would be inconvenient, even for you, Monsieur Boehmer."

"Still, I cannot consent to dispense with some ready money."

"That is but reasonable." Then turning to Don Manoel, "How much will your Excellency pay down to Monsieur Boehmer?"

"One hundred thousand francs on signing the agreement."

Beausire repeated this.

"And the remainder?" asked Boehmer.

"At the expiration of the time necessary to transmit a draft signed by Monseigneur to Lisbon; unless you prefer to wait for information sent from Lisbon to Paris."

"Oh!" said Boehmer, "we have a correspondent in Lisbon; by writing to him —"

"The very thing," said Beausire, laughing ironically; "write to him; ask him if Monsieur de Souza is solvent, and whether her Majesty the queen can be trusted to the amount of fourteen hundred thousand francs."

"Monsieur —" said Boehmer, confused.

"Do you accept, or do you prefer other conditions?"

"Those which you at first proposed appear to me acceptable. Would there be any fixed dates for the payments?"

"There would be three payments, Monsieur Boehmer, of five hundred thousand francs, and you might make that the object of a pleasant journey."

"A journey to Lisbon?"

"And why not? Is it not worth a little trouble to receive a million and a half within three months?"

"Oh, undoubtedly, but —"

"Moreover, you would travel at the expense of the embassy, and either the chancellor or myself would accompany you."

"I should take the diamonds with me?"

"Without any doubt, unless you would prefer to send the drafts from here, and allow the diamonds to go alone to Portugal."

"I do not know — I believe — that — the journey would be useful, and that —"

"That is also my opinion," said Beausire. "The signature would be made here. You would receive your one hundred thousand francs cash, you would sign the bill of sale, and you would carry the diamonds to her Majesty. What is the name of your correspondent?"

"Messieurs Nunez Balboa, Brothers."

Don Manoel raised his head. "They are my bankers," he said, smiling.

"They are his Excellency's bankers," said Beausire, smiling also.

Boehmer appeared radiant; every cloud had left his brow. He bowed as if to express thanks, at the same time taking leave. A sudden thought brought him back.

"What is it?" asked Beausire, with anxiety.

"Our bargain is made?" said Boehmer.

"Yes."

"Except —"

"Except the consent of Monsieur Bossange, as we have agreed."

"Except another thing," added Boehmer.

"Ah! ah!"

"Monsieur, this is a delicate question, and the honor of the Portuguese name is too strong a sentiment for his Excellency not to understand my meaning."

"What a round-about way you take! To the point!"

"This is the point. The necklace has been offered to her Majesty the queen of France."

"Who has refused it; what then?"

"We cannot, Monsieur, let this necklace leave France forever without informing the queen; and our respect and loyalty demand that we should give the preference to her Majesty."

"It is right," said Don Manoel, with dignity. "I should wish a Portuguese merchant to express the same sentiments."

"I am very happy that his Excellency approves of my conduct. Then all is settled, subject only to the consent of Monsieur Bossange, and the definite refusal of her Majesty the queen of France. I ask three days to settle these two points."

"On our side," said Beausire, "one hundred thousand francs down, three drafts amounting in all to fourteen hundred thousand francs placed in your hands. The case of diamonds to be delivered to the chancellor of the embassy or to me, whichever shall accompany you to Lisbon, to the house of Messieurs Nunez Balboa, Brothers. The whole of the money to be paid in three months. Your travelling expenses to be paid."

"Yes, Monseigneur; yes, Monsieur," said Boehmer.

"Ah!" said Don Manoel, in Portuguese.

"What is it, then?" said Boehmer, uneasy in his turn, and coming back.

"As gratuity," said the ambassador, "a ring worth one thousand pistoles to be given by you to my secretary or to the chancellor of the embassy; in short, to the one who accompanies you to Lisbon, Monsieur."

"That is but too just, Monseigneur," murmured Boehmer; "and I had already in my own mind determined to do so."

Don Manoel dismissed the jeweller with a wave of his hand.

When the two partners were left alone, Don Manoel said angrily to Beausire, "Please to explain what the devil you mean by this journey to Portugal? Are you mad? Why not have the jewels here in exchange for our money?"

"You are too sure of yourself as to this part you are playing," replied Beausire. "You are not yet altogether Monsieur de Souza in the opinion of Monsieur Boehmer."

"Come now! do you think he would have made an agreement if he had suspected anything?"

"As you please. Perhaps he would not have entered into an agreement; but every man in possession of fifteen hundred thousand francs holds himself above all the ambassadors in the world; and every one who gives that value in exchange for pieces of paper, wishes first to know what the papers are worth."

"Then you mean to go to Portugal, — you who cannot speak Portuguese? I tell you, you are mad."

"Not in the least. You will go there yourself."

"Oh, no!" cried Don Manoel, "I have too many good reasons for not wishing to return to Portugal. No! no!"

"I tell you that Monsieur Boehmer would never have given up his diamonds for mere paper."

"Paper signed 'Souza'?"

"I said that he thought himself a real Souza!" cried Beausire, striking his hands together.

"I would rather hear you admit that the affair is a failure," said Don Manoel.

"Not the least in the world. Come here, Captain," said Beausire to the valet, who appeared on the threshold. "You know what we are talking about?"

"Yes."

"You heard me?"

"Certainly."

"Very well. Do you think I have committed a folly?"

"I am sure that you were a thousand times right."

"Explain why."

"Because Monsieur Boehmer would have kept continual watch over the hôtel of the embassy and over the ambassador himself."

"Well?" said Don Manoel.

"Well," replied Beausire, "having both his money and his diamonds by his side, he will have no suspicions; he will set out quietly for Portugal."

"But he will not arrive," said the valet. "Is not that what you mean, Monsieur le Chevalier de Beausire?"

"Ah, you are a lad of discernment," replied Oliva's lover.

"Explain your plan," said Manoel.

"About fifty leagues from Paris," said Beausire, "this clever fellow here will come and present two pistols at the heads of our postilions, will steal from us all we have, including the diamonds, and will leave Monsieur Boehmer half-dead with blows."

"Oh, I was not thinking of that exactly," said the valet; "I thought you would embark for Portugal."

"Well, what then?"

"Monsieur Boehmer, since he is a German, will like being at sea, and will walk frequently on the deck. One day he will make a misstep and fall over, and the necklace will be supposed to have gone with him into the sea. Why should not the sea swallow diamonds worth fifteen hundred thousand francs since it has kept so well the Spanish galleons?"

"Oh, I understand," said Manoel.

"That is fortunate," muttered Beausire.

"But," continued Don Manoel, "for stealing diamonds we should be sent to the Bastille; for making the jeweller look into the sea we should be hanged."

"Yes, but for stealing the diamonds we might be taken," said the captain; "while we should never for a single moment be suspected of drowning this man."

"Well, we will settle all this when the time comes," said Beausire. "In the mean time, to our respective parts. We must administer the affairs of the embassy like model Portuguese, so that it may be said of us: 'If they were not real ambassadors, they appeared to be.' That is always flattering. Let us wait the three days."

CHAPTER XXX.

THE JOURNALIST'S HOUSE.

In the Rue Montorgueil, at the end of a court-yard the entrance to which was closed by an iron gate, was a rather high and narrow house, protected from the noise of the street by massive shutters which gave it the appearance of a house in the country.

On the first floor of this house lived a journalist who had acquired some degree of notoriety. The ground-floor was used for the storage of old journals, which were there piled up after being duly labelled. The two upper stories were occupied by peaceable tenants, whose quiet was broken several times a year by noisy incidents occurring in the rooms of the journalist, — when he was visited by the police or was assailed by actors or other persons to whom he had given special offence.

When these incidents occurred the tenants of the house, which was known in the neighborhood as "The Grate," closed their windows on the side toward the street that they might hear more distinctly the cries of the journalist when receiving chastisement.

Sometimes the journalist, pursued by such assailants, would seek escape by way of the Rue des Vieux-Augustins through a door opening on a level with his chamber. A concealed door opened, then closed; the noise ceased; the man assailed had disappeared, and the assailants found themselves face to face with four fusileers of the French guards, hastily summoned by an old woman in the service of the journalist.

Aside from scenes like this, the tranquillity of "The Grate" was proverbial.

Monsieur Reteau was accustomed to go out in the morning and take a turn on the quays, the public squares, and the boulevards. He observed whatever was ridiculous, whatever was vicious, took notes of what he found, sketched vivid illustrations, and published his portraitures in his next issue. His journal was issued once a week. That is to say, Reteau spent four days looking for subjects and preparing his articles, three days more in printing them, and had his journal ready for issue on the day of publication.

On the day after that on which the agreement with Monsieur Boehmer had been made, three days after the Opera-ball at which Mademoiselle Oliva had enjoyed so much pleasure, leaning on the arm of the blue domino, Monsieur Reteau, on rising at eight o'clock, received from the hands of his old servant a copy of the issue for that day, still fresh from the press. He hastened to read it, with the attentive interest a tender father shows in examining the merits or defects of his beloved son. When he had read it through, "Aldegonde," said he to the old woman, "this is a capital number; have you read it?"

"Not yet; my soup is not made."

"I am satisfied with this number," said the journalist.

"Yes," replied Aldegonde; "but do you know what they say in the printing-room?"

"What do they say?"

"That this time you will not escape the Bastille."

"Aldegonde," replied Reteau, calmly, "make me a good soup, and don't meddle with literature."

"Oh, always the same," returned the old woman, — "rash and imprudent."

"I will buy you some buckles with the profits of this number. Have many copies been sold yet?"

"No; and I fear my buckles will not be very brilliant if this state of things continues. Do you remember the number containing an article on Monsieur de Broglie? Before ten o'clock on that day we had sold a hundred copies."

"And I had retreated three times to the Rue des Vieux-Augustins," said Reteau. "Every noise put me into a fever; those military men are rough!"

"I had inferred," persisted Aldegonde, "that this number of to-day will not be so profitable as was that on Monsieur de Broglie."

"So be it; but at any rate I shall not have to run away so often, and can take my soup in peace. Do you know why, Aldegonde?"

"Faith, no, Monsieur."

"It is because, instead of attacking a man, I attack a body; instead of attacking a soldier, I attack a queen."

"The queen! Thank God!" murmured the old woman. "Fear nothing, then. If you have attacked the queen you will be borne in triumph; we shall sell all our copies, and I shall have my buckles."

"Some one is ringing," said Reteau.

The old woman hastened to the shop to receive the visitor. A moment later she returned triumphant. "A thousand copies!" she said, — "a thousand copies, all at once; there's an order!"

"In what name?" asked Reteau, eagerly.

"I don't know."

"We must know; run and find out."

"Oh, there is time enough; it is no small matter to count and do up a thousand copies."

"Go at once, I tell you, and ask the valet. Is it a valet?"

"It is a messenger, an Auvergnese, with his pack."

"Good; ask him to whom he is to carry these numbers."

Aldegonde went with all speed. The wooden stairs creaked under her ponderous legs, and her loud voice was heard through the floor as she spoke to the messenger. He told her that he was to carry the copies to the Rue Neuve-Saint-Gilles, to the house of the Comte de Cagliostro.

The journalist bounded with joy, and hastened downstairs to assist in the delivery of the papers. The thousand copies were soon heaped on the back of the Auvergnese, who departed bending beneath the weight.

Monsieur Reteau prepared to jot down some notes for his next number regarding the extraordinary success of this, and proposed to write a few lines on the generous nobleman who had bought the thousand copies. He was congratulating himself on having so fortunately made acquaintance with that nobleman, when another ring at the bell was heard.

"Another thousand copies," said Aldegonde, excited by the first success. "Ah, Monsieur, it is not surprising; since the article is about the Austrian, every one will join in the chorus."

"Silence! silence! Aldegonde, don't speak so loud. 'The Austrian!' — that is an offence which might indeed send me to the Bastille you talked about."

"Very well, tell me," said the old woman, sharply; "is she, or is she not, an Austrian?"

"It is a word to which we journalists have given currency, but is not to be used too freely."

There was another ring at the bell.

"Go and see, Aldegonde; I don't think it is any one to buy papers."

"Why do you say that?"

"I think I see a man with a gloomy countenance waiting at the gate."

Aldegonde went down to open the gate; meanwhile Reteau looked on, from his window, with an anxiety that may be easily understood. Aldegonde opened to a man plainly dressed, who asked if he could see the editor of the journal.

"What have you to say to him?" asked Aldegonde, somewhat distrustful; and she held the gate slightly open, ready to shut it at the first sign of danger.

The man rattled some crown-pieces in his pocket, and the sound expanded the old woman's heart. "I have come," he said, "to pay for the thousand copies of to-day's paper, taken in the name of the Comte de Cagliostro."

"Ah, if that is so, come in."

The man entered; but he had not yet closed the gate when another visitor, coming up behind him, — young, tall, and of fine appearance, — held back the gate, saying, "Pardon, Monsieur." Without asking further permission he glided in after the messenger sent by the Comte de Cagliostro.

Aldegonde, intent on gain, and fascinated by the sound of the crown-pieces, hastened on to her master. "Come, come!" she cried; "all goes well. Here are the five hundred francs for the thousand copies."

"Let us receive them nobly," said Reteau, with a grand air; and he draped himself in a somewhat pretentious dressing-gown, for which he was indebted to the munificence, or rather to the fears, of Madame Dugazon, from whom, after her adventure with Astley the equestrian, he had procured numerous presents of every kind.

The messenger of the Comte de Cagliostro went forward and counted out one hundred six-franc pieces, which he arranged in twelve piles. Reteau carefully counted them and examined their quality. Then he thanked the messenger, gave him a receipt, and while dismissing him with a pleasant smile, asked him about the health of the Comte de Cagliostro. The man thanked him as for a common civility, and was taking his departure when Reteau added: "Say to the count that I await his wishes, and that he may rest undisturbed; I know how to keep a secret."

"It is unnecessary," the man replied; "Monsieur le Comte is independent. He does n't believe in magnetism; he wishes to raise a laugh against Monsieur Mesmer, and gives currency to the adventure of the vat for his own amusement."

"Very good," murmured a voice from the doorway; "we will try to raise a laugh at the expense of Monsieur le Comte de Cagliostro."

Monsieur Reteau beheld, advancing into his chamber, a person whose face seemed to him more gloomy than had that of the person he had noticed first. He was, as we have said, a man young and vigorous; but as to his fine appearance, Reteau was not of our opinion. To him the young man seemed to have a threatening expression in his eyes, and to conduct himself in a threatening manner. And in fact, the stranger's left hand rested on the hilt of his sword, and his right hand on the head of a cane.

"What can I do for you, Monsieur?" asked Reteau, with a certain tremulousness of utterance which always seized him on such occasions.

"Monsieur Reteau?" asked the unknown.

"That is my name."

"Who calls himself 'De Villette'?"

"I am he, Monsieur."

"Journalist?"

"I am a journalist."

"Author of this article," asked the unknown, coldly, drawing from his pocket a copy of the new number.

"I am, in fact, not its author," said Reteau, "but its publisher."

"Very well, that comes to exactly the same result; for if you have not had the courage to write the article, you have had the cowardice to allow its publication. I say 'cowardice,' because as a gentleman I wish to measure my words, even in this hole; but I do not thus give full expression to my thought. Were I to say what I think, I should say that he who wrote that article is infamous; he who published it is a scoundrel!"

"Monsieur!" said Reteau, turning pale.

"Ah, this is a wretched piece of business indeed!" continued the young man, with growing excitement; "but listen now, Monsieur, — everything in its turn; just now you received crowns, now you are to receive a caning."

"Oh!" cried Reteau, "we shall see about that."

"And what shall we see?" said the young man, in a sharp, military tone, advancing toward his adversary.

But this was by no means Reteau's first experience in affairs of this sort, and he was acquainted with the secrets of his house. He had only to turn around to find a door, open it, pass through, close it, and bar it, and so make it serve as a defence while he gained an adjacent room which opened into the Rue des Vieux-Augustins. Once there he would be safe; he would find there a small gate, which a turn of the key — and the key was always ready — would open, when he could escape by making good use of his legs.

But that was an unfortunate day for the poor journalist; for just when he put his hand on that key he perceived another man, who seemed to him in his agitated state of mind a Hercules, and who, motionless, threatening, seemed to be waiting for his approach.

Reteau would have been glad to retrace his steps, but the young man with the cane, whom he had seen first, had burst through the door with a vigorous kick, had followed him, and now that he had stopped on seeing that other sentinel, also armed with sword and cane, had only to reach out his arm to lay hold on him. Reteau found himself, then, between two fires, — or rather, between two canes, — in an obscure court between his house and the gate opening into the street.

"Monsieur, I beg you to let me pass," said Reteau to the young man who guarded the gate.

"Monsieur," cried the young man in pursuit, "Monsieur, stop the rascal."

"Be content, Monsieur de Charny; he will not pass out," said the young man at the gate.

"Monsieur de Taverney, is it you?" cried Charny, — for it was he who had come first to Monsieur Reteau by way of the Rue Montorgueil.

On reading the paper that morning they had both conceived the same idea, for they had the same sentiment in their hearts; and without any communication with each other they had proceeded to put that idea into execution. Each of them, on perceiving the other, was affected by jealousy; for each discovered a rival in the man who had been actuated by sentiments identical with his own. It was therefore with a somewhat offensive accent that Monsieur de Charny uttered the words, "Monsieur de Taverney, is it you?"

"Myself," replied Philippe, in the same tone, and making a movement toward the suppliant journalist who had thrust his arms through between the bars of the gate;

"but it seems that I have come too late. Very well, I will be a spectator of the game, — unless you will have the kindness to open the gate for me."

"The game!" murmured the frightened journalist; "are you going to murder me, gentlemen?"

"Oh," said Charny, "that expression is too strong. No, Monsieur, we will not murder you; but we will question you, and then we will see. You allow me to do what I please with this man, do you not, Monsieur de Taverney?"

"Certainly, Monsieur," replied Philippe; "you have the right to precedence, since you arrived first."

"There, then, stick to the wall, and don't you stir," said Charny to Reteau, after thanking Taverney with a gesture. "You admit, then, my dear Monsieur, that you wrote and published that comic tale, as you call it, about the queen, which appeared this morning in your paper?"

"Monsieur, it is not against the queen."

"Ah, good! only that was wanting."

"You are very patient, Monsieur," said Philippe, raging on the other side of the gate.

"Don't be alarmed," replied Charny; "the fellow will lose nothing by waiting."

"Yes," murmured Philippe; "but I also am waiting."

Charny made no reply, but turning to the unhappy Reteau, he said: "'Etteniotna' is 'Antoinette' reversed. Oh, don't lie about it, Monsieur. That would be so stupid and so base that instead of beating you or killing you in an orderly manner, I shall flay you alive. Answer, then, are you the sole author of that article?"

"I am not an informer," said Reteau, drawing himself up.

"Very well; that is as much as to say that there is an accomplice. It must be he who bought a thousand copies of that diatribe, — the Comte de Cagliostro, whom you named a little while ago. So be it; the count will pay his share when you have paid yours. But as I have got hold of you first, you shall pay first," and he raised his cane.

"Monsieur, if I had a sword!" roared the journalist.

Charny lowered his cane. "Monsieur Philippe," said he, "lend your sword to this rascal, I beg of you."

"Oh, by no means. I do not lend an honest sword to a fellow like that. Here is my cane if yours is not enough; but I can't conscientiously do anything more either for him or for you."

"Corbleu! a cane?" said Reteau, exasperated. "Do you know, Monsieur, that I am a gentleman?"

"Then lend your sword to me," said Charny, "and my only course will be never to touch this one again." He threw down his own sword at Reteau's feet, who turned pale.

Philippe could make no further objection. He drew his sword from its sheath, and passed it through the gate to Charny. Charny received it, bowing his thanks. "Ah, you are a gentleman," said he, turning toward Reteau, — "you are a gentleman, and you write such infamous things about the queen of France! Well, then, pick up that sword, and prove yourself a gentleman."

But Reteau did not stir. He seemed to be as much afraid of the sword at his feet as he had been of the cane when it was raised for a moment over his head.

"Mordieu!" said Philippe, in disgust, "open this gate for me."

"Pardon, Monsieur," said Charny; "but you have agreed that this man belongs to me first."

"Then make haste to get through with him, for I am in a hurry to begin."

"I was obliged to exhaust all other means before resorting to this extreme measure," said Charny; "for I find that blows with a cane cost almost as much to the giver as to the receiver; but since the fellow decidedly prefers blows of a cane to thrusts of a sword, he shall be served according to his choice."

Hardly had these words been spoken when a cry from Reteau showed that Charny had suited the action to the word. Five or six blows, vigorously applied, each of which extorted a cry equivalent to the pain it inflicted, followed the first. These cries brought out the old servant; but Charny was as little disturbed by her cries as by those of her master. Meanwhile Philippe, placed like Adam outside of Paradise, bit his fingers, and jumped about like a bear who smells fresh meat before the bars of his cage.

At length Charny stopped, tired of beating; and Reteau threw himself down, tired of being pommelled.

"There!" said Philippe, "are you through, Monsieur?"

"Yes," said Charny.

"Well, then, now return to me my sword, which has been useless to you, and I beg of you, open the gate."

"Monsieur! Monsieur!" implored Reteau, who saw a defender in the man who had settled accounts with him.

"You understand that I can't leave the gentleman outside the gate?" said Charny; "I must open to him."

"Oh, it is a murder!" cried Reteau. "Come, kill me at once, and have it over."

"Oh, now be quiet!" said Charny. "I have no idea that the gentleman will even touch you."

"And you are right!" said Philippe, with sovereign contempt, as he entered the court. "He has been beaten, and justly; but as the legal maxim says, 'Non bis in idem.'

But there are copies of this edition still remaining, and it is important that they should be destroyed."

"Ah, that is true!" said Charny. "You see that two are better than one alone; I should, perhaps, have forgotten that. But by what chance were you at that gate, Monsieur de Taverney?"

"I will tell you," said Philippe. "I inquired in the neighborhood as to the habits of this scoundrel. I ascertained that he was wont to run away when closely pressed. Then I inquired as to his means of escape, and thought that if I should enter by the secret door, and close it after me, I should catch my fox in his hole. The same idea of vengeance occurred to you; but being in more haste than I, your information was less complete. You came in by the usual entrance, and he was escaping from you when, fortunately, you found me there."

"And I am glad it so turned out. Come, Monsieur de Taverney, this fellow will conduct us to his press."

"But my press is not here," said Reteau.

"A lie!" cried Charny, threateningly.

"No, no," said Philippe; "he is right. The type is already distributed; there remains only the printed edition. Now, the edition must be still complete, except for the thousand copies sold to Monsieur de Cagliostro."

"Then he shall tear up that edition before our eyes."

"He shall burn it, — that is the surest method of destruction;" and Philippe, determined on that mode of satisfaction, pushed Reteau before him in the direction of the shop.

CHAPTER XXXI.

HOW TWO FRIENDS BECOME ENEMIES.

In the mean time Aldegonde, having heard her master's cries, and finding the door locked, had gone to call the guard; but before she returned Philippe and Charny had had time to light a fire with the copies from the top of the pile. They were throwing in the rest, one after another, and had nearly completed the task, when the guard appeared followed by a crowd from the neighborhood. Happily, Monsieur Philippe and Charny knew Monsieur Reteau's secret exit, which he had so imprudently shown them; so that when they caught sight of the guard, they made their escape, carrying the key with them.

Then Reteau, once more at liberty, cried, "Help! murder! murder!" while Aldegonde, seeing the flames through the window, cried, "Fire! fire!"

The soldiers arrived; but finding that the young men had disappeared, and that the fire was nearly extinguished, they left Reteau to bathe his back with spirits of camphor, and withdrew to their guard-room. But the crowd, always more curious than the guard, lingered about until noon, hoping for a renewal of the scene of the morning.

When Taverney and Charny found themselves in the Rue des Vieux-Augustins, "Monsieur," said Charny, "now that we have finished that business, can I be of use to you in any way?"

"A thousand thanks, Monsieur! I was about to make you the same offer."

"Thank you; but I have private business, which will probably keep me in Paris most of the day."

"And I also, Monsieur."

"Permit me, then, to take leave of you. I am happy to have met you."

"Permit me to return the compliment, and to express also my sincere desire that this affair may terminate according to your wishes."

The two men bowed with smiling courtesy; but it was easy to see that this exchange of polite words proceeded only from the lips. On separating, they took opposite directions, Philippe ascending the street toward the boulevards, and Charny descending it toward the river; both turned round two or three times, until they lost sight of each other.

Charny, going in the direction of the river, hastened on toward the Rue Neuve-Saint-Gilles. As he approached it, his attention was attracted to the form of a young man who was ascending the Rue Saint Louis, whom, after a moment of doubt, he recognized as Philippe de Taverney. Philippe, by a different course, had reached the corner of the Rue Neuve-Saint-Gilles, where the two young men now found themselves face to face. They both stopped and looked at each other with eyes which on this occasion did not take the trouble to conceal their thoughts. Both had now also the same idea, — that of demanding satisfaction of the Comte de Cagliostro; and meeting there, neither could doubt the other's intention.

"Monsieur de Charny," said Philippe, "I left to you the seller, you should indeed have left to me the purchaser. I allowed you to strike with the cane, let me give the sword-thrusts."

"Monsieur," replied Charny, "you did me that favor because I had arrived first, and for no other reason."

"Yes; but here," said Taverney, "we arrive at the same time, and I tell you at once that I will make no concessions."

"And who says that I ask any, Monsieur? I will maintain my rights, that is all."

"And in your opinion, Monsieur de Charny, your right is —"

"To make Monsieur de Cagliostro burn the thousand copies which he purchased of that scoundrel."

"You will please remember, Monsieur, that it was I who first had the idea of burning those in the Rue Montorgueil."

"Well! you had them burned in the Rue Montorgueil, and I will have them torn up in the Rue Neuve-Saint-Gilles."

"Monsieur, I am sorry to tell you that I very seriously wish to be the first to settle with Comte de Cagliostro."

"All that I can agree to, Monsieur, is to decide the matter by chance; I will throw up a louis, and he who wins shall take precedence."

"Thanks, Monsieur, but I am not generally lucky, and should probably lose;" and he stepped toward the door.

Charny stopped him. "One word, Monsieur, we will soon understand each other."

"Well, Monsieur," answered Philippe, turning back eagerly, for he noticed in Charny's tone an accent of menace which pleased him.

"Before asking satisfaction of Monsieur de Cagliostro, suppose we take a turn in the Bois de Boulogne. It will be out of our way, I know, but perhaps we can settle our dispute there. One of us will probably be left behind, and he who returns need not yield to any one."

"Really, Monsieur," said Philippe, "you anticipate my own thoughts, — that will adjust everything; where shall we meet?"

"Well, if my society be not insupportable to you, we need not part. I ordered my carriage to wait for me in the Place Royale close by here."

"Then you will give me a seat?" said Philippe.

"Certainly, and with the greatest pleasure."

And the two young men, who at first sight had felt that they were rivals, and had become enemies at the first opportunity, now hastened toward the Place Royale where they perceived Charny's carriage. Before entering the carriage Charny wrote a few words on his tablets, which he asked his footman to leave at his hôtel in Paris.

Monsieur de Charny's horses were excellent, and in less than half an hour they reached the Bois de Boulogne. The weather was lovely, and the air was delightful; the fresh leaves were appearing on the trees, and the violets filled the place with their perfume.

"It is a fine day for our drive, is it not, Monsieur de Taverney?" said Charny.

"Beautiful, Monsieur."

"You may go," said Charny to his coachman, as they alighted.

"Are you not wrong, Monsieur, to send away your carriage? One of us may need it."

"No, Monsieur," replied Charny; "in such an affair as this, secrecy is the first thing to be considered; and once in the knowledge of a servant, by to-morrow all Paris might be talking about it."

"As you please, Monsieur; but the fellow who brought us here knows very well what is going on. These people know too well the habits of gentlemen to suppose when they take us to the Bois de Boulogne, and at the pace at which he brought us, that we come simply for a drive. So,

I repeat, your coachman knows what is going on. If he is not sure of it now, he may afterward see one of us wounded, and then he will have no doubt of it. Is it not better to keep him here to take back the one who may need help, than for either of us to be left here wounded and alone?"

"You are right, Monsieur," replied Charny. Then turning to the coachman, "Dauphin," he said, "stop, you may wait here."

Dauphin had expected to be recalled; he had driven very slowly and consequently was within hail. He therefore stopped; and as Philippe had foreseen, he suspected what was going forward. He placed himself so as to see, through the still leafless trees, everything that took place.

Philippe and Charny soon reached a spot which was near the centre of the wood. Philippe, who walked in front, found a dry place, and firm under-foot; it was an open place, well adapted to the purpose they had in view.

"With deference to your opinion, Monsieur de Charny," said Philippe, "it seems to me that this is a good place."

"Excellent, Monsieur," replied Charny, taking off his coat.

Philippe also took off his coat, threw down his hat, and drew his sword.

"Monsieur," said Charny, whose sword was still in the scabbard, "to any one but you I would say one word of kindness, if not of apology, and we should be friends again; but to you — a brave soldier who have just come from America, a country where they fight so well — I cannot —"

"And I, to any other," replied Philippe, "would say, 'Monsieur, in my relations toward you I am perhaps in the wrong;' but to you — to the brave sailor who lately received the admiration of the whole court for having performed a glorious exploit in battle — to you, Monsieur de Charny, I can say nothing but this, 'Monsieur le Comte, do me the honor to draw your sword.'"

The count bowed, and in his turn drew his sword.

"Monsieur," said Charny, "I believe that neither of us has touched on the real cause of the quarrel."

"I do not understand you, Count," replied Philippe.

"Oh, on the contrary, you do understand me, Monsieur; and as you come from a country whose people know not how to lie, you blushed while saying that you did not understand me."

"Guard!" said Philippe.

Their swords crossed. At the first pass Philippe perceived that he had a marked superiority over his adversary. But this assurance, instead of increasing his ardor, appeared to chill it altogether, and he became as calm as if he were in a fencing academy, and instead of a sword was holding a foil in his hand. He contented himself with parrying, and the combat had lasted more than a minute without his giving a single blow.

"You are sparing me, Monsieur," said Charny; "may I ask why?" And making a rapid feint, he lunged heavily at Philippe. But Philippe covered the sword of his adversary with a counter still more rapid than the feint, and the thrust was parried.

Although Taverney's parry had thrown Charny's sword out of line, Taverney did not thrust in return. Charny made another attack which Philippe again warded off by a simple parry; Charny was forced to recover himself rapidly.

Charny was the younger of the two, and the most ardent; he was mortified, feeling his own blood boil, by his antagonist's coolness. He wished to disturb this calmness.

"I told you, Monsieur, that we had not touched upon the real cause of the quarrel."

Philippe did not answer.

"I will now tell you the real cause; you sought a quarrel with me, — for the quarrel began with you, — you sought a quarrel with me from jealousy."

Philippe remained silent.

"Come now," said Charny, as angry now as Philippe was cool, "what game are you playing, Monsieur de Taverney? Is it your intention to tire my hand? That would be a plan unworthy of you. Morbleu! kill me if you can, but at least kill me in full combat."

Philippe shook his head. "Yes, Monsieur," he said, "your reproaches are deserved; I sought the quarrel and I regret it."

"That is not the question now, Monsieur. You have a sword in your hand; use it for something besides parrying, or if you will not more directly attack, do not defend yourself so well."

"Monsieur," replied Philippe, "I have the honor to tell you a second time that I was wrong, and that I regret it."

But Charny's blood was too hot to comprehend his adversary's generosity; he took offence at it. "Ah!" said he, "I understand; you wish to play the magnanimous with me! That is it, am I not right, Chevalier? This evening, or to-morrow morning, you calculate on telling some beautiful ladies that you came upon the ground with me, and that you spared my life."

"Monsieur le Comte," said Philippe, "I really fear that you are going mad."

"You wished to kill Monsieur de Cagliostro to please the queen; and more surely still to please the queen, you wish to kill me also, but by ridicule."

"Ah, that is a word too much," cried Philippe, knitting his brow; "and this word proves that your heart is not so generous as I thought."

"Well, pierce that heart, then!" said Charny, exposing his breast just as Philippe was making a rapid lunge.

The sword glanced along the ribs, and cut a bleeding seam under the fine white shirt.

"At last!" said Charny, joyfully, "I am wounded! Now if I kill you, mine will be the glorious part!"

"Decidedly," said Philippe, "you are quite mad, Monsieur. You will not kill me, and your part will be altogether inglorious; you will only be disabled without cause and without profit, for no one will ever know for what you have fought."

Charny gave a straightforward thrust, so rapidly that it was with difficulty that Philippe parried it in time; which he not only succeeded in doing, but sent Charny's sword flying ten paces away. Then rushing upon it he broke it under his heel.

"Monsieur de Charny," he said, "it was not necessary for you to prove to me that you were brave; you must therefore detest me very much when you fight with such fury."

Charny did not reply, he was growing pale. Philippe looked at him a few moments, expecting either an avowal or a denial on his part. "Come, Monsieur le Comte," he said, "the die is cast, — we are to be enemies."

Charny tottered. Philippe rushed forward to support him; but he repulsed him, saying, "I thank you, but I hope to be able to get to my carriage."

"Take this handkerchief, at least, to stop the bleeding."

"Willingly," and he took the handkerchief.

"And my arm, Monsieur; the slightest obstacle you meet will throw you down, exhausted as you are, and a fall would cause you useless pain."

"The sword has only penetrated the flesh," said Charny; "I feel nothing in the chest."

"So much the better, Monsieur."

"And I hope soon to be quite well."

"So much the better again, Monsieur. But I warn you that you will find it difficult to make me your adversary again."

Charny tried to answer, but the words died on his lips; he tottered again, and Philippe had only time to catch him in his arms. He lifted him as if he were an infant and carried him half-fainting to his carriage. Dauphin, having seen all that had happened, advanced to meet his master. They put Charny into the carriage; he thanked Philippe by an inclination of the head.

"Drive with care, coachman," said Philippe.

"But you, Monsieur," murmured the wounded man.

"Oh, do not make yourself uneasy about me;" and bowing in his turn, he closed the carriage-door.

Philippe watched the carriage until it disappeared round the corner of an avenue, and then slowly took his way toward Paris. Then, turning round once more and perceiving the carriage, which, instead of returning to Paris as he was about to do, was proceeding in the direction of Versailles and was already disappearing among the trees, he uttered these words, torn from the depths of his heart, "She will pity him!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

PHILIPPE AND CAGLIOSTRO.

At the gate near the guard-house Philippe leaped into a coach which he found standing near.

"To the Rue Neuve-Saint-Gilles," he said to the coachman, "and quickly."

A man who has just fought a duel, and who has preserved the air of a conqueror; a man of vigorous form, whose figure proclaims the nobleman; a man dressed as a citizen, whose deportment indicates the military man, — was more than enough to stimulate the automedon, who started off at a rapid pace, and carried Philippe in a state of great excitement to the house of the Comte de Cagliostro.

The exterior of the hôtel was simple in architectural form and majestic in outline, like most of the buildings constructed in the time of Louis XIV. A large carriage, to which were attached two good horses, stood in the court-yard. The coachman was asleep on his box, wrapped in a great-coat lined with fox-skin; two footmen, one of whom wore a hunting-knife, silently paced up and down before the entrance. With this exception, there was no sign of life about the hôtel.

Philippe's coachman, having been ordered to enter, hailed the guard, who immediately threw open the massive gates. Philippe jumped out, ran up the steps, and addressing both the servants at once, "Does the Comte de Cagliostro live here?" he asked.

"He is just going out," said one of the footmen.

"The more reason, then, for haste, for I wish to speak to him before he goes out. Announce the Chevalier Philippe de Taverney;" and he followed the servant so quickly that they reached the salon at the same time.

"The Chevalier Philippe de Taverney!" repeated after the valet, a voice manly and sweet at the same time, "Show him in."

Philippe entered the room under the influence of a strange emotion which this calm voice had excited. "Excuse me, Monsieur!" he said to a man whom we have already seen, first, at the table of Monsieur de Richelieu, and later, at the exhibition of Monsieur Mesmer, in Oliva's apartment, and with her at the Opera-ball.

"For what, Monsieur?" he replied.

"Because I prevent you from going out."

"You would indeed have needed to excuse yourself had you been much later, for I was waiting for you."

Philippe knit his brows. "What! you were waiting for me?" he said.

"Yes; I was forewarned of your visit."

"You were forewarned of my visit?"

"Yes; two hours ago. It is about that time, is it not, since you were on your way here, when an interruption, independent of your will, caused you to postpone the execution of your project?"

Philippe began to experience the same strange sensations with which this man inspired every one.

"Sit down, Monsieur de Taverney," continued the count; "this arm-chair was placed for you."

"A truce to pleasantry, Monsieur!" said Philippe, in a voice which he vainly tried to render calm.

"I do not jest, Monsieur; I was really waiting for you."

"Then a truce to charlatanism. I did not come to make trial of your skill as a sorcerer; but if you are one, so much the better, for you must know what I am come to say to you, and therefore can protect yourself beforehand."

"I protect myself?" said the count, with a peculiar smile, "and from what, if you please?"

"Divine, since you claim that power."

"Oh, yes; to please you, I spare you the shame of exposing the motive of your visit! You have come to seek a quarrel."

"You know that? Perhaps you also know why?" cried Philippe.

"On account of the queen. Now, Monsieur, it is your turn. Go on; I am ready to listen;" and these last words were not pronounced with the courteous accent of a host, but in the hard and dry tone of an adversary.

"You are right, Monsieur; I like that better."

"We are both suited, then."

"Monsieur, there exists a certain publication —"

"There are many publications," said Cagliostro.

"Edited by a certain journalist —"

"There are many journalists."

"Be patient; this publication — we will speak of the journalist afterward —"

"Permit me to remind you, Monsieur," interrupted Cagliostro, smiling, "that you have spoken of him already."

"Well, this morning's number contained an article aimed against the queen."

Cagliostro made an affirmative sign.

"You know to what I refer?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"You have bought one thousand copies of it?"

"I do not deny it."

"Luckily, they have not reached your hands."

"What makes you think so, Monsieur?"

"Because I met the porter, paid him, and sent him with them to my house; and my servant, instructed by me, must have received them."

"You should always finish yourself the work you undertake, Monsieur."

"I did not finish my own work, because while my servant was employed in saving from your bibliomania these thousand copies, I was engaged in destroying the rest of the edition."

"You are sure, then, that these thousand copies are at your house?"

"Certainly."

"You are mistaken, Monsieur; they are here. Ah, you thought," said the count, phlegmatic as a Nestor, "that I, sorcerer that I am, would let myself be foiled in that way? You thought it a brilliant idea to buy off my messenger? Well, I have a steward, and you see it is natural for the steward of a sorcerer to be a sorcerer also. He divined that you would go to the journalist, and that you would meet my messenger, and that you would pay him; he followed him, and threatened to make him return the gold you had given him. The man was afraid, and instead of going to your hôtel, he followed my steward here. But I see you doubt."

"I do."

"'Vide pedes, vide manus!' Jesus said to Saint Thomas. I will say it to you, Monsieur de Taverney. See this closet, and touch those papers;" and opening an oak cabinet he showed the astonished chevalier the thousand copies lying there.

Philippe approached the count in a menancing attitude, but the latter did not stir. "Monsieur," he said, "you appear to be a man of courage; I call upon you to give me immediate satisfaction."

"Satisfaction for what?"

"For the insult to the queen; in which you render yourself an accomplice, while you keep one number of this vile paper."

"Monsieur," said Cagliostro, without changing his posture, "you make a mistake which gives me pain. I like novelties, scandalous reports, and other amusing things, and collect them that I may remember at a later day what I should otherwise forget. Therefore I have bought these copies, and I do not see that I have insulted anybody by the purchase."

"You have insulted me."

"You?"

"Yes, me, Monsieur; do you understand?"

"No, upon my honor, I do not understand."

"But why, I ask you, did you persist in buying so infamous a publication?"

"As I told you, because of my mania for collecting."

"A man of honor, Monsieur, does not collect infamous things."

"You will excuse me, Monsieur; but I am not of your opinion in regard to this paper. It is injudicious, perhaps, but it is not infamous."

"You will allow, at least, that it is a lie."

"You deceive yourself, Monsieur. The queen was at Monsieur Mesmer's."

"It is false, Monsieur."

"You mean to tell me I lie?"

"I do."

"Well, I will reply in a few words, — I saw her there."

"You saw her!"

"As plainly as I now see you."

Philippe looked his interlocutor full in the face. He wished to combat with his frank, noble, fine look the luminous gaze of Cagliostro; but the struggle wearied him, and he looked away saying, "I still say, Monsieur, that you lie."

Cagliostro shrugged his shoulders as he would have done at the insult of a madman.

"Do you not hear me, Monsieur?" said Philippe.

"On the contrary, Monsieur, I have not lost a word of what you say."

"And do you not know what giving the lie deserves?"

"Yes, Monsieur; there is a French proverb which says it merits a box on the ear."

"Well, Monsieur, I am astonished that your hand has not been already raised to give it, as you are a French gentleman, and know the proverb."

"Before making me a gentleman and teaching me the French proverb, God made me a man and told me to love my fellow-man."

"Then you refuse me satisfaction with the sword?"

"I only pay what I owe."

"Then you will compel me to take satisfaction in another manner."

"How?"

"I will not treat you worse than one nobleman should treat another, but I demand that you burn every copy of that journal which you have in your cabinet."

"Which I refuse to do."

"Reflect."

"I have reflected."

"Then I shall be obliged to proceed with you as another did with the journalist."

"Oh, a beating!" said Cagliostro, laughing, and still as motionless as a statue.

"Neither more nor less, Monsieur. Oh, you will not call your servants?"

"I! Nonsense! And why should I call my servants? It is no concern of theirs; I can settle my own affairs. I am stronger than you. Do you doubt it? I swear it is so, therefore reflect yourself. If you approach me with your cane, I shall take you in my arms and throw you across the room, and shall repeat this as often as you repeat your attempt."

"An English wrestling-match, — that is, a porter's game. Well, Monsieur Hercules, I accept the challenge," said Philippe, throwing himself furiously upon Cagliostro, who, seizing him round the neck and waist with a grasp of iron, threw him on a pile of cushions which lay some way off, and then again took his position before the fire-place as if nothing had happened.

Philippe rose, foaming with rage. But the reaction of cool reasoning soon restored to him his moral faculties. He straightened himself up, arranged his coat and his ruffles, then with a sinister voice, said: "Monsieur, you are in fact as strong as four men, but your logic is not as strong as your arm; and you forgot, when you treated me thus, that you gave me the right to say, 'Defend yourself, Count, or I will kill you.'"

Cagliostro did not move.

"Draw your sword, I tell you, Monsieur, or you are a dead man."

"You are not yet sufficiently near for me to treat you as I did before, and I will not expose myself to be wounded and perhaps killed by you as poor Gilbert was."

"Gilbert!" cried Philippe, reeling back. "Did you say Gilbert?"

"Happily you have no gun this time, only a sword."

"Monsieur," cried Philippe, "you have pronounced a name —"

"Which has awakened a terrible echo in your memory, has it not? — a name that you never thought to hear again, for you were alone with the poor boy, in that grotto of Azores, when you assassinated him."

"Oh!" said Philippe, "defend yourself! defend yourself!"

"If you knew," said Cagliostro, "how easily I could make your sword fly from your hand."

"With your sword?"

"Yes; with my sword, if I wished."

"Then try! then try!"

"No, I have a still surer method."

"For the last time, draw your sword," said Philippe, springing toward the count; but the latter, now threatened by the sword's point, which was scarcely three inches from his breast, took from his pocket a small vial which he uncorked and threw the contents in Philippe's face. Scarcely had the liquid touched him, when he reeled, let his sword drop, and fell senseless.

Cagliostro picked him up, laid him on a sofa, waited for his senses to return, and then said, "At your age, Chevalier, we should have done with follies; cease therefore to act like a foolish boy, and listen to me."

Philippe made an effort to shake off the torpor which still held possession of him, and murmured, "Oh, Monsieur, do you call that the weapon of a gentleman?"

Cagliostro shrugged his shoulders. "You repeat forever the same word," he said. "When we of the nobility have opened our mouths wide enough to utter the word 'gentleman,' we think we have said everything. What do you call the weapon of a gentleman? Is it your sword, which served you so badly against me, or is it your gun, which served you so well against Gilbert? What makes some men superior to others, Chevalier? Do you think it is that high-sounding word 'gentleman'? No; it is first reason, then strength, and most of all, science. Well, I have used all these against you. With my reason, I braved your insults; with my strength, I conquered yours; and with my science, I extinguished at once your moral and physical powers. Now I wish to show you that you have committed two faults in coming here with threats on your lips. Will you do me the honor to listen to me?"

"You have over-powered me," replied Philippe; "I can scarcely move. You have made yourself master of my muscles and of my mind, and then you ask me if I will listen."

Then Cagliostro took down from the chimney-piece another gold vial, which was held by a figure of Esculapius in bronze. "Smell this, Chevalier," said he, with a gentleness full of dignity.

Philippe obeyed, and it seemed to him that the cloud which hung over him was dispersed. "Oh, I revive!" he cried.

"And you feel free and strong?"

"Yes."

"With your full powers and memory of the past?"

"Yes."

"And as I have to deal with a man of courage and intelligence, that memory which returns to you gives me every advantage over you in regard to what has taken place between us."

"No," said Philippe; "for I have acted in defence of a vital and sacred principle."

"What do you mean?"

"I have defended the monarchy."

"You have defended the monarchy! — you, who went to America to defend a republic! Ah, mon Dieu! be frank; either it was not the republic you were defending there, or it is not the monarchy you are upholding here."

Philippe cast down his eyes, a great sob almost broke his heart.

"Love," continued Cagliostro, — "love those who scorn you; love those who forget you; love those who deceive you. It is the fate of great souls to be ruined by their grand sentiments. It is the law of Jesus to return good for evil; you are a Christian, Monsieur de Taverney?"

"Monsieur," cried Philippe, terrified at hearing Cagliostro reading thus the present and the past, "not a word more; if I did not defend the monarchy, I defended the queen, — that is to say, an innocent woman, and to be respected even if she were not longer innocent, for it is a divine obligation to defend the weak."

"The weak! Do you call the queen weak? — her to whom twenty-eight million human beings bow the knee!"

"Monsieur, they calumniate her."

"How do you know?"

"I wish to believe it."

"You think it is your right?"

"Certainly."

"Well, then, my right is to believe the contrary."

"You act like an evil genius."

"Who tells you so?" cried Cagliostro, whose sparkling eyes suddenly inundated Philippe with their light. "How have you the temerity to assume that you are right, and that I am wrong? You defend royalty; well, I defend the people. You say, 'Render to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's;' and I say, 'Render to God the things that are God's.' Republican of America, Chevalier of the order of Cincinnatus, I recall you to the love of the people, to the love of equality. You trample on the people to kiss the hands of queens. I trample on queens to elevate the people but one degree. I do not disturb you in your adoration, leave me at peace in my work. I leave you the broad daylight, the sun of the heavens and the sun of courts; leave me shadows and solitude. You comprehend the strength of my language, do you not, — as you just now comprehended the force of my personality? You say to me, 'Die, for you have offended the object of my worship;' and I say to you, 'Live, you who combat the principles I worship;' and if I say this to you it is because I know that with these principles I am so strong that neither you nor yours, whatever you may do, can for an instant retard my progress."

"Monsieur, you frighten me," said Philippe. "I am perhaps the first in this country, thanks to you, to see the depths of the abyss into which royalty is hurrying."

"Be prudent, then, if you have seen the precipice."

"You who tell me this," replied Philippe, moved at the paternal tone in which Cagliostro had spoken to him; "you who reveal to me secrets so terrible, — you are still wanting in generosity, for you well know that I should throw myself into the abyss rather than see it engulf those whom I defend."

"Well, I have warned you, and like the prefect of Tiberius shall wash my hands, Monsieur de Taverney."

"Well, I!" cried Philippe, running to Cagliostro with feverish ardor, "I, who am weak and inferior to you, — I will employ against you the weapons of the weak; I will approach you with tearful eye, trembling voice, clasped hands; I will ask you for this once to be merciful to those you are pursuing. I will ask you for myself, — for myself, do you hear? — for myself, who cannot, I know not why, bring myself to think of you as an enemy. I will work upon your feelings, I will convince you, I will ask you to spare me the remorse of seeing the downfall of this poor queen, without having tried to avert it. In short, Monsieur, I shall prevail on you to destroy this paper, which would make a woman weep; I will obtain this from you, or upon my honor, by that fatal love you know so well, I swear that with this sword, so powerless against you, I will pierce my heart here at your feet."

"Ah!" murmured Cagliostro, regarding Philippe with eyes full of eloquent sorrow, "why are they not all like you? I should be on their side, and they would not perish!"

"Monsieur, Monsieur, I entreat you, answer me!"

"Count them," said Cagliostro, after a moment's silence; "see if the thousand numbers are there; burn them yourself, even to the last number."

Philippe's heart was in his mouth; he ran to the cabinet, took out the copies of the journal, threw them on the fire, and pressed with effusion the hand of Cagliostro.

"Adieu, adieu, Monsieur," he said. "A hundred times I thank you for what you have done for me;" and he left the room.

"I owed the brother," said Cagliostro, when Philippe had gone, "this compensation for the suffering his sister endured." Then raising his voice he cried, "My horses!"

CHAPTER XXXIII.

BARON DE TAVERNEY.

WHILE these things were taking place in the Rue Neuve-Saint-Gilles, Monsieur de Taverney the elder was walking in his garden, followed by two servants pushing a wheeled-chair.

There were then at Versailles, and perhaps there are some still existing, a few of those old hôtels with French gardens, which by servile imitation of the taste and ideas of the sovereign resembled somewhat the Versailles of Le Notre and of Mansard. Several courtiers, who must have taken Monsieur de le Feuillade for their model, had constructed a miniature subterranean orange-house, a Swiss lake, and baths of Apollo. There were also a court-yard of honor and the Trianons, all five hundred times smaller than the original; each pond was about as large as a bucket of water.

Monsieur de Taverney had followed the prevailing custom since Louis XV. had taken the Trianons. His house at Versailles had its Trianons, its orchards, and its flower-beds. Since Louis XVI. had his locksmith shops and turning lathes, Monsieur de Taverney had his forge and his chips. Since Marie Antoinette had laid out English gardens, artificial rivers, prairies, and Swiss chalets, Monsieur de Taverney had made in a corner of his garden a little Trianon suitable for dolls, and a river for young ducks.

However, at the moment when we find him, he was enjoying the sunshine in the only avenue laid out in the time of Louis XIV. which remained to him, — an avenue of lindens with their long red suckers looking like irons just drawn from the fire. He was walking slowly, his hands in his muff, and every five minutes the two servants approached him with the chair that he might rest after his exercise.

He was enjoying this repose and winking in the strong sunshine, when a porter came running from the house calling out, "Monsieur le Chevalier!"

"My son!" said the old man, with proud joy. And turning he perceived Philippe, who had followed the servant. "My dear Chevalier," he said, dismissing the servants by a sign, "your arrival is very timely, for my mind is full of happy thoughts; but how strange you look. You are in bad humor."

"I, Monsieur? no."

"You know already the result of that affair?"

"What affair?"

The old man turned round to see that no one was listening, then said, "I speak of the ball."

"I do not understand."

"The Opera-ball."

Philippe colored, the sly old man observed it. "Imprudent!" he said, "you are like bad sailors who as soon as there is a favorable wind furl every sail. Sit down on this bench and let me entertain you with some moral reflections; I have some good ones."

"But Monsieur, in short —"

"In short, Monsieur, you are too audacious; you who were at first so timid and delicate now compromise her."

Philippe looked up. "Of whom are you speaking, Monsieur?" he said.

"Pardieu! of her."

"Whom do you mean?"

"Ah! Do you think I have not heard about the pranks you two were playing at the Opera-ball. A pretty piece of work."

"Monsieur, I protest —"

"Come, do not be angry; I speak only for your good. You are not careful enough, you will be caught sometime. You were seen with her at this ball; another time you will be seen with her somewhere else."

"I was seen?"

"Pardieu! Had you, or had you not, a blue domino?"

Taverney was about to explain that he had not a blue domino, that it was all a mistake, that he had not been to any ball, and that he did not even know of what ball his father was speaking; but it is repugnant to some natures to defend themselves under delicate circumstances. Those only defend themselves energetically who know that by defending themselves, they are rendering a service to the friend who loves them and who accuses them.

"But of what use," thought Philippe, "to make explanations to my father? Besides, I wish to know everything."

"You see," continued the old man, "that you were recognized; I was sure of it. Indeed, Monsieur de Richelieu, who was at the ball in spite of his eighty-four years, and who is very fond of you, wondered who the blue domino could be on whose arm the queen was leaning, and he could suspect only you, for he had seen all the others. And you know the great discernment of Monsieur le Maréchal."

"That I may have been suspected, I can conceive; but that the queen should have been recognized is more extraordinary."

"Not so very difficult, since she took off her mask.

Oh, that passes all comprehension. Such audacity! That woman must be mad about you."

Philippe blushed. To continue the conversation further would have been impossible.

"If it was not audacity," said Taverney, "it was a very unfortunate accident. Take care, Chevalier, you have jealous rivals to fear. To be the favorite of a queen is an envied post, especially when the queen is really the king;" and Taverney senior slowly inhaled a pinch of snuff. "You will forgive me my little sermon, will you not, Chevalier? Pardon it, my dear. I feel very grateful toward you, and I would prevent the breath of chance from demolishing the scaffolding which you have so skilfully raised."

Philippe rose, perspiring freely, his hands clenched. He was about to go away in order to break off this conversation, and with the same pleasure one would take in breaking the back-bone of a serpent; but one feeling held him back, — a painful feeling of curiosity; an overpowering desire to know the worst, — one of those pitiless arrows which lacerate hearts overflowing with love.

"I was telling you, then," said the old man, "that we are looked upon with envy; that is very natural. However, we have not yet reached the pinnacle to which you are raising us. To you belongs the glory of elevating the name of Taverney above its humble source. But unless you are prudent, we shall never arrive, and your plans will miscarry on the way. That would be a pity, for indeed we are progressing well."

Philippe turned away to conceal the profound disgust, the bitter contempt which imparted to his features at this moment an expression at which the old man would have been astonished, perhaps terrified.

"In a short time you will ask for some high post," said the old man, growing excited. "You will obtain for me a lord-lieutenancy in some place not too far from Paris; you will then make a peerage of Taverney-Maison-Rouge; you will have me included in the first promotion of the order. You can be duke, peer, and lieutenant-general. In two years — I shall still be living — you will obtain for me — "

"Enough! enough!" groaned Philippe.

"Oh, if you are satisfied with that, I am not. You have a whole life before you; I have but a few months. These months must repay me for the sad and miserable past. But I do not complain. God has given me two children. That is much for a man without fortune; but if my daughter has been useless in repairing our fortunes, you will make up for it. You are the architect of the temple. I see in you the great Taverney, the hero. You inspire me with respect, and that is something, you know. It is true that your conduct with the court has been admirable. Oh, I have never seen anything more skilful."

"What do you mean?" said the young man, uneasy at being approved by this serpent.

"Your demeanor is superb. You show no jealousy. You leave the field apparently open to every one, while you really hold it alone."

"I do not understand you," said Philippe, more and more annoyed.

"No modesty, if you please! It is a repetition of the conduct of Monsieur Potemkin, who astonished the world by his success. He saw that Catherine liked variety in her loves; that if left at liberty she would flutter from flower to flower, returning always to the sweetest and most beautiful, but that if pursued she would fly out of reach. He took his resolution. It was he who praised and rendered agreeable to the empress the new favorites whom she distinguished with her favor, — leaving always a vulnerable point of attack; it was he who wearied the sovereign with these passing caprices, instead of satiating her with the charms of Potemkin himself. By aiding the ephemeral reign of these favorites, ironically called the twelve Cæsars, Potemkin rendered his own reign eternal, indestructible."

"But these are incomprehensible infamies!" murmured poor Philippe, gazing at his father in stupefaction.

The old man continued, with imperturbable calmness, "According to the system of Potemkin, you have been slightly at fault. He never abandoned his surveillance, while you relax yours. I know very well that French policy is not Russian policy."

To these words, spoken with an expression of cunning which would have baffled the most hardened diplomatists, Philippe, who thought his father was raving, answered by a shrug of the shoulders which was anything but respectful.

"Yes, yes," cried the old man, quickly; "you think that I have not divined your plan? But you shall see."

"Well, let us see, Monsieur," said Philippe, folding his arms.

"Will you tell me," said the baron, "that you have not your probable successor already in training?"

"My successor?" said Philippe, turning pale.

"Do you mean to tell me that you do not know the stability of the queen's amorous inclinations when once she is possessed by them, and that in the event of a change on her part you do not wish to be wholly sacrificed, evicted, which always happens where the queen is concerned, for she cannot at the same time love the present and endure the past?"

"You speak Hebrew, Monsieur le Baron."

The old man burst into a harsh and ominous laugh, which made Philippe shudder as if it were the summons of an evil genius.

"You will make me believe that it is not your tactics to stand well with Monsieur de Charny?"

"Charny?"

"Yes, your future successor, — the man who can, when he is in power, exile you, as you now can exile Messieurs de Coigny, de Vaudreuil, and others."

The blood rushed violently to Philippe's temples.

"Enough," cried he, once more, — "enough, Monsieur! I am ashamed indeed to have listened so long. He who asserts that the queen of France is a Messalina, that man, Monsieur, is a criminal calumniator!"

"Good, — very good!" cried the old man. "You play your part well; but I assure you that no one can possibly hear us."

"Oh!"

"And as for Charny, I have divined your plan, although skilfully made; the gift of divination runs in the Taverney blood. Go on, Philippe, go on; flatter, mollify, console your Charny. Help him to pass by gentle gradations from the state of the green blade to that of the full-blown flower; and be assured that he is a gentleman who will later, when in favor, repay your kindness;" and after uttering these words, Monsieur de Taverney, quite proud of his exhibition of perspicacity, made a little fantastic leap as if he had been a young man, and a young man insolent in his prosperity.

Philippe, who was furious, seized him by the sleeve and stopped him.

"That is what you mean, is it, Monsieur? Your logic is admirable."

"I have guessed, have I not, and you are angry? Bah! you will pardon me, if only for my good intention. Besides, I like Charny, and am glad that you have conducted yourself so well toward him."

"Your Monsieur de Charny is at this moment so much my favorite, my darling, my trained bird, that a little while ago I passed a foot of this blade between his ribs;" and Philippe held out his sword to his father.

"What!" cried Taverney, terrified at the sight of those flashing eyes and at this warlike intelligence. "Did you not say that you had fought with Monsieur de Charny?"

"And that I spitted him! Yes."

"Great God!"

"That is my mode of caressing, mollifying, and standing well with my successors," added Philippe; "and now that you are acquainted with it, apply your theory to my practice;" and he made a desperate effort to get away.

The old man clung to his arm. "Philippe, Philippe, tell me that you jest!"

"Call it a jest, if you please, but it is done."

The old man raised his eyes to heaven, mumbled some incoherent words, and leaving his son ran to his house.

"Quick! quick!" he cried, "a man on horseback! Let him go instantly to make inquiries about Monsieur de Charny, who has been wounded; let him not forget to say that he comes from me. That traitor, Philippe!" he said, returning, "is he not the brother of his sister? And I thought him cured! Oh, there is only one head in my family, and that is mine!"

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE QUATRAIN OF MONSIEUR DE PROVENCE.

WHILE these events were taking place at Paris and Versailles, the king, tranquil as usual, since he knew that his fleets were victorious and the perils of the preceding winter were safely passed, was sitting in his cabinet, surrounded by charts, maps, and drawings, and was tracing new furrows in the seas for the vessels of Lapeyrouse. A light knock at the door interrupted him in this occupation, and a voice was heard saying, "May I come in, brother?"

"Monsieur le Comte de Provence, the marplot!" muttered the king, pushing from him an open book on astronomy. "Come in," he said.

A stout person, short and red-faced, with an alert expression, entered with a step too respectful for a brother, too familiar for a subject.

"You were not expecting me, brother?" he said.

"No, upon my word."

"Do I disturb you?"

"No; but have you anything interesting to say to me?"

"A rumor so droll, so grotesque —"

"Ah! ah! a scandal."

"Upon my word! yes, brother."

"Which has amused you?"

"Oh, on account of its singularity."

"Some villanous attack against me?"

"God is my witness that I should not laugh if it were so."

"Against the queen, then?"

"Sire, imagine that I have been told, and very seriously, that — I will give you a hundred, a thousand times to guess what."

"Brother, I have no patience with that oratorical trick. To the point."

"Well, brother," said the Comte de Provence, somewhat chilled by this harsh reception, "I have been told that the queen slept out the other night. Ah! ah! ah!" and he pretended to laugh.

"That would be deplorable if it were true."

"But it is not true, is it, brother?"

"No."

"It is not true either that the queen was seen waiting outside the gate?"

"No."

"That night, you know, when you ordered the gate shut at eleven o'clock."

"I do not remember."

"Well, imagine, brother, that the rumor claims — "

"What is rumor? Where is it? What is it?"

"That is well said, brother. Indeed, what is rumor? Well, then, this impalpable, imcomprehensible thing they call rumor affirms that the queen was seen arm in arm with Monsieur le Comte d'Artois on that very night at half-past twelve."

"Where?"

"Going to a house belonging to Monsieur d'Artois, which stands back of the stables. Has your Majesty not heard of this enormity?"

"Well, yes, brother; I have heard about it, of course."

"How 'of course,' Sire?"

"Yes; did you not do something that I might hear of it?"

"I?"

"You."

"What then, Sire, have I done?"

"A quatrain, for instance, which appeared in the 'Mercury.'"

"A quatrain!" said the count, ruddier than when he entered the room.

"You are known to be a favorite of the Muses."

"Not to the degree of —"

"Of writing a quatrain of which this is the last line, —

"'Helen said nothing about it to the good king Menelaus.'"

"I, Sire?"

"Do not deny it; I have here the original of the quatrain, — your handwriting. Eh! I know very little about poetry, but as to handwriting, oh, I am an expert."

"Sire, one folly leads to another."

"Monsieur de Provence, I assure you that the folly has been wholly on your side, and I am astonished that a philosopher should have committed this folly; let us reserve this qualification for your quatrain."

"Sire, your Majesty is hard on me."

"Retaliation, brother. Now, if you had informed yourself of what the queen really did that day, as I did, instead of writing these lines against her, and consequently against me, you would hav written an ode in favor of your sister-in-law. Perhaps the subject does not inspire you; but I should have liked a bad ode better than a good satire. Horace also says that, — Horace, your poet."

"Sire, you overwhelm me."

"If you had not been sure of the queen's innocence, as I am," added the king, firmly; "you should have had recourse to your Horace. Is it not he who has written these beautiful words? Excuse me, if I murder the Latin, —

"'Reclius hoc est;
Hoc faciens vivam melius, sic dulcis amicis occurram.'

'That is the better course; if I act thus I shall be more honorable, and I shall be agreeable to my friends.' You would translate more elegantly, brother; but I think that is the sense of it." The good king, after this lesson, given in the manner of a father, rather than of a brother, waited for the culprit to say something in his justification.

The count considered, for some moments, his reply, not so much from lack of something to say, but as an orator in quest of fine sentences. "Sire," he said, "severe as is the judgment of your Majesty, I have a plea in excuse, and a hope of pardon."

"Say on, brother."

"You accuse me of being mistaken, do you not, and not of any bad intention?"

"Agreed."

"If it be so, your Majesty, who knows that every man is sometimes mistaken, will admit that I had some foundation for my mistake."

"I will never accuse your intelligence, which is broad and superior, brother."

"Well! Sire, how could I help being mistaken, hearing all the reports that are circulated? We princes live in an atmosphere of calumny, we are impregnated by it. I do not say that I believed it, I say that I was told so."

"Well and good! since it is so; but —"

"The quatrain? Oh, poets are strange beings; and then, is it not better to warn by gentle criticism than by a frowning brow? Verses of warning do not offend, Sire; it is not so with newspaper articles, such as this one, for instance, which I have come to show you."

"An article?"

"Yes, Sire. An order for imprisonment must certainly be issued against the author of this vile work."

The king rose abruptly. "Let us see it!" he said.

"I do not know whether I ought, Sire —"

"Certainly you ought; there should be no concealment in a case like this. Have you this article?"

"Yes, Sire,"

"Give it to me."

The Comte de Provence drew from his pocket a copy of the "Histoire d' Etteniotna," — a fatal copy which notwithstanding the cane of Charny, the sword of Philippe, and the fire at Cagliostro's, had passed into circulation.

The king cast his eyes rapidly over the paper, and exclaimed, "Infamous! infamous!"

"You see, Sire, it affirms that my sister has been to Monsieur Mesmer's."

"Well, yes; she has been there."

"She has been there!" exclaimed the Comte de Provence.

"With my permission."

"Oh, Sire!"

"And it is not from the fact of her presence at Mesmer's that I infer imprudence on her part, since I allowed her to go to the Place Vendôme."

"Your Majesty did not give the queen permission to approach the vat to experience, in her own person —"

The king stamped his foot. The count said this just when Louis XVI. was running over the most insulting paragraph against Marie Antoinette, — in short, the relation of everything which had happened to Mademoiselle Oliva in Mesmer's house.

"Impossible! impossible!" said the king, turning pale. "Oh, the police shall deal with this!"

He rang. "Monsieur de Crosne," he said, — "let some one go for Monsieur de Crosne."

"Sire, it is the day for the weekly report, and Monsieur de Crosne is waiting in the antechamber."

"Let him come in."

"Allow me, brother," said the Comte de Provence, in a hypocritical tone; and he pretended to be about to take his leave.

"Remain," said Louis XVI. "If the queen is guilty, — well, Monsieur, you as one of the family may know it; if she is innocent, you must also know that, — you who suspected her."

Monsieur de Crosne entered the room. Seeing Monsieur de Provence with the king, he began by paying his respectful homage to the two greatest personages in the kingdom; then, addressing the king, "The report is ready, Sire," he said.

"In the first place, Monsieur," said Louis XVI., "explain how so infamous an article against the queen can be published in Paris."

"Etteniotna?" said Monsieur de Crosne.

"Yes."

"Well, Sire, it is by a journalist called Reteau."

"Yes; you know his name, and you have neither prevented him from publishing, nor arrested him after the publication!"

"Sire, nothing was easier than to arrest him; I will even show your Majesty an order for imprisonment already prepared in my portfolio."

"Then why was the arrest not made?"

Monsieur de Crosne now turned toward Monsieur de Provence.

"I take my leave of your Majesty," said the latter, slowly.

"No, no," replied the king; "I have told you to remain. Well, remain!"

The count bowed.

"Speak, Monsieur de Crosne, — speak openly, without reserve; speak quickly and clearly!"

"Well, this is the case," replied the lieutenant of police; "I have not arrested the journalist Reteau, because it was of the greatest importance, before taking this step, to consult with your Majesty."

"Well?"

"Perhaps, Sire, it would be better to give this journalist a bag of money, and send him away to get himself hanged elsewhere."

"Why?"

"Because, Sire, when these wretches tell a lie the public is glad enough to see them whipped, or even hanged, perhaps; but when, unfortunately, they hit upon a truth — "

"A truth?"

Monsieur de Crosne bowed.

"Yes, I know. The queen really was present at Mesmer's. She was there. It is unfortunate, as you say; but I had given her permission."

"Oh, Sire!" murmured Monsieur de Crosne.

This exclamation of the respectful subject had more effect on the king than when uttered by his jealous relation. "The queen is not ruined by that, I imagine," said he.

"No, Sire; but compromised."

"Monsieur de Crosne, what has your police told you on the subject?"

"Sire, many things, which, saving the respect I owe your Majesty, and the very respectful adoration I profess for the queen, are in accordance with some allegations in the article."

"In accordance, do you say?"

"So far as this: a queen of France, who, dressed as an ordinary woman, mixes with that class of persons who are attracted by the magnetic extravagancies of Mesmer, and who goes alone —"

"Alone!" cried the king.

"Yes, Sire."

"You are mistaken, Monsieur de Crosne."

"I do not think so, Sire."

"You have incorrect reports."

"So exact, Sire, that I can give you a description of her dress, of her general appearance, her steps, her movements, her cries."

"Her cries!" The king turned pale, and crushed the journal in his hands.

"Even her sighs were observed by my agents," timidly added Monsieur de Crosne.

"Her sighs! Could the queen have forgotten herself to that degree? Could she have held so cheaply my honor as a king, — her honor as a woman?"

"It is impossible!" said the Comte de Provence; "that would be more than scandalous, and her Majesty is incapable of it."

This was an added accusation, rather than an excuse. The king felt it; it was all revolting to him. "Monsieur," he said, to the lieutenant of police, "you maintain what you have said?"

"Alas! even to the last word, Sire."

"I owe it to you, brother," said Louis XVI., "to prove what I have advanced. The honor of the queen is that of all my house. I never take chances with it. I allowed the queen to go to Mesmer's vat; but I had enjoined upon her to take with her a reliable, irreproachable, even saintlike person."

"Ah!" said the Monsieur de Crosne, "if it had been so —"

"Yes," said the Comte de Provence, "if a woman like Madame de Lamballe, for example —"

"Precisely, brother; it is Madame la Princesse de Lamballe whom I had designated to the queen."

"Unfortunately, Sire, the princess did not accompany her."

"Well," added the king, trembling, "if she has disobeyed me so openly, I ought to punish, and I shall punish;" and he heaved a deep sigh which seemed to tear his heart.

"Only," he said in a lower tone, "I have still one doubt, which you will not share; that is natural. You are not the king, the husband, the friend of her who is accused. This doubt I am now about to solve."

He rang, the officer on duty appeared. "Let some one see whether Madame la Princesse de Lamballe is with the queen, or in her own apartment."

"Sire, Madame de Lamballe is walking in the private garden with her Majesty and another lady."

"Ask Madame la Princesse to come here immediately."

The officer left the room.

"Now, gentlemen, ten minutes more. I cannot come to a decision until then;" and Louis XVI., contrary to his usual habit, knit his brow and darted at the two witnesses of his profound sorrow a look almost threatening.

The two witnesses kept silence. Monsieur de Crosne was really sad; Monsieur de Provence affected an air of sorrow which would have saddened the god Momus himself.

A light rustling of silk behind the door warned the king that the Princesse de Lamballe was approaching.

CHAPTER XXXV.

PRINCESSE DE LAMBALLE.

THE Princesse de Lamballe entered, calm and beautiful, her brow uncovered, the ringlets of her high head-dress drawn back from her temples, her eyebrows black and delicate as if traced with sepia, her eyes blue, clear, dilated, her nose straight and finely formed, her lips chaste and voluptuous at the same time. All this beauty, with an unrivalled figure, was charming and imposing. The princess seemed to diffuse about her that perfume of virtue, of grace, of spirituality, which surrounded La Vallière, both before her favor and after her disgrace.

When the king saw her approaching, smiling and modest, he was overwhelmed with grief. "Alas!" he thought, "that which issues from that mouth will be a condemnation without appeal."

"Be seated, Princess," he said, bowing low.

Monsieur de Provence approached to kiss her hand.

The king collected his thoughts.

"What does your Majesty wish of me?" said the princess, in the voice of an angel.

"Some information, Madame, — precise information, cousin."

"I am ready, Sire."

"On what day did you accompany the queen to Paris? Try to remember, exactly."

Monsieur de Crosne and the Comte de Provence looked at each other in surprise.

"You understand, gentlemen," said the king; "you have no doubts, but I still doubt; consequently I put my questions like a man who doubts."

"Wednesday, Sire," replied the princess.

"Pardon me," continued Louis XVI.; "but, cousin, I wish to know the exact truth."

"You will know it by questioning me, Sire," said Madame de Lamballe, simply.

"For what did you go to Paris, cousin?"

"I went to Monsieur Mesmer's, in the Place Vendôme, Sire."

The two witnesses started, the king grew red with emotion.

"Alone?" he said.

"No, Sire, with her Majesty the queen."

"With the queen? you said with the queen?" cried Louis XVI., eagerly taking her hand.

"Yes, Sire."

Monsieur de Provence and Monsieur de Crosne drew nearer each other, astounded.

"Your Majesty gave the queen permission," said Madame de Lamballe; "at least, so her Majesty told me."

"And her Majesty was right, cousin. Gentlemen, I breathe again; Madame de Lamballe never tells a falsehood."

"Never, Sire," said the princess, gently.

"Oh, never, Sire," said Monsieur Crosne, with perfect sincerity. "But will you permit me, Sire?"

"Certainly, Monsieur; question, search. I place my dear princess upon the rack; I give her up to you."

Madame de Lamballe smiled; "I am ready," she said; "but, Sire, the torture has been abolished."

"Yes, I have abolished it for others," said the king, with a smile, "but they have not abolished it for me."

"Madame," said the lieutenant of police, "have the goodness to tell his Majesty what you did at Monsieur Mesmer's; but in the first place how was the queen dressed?"

"Her Majesty wore a dress of gray taffeta, a mantle of embroidered muslin, an ermine muff, and a rose-colored velvet bonnet trimmed with black."

Monsieur de Crosne looked astonished. It was a very different description from that given of Oliva's dress. The Comte de Provence bit his lips with vexation, and the king rubbed his hands. "What did you do on entering?" he asked.

"Sire, you are right to say 'on entering,' for we had hardly entered —"

"Together?"

"Yes, Sire; and we had hardly entered the first salon, where no one could have seen us, for everybody was giving their attention to the magnetic mysteries, when a lady approached the queen, and offering her a mask, implored her to turn back."

"And you stopped?" asked the Comte de Provence, quickly.

"Yes, Monsieur."

"You did not go through the rooms?" asked Monsieur de Crosne.

"No, Monsieur."

"And you did not leave the queen?" asked the king.

"Not for a moment, Sire. Her Majesty's arm rested constantly on my own."

"Now!" cried the king, "what do you say, Monsieur de Crosne? and you, brother?"

"It is extraordinary, — quite supernatural," said the count, who affected a gayety which could not conceal his disappointment.

"There is nothing supernatural in it," said Monsieur de Crosne, in whom the king's happiness inspired something like remorse; "what Madame de Lamballe says is undoubtedly true; therefore my informants must have been mistaken."

"Do you speak seriously, Monsieur?" asked the count.

"Perfectly, Monseigneur. Her Majesty did what Madame de Lamballe states, and nothing more, I feel convinced; my agents were, somehow or other, deceived. As for this journalist, I will immediately send the order for his imprisonment."

Madame de Lamballe looked from one to the other with an expression of innocent curiosity.

"One moment," said the king; "there will be time enough to hang the journalist. You spoke of a lady who came to prevent the queen from entering the salon; tell us who she was."

"Her Majesty seemed to know her, Sire; I will even say, because I never speak falsely, that I am sure her Majesty knows her."

"Because, cousin, I must speak to this person; it is indispensable. There lies all the truth, there only is the key to the mystery."

"That is my opinion also, Sire," said Monsieur de Crosne.

"Bosh!" murmured the Comte de Provence. "Here is a woman who seems to be a sort of deus ex machina." Then aloud, "Cousin, did the queen admit to you that she knew this person?"

"Her Majesty admitted nothing, Monseigneur; she told me so."

"Yes, yes; pardon."

"My brother means to say that if the queen knows that person, you also probably know her name."

"It is Madame de La Motte Valois."

"That intriguer!" cried the king, disgusted.

"That mendicant!" said the count. "The devil! she will be difficult to interrogate; she is cunning."

"We will be as cunning as she," said Monsieur de Crosne. "There is no chance for cunning after Madame de Lamballe's statement. So at the first word from the king —"

"No, no," said the king, with an air of weariness; "I am tired of seeing such persons about the queen; she is so benevolent that the pretext of poverty brings to her all doubtful characters among the lower nobility."

"Madame de La Motte is a true Valois," said the princess.

"However that may be, I will not see her here. I would rather renounce the immense joy which the complete justification of the queen would give, than look in the face of that creature."

"But you must see her, Sire," said the queen, entering at that moment, pale with anger, and beautiful with a noble indignation. "It is not now for you to say 'I do, or I do not, wish to see her.' She is a witness from whom the intelligence of my accusers," said she, looking at her brother-in-law, "and the justice of my judges," turning to the king and Monsieur de Crosne, "must draw the truth. I, the accused, demand that she be heard."

"Madame," said the king, "we will not do Madame de La Motte the honor of sending for her to give evidence either for, or against, you. I cannot stake your honor against the veracity of this woman."

"You need not send for her, she is here."

"Here!" cried the king, turning as if he had trodden on a snake.

"Sire, you know that I visited an unfortunate woman who bears an illustrious name, on that day of which so many things were said," and she looked fixedly over her shoulder at the Comte de Provence, who felt ready to sink through the ground; "and while at her house I dropped a box containing a portrait, which she was to return to me to-day, — and she is here."

"No, no," said the king; "I am satisfied, and do not wish to see her."

"But I am not satisfied, and shall bring her in. Besides, why this repugnance? What has she done? If there be anything, tell me, you, Monsieur de Crosne; you know everything."

"I know nothing against this lady," he replied.

"Really?"

"Certainly not; she is poor, and perhaps ambitious, but that is all."

"Ambition is the voice of noble blood; if there be no more than that against her, the king can surely admit her."

"I do not know why," said Louis, "but I have a presentiment that this woman will be the cause of misfortune to me, of some disastrous event in my future life; that is quite enough."

"Oh, Sire, that is superstition; please bring her, Madame de Lamballe."

Five minutes later, Jeanne, with a timid air, although with a distinguished appearance, entered with dignity the cabinet of the king.

Louis XVI., strong in his antipathies, had turned his back toward her, and was leaning his head on his hands, seeming to take no longer a part in the conversation. The Comte de Provence cast on her glances so searching that, had her modesty been real, this woman would have been so paralyzed that she could not have spoken a word; but it required much more than that to trouble Jeanne.

"Madame," said the queen, leading her behind the king's chair, "have the goodness to tell the king exactly what took place the other day at Monsieur Mesmer's."

Jeanne did not speak.

"No reservations, nothing but the truth; tell everything just as you remember it;" and the queen sat down in an easy-chair, that she might not influence the witness even by a look.

Jeanne understood immediately that the queen had need of her, and knew that she could clear her in a moment by speaking the simple truth. Any one but Jeanne, having this conviction, would have yielded to the pleasure of exculpating the queen by enlarging upon the proofs; but she was so shrewd, so keen, so strong, that she confined herself to the simple relation of facts.

"Sire," said she, "I went to Monsieur Mesmer's from curiosity, like every one else. The spectacle appeared to me rather coarse; I was turning away when I suddenly saw her Majesty, whom I had already had the honor of seeing, but without knowing her until her generosity revealed her rank. When I saw those august features, which will never be effaced from my memory, it seemed to me that her Majesty was out of place in this room, where there was much suffering, and where many ridiculous exhibitions were made. I beg pardon for having taken it on myself to judge; it was a woman's instinct, but I humbly beg pardon if I passed the bounds of proper respect." She seemed overcome with emotion as she concluded.

Monsieur de Crosne was pleased. Madame de Lamballe felt drawn toward this woman who appeared at once delicate, timid, intelligent, and good. Monsieur de Provence was bewildered. The queen thanked Jeanne with a look, for which the latter was slyly watching.

"Well," said the queen, "you have heard, Sire."

He did not move, but said, "I did not need her testimony."

"I was told to speak," said Jeanne, timidly; "and I obeyed."

"Enough!" said Louis XVI., harshly. "When the queen says a thing she needs no witnesses to confirm what she has said; and when she has my approbation, which she has, she need care for that of no one else." He rose on saying these words, which overwhelmed Monsieur de Provence. The queen did not fail to add a disdainful smile. The king turned his back toward his brother, and kissing the hands of the queen and the princess, and begging pardon of the latter for having disturbed her "for nothing," made a very slight bow to Jeanne, to which she replied by a profound reverence calculated to display her gracefulness.

Madame Lamballe left the room first, then Madame de La Motte, whom the queen pushed before her, and finally the queen herself, who exchanged an almost loving look with the king as she went out.

"Brother," said Louis to the count, "now I will detain you no longer; I have work to do with Monsieur de Crosne. You have heard your sister's complete justification, and it is easy to see that you are as pleased as I am. Sit down, Monsieur de Crosne."

The Comte de Provence bowed, smiling; and when he could no longer hear the ladies, and felt safe from malicious smiles and bitter words, he left the cabinet.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

IN THE QUEEN'S APARTMENT.

THE queen went out from the king's cabinet fully understanding the peril to which she had been exposed. She appreciated the delicacy and reserve with which Jeanne had given her impromptu testimony, as well as the really remarkable discretion with which, after her success, she had kept herself in the background.

Indeed, Jeanne, who at her very first step had been admitted, by unprecedented good fortune, to a footing of confidential intimacy with the queen, for which courtiers the most adroit strive in vain for years, and who was sure of the queen's grateful remembrance of the service she had rendered at an important crisis, showed no consciousness of her position by any of those signs which the proud susceptibility of the great quickly discerns on the faces of inferiors.

The queen, then, instead of acceding to Jeanne's proposition to pay her respects and take leave, retained her with a pleasant smile, saying: "It is really fortunate, Countess, that you prevented me from entering Mesmer's house with the Princesse de Lamballe; for think of the baseness, — some one, who must have seen me either at the door, or in the antechamber, has made that the foundation of a rumor that I had been in the crisis-hall. Is not that what they call it?"

"The crisis-hall; yes, Madame."

"But," said the Princesse de Lamballe, "how could it have happened, even if the spectators had supposed the queen to be there, that the agents of Monsieur de Crosne should have been mistaken? That, in my opinion, is the mystery; the agents of the lieutenant of police affirm positively that the queen was in the crisis-hall."

"It is strange!" said the queen. "Monsieur Crosne is an honest man, and would not willingly injure me; but his agents may have been bought. I have enemies, dear Lamballe. Still, there must have been some foundation for this tale. This infamous libel represents me as intoxicated, and overcome to such a degree by the magnetic fluid that I lost all control over myself, and abandoned all womanly reserve. What is the truth in all this? Was there, in fact, a woman —"

Jeanne colored. The secret again presented itself, — the secret, one word of which would destroy her fatal influence on the queen's destiny. By revealing that secret, Jeanne would lose the chance of being useful, indispensable even, to her Majesty. She, therefore, as before, kept the secret to herself.

"Madame," said she, "there was a woman much agitated, who attracted great attention by her contortions and cries. But it seems to me —"

"It seems to you," said the queen, quickly, "that this woman was some actress, or some loose character, and not the queen of France?"

"Certainly not, Madame."

"Countess, you replied very well to the king, and I will not forget you. How have you advanced in your own affairs? But is not some one coming, Princess?"

At this moment Madame de Misery came in to say that Mademoiselle de Taverney wished to know if her Majesty would receive her.

"Assuredly," said the queen. "Oh, the ceremonious creature! She will never fail in any point of etiquette. Andrée, Andrée, come in!"

"Your Majesty is too good to me," said the latter, saluting gracefully. Jeanne, recognizing the second German lady from the bureau of charity, called to her face a blush and an expression of modesty.

Madame de Lamballe availed herself of Andrée's entrance to take leave. Andrée took her place by the side of Marie Antoinette, her calm and searching eyes fixed on Madame de La Motte.

"Well, Andrée," the queen then said, "here is this lady whom we went to see the last day of the frost."

"I recognize Madame," said Andrée, bowing.

Jeanne, already proud of the attention of the queen, tried to discover on the face of Andrée some sign of jealousy. She saw only complete indifference.

Andrée, having the same passions as the queen, — Andrée, who would have been superior to all other women in goodness, intelligence, and generosity if she had been happy, concealed herself in an impenetrable reserve, which all the court imagined to be the proud modesty of the chaste Diana.

"Do you know," said the queen, "what they have been saying of me to the king?"

"They must have said all that is bad, because they could not find words to say all that is good."

"That is," said Jeanne, with frankness, "the most beautiful thing I ever heard. I say beautiful, because it expresses fully the sentiment which is that of my whole life, and which my weak intelligence could never have rendered in these words."

"I will tell you about it, Andrée."

"Oh, I know, Madame! Monsieur de Provence has been repeating the whole story. A friend of mine heard him."

"It is a happy way," said the queen, angrily, "of propagating falsehood, after paying homage to the truth. Let us leave that. I was speaking to the countess about her personal affairs. Who protects you, Countess?"

"You, Madame," replied Jeanne, boldly, — "you who permit me to come and kiss your hand."

"She has heart," said Marie Antoinette; "I like this impulsiveness."

Andrée did not reply.

"Few people," continued Jeanne, "dared to protect me when I was in obscurity; now that I shall have been once seen at Versailles, every one will contend for the honor of being agreeable to the queen, — I mean to one on whom the queen has deigned to look."

"What!" said the queen, "no one has been either brave enough, or corrupt enough, to protect you for yourself?"

"I had first Madame de Boulainvilliers, a brave woman; then her husband, a corrupt protector. But since my marriage, no one, — oh, no one!" she said, with a most skilful affectation of distress. "Oh, yes, I forget one brave man, — a generous prince!"

"Prince, Countess! Who is it?"

"Monsieur le Cardinal de Rohan."

The queen made an abrupt movement toward Jeanne. "My enemy!" said she, smiling.

"Your enemy! he! the cardinal! Oh, Madame!" cried Jeanne.

"It seems you are astonished that a queen should have an enemy. It is evident you have not lived at court."

"But, Madame, he adores you, — at least I thought so; and if I am not mistaken, his respect for the august spouse of his king equals his devotion."

"Oh, I believe you, Countess, I believe a part of what you say; yes, that is it, the cardinal is in a state of adoration," and she turned to Andrée with a hearty burst of laughter. "Well, Countess, Monsieur le Cardinal is in a state of adoration. That is why he is my enemy."

Jeanne affected the surprise of a country girl.

"And you are his protégé," continued the queen; "tell me all about it."

"It is very simple; his Eminence has assisted me in the most generous, yet the most considerate, manner."

"Good! Prince Louis is generous; no one can deny that. But do you not think, Andrée, that Monsieur le Cardinal also adores this pretty countess a little? Come, Countess, tell us," and Marie Antoinette laughed again in her frank, joyous manner.

"All this gayety must be put on," thought Jeanne; so she answered, with a grave air and penetrating tone, "Madame, I have the honor to affirm to your Majesty that Monsieur de Rohan —"

"Well," said the queen, interrupting the countess, "since you are so zealous in his defence, since you are his friend, ask him what he did with some hair of mine which he bribed a certain hair-dresser to steal; and which trick cost the poor man dear, for he lost my custom."

"Your Majesty surprises me; Monsieur de Rohan did that?"

"Oh, yes; all his adoration, you know. After having hated me at Vienna, and employing every means to prevent my marriage, he at last began to perceive that I was a woman and his queen, and that he had offended me forever. Then this dear prince began to fear for his future, and like all of his profession, who seem most fond of those whom they most fear, since he knew me to be young and believed me to be foolish and vain, he changed to a Celadon. After sighs and languishing airs, he threw himself, as you say, into a state of adoration. He adores me, does he not, Andrée?"

"Madame!"

"Oh, Andrée will not compromise herself, but I say what I please; at least royalty should have some advantages. Countess, I know and you know, do we not, that the cardinal adores me? So it is a settled thing, and you may tell him, Countess, that he has my permission."

These words, which contained bitter irony, had a powerful effect on the corrupt heart of Jeanne de La Motte. If she had been noble, pure, and loyal she would have seen in them only the supreme disdain of a woman of sublime character, only the perfect contempt of a superior soul for the low intrigues which were carried on beneath her.

Women of this kind, these angels so rare, never defend their reputation against the snares which are set for them on the earth. They will not even suspect the existence of the mire which soils them, — that bird-lime in which they leave the most brilliant feathers of their gilded wings.

Jeanne, being of a corrupt and vulgar nature, thought she saw much spite in this manifestation of anger on the part of the queen against Monsieur de Rohan. She recalled the rumors, which, starting from the palace, had penetrated the suburbs of Paris, and had found many an echo.

The cardinal, a lover of women from the sexual point of view, had said to Louis XV., who admired them in the same way, that the dauphiness was not a complete woman. The singular remarks of Louis XV. at the time of his grandson's marriage will be recalled, and his questions to a certain ingenuous ambassador.

Jeanne, a complete woman if there ever was one, a woman from head to foot, vain of the locks of hair which distinguished her, — Jeanne, who felt the need of pleasing and conquering by all her attractions, did not understand how a woman could feel otherwise on these delicate points.

"There is spite on the part of the queen," she said, "if so, there must be something else." Then reflecting that discussion produces knowledge, she began to defend Monsieur de Rohan with all the mind and all the curiosity with which Nature, like a good mother, had endowed her.

The queen listened.

"Good, she listens," thought Jeanne; and deceived by her own perverted nature, she did not perceive that the queen listened through generosity, and through pleasure at the novelty of hearing a person defended of whom the sovereign chose to speak ill. Marie Antoinette was pleased with her, thinking she saw a heart where God had placed a dry and thirsty sponge.

The conversation was continued on a footing of condescending intimacy on the part of the queen. Jeanne was upon thorns; she looked embarrassed; she saw no possibility of getting away without a dismissal, — she who had just now played the advantageous part of the stranger who asks leave to withdraw. But suddenly a youthful, joyous, and loud voice was heard in the next room.

"The Comte d'Artois!" said the queen.

Andrée rose immediately, and Jeanne prepared to withdraw, but the prince had entered so suddenly that it was almost impossible for them to go out. However, Madame de La Motte made a pretence of withdrawing. The prince stopped on seeing this pretty woman, and saluted her.

"Madame la Comtesse de La Motte," said the queen, presenting Jeanne to the prince.

"Ah! ah! do not let me send you away, Madame la Comtesse," said the Comte d'Artois.

The queen made a sign to Andrée, who detained Jeanne. That sign meant, "I intended to give something to Madame de La Motte; I have not had time, so will attend to it later."

"You have returned from the wolf-hunt, then?" said the queen, giving her hand to her brother after the English fashion, which was already coming into favor.

"Yes, sister, and have had good sport; I have killed seven, and that is something wonderful."

"You have killed them all yourself?"

"I am not sure," continued he, laughing; "but they say so. However, do you know I have gained seven hundred francs?"

"How?"

"Why, they pay a hundred francs a head for these beasts. It is dear, but I would give two hundred of them just now for the head of a certain journalist."

"Ah! you know the story, already?"

"Monsieur de Provence told me."

"He is indefatigable; but tell me how he related it?"

"So as to make you whiter than ermine, whiter than Venus Aphrodite."

"It is true, nevertheless, that he related to you that adventure?"

"Of the journalist? yes, sister. But your Majesty came out of it with honor. One might even say — to make a pun such as Monsieur de Bièvre is guilty of every day — the affair of the tub is washed."

"Oh, what a horrible pun!"

"Sister, do not ill-treat a knight who comes to place his arm and his lance at your disposal. Happily, you need no aid. Ah, my dear sister, you are fortunate."

"You call that fortunate! Do you hear him, Andrée?"

Jeanne laughed. The count, who had not ceased looking at her, gave her courage. The queen had spoken to Andrée, Jeanne replied.

"Yes, fortunate," repeated the Comte d'Artois; "for it might easily have happened, my dear sister, in the first place, that Madame de Lamballe had not been with you."

"Should I have gone there alone?"

"In the second place, that Madame de La Motte had not been there to prevent your entrance."

"Ah, you know that Madame la Comtesse was there?"

"Sister, when Monsieur le Comte de Provence tells a story he tells it all. And finally, you might not have had Madame de La Motte at hand at that moment to give her testimony. You will tell me, doubtless, that virtue and innocence are like the violet, which does not require to be seen in order to be discovered; but sister, they make bouquets of violets when they find them, and throw them away when they have inhaled their perfume. That is my lesson."

"It is a fine one!"

"I take it as I find it, and I have proved that you are fortunate."

"Badly proved."

"Must I prove it more completely?"

"It would not be superfluous."

"Well! you are unjust to accuse fortune," said the count, twirling on his heel to the sofa, where he sat down by the queen's side, "for in short, saved from the famous escapade of the cabriolet —"

"One," said the queen, counting on her fingers.

"Saved from the vat —"

"So be it, I will count it. Two. And then?"

"And saved from the affair of the ball," he whispered in her ear.

"What ball?"

"The ball at the Opera."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean the ball at the Opera; but I beg pardon, I should not have mentioned it."

"Really, brother, you puzzle me; I know nothing about the ball at the Opera."

The words "ball" and "Opera" caught Jeanne's ear, and she listened intently.

"Mum!" said the prince.

"Not at all! not at all! You spoke of an affair at the Opera. Explain to me what you mean."

"I implore your mercy, sister."

"I insist, Count, on knowing."

"And I insist on holding my tongue."

"Do you wish to offend me?"

"No, sister, but I have told you quite enough for you to understand."

"You have told me nothing."

"Oh! little sister, it is you who are puzzling me. Come now — in earnest."

"Upon my honor, I am in earnest."

"You wish me to speak?"

"Immediately."

"Not here," said he, looking at Jeanne and Andrée.

"Yes, here; there cannot be too many witnesses of such an explanation."

"Beware, sister!"

"I will risk it."

"Then you mean to say you were not at the last Opera-ball?"

"I!" cried the queen, "at the Opera-ball?"

"Hush, I beg."

"No, I will not hush, I will speak it aloud. You say I was at the ball?"

"Certainly I do."

"Perhaps you saw me," she said, ironically, but even then jestingly.

"Yes, I did."

"Me!"

"Yes, you."

"Oh, it is too much; why did you not speak to me? That would have been still more droll."

"Upon my word I was just going to do so, when the crowd separated us."

"You are mad!"

"I was sure you would say so. I should not have spoken of it. I have been very foolish."

The queen rose, and walked up and down the room in great agitation. The count watched her in astonishment; Andrée trembled with fear and disquietude; and Jeanne could hardly keep from laughing.

Then the queen stopped and said. "My friend, do not jest any more; you see, I am so passionate that I have lost my temper already. Confess at once that you wished to amuse yourself at my expense, and I shall be very happy."

"I will say so, if you wish it, sister."

"Be serious, Charles."

"As a fish, sister."

"For mercy's sake, tell me that you have invented all this."

He winked at the ladies and said, "Oh, yes, of course, I invented it; forgive me."

"You do not understand me, brother," cried the queen, vehemently. "Say yes, or no; in presence of these ladies retract what you have said. Do not tell falsehoods, I want only the truth!"

Andrée and Jeanne retired behind the tapestry.

"Well then, sister," said he, in a low voice, "I have told the truth; why did you not warn me sooner?"

"You saw me at the Opera-ball?"

"As plainly as I see you now; and you saw me."

The queen uttered a cry, and running up to Andrée and Jeanne dragged them out from behind the tapestry, one by each hand, crying, "Ladies, Monsieur le Comte d'Artois affirms that he saw me at the Opera-ball."

"Oh!" murmured Andrée.

"It is too late to retract," continued the queen; "prove it, prove it, —"

"Well," said he, "I was with Monsieur de Richelieu and others when your mask fell off."

"My mask!"

"I was about to say, 'This is too rash, sister,' but you had disappeared with the gentleman who attended you."

"Oh, my God! you will drive me mad. What gentleman?"

"The blue domino."

The queen passed her hand over her eyes. "What day was this?" she asked.

"Saturday; the day before I set out on my hunting excursion. You were asleep when I went away, so that I could not tell you what I have told you now."

"My God! my God! at what time do you say you saw me?"

"Between two and three."

"Decidedly, one of us is mad."

"Oh, it is I. It is all a mistake; do not be so afraid, there is no harm done. At first I thought you were with the king; but the blue domino spoke German, and he does not."

"German — a German. Oh! I have a proof, brother. On Saturday I went to bed at eleven."

The count bowed, with an incredulous smile.

The queen rang, "Madame de Misery shall tell you."

"Why do you not call Laurent, the guard of the Reservoir gate; he will bear testimony also," said he, laughing; "It is I who cast that cannon, little sister; do not fire it off at me."

"Oh," cried the queen, in a rage; "not to be believed!"

"My dear sister, I would believe you if you would not get in such a passion; but how to prove it? If I say yes, others coming here will say no."

"What others?"

"Pardieu! those who saw you as I did."

"Ah, that is curious indeed! There were persons who saw me. Well, show them to me."

"At once. Philippe de Taverney was there."

"My brother!" said Andrée.

"He was there, Mademoiselle," replied the prince; "do you wish to question him, sister?"

"I demand it, instantly."

"My God!" murmured Andrée.

"What is it?" said the queen.

"My brother called as witness."

"Yes, yes; I wish it."

The queen called; a servant entered, and immediately set out in haste seeking Philippe. Philippe was found near his father's house, which he had just left, after the scene which we have described.

Philippe, master of the field of battle after his duel with Charny, — Philippe, who had just rendered a service to the queen, was walking joyously toward the palace at Versailles. The messenger met him on the way and communicated to him the queen's orders, which he hastened to obey.

Marie Antoinette rushed to meet him, and placing herself before him, "Monsieur," said she, "are you capable of speaking the truth?"

"Yes, Madame; and incapable of telling an untruth."

"Well, then, say frankly, have you seen me at any public place within the last week?"

"Yes, Madame," replied Philippe.

Every heart in the room might have been heard beating.

"Where have you seen me?" asked the queen, in a terrible voice.

Philippe was silent.

"Oh, no concealment, Monsieur; my brother says that he saw me at the Opera-ball; now where did you see me?"

"Like Monseigneur le Comte d'Artois, I saw you at the Opera-ball, Madame."

The queen sank on a sofa; then springing up like a wounded panther, she said, "It is impossible, for I was not there. Take care, Monsieur de Taverney, I see that you are putting on Puritan airs; that was all very well in America with Monsieur de Lafayette, but here, at Versailles, we are French, and polite and simple."

"Your Majesty overwhelms Monsieur de Taverney," said Andrée, pale with anger. "If he says that he saw you, he did see you."

"You too," said Marie Antoinette; "you too! It only remains now for you to have seen me. My God! if I have friends to defend me, I also have enemies to assassinate me. One witness only is not sufficient evidence, gentlemen."

"You remind me," said the Comte d'Artois, "that at the moment when I saw you, and when I perceived that the blue domino was not the king, I thought that it was the nephew of Monsieur de Suffren. What is his name? I mean the brave officer who performed the great exploit. You received him so graciously the other day that I thought he might be your chevalier of honor."

The queen blushed, Andrée became pale as death. They exchanged glances, and trembled at each other's looks.

Philippe became livid. "Monsieur de Charny?" he murmured.

"Charny! that is it," continued the Comte d'Artois. "Do you not think, Monsieur Philippe, that the blue domino's figure resembled somewhat Monsieur de Charny's?"

"I did not notice it, Monseigneur," said Philippe, almost choking.

"But," continued Monsieur le Comte d'Artois, "I soon saw that I was mistaken, for Monsieur de Charny suddenly made his appearance near Monsieur de Richelieu, — just opposite you, sister, when your mask fell off."

"And he saw me?" cried the queen, losing all prudence.

"Unless he was blind," said the prince.

Making a gesture of despair, the queen rang again.

"What are you doing?"

"I wish to question Monsieur de Charny also, — to drain the cup to the dregs."

"I do not believe that Monsieur de Charny is at Versailles," murmured Philippe.

"Why do you think so?"

"I was told, I believe, that he was not well."

"Oh, the affair is so serious that he must come, Monsieur! I also am not well; but I would go to the end of the world barefoot to prove —"

Philippe, heart-broken, approached Andrée, who, looking out of a window opening on the gardens, had uttered a slight exclamation.

"What is the matter?" said the queen, coming up to her.

"Nothing, nothing — Monsieur de Charny was said to be ill, and I see him."

"You see him?" cried Philippe, with a sudden movement.

"Yes; it is he."

The queen, forgetting everything, opened the window herself, and called out, "Monsieur de Charny!"

The latter turned his head, and overcome with astonishment hastened to the palace.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

AN ALIBI.

MONSIEUR DE CHARNY entered, a little pale, but upright, and apparently not suffering. At sight of this illustrious company he assumed the respectful and dignified demeanor of the man of the world and the soldier.

"Take care, sister!" said the Comte d'Artois; "it seems to me you are questioning everybody?"

"Brother, I will ask the whole world, until I meet some one who will tell you that you are deceived."

Charny and Philippe bowed courteously to each other, and Philippe said, in a low voice, "You are surely mad to come out wounded; one would say you wished to die."

"One does not die from the scratch of a thorn in the Bois de Boulogne," replied Charny, happy in giving his enemy a moral thrust more painful than the thrust of a sword.

The queen approached and put an end to this conversation. "Monsieur de Charny," she said, "these gentlemen say that you were at the Opera-ball."

"Yes, your Majesty," said Charny, bowing.

"Tell us what you saw there."

"Does your Majesty mean what I saw there, or whom I saw there?"

"Precisely; whom did you see there, and no complaisant reserve, Monsieur de Charny."

"Must I tell all, Madame?"

The cheeks of the queen assumed once more a deadly paleness.

"Did you see me?" she asked.

"Yes, your Majesty, at the moment when your mask, unhappily, fell off."

Marie Antoinette clasped her hands. "Monsieur," she said, almost sobbing, "look at me attentively. Are you sure of what you say?"

"Madame, your features are engraved on the hearts of all your subjects. To have seen your Majesty once is to see you forever."

Philippe looked at Andrée, Andrée fixed her eyes upon Philippe. These two griefs, these two jealousies, made a sorrowful alliance.

"But, Monsieur," she said, "I assure you I was not at the Opera-ball."

"Oh, Madame!" said the young man, bowing almost to the ground, "has not your Majesty the right to go where you please?"

"I do not ask you to excuse my action; I only beg you to believe that I did not perform it."

"I will believe all your Majesty wishes me to believe," cried he, moved in the very depths of his heart by this persistence of the queen, by this touching humility of a woman so proud.

"Sister, sister, it is too much!" murmured the count, in Marie Antoinette's ear.

For this scene had chilled the hearts of all present, — some through the pain caused by their love, or their self-love; others through the emotion inspired by an accused woman, who defends herself with courage against overwhelming proofs.

"They believe it! they believe it!" cried the queen, beside herself with anger; and discouraged she sank into an arm-chair, stealthily wiping away with the tip of her finger a scalding tear. Suddenly she rose.

"Sister, sister, forgive me!" said the Comte d'Artois, tenderly; "you are surrounded by devoted friends. This secret, which terrifies you so, we alone know; and no one can draw it from us except with our lives."

"Secrecy, secrecy!" cried the queen. "Oh, I do not wish it!"

"Sister!"

"No secret, but proof."

"Madame," said Andrée, "some one approaches."

"Madame," said Philippe, in a low tone, "the king."

"The king," cried an usher, in the antechamber.

"The king! so much the better. Oh, the king is my only friend! The king would not judge me guilty, even if he thought he had seen me. The king is welcome!"

The king entered with an air of calmness, in strange contrast with the disturbed countenances about the queen. "Sire," cried the latter, "you come most opportunely. Sire, here is another calumny, another insult to combat."

"What is the matter?" said Louis XVI., coming forward.

"Monsieur, a rumor, an infamous rumor. Come to my aid, Sire, for this time it is not my enemies who accuse me but my friends."

"Your friends?"

"These gentlemen — my brother (pardon, Monsieur le Comte d'Artois), Monsieur de Taverney, Monsieur de Charny — assure me that they saw me at the Opera-ball."

"At the Opera-ball!" cried the king, knitting his brows.

"Yes, Sire."

A terrible silence ensued. Madame de La Motte saw the gloomy uneasiness of the king; she saw the mortal pale-ness of the queen; with a word, a single word, she might put an end to this painful struggle; with one word she could defend the queen from all past accusations and shield her against those of the future. But her heart did not prompt her to this course; her own interest dissuaded her. She said to herself that it was too late; that if she spoke now, they would see that she had deceived them before, at a time when the whole truth would have been of such advantage to the queen, and that she should forfeit her newly acquired favor. Therefore she was silent.

Then the king repeated, in a voice full of anguish, "At the Opera-ball? Who has spoken of this? Does Monsieur le Comte de Provence know this?"

"But it is not true," cried the queen, with the accent of despairing innocence. "It is not true; Monsieur le Comte d'Artois is mistaken, Monsieur de Taverney is mistaken. You are mistaken, Monsieur de Charny. In short, any one may be mistaken." All bowed.

"Come," cried the queen, "call my people, everybody; question them! The ball was on Saturday, was it not?"

"Yes, sister."

"Well, what did I do Saturday? Let some one tell me, for really I am going mad, and if this continues I shall believe myself that I went to this infamous Opera-ball; but if I had gone there, I would acknowledge it, gentlemen."

At this moment the king approached her with dilated eyes, smiling face, and outstretched hands. "Saturday," he said, — "Saturday, was it, gentlemen?"

"Yes, Sire."

"Well then," he continued, becoming more and more calm, more and more joyous, "you need question only your maid, Marie. She will perhaps remember at what hour I went to your apartment; it was, I think, about eleven o'clock in the evening."

"Ah!" cried the queen, transported with joy, "yes, Sire." She threw herself into his arms; then blushing and confused, she hid her face on the king's breast, who kissed tenderly her beautiful hair.

"Well!" said the Comte d'Artois, bewildered with joy and surprise combined, "I will buy some spectacles. But, mon Dieu! I would not have lost this scene for a million; would you, gentlemen?"

Philippe was leaning against the wainscot as pale as death. Charny, cold and impassive, wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"Therefore, gentlemen," said the king, delighted at the effect he had produced, "it is impossible that the queen could have been that night at the Opera-ball. Believe it if you please; the queen, I am sure, is satisfied that I believe her."

"Well!" added the Comte d'Artois, "Monsieur de Provence may think as he pleases; but I defy his wife to prove an 'alibi' in the same way if she should be accused of spending the night abroad."

"Brother!"

"Sire, I kiss your hand."

"Charles, I will go with you," said the king, after giving a last kiss to the queen.

Philippe had not stirred.

"Monsieur de Taverney," said the queen, severely, "do you not accompany the Comte d'Artois?"

Philippe drew himself up; the blood rushed to his temples. He almost fainted. He had hardly strength to bow, to look at Andrée, to cast a terrible glance at Charny, and restrain the expression of his insensate grief. He left the room.

The queen retained with her Andrée and Monsieur de Charny.

The position of Andrée, thus placed between her brother and the queen, between her love and her jealousy, was such as to cause her great suffering. She felt that Philippe would have given his life to prevent a tête-à-tête between the queen and Charny; and she acknowledged that it would break her heart if, by following and consoling Philippe as she ought to do, she should leave Charny alone with Madame de La Motte and the queen. Indeed, she divined from Jeanne's modest, and at the same time familiar, manner that her presence would be no restraint. How could she explain what she felt? Was it love? Oh, love — she would have said to herself — does not spring up and grow with such rapidity in the cold atmosphere of the court. Love, that rare plant, delights to flower in generous, pure, innocent hearts. It will not take root in a heart profaned by recollections, in a soil chilled by tears which have been concentrating there for years. No, it was not love which Mademoiselle de Taverney felt for Monsieur de Charny. She repelled with all her might such an idea, because she had sworn never to love anything in this world.

But why had she suffered so much when Charny addressed a few words of respect and devotion to the queen? Yes, that must have been jealousy. Yes, Andrée acknowledged that she was jealous, not of the love which a man might feel for another woman than herself, but jealous of the woman who could inspire or receive this love. She observed, with melancholy, all the handsome suitors of the new court who were about her, — those gallant men, full of ardor, who did not understand her, and kept aloof after having offered her a few attentions, some because her coldness was not that of philosophy, others because this coldness was in strange contrast with the old frivolities in which Andrée had been brought up.

And then men, whether in search of pleasure or dreaming of love, distrust the coldness of a woman twenty-five years of age who is beautiful, who is rich, who is the favorite of the queen, and who goes her way alone, cold, silent, and pale along a path where supreme joy and supreme happiness consists in making as much noise as possible.

To be a living problem is to be without attraction. Andrée had perceived this; she had observed that eyes little by little had been averted from her beauty, that intellect distrusted or denied her intellect. She saw even more: this abandonment became a habit with the old courtiers, an instinct with the new; it was no more the custom to approach Mademoiselle to converse with her, than it was usual to approach the statues of Latona or Diana at Versailles. Whoever bowed to Mademoiselle de Taverney and then turned away to smile on another woman, conceived that he had done his duty.

This did not escape the keen eye of the young girl. She whose heart had experienced so much trouble without knowing a single pleasure, she who felt age advancing upon her with its retinue of pallid cares and gloomy memories, meditated in her sorrowful, sleepless nights on the delights in store for the happy lovers at Versailles and sighed, in mortal bitterness, "And I, my God! and I!"

When she met Charny on that night of the severe cold, when she saw the eyes of the young man rest curiously upon her, and envelop her gradually in a network of sympathy, she was no longer sensible of this strange reserve evinced toward her by all the courtiers. To this man she was a woman. He had re-awakened youthfulness in her, he had revived the dead. He had caused the marble of Diana and Latona to blush.

Therefore Mademoiselle de Taverney became immediately attached to this regenerator who had made her conscious of vitality. She was happy in looking at this young man, to whom she was not a problem. She was unhappy in the thought that another woman was about to clip the wings of her bright-hued fancy, and appropriate her dream which had scarcely emerged from its golden portal.

All this explains why Andrée did not follow Philippe out of the queen's cabinet, although she felt deeply the outrage offered her brother, and although that brother was to her an object of idolatrous devotion.

Mademoiselle de Taverney, who was concerned only to prevent a private interview between the queen and Charny, had no thought of taking part in the conversation after her brother's dismissal. She sat in a corner by the fireplace, almost turning her back to the group which formed about the queen. The queen was sitting, Charny standing and bending forward, Madame de La Motte standing in the recess of a window, where her affected timidity had sought a refuge, and her actual curiosity a place of observation.

The queen remained silent for some moments. She could not readily start a new conversation in connection with the delicate explanation that had just taken place.

Charny appeared to be suffering, and his attitude was not displeasing to the queen.

At length Marie Antoinette broke the silence, and replying at the same time to her own thought and to that of the others, "This proves," she said, "that we have enemies. Would any one believe, Monsieur, that such disgraceful things could happen at the court of France?"

Charny made no reply.

"What happiness," continued the queen, "to live on your vessels, under the open sky, on the open sea! They tell us of the wrath, the cruelty of the waves. Ah, Monsieur, consider your own case. Have not the waves of the ocean — the most furious waves — thrown upon you the foam of their wrath? Have not their assaults sometimes prostrated you on the deck? Well, look at yourself; you are in good health, you are young, you are honored."

"Madame!"

"Have not the English," continued the queen, gradually becoming more animated, "also discharged upon you their wrath, in flame and bullets, — a wrath dangerous to life, is it not? But of what moment is that to you? You are safe, you are strong; and by reason of that wrath of enemies you have conquered; the king has congratulated you, has caressed you, and the people know and love your name."

"Well, Madame?" murmured Charny, who saw with dread the increasing excitement of the queen.

"At what am I aiming?" she said; "it is this: Blessed be the enemies who launch against us flame, iron, and foaming waves! Blessed be the enemies who threaten us only with death!"

"Mon Dieu! Madame," replied Charny; "your Majesty has no enemies, — except as the serpent is enemy to the eagle. That which crawls, clinging to the ground, cannot annoy those who soar in the clouds."

"Monsieur," the queen quickly replied, "I know that you have returned from battle safe and sound; you have emerged safe and sound from the tempest; you have come forth triumphant and beloved. But those whose name an enemy like ours soils with the slime of calumny, although it is true their lives are not endangered, are made older by every tempest shock; they accustom themselves to bow their heads, in the fear of meeting, as I have done to-day, a twofold injury by friends and foes combined in one attack. And then, Monsieur, if you knew how painful it is to be hated!"

Andrée anxiously awaited the young man's answer. She trembled lest he should reply in the words of tender consolation which the queen appeared to solicit. But Charny, on the contrary, wiped his brow with his handkerchief, sought for support by leaning on the back of a chair, and turned pale.

The queen, looking at him, said, "Is it not too warm here?"

Madame de La Motte opened the window with her delicate hand, attacking the fastening as vigorously as if her wrist had been that of a man. Charny breathed the air with delight.

"Monsieur is accustomed to the air of the sea; he will stifle in the boudoirs of Versailles."

"It is not that, Madame," replied Charny; "but I have a special order to fulfil at two o'clock, and unless your Majesty commands me to remain —"

"By no means, Monsieur," returned the queen; "we know what a special order is, do we not, Andrée?" Then turning toward Charny, she said, with a slight appearance of vexation, "You are free, Monsieur," and she dismissed the young officer with a wave of the hand.

Charny bowed with the air of a man in haste, and disappeared behind the tapestry. A few seconds later a noise was heard in the antechamber, as of some one groaning and others hastening to his relief. The queen was near the door, either by accident or because she had wished to observe Charny, whose hasty withdrawal had seemed to her extraordinary. She raised the tapestry, uttered a slight cry, and seemed about to rush forward. But Andrée, who had closely observed her movements, placed herself between the queen and the door. "Oh, Madame!" said she. The queen looked intently at Andrée, who firmly sustained the scrutiny. Madame de La Motte reached her head forward. Between the queen and Andrée was a small clear space, and looking through that she could see Charny lying in a swoon and several servants and guards attending him. The queen, noticing Madame de La Motte's movement, hastily closed the door. But it was too late, Madame de La Motte had seen.

Marie Antoinette, with a frown on her brow, moved slowly to her chair. She was a prey to that gloomy pre-occupation which succeeds all violent emotion. She seemed not to be aware that there was any one near her. Andrée also, though she remained standing, leaning against the wall, seemed not less pre-occupied than the queen. There ensued a moment of silence.

"Here is something extraordinary," said the queen, suddenly, startling her two companions by her abruptness; "Monsieur de Charny seems to me to be still in doubt!"

"In doubt of what, Madame?" asked Andrée.

"Why, about my being at home on the night of the ball."

"Oh, Madame!"

"Is it not so, Countess?" said the queen. "Am I not right? Is not Monsieur de Charny still in doubt?"

"Against the king's word? Oh, that is impossible, Madame!"

"He may think that the king came to my aid through his own self-respect. Oh, he does not believe! he does not believe! that is easy to see."

Andrée bit her lips. "My brother is not so incredulous as Monsieur de Charny," she said; "he seemed to be quite convinced."

"Oh, that would be bad!" continued the queen, who had not listened to Andrée's reply; "and in that case this young man's heart is not so pure and upright as I thought." Then striking her hands angrily together, "But after all," she cried, "if he saw me there, why should he believe that I was not there? Monsieur le Comte d'Artois also saw me, and Monsieur Philippe, — at least he says so. Every one saw me, and the king's word was needed to make them believe, or pretend to believe. Oh, there is something under all this, — something which I ought to clear up, since no one else thinks of doing so. Is it not true, Andrée, that I ought to search into and discover the meaning of all this?"

"Your Majesty is right," said Andrée; "and I am sure that Madame de La Motte is of my opinion, and thinks with me that your Majesty ought to search until the discovery is made. Do you not, Madame?"

Madame de La Motte, taken by surprise, was startled and made no reply.

"For, also," continued the queen, "they say they saw me at Mesmer's."

"Your Majesty was there," Madame de La Motte hastened to say, smiling.

"Yes," replied the queen; "but I did not do what is charged against me in that article. And then they saw me at the Opera, and I certainly was not there." She reflected a moment, and then cried out, eagerly, "Oh, I have hold of the truth!"

"The truth?" stammered the countess.

"Oh, so much the better!" said Andrée.

"Let Monsieur de Crosne be summoned immediately," said the queen, joyously, to Madame de Misery, who had come in.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

MONSIEUR DE CROSNE.

Monsieur de Crosne found himself in a very embarrassing position after the explanation which had taken place between the king and queen. The full possession of a woman's secrets, especially when that woman is a queen, imposes on one no inconsiderable burden, when one's business is to watch over the interests of the crown and protect its fame.

Monsieur de Crosne believed that he was about to be exposed to a woman's anger and a queen's indignation; but he was strongly intrenched in his official obligations, and his well-known urbanity would serve as a shield to ward off the first blows. He entered quietly, with a smile on his lips. The queen, however, did not smile.

"Come, Monsieur de Crosne," said she, "it is now our turn to have an explanation."

"I am at your Majesty's orders."

"As lieutenant of police you should know the source of all this that is happening to me."

Monsieur de Crosne looked around him with a somewhat affrighted appearance.

"Do not be disturbed," continued the queen. "You know well these two ladies; you know every one."

"Very nearly," said the magistrate; "I know persons, I know effects; but I do not know the source of that to which your Majesty alludes."

"Then I am sorry to have to inform you," said the queen, annoyed by the calm demeanor of the lieutenant of police. "It is evident enough that I might give you my secret secretly, in a low voice, or in a place apart; but I prefer, Monsieur, the open daylight and the full voice. Well, then, I ascribe the effects, as you call them, — the effects of which I complain, — to the evil conduct of some one who resembles me, and who exhibits herself in those places where you and your agents think I have been seen."

"A resemblance!" cried Monsieur de Crosne, too much occupied in sustaining the queen's attack to notice Jeanne's momentary confusion and an exclamation by Andrée.

"Do you find the supposition impossible, Monsieur? Would you prefer to believe that I am deceiving myself, or deceiving you?"

"Madame, I do not say that. But whatever resemblance there might be between any other woman and your Majesty, there must still be so much difference that no experienced observer could be deceived."

"The observers can be deceived, Monsieur, because they have been deceived."

"I can give your Majesty an example," said Andrée.

"Ah!"

"When we were at home, at Taverney-Maison-Rouge, we had a girl in our service who, by a strange freak of Nature — "

"Resembled me!"

"Oh, your Majesty, so much as to deceive any one!"

"And that girl, — what became of her?"

"We did not then know your Majesty's generous and elevated disposition, and my father was afraid that the resemblance might be displeasing to the queen; so when we were at Trianon we kept the girl concealed from the eyes of all the court."

"You see, then, Monsieur de Crosne? Ah, this interests you?"

"Much, Madame."

"Go on, my dear Andrée."

"Well, Madame, that girl, being of a restless, ambitious spirit, soon wearied of being so isolated. She became acquainted, doubtless, with some evil-minded person, and one evening, on retiring for the night, I was surprised by her absence. She was searched for, but she had disappeared."

"My double had stolen something from you?"

"No, Madame; I had nothing."

Jeanne had listened to this conversation with an eagerness easily to be conceived.

"So you knew nothing of all that, Monsieur de Crosne?" asked the queen.

"No, Madame."

"So there lives a woman bearing a striking resemblance to me, and you do not know it! An event of this importance occurs in the kingdom, giving rise to grave disorders, and you are not the first to be informed of that event! Come, confess, Monsieur, the police service is very badly administered."

"But," replied the magistrate, "I assure you, Madame, it is not. Though to the eyes of the vulgar, the functions of the lieutenant of police are as exalted as are those of a god, your Majesty, who is placed so far above me in this terrestrial Olympus, is well aware that the king's magistrates are but men. I do not command events; and some events are so strange that human intelligence can hardly understand them."

"Monsieur, when a man has received all possible facilities for penetrating even to the thoughts of his fellow-beings; when through his agents he engages spies in his service; when through his spies he is able to note even the gestures I make before my mirror, — if that man is not the master of events — "

" Madame, when your Majesty spent a night away from home, I knew it. Is my police well administered? Yes, it is, is it not? That day your Majesty had visited Madame, who is here present. That was no affair of mine. When you appeared at Mesmer's vat you had really gone thither, I suppose; and my police service is well performed, since my agents saw you there. When you went to the Opera — "

The queen quickly raised her head.

" Allow me to speak, Madame. I say 'you,' as Monsieur le Comte d'Artois has said 'you.' If the brother-in-law can be mistaken as to his sister's appearance, certainly an agent of the police may be deceived. The agent said he thought he had seen you. My police service was well performed on that day. Will you say also, Madame, that my agents did not well follow up that affair of the journalist Reteau, whom Monsieur de Charny has so soundly beaten? "

" Monsieur de Charny? " cried Andrée and the queen, at the same time.

" The event is not yet old, Madame, and the blows of the cane are still warm on the journalist's shoulders. This is one of those occurrences from which my predecessor, Monsieur de Sartines, would have made capital, in his spirited narrations to the late king, or to the favorite."

" Did Monsieur de Charny commit himself with this fellow? "

" I have heard it only through my police, which is so calumniated, as you know, Madame; and you will confess that it must have required some intelligence in that police to discover the duel which followed this affair."

"Monsieur de Charny engaged in a duel! Monsieur de Charny has fought a duel!" cried the queen.

"With the journalist?" Andrée said eagerly.

"Oh, no, ladies, the journalist was too well beaten to have been able to give Monsieur de Charny the wound which made him faint in your antechamber."

"Wounded! he is wounded!" cried the queen. "Wounded! but when was this? How did it happen? You must be mistaken, Monsieur de Crosne."

"Oh, Madame, your Majesty so often finds me at fault that you might allow that for once I am right."

"He was here just now."

"I know that."

"Oh, but," said Andrée, "I saw that he was suffering."

These words she spoke in such a manner that the queen recognized their hostility, and turned quickly round. The queen's look was an answer which Andrée met with resolute composure.

"What do you say?" said Marie Antoinette; "you saw that Monsieur de Charny was suffering, and did not speak of it!"

Andrée did not reply. Jeanne came to the assistance of the favorite, of whom it was necessary to make a friend. "I too," she said, "thought that Monsieur de Charny found it difficult to stand while your Majesty did him the honor to speak to him."

"Difficult, yes," said the proud Andrée, who did not thank the countess even with a look.

Monsieur de Crosne, having passed through his examination, was now leisurely observing these three women, not one of whom mistrusted that she was undergoing the lieutenant's scrutiny.

At last the queen continued, "Monsieur, with whom and why did Monsieur de Charny fight?"

Andrée, meanwhile, had recovered her self-possession.

"With a gentleman, who — but mon Dieu! Madame, it is useless; the two adversaries understand each other now, and a little while ago they were conversing together in your Majesty's presence."

"In my presence, — here?"

"Yes, here; the victor was the first to leave, about twenty minutes ago."

"Monsieur de Taverney!" cried the queen, with an angry flash in her eyes.

"My brother!" murmured Andrée, who reproached herself for having been so selfish as not to have understood everything.

"I think," said Monsieur de Crosne, "that it was, in fact, with Monsieur Philippe de Taverney that Monsieur de Charny fought."

The queen struck her hands violently together, which was always a sign of her most passionate rage.

"It is improper, improper!" she said. "What! American manners brought to Versailles! Oh, no, I will not permit them to gain a footing here."

Andrée bowed her head, Monsieur de Crosne also.

"So, then, because one has been associating with Monsieur Lafayette and Monsieur Washington," — the queen affected to pronounce this name as if it were French, — "my court is to be transformed into a battle-ground of the sixteenth century! No! once more, no! Andrée, you must have known that your brother had fought."

"I learn it now for the first time, Madame."

"Why did he fight?"

"We might have asked that of Monsieur de Charny, who fought with him," said Andrée, pale and with flashing eyes.

"I do not ask," replied the queen, arrogantly, "what Monsieur de Charmy has done; but what Monsieur Philippe de Taverney has done."

"If my brother has fought," said the young girl, letting her words fall one by one, "it must have been in your Majesty's service."

"Do you mean to say that Monsieur de Charny did not fight in my service, Mademoiselle?"

"I have the honor to remark to your Majesty," replied Andrée, in the same tone, "that I speak to the queen of my brother only, and of no other."

Marie Antoinette remained calm, but to do so she required all the self-control of which she was capable. She rose, took a turn around the room, pretended to look at herself in the mirror, took a volume from a book-case, ran over seven or eight lines, then threw it aside, "I thank you, Monsieur de Crosne," she said to the magistrate; "you have convinced me. My head was rather confused by all these stories, all these suppositions. Yes, the police is very efficient, Monsieur; but I beg you to think over this resemblance of which I have spoken to you. You will not forget, Monsieur? Adieu." She held out her hand with supreme grace, and he departed twice happier than when he came, and with ten times as much information. Andrée understood the tone in which this word "Adieu" was spoken; she made a slow and formal reverence. The queen bade her adieu in a careless manner, but without any apparent ill-feeling. Jeanne bowed as before a sacred altar, she prepared to take leave.

Madame de Misery entered. "Madame," she said to the queen, "has not your Majesty an appointment with Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange for this hour?"

"Ah, it is true, my good Misery; it is true. Let them come in. Remain a little longer, Madame de La Motte; I wish the king to make full peace with you." The queen while saying these words watched in a mirror the expression on the face of Andrée, who was slowly retiring toward the door. She wished perhaps to rouse her jealousy by thus showing favor to the new-comer. Andrée disappeared beneath the folds of the tapestry; she had shown not the slightest emotion.

"Steel! steel!" cried the queen, sighing. "Yes, these Taverneys are all steel, but gold also. Ah, gentlemen, good-day. What do you bring me that is new? You know very well that I have no money."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE TEMPTRESS.

MADAME DE LA MOTTE had resumed her position; she kept herself somewhat apart like a modest woman, and stood attentively observant like one to whom had been accorded the privilege of remaining as a spectator.

Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange, in ceremonial costume, presented themselves to receive audience of their queen. They advanced toward the queen's chair, bowing repeatedly.

"Jewellers," said the queen, suddenly, "you have come here only to speak of jewels. You come at a bad time, gentlemen."

Monsieur Boehmer was the orator of the partnership. "Madame," he said, "we do not come to offer our goods to your Majesty, we should fear to be indiscreet."

"Oh!" said the queen, already repenting of having shown so much spirit, "to see jewels, is not to purchase them."

"Undoubtedly, Madame," continued Boehmer, trying to catch the thread of his discourse; "but we come to perform a duty, and that has emboldened us."

"A duty?" said the queen, in astonishment.

"Concerning that beautiful diamond necklace which your Majesty did not deign to take."

"Ah! well — the necklace. Then it has come back to us!" cried Marie Antoinette, laughing.

Boehmer remained serious.

"The fact is, it was very beautiful, Monsieur Boehmer," added the queen.

"So beautiful, Madame," said Bossange, timidly, "that your Majesty alone is worthy of wearing it."

"My consolation is," said Marie Antoinette, with a light sigh, which did not escape Madame de La Motte, "that it cost — a million and a half; was not that the price, Monsieur Boehmer?"

"Yes, your Majesty."

"And that in these agreeable times in which we live, when the hearts of the people are cold, there is no sovereign who can purchase a diamond necklace worth fifteen hundred thousand francs."

"Fifteen hundred thousand francs!" repeated Madame de La Motte, like a faithful echo.

"So that, gentlemen, no one can have that which I cannot, ought not, to purchase. You will answer me that each stone is valuable by itself. It is true; but I should not envy any one two or three diamonds; I might envy them sixty of them." The queen rubbed her hands with a degree of satisfaction which included a slight desire to tease Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange.

"That is just where your Majesty is in error," said Boehmer; "and that brings us to the duty which we now come to perform; the necklace is sold."

"Sold!" cried the queen, turning round.

"Sold!" said Madame de La Motte, whom the movement of her protectress inspired with anxiety as to her pretended self-denial.

"To whom, then?" asked the queen.

"Ah! Madame, that is a State secret."

"A State secret! Good, we can laugh about it, then," exclaimed Marie Antoinette, joyously. "These secrets are very often kept, because there is really nothing to tell, — is it not so, Boehmer?"

"Madame!"

"Oh! State secrets; they are very common things with us. Take care, Boehmer; if you do not confide to me your secret, I will have one of Monsieur de Crosne's agents steal it from you," and she laughed heartily, manifesting clearly her opinion as to the pretended secret which would prevent Boehmer and Bossange from revealing the name of the purchasers of the necklace.

"We do not conduct ourselves toward your Majesty as toward other customers. We have come to inform your Majesty that the necklace is sold, because it really is sold; and we must not reveal the name of the purchaser, because the sale was made secretly by an ambassador sent incognito."

The queen at this word "ambassador" was seized with a new fit of hilarity. She turned toward Madame de La Motte, saying, "What is most admirable in Boehmer is, that he is capable of believing what he has just told me. Come, Boehmer, just tell me the country from which this ambassador comes? No, that is too much," said she laughing; "the first letter of his name, that will do," and once in a laughing mood, she could restrain herself no longer.

"It is the ambassador from Portugal," said Boehmer, in a low voice, as if to keep his secret at least from the ears of Madame de La Motte.

At this assertion, so positive, so clear, the queen suddenly stopped. "An ambassador from Portugal!" she said; "there is none here, Boehmer."

"He came expressly for this, Madame."

"To your house, incognito?"

"Yes, Madame."

"Who is it, then?"

"Monsieur de Souza."

The queen did not reply for some moments; then as if she had made up her mind: "Well!" she said, "her Majesty the queen of Portugal is fortunate; the diamonds are beautiful. Let us say no more about it."

"Madame, on the contrary, your Majesty will allow me to speak — will allow us," said Boehmer, looking at his partner. Bossange bowed.

"Have you ever seen those diamonds, Countess?" cried the queen, looking at Jeanne.

"No, Madame."

"Beautiful diamonds! It is a pity these gentlemen have not brought them."

"Here they are," said Bossange, eagerly. And he drew from his hat, which he carried under his arm, the little flat box containing the necklace.

"Look, look, Countess! you are a woman, this will please you," said the queen. And she drew back a little from the stand of Sèvres upon which Boehmer had displayed the necklace with so much art that the light in striking the stones brought jets of fire from almost every facet. Jeanne uttered a cry of admiration. And indeed, nothing could be more beautiful; it seemed to emit tongues of fire, sometimes green and red, sometimes white as light itself. When Boehmer moved the case backward and forward, the streams of wonderful liquid flame would gush forth.

"Wonderful! wonderful!" cried Jeanne, a prey to the delirium of an enthusiastic admiration.

"Fifteen hundred thousand francs, which might be held in the hollow of my hand," said the queen, with an affectation of the phlegmatic philosophy which Monsieur Rousseau of Geneva would have displayed under similar circumstances.

But Jeanne saw something in this disdain beside the disdain itself; for she did not despair of convincing the queen, and after a careful examination of the diamonds, "Monsieur Boehmer is right," she said; "there is in the world only one queen worthy of wearing this necklace, and that is your Majesty."

"My Majesty will not wear it, however."

"We could not allow it to leave France, Madame, without coming to lay at the feet of your Majesty all our regrets. It is a jewel known over all Europe, and whose possession is disputed. That any other sovereign should adorn herself with it, after it has been refused by the queen of France, our national pride will permit only when you, Madame, shall have once more, definitely, irrevocably, refused it."

"My refusal has been pronounced," replied the queen. "It has been made public, and has been too much applauded for me to repent of it."

"Oh, Madame," said Boehmer, "if the people found it admirable that your Majesty should prefer a ship-of-war to a necklace, the nobility, which is French also, would not think it surprising that the queen of France should purchase a necklace after having purchased a ship-of-war."

"Let us speak no more of it," said Marie Antoinette, casting a last look at the casket.

Jeanne sighed in sympathy with the queen.

"Ah! you sigh, you, Countess. If you were in my place, would you do differently?"

"I do not know," murmured Jeanne.

"Have you looked at them enough?"

"I could look at them forever, Madame."

"Let her look, gentlemen; she is admiring them. That takes nothing from the value of the diamonds; they are still worth fifteen hundred thousand francs, unfortunately."

That word "unfortunately" seemed to offer a favorable opportunity to the countess. The queen regretted, therefore she had desired. She had desired, therefore she desired still, since that wish had not been satisfied. Such was Jeanne's logic, we must believe, since she added, "Fifteen hundred thousand francs, Madame, which on your neck would cause all women to die of jealousy." And snatching the royal necklace from the case, she clasped it so skilfully, so quickly, about the lovely neck of Marie Antoinette that the latter found herself, in the twinkling of an eye, inundated with phosphorescent and changing colors.

"Oh, your Majesty is sublime thus!" said Jeanne.

Marie Antoinette quickly went to a mirror. She was dazzling; her neck, white and flexible as that of Jane Grey, delicate as a lily-stalk, destined to fall like Virgil's flower beneath the iron, rose gracefully with its golden ringlets from the midst of this luminous flood. Jeanne had ventured to expose the queen's shoulders, so that the last row of diamonds fell on her pearly bosom. The queen was radiant, the woman was superb. Lovers or subjects, all would have prostrated themselves before her. Marie Antoinette was lost in admiration of herself. Then seized with fear, she wished to tear the necklace from her shoulders. "Enough," she said, "enough!"

"It has touched your Majesty," cried Boehmer; "it can belong to no one else."

"Impossible," replied the queen, firmly. "Gentlemen, I have amused myself with these diamonds, but to prolong the sport would be a fault."

"Your Majesty has ample time to become accustomed to this idea," Boehmer whispered to the queen; "we shall return to-morrow."

"To postpone payment is not to avoid it. And then, why postpone? You need the money. The other purchasers will doubtless pay you in a manner more to your advantage."

"Yes, your Majesty, in ready money," replied the merchant.

"Take them, take them! Put the diamonds in the case again. Quick! quick!"

"Your Majesty forgets, perhaps," said Madame de La Motte, "that such an ornament is always equivalent to money, and that a hundred years from now the necklace will still be worth what it is worth to-day."

"Give me fifteen hundred thousand francs, Countess," said the queen, with a forced smile, "and we will see."

"Oh, if only I had them!" cried Jeanne. She then remained silent. Long speeches sometimes are less forcible than an expressive reticence.

In vain did Boehmer and Bossange spend a quarter of an hour in replacing the diamonds in their case, and carefully securing the locks, — the queen gave no sign of yielding. It might be seen, however, in her gloomy manner and her silence, that she was passing through a painful struggle. As was her custom in moments of vexation, she reached out for a book, and turned over a few pages without reading them.

The jewellers took leave, saying, "Your Majesty has refused?"

"Yes; and again, yes," sighed the queen; and this time she sighed so that all might hear.

The jewellers departed. Jeanne perceived the agitation of Marie Antoinette in the nervous movement of her feet on the velvet cushion. "She suffers," said the countess to herself.

Suddenly the queen rose, took a turn around the room, and pausing before Jeanne, whose watchful look fascinated her, "Countess," she said, "it appears that the king will not return. Our little petition must be postponed till the next audience."

Jeanne bowed respectfully, and made a movement toward the door.

"But I shall keep you in mind," added the queen, kindly.

Jeanne pressed her lips to the queen's hand, as if she would there place her heart, and withdrew, leaving Marie Antoinette a prey to vexation and longing.

"The vexation of weakness, the longing of unsatisfied desire," said Jeanne to herself. "And she is the queen! Oh, no, — she is a woman."

The countess disappeared.

END OF VOL. I.

THE QUEEN'S NECKLACE.

CHAPTER I.

AMBITION IN THE GUISE OF LOVE.

JEANNE also was a woman, though she was not a queen. And therefore she was hardly seated in her carriage when she began to compare that splendid palace of Versailles with her fifth-story apartment, — those magnificent lackeys with her old servant Clotilde. But immediately the attic rooms and the old servant faded into the past, and Jeanne saw her little house in the Faubourg Saint Antoine, so elegant and comfortable, and her lackeys, less adorned with embroidery than those of Versailles, but as respectful and obedient. That house and those lackeys were her Versailles. There she was a queen no less than Marie Antoinette, and her wishes once formed, provided they were limited, not to what was necessary, but to what was reasonable, were as well and as speedily executed as if she had held a sceptre.

It was, then, with a cheerful face, and a smile on her lips, that Jeanne re-entered her house. It was still early. She took paper, pen, and ink, wrote a few lines, enclosed them in a fine, perfumed envelope, wrote the address, and rang the bell. Hardly had its last vibration ceased when the door opened, and a servant stood on the threshold.

"I was right," murmured Jeanne; "the queen is not better served." Then aloud, "Take this letter to Monseigneur le Cardinal de Rohan."

The lackey took the note and went out, in silent obedience. The countess fell into a revery, in continuance of her meditations on the road from Versailles. Five minutes later the lackey returned.

"Well?" said Madame de La Motte, with a slight accent of impatience, on seeing that her order had not been executed.

"As I was going out," said the lackey, "Monseigneur knocked at the door. I told him that I was starting out to go to his house. He took the letter, read it, and came in, saying, 'It is all right; announce me.'"

"Go on."

"Monseigneur is here, waiting Madame's permission to enter."

A light smile played on the lips of the countess. After a silence of two seconds, "Let him come in," she said, with an air of peculiar satisfaction.

Was that pause of two seconds made for the purpose of keeping waiting in her antechamber a prince of the Church, or did Madame de La Motte need them for the completion of her plan?

The prince appeared in the doorway.

In returning to her house, in sending for the cardinal, in experiencing so much satisfaction at his arrival, Jeanne had, then, a plan?

Yes; for this longing of the queen, like the night-fires which reveal the gloomy features of a landscape, had exposed to the eyes of the intriguing countess all the recesses of a soul too proud to take precautions against observation. The journey from Versailles to Paris is of some length, and when it is made side by side with the demon of cupidity, he has time to whisper to the traveller the most daring counsels.

Jeanne was still intoxicated with the view of that immense amount of money — fifteen hundred thousand francs — spread out in diamonds on the white satin of the jewel-case. Fifteen hundred thousand francs! Was it not, indeed, a princely fortune, — especially to the poor mendicant who, only a month before, was holding out her hands for charity? Certainly there was a greater distance between the Jeanne de Valois of the Rue Saint Claude and the Jeanne de Valois of the Faubourg Saint Antoine than between the Jeanne de Valois of the Faubourg Saint Antoine and Jeanne de Valois, mistress of the necklace. She had, then, accomplished more than half the journey which led to fortune.

And this fortune, coveted by Jeanne, was no illusion, like the words of a contract, or like territorial possession, which require the exercise of imagination to give them value; no, the necklace was a fortune in sight, — there, always there, glowing and fascinating; and since the queen could desire it, Jeanne de Valois well might dream of it; since the queen could make up her mind to forego possession of it, Madame de La Motte well might place it as the limit of her ambition.

The cardinal, who was to realize these dreams, interrupted them in responding by his unexpected presence to her desire to see him. He also had his dreams; he also had his ambition, which he concealed under the mask of love.

"Ah, my dear Jeanne!" said the cardinal, "you have become so necessary to me that my entire day has been clouded by the thought that you were so far from me. You are well, after your visit to Versailles?"

"Why, as you see, Monseigneur."

"And contented?"

"Enchanted."

"The queen received you, then?"

"Immediately on my arrival I was introduced to her presence."

"You have good luck. One might infer from your triumphant manner that the queen spoke to you."

"I spent about three hours in her Majesty's cabinet."

The cardinal started, and was very near repeating after Jeanne, in a tone of astonishment, "Three hours!" but he restrained himself. "You are really an enchantress!" he said, "and no one can resist you."

"Oh, oh, you exaggerate, Prince!"

"No, really. And so you remained three hours with the queen?"

Jeanne nodded.

"Three hours!" repeated the cardinal, smiling. "What a number of things an intelligent woman like you can say in three hours!"

"Oh, I assure you, Monseigneur, I did not lose my time!"

"I will wager," ventured the cardinal, "that during those three hours you did not once think of me."

"Ungrateful man!"

"Really?" cried the cardinal.

"I did more than think of you."

"What did you, then?"

"I spoke of you."

"Spoke of me?—and to whom?" asked the prelate, in a tone in which it was impossible for him to conceal his emotion.

"To whom, if not to the queen?" But while saying these words, so precious to the cardinal, Jeanne was careful not to look at the prince that she might not seem to be at all anxious as to their effect.

Monsieur de Rohan was almost panting. "Ah!" said he, "dear Countess, tell me about it. Indeed I feel so much interest in everything that happens to you that I do not wish you to omit the slightest detail."

Jeanne smiled; she knew what interested the cardinal as well as he did himself. But as she had intended to relate punctiliously the whole story even without the cardinal's entreaty, she began deliberately, pronouncing distinctly each syllable. She gave a full account of the interview, related all the conversation, and demonstrated by every word how by one of those happy accidents which make the fortune of courtiers, she had happened at Versailles under one of those strange circumstances which in one day may transform a stranger into an almost indispensable friend. In fact, Jeanne de La Motte had in one day been admitted to the knowledge of the misfortunes of the queen, of the impotency of royalty.

In this narration Monsieur de Rohan appeared to observe that part only which related to what the queen had said about Jeanne, while Jeanne lay stress upon what the queen had said about Monsieur de Rohan.

The narration was scarcely finished when a servant entered announcing supper. Jeanne invited the cardinal by a glance, the cardinal accepted by a sign. He offered his arm to the mistress of the house, who had so quickly become accustomed to her position as hostess, and they went into the dining-room.

When supper was over, when the cardinal had drunk deep draughts of hope and love from the story of the enchantress, twenty times begun, and as many times interrupted, he felt obliged to come to some sort of conclusion with this woman who held the hearts of sovereigns in her hand. For he remarked, with a surprise which amounted to terror, that instead of assuming airs, like other women who are much sought after and who can render valuable services, she anticipated his wishes with a grace very different from that fierce haughtiness she had shown at the former supper, in the same house.

Jeanne, on this occasion, did the honors of her house as if she were mistress not only of herself but of others also. There was no embarrassment in her expression, no hesitation in her tone. Had she not been taking, all day, these lessons in aristocratic deportment by association with the flower of French nobility? Had not a queen without rival called her "dear countess"? Therefore the cardinal, a man of superior rank himself, did not attempt to resist this assumption of superior rank on the part of Jeanne. "Countess," he said, taking her hand, "there are two women in you."

"How so?" asked the countess.

"The one of yesterday and the one of to-day."

"And which does your Eminence prefer?"

"I do not know. I feel only that the one of this evening is an Armida, a Circe, something irresistible."

"And whom you will not attempt to resist, I hope, Monseigneur, prince though you are."

The prince slid from his seat and fell upon his knees before Madame de La Motte.

"You ask alms?" she said.

"And I expect you to grant me them."

"It is a day for gifts," replied Jeanne. "The Countess de Valois has taken her place, — she is a woman of the court; before long she will rank among the proudest women of Versailles. She can then open her hand and extend it to whomsoever she pleases."

"Even to a prince?" said Monsieur de Rohan.

"Even to a cardinal," replied Jeanne.

The cardinal imprinted a long and burning kiss upon that pretty, rebellious hand, and after a glance and a smile from the countess, he rose. He then went into the antechamber and spoke a few words to his servant. Two minutes after could be heard the noise of the carriage as it rolled away. The countess looked up.

"Upon my word, Countess," said the cardinal, "I have burned my ships."

"And there is no great merit in that," replied the countess, "since you have reached port."

CHAPTER II.

MASKS AND FACES.

LONG conversations are the blessed privilege of persons who have nothing further to tell each other. After the pleasure of being silent there is none greater than that of conversing carelessly. Two hours after the departure of the carriage, the cardinal and the countess had reached this point in their intercourse. The countess had yielded, the cardinal had conquered; and yet the cardinal was the slave, the countess was the victor.

Two men deceive each other while shaking hands; a man and a woman deceive each other with a kiss. But in this case each deceived the other only because the other wished to be deceived. Each had an end in view, for the attainment of which this intimacy was necessary. Each, then, had made a forward step.

The cardinal did not take the trouble to conceal his impatience. He very soon brought the conversation back to the subject of Versailles and the honors which there awaited the new favorite of the queen: "She is generous," he said, "and spares no pains to please those whom she likes. She has the rare gift of giving a little to a great many persons, and of giving much to a few friends."

"You think she is rich, then?" asked Madame de La Motte.

"She knows how to obtain resources with a word, a gesture, a smile. There has never been a minister except Turgot, perhaps, who has had the courage to refuse the queen anything she asked."

"Well! I think she is not so rich as you imagine, poor queen, — or rather, poor woman!"

"Why do you think so?"

"Is a person rich who is obliged to endure privations?"

"Privations? Tell me about it, dear Jeanne."

"Oh! mon Dieu! I will tell you what I have seen, nothing more, nothing less."

"Go on, I will listen."

"Imagine to yourself two terrible torments which this unhappy queen has endured."

"Two torments! Tell me what they are."

"Do you know what the longing of a woman is, my dear Prince?"

"No; but I wish that you would tell me what it is."

"Well, the queen has a desire which she cannot satisfy."

"For whom?"

"No, for what!"

"For what, then?"

"For a diamond necklace."

"Stay, I remember! Do you not allude to the diamonds of Boehmer and Bossange?"

"Precisely."

"Oh, that is an old story, Countess!"

"Old or new, is it not a real sorrow for a queen that she cannot possess what a mere favorite was so near obtaining? If Louis XV. had lived fifteen days longer, Jeanne Vaubernier would have possessed that which Marie Antoinette cannot have."

"Well, dear Countess, you are mistaken about this; these diamonds have been offered to the queen five or six times, and she has always refused them."

"Oh!"

"The king has offered them to her, and she has always refused to accept them;" and the cardinal told the story of the ship-of-war.

Jeanne listened eagerly, and when the cardinal had finished, "Well," she said, "what then?"

"What then?"

"Yes; what does that prove?"

"Why, that she did not wish for them, it seems to me."

Jeanne shrugged her shoulders. "You know what women are, you know the court, you know kings, and yet you allow yourself to be misled by such an answer?"

"Well, I prove that she refused."

"My dear Prince, that proves one thing; the queen thought she must utter a brilliant saying, a popular saying, and she uttered it."

"Good!" said the cardinal; "is that your faith in royal virtues? Ah, sceptic! Why, Saint Thomas was a believer in comparison with you."

"Sceptic or believer, I will affirm one thing."

"What is it?"

"That the queen had no sooner refused the necklace than she was seized with an insane desire to possess it."

"You are inventing these ideas, my dear; and in the first place, you must consider that with all her faults the queen has one great quality."

"What is it?"

"She is disinterested. She loves neither gold, nor silver, nor precious stones. She takes these minerals at their true value; to her a flower on her bosom is as precious as a diamond in her ear."

"I will not deny it. But I do maintain that at this moment she has a strong desire to put several diamonds about her neck."

"Oh, Countess, prove what you say!"

"Nothing will be more easy. I have just seen the necklace."

"You?"

"I; I have not only seen it, but I touched it."

"And where?"

"At Versailles."

"At Versailles?"

"Yes; where the jewellers took it to tempt the queen for the last time."

"And it is beautiful?"

"It is marvellous."

"Then you, who are a true woman, can understand how this necklace could possess one's thoughts."

"I can see how, on account of it, a woman might lose appetite and sleep."

"Alas! why have I not a ship to give to the king?"

"A ship?"

"Yes; he would give me the necklace. And if I once had it, you could eat and sleep peacefully."

"You are jesting?"

"No; I swear I am not."

"Well, I am going to tell you something which will astonish you very much."

"Say on."

"I would not have that necklace!"

"So much the better, Countess, for I could not give it to you."

"Alas! neither you nor any one else; indeed, the queen understands that, therefore she desires it."

"But I repeat to you that the king offered it to her."

Jeanne made a quick gesture, an almost impatient one. "And I tell you," she said, "that women are most pleased with such presents when they are not given by persons who oblige them to accept them."

The cardinal regarded Jeanne more attentively. "I do not understand exactly," he said.

"So much the better, let us say no more about it. What is the necklace to you, since we cannot have it?"

"Oh, if I were the king, and you were the queen, I would oblige you to accept it!"

"Well, without being king, oblige the queen to take it, and see if it makes her as angry as you imagine."

The cardinal again looked at Jeanne. "Really," he said, "you are sure you are not mistaken; the queen has this desire?"

"An overwhelming desire. Listen, dear Prince; have you not told me, or have I heard in some other way, that you would not be sorry to become prime minister?"

"It is very possible that I may have said that, Countess."

"Well, let us wager, my dear Prince —"

"What?"

"That the queen would make a minister of that man who should manage to have this necklace placed upon her toilet-table within eight days."

"Oh, Countess!"

"I say what I say. Would you rather have me keep it to myself?"

"Oh, never!"

"Besides, what I say does not concern you. It is very clear that you would not sacrifice a million and a half to a royal caprice. Upon my word, that would be paying too dear for a portfolio which you might have for nothing, and which is your due. Therefore, consider all that I have said as mere chatter. I am like the parrots; I have been dazzled by the sun, and keep saying to myself that 'it is hot.' Ah, Monseigneur, how severe a trial is a day of favor to a little country girl! These rays of light, — one must be an eagle like you to gaze at them serenely."

The cardinal became thoughtful.

"Come, come," said Jeanne, "you think so ill of me, you find me so vulgar and so wretched, that you do not deign even to speak to me."

"Ah, you are mistaken!"

"I have judged the queen by myself."

"Countess!"

"How could I help it? I thought she wished for the diamonds, because she sighed while looking at them; I believed it, because in her place I should have desired them. Excuse my weakness."

"You are an adorable woman, Countess. You have both tenderness of heart and strength of mind, — a rare combination; there is at times in you so little of the woman that I am afraid of you. You are at other times so adorable a woman that I bless Heaven for you, and I bless you also;" and the gallant cardinal emphasized this compliment by a kiss. "Come, let us talk no longer of these things," he said.

"So be it," murmured Jeanne to herself, "but I think the hook has caught in the flesh."

But although the cardinal said, "Let us talk no more about it," he continued, "And do you think it is Boehmer who has returned to the charge?"

"With Bossange, yes," answered Madame de La Motte, innocently.

"Bossange, — let me see," said the cardinal, as if he were trying to recall something; "is he not his partner?"

"Yes; a tall, thin man."

"That is he. And he lives —"

"He must live somewhere near the Quai de la Ferraille or that of l'École, I do not know exactly; but at all events, somewhere in the neighborhood of the Pont Neuf."

"The Pont Neuf, — you are right; I have read those names over some door, while driving in my carriage."

"The fish bites more and more," murmured Jeanne to herself. And she was right, for the prey had swallowed even the hook.

The next morning, on leaving the little house in the Faubourg Saint Antoine, the cardinal drove directly to the house of Boehmer. He intended to remain incognito, but Boehmer and Bossange were the jewellers to the court, and at the first words he spoke, they addressed him as "Monseigneur."

"Well, yes, 'Monseigneur,'" said the cardinal; "but since you recognize me, try, at least, to prevent others from recognizing me."

"Monseigneur may rest easy. We await Monsieur's orders."

"I have come to purchase the diamond necklace which you have shown to the queen."

"Indeed, we are very sorry, but Monseigneur is too late."

"Why so?"

"It is sold."

"It is impossible, since it was only yesterday that you offered it again to the queen."

"Who refused it again, Monseigneur, so that the old bargain stands."

"And with whom was that bargain made?" asked the cardinal.

"It is a secret, Monseigneur."

"Too many secrets, Monsieur Boehmer," and the cardinal rose.

"But, Monseigneur — "

"I thought, Monsieur," continued the cardinal, "that a jeweller to the crown of France should be glad to sell in France these beautiful stones; prefer Portugal, if you please, Monsieur Boehmer."

"Monseigneur knows everything!" cried the jeweller.

"Well, what is there surprising in that?"

"But if Monseigneur knows all, he can have learned it only from the queen."

"And what if it were so?" said Monsieur de Rohan, without denying the supposition, which flattered his self-love.

"Oh, that would change everything entirely, Monsieur."

"Explain yourself, I do not understand."

"Will Monseigneur allow me to speak with perfect freedom?"

"Speak."

"Well, then, the queen wants our necklace."

"Do you think so?"

"We know it."

"Ah! why, then, does she not buy it?"

"Why? because she has refused to accept it from the king, and to retract that refusal, which has won for her Majesty so much praise, would make her seem capricious."

"The queen is above considering what might be said about her."

"Yes, when the people speak, or even the courtiers; but when it is the king who speaks — "

"You know very well that the king wished to give this necklace to the queen."

"Yes, but he was very ready with his thanks when she declined it."

"What, then, does Monsieur Boehmer conclude?"

"That the queen would be glad to have the necklace without seeming to purchase it."

"Well, you are mistaken, Monsieur," said the cardinal; "there is no foundation for what you say."

"That is unfortunate, Monseigneur, for that would have afforded us our only ground for breaking our agreement with the Portuguese ambassador."

The cardinal reflected. Seeing that he was in the man's power, "Monsieur," said he, "you may suppose, if you please, that the queen desires to possess your necklace."

"That changes everything, Monseigneur. I can break any bargain when there is a question of giving preference to the queen."

"What is your price for the necklace?"

"Fifteen hundred thousand francs."

"On what terms?"

"Portugal was to pay me a sum on account, and I was to carry the necklace to Lisbon, where the balance was to be paid at once."

"That mode of payment is not practicable with us, Monsieur Boehmer; you shall have a sum on account if it is reasonable."

"A hundred thousand francs."

"They can be found. As to the rest?"

"Your Eminence would wish for time," said Boehmer. "With the guarantee of your Eminence everything is feasible. Only, delay involves a loss. For observe, Monsieur, in a matter of this importance the figures increase of themselves, and rapidly. The interest on fifteen hundred thousand francs, at five per cent, is seventy-five thousand francs, and five per cent is ruinous to tradesmen. Ten per cent is the least they ought to accept."

"That would be one hundred and fifty thousand francs by your calculation?"

"Why, yes, Monseigneur."

"Suppose you sell the necklace for sixteen hundred thousand francs, Monsieur Boehmer, and divide the payment of the fifteen hundred thousand francs which will remain to be paid into three installments, payment to be completed within a year. Is it agreed?"

"Monseigneur, we should lose fifty thousand francs by that bargain."

"I do not think so, Monsieur. If you should receive, to-morrow, fifteen hundred thousand francs, you would not know what to do with them; a jeweller does not buy an estate of that value."

"There are two of us, Monseigneur, — my partner and myself."

"That is true, but no matter; it will be more convenient for both to receive five hundred thousand francs every four months, — that is, two hundred and fifty thousand francs apiece."

"Monseigneur forgets that these diamonds do not belong to us; if they did, we should be rich enough to wait."

"To whom, then, do they belong?"

"Why, to perhaps ten different creditors. We procured some from Hamburg, some from Naples, one from Buenos Ayres, two from Moscow. Our creditors are waiting for the sale of the necklace to be paid. The profit we shall make is all that will be ours; but alas! Monseigneur, since we have had this unfortunate necklace on hand, which is about two years, we have already lost two hundred thousand francs in interest. You may judge what the profits will be."

Monsieur de Rohan interrupted Boehmer. "After all," he said, "I have not seen the necklace."

"True, Monseigneur, here it is," and Boehmer, with all the usual precautions, exhibited the precious jewels.

"Superb!" cried the cardinal, touching affectionately the clasp which must have pressed the queen's neck. When his fingers had sought, to his satisfaction, any sympathetic effluence which might still be clinging to the stones, "Is it a bargain?" he asked.

"Yes, Monsieur; and I must now go to the embassy to retract my promise."

"I did not know that there was an ambassador from Portugal in Paris, just now."

"Indeed, Monseigneur, Monsieur de Souza is here now; he came incognito."

"To negotiate this business," said the cardinal, laughing.

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"Oh, poor Souza! I know him well. Poor Souza!" said the cardinal, laughing still more heartily. Monsieur Boehmer thought he ought to join in the hilarity of his customer. They amused themselves for some time over this jewel-casket, at the expense of Portugal.

Monsieur de Rohan was about to leave. Boehmer stopped him. "Will Monseigneur tell me how this matter is to be arranged?" he asked.

"Why, simply enough."

"With Monseigneur's intendant?"

"No; with myself only, — you will deal only with me."

"And when?"

"To-morrow."

"And the hundred thousand francs."

"I will bring them here — to-morrow."

"Very well, Monseigneur."

"And the notes?"

"I will sign them here, to-morrow."

"Nothing could be better, Monseigneur."

"And as you are a man used to secrets, Monsieur Boehmer, remember that you now possess an important one."

"Monseigneur, I feel it, and will merit your confidence as well as that of the queen," he added slyly.

Monsieur de Rohan blushed, and went away somewhat disturbed but happy, like every man who ruins himself in the ardor of passion.

The next day Monsieur Boehmer went to the hôtel of the Portuguese ambassador. Just at the moment he knocked at the gate, Monsieur Beausire was going through some accounts with Monsieur Ducorneau, while Don Manoel was discussing with the valet, his partner, a new scheme of adventure.

Since Monsieur Boehmer's last visit to the Rue de la Jussienne, the hôtel had undergone some transformations. The whole of the household, having arrived as we have said in two post-chaises, had been established according to the different positions they were to fill in the house of the new ambassador. It must be confessed that the partners, in distributing among themselves the several offices, — which they filled admirably, — had thus an opportunity to watch the progress of their own affairs; and this always imparts a certain degree of courage even in the performance of the most disagreeable tasks.

Monsieur Ducorneau was charmed to find an ambassador so free from national prejudice as to have formed his whole establishment of Frenchmen. Thus it was that while going over accounts with Monsieur de Beausire, he entered into conversation with that gentleman, full of praise of the head of the embassy.

"The Souzas, you see," said Beausire, "are not like those old Portuguese of the fourteenth century, many of whom you can see now in our provinces. No, they are gentlemen, travellers, very rich, who might be kings if the fancy took them."

"But it does not take them," said Monsieur Ducorneau.

"But why should it, Monsieur? With a certain number of millions and the name of a prince, is not one equal to a king?"

"Why, these are philosophical doctrines, Monsieur," said Ducorneau, surprised; "I should not expect such opinions concerning equality from a diplomatist."

"We are an exception," replied Beausire, rather annoyed at the anachronism he had committed; "without being a follower of Voltaire, or an Armenian after the manner of Rousseau, a man may know the natural theories of the inequality of conditions and forces."

"Do you know," cried the chancellor, enthusiastically, "that it is fortunate that Portugal is a small state?"

"Eh! why?"

"Because with such men at its head, it would soon become powerful, Monsieur."

"Oh, you flatter us, dear Chancellor. No, we are philosophical politicians. What you say is specious, but not pertinent. But enough of this. There are one hundred and eight thousand francs in the box, you said?"

"Yes, Monsieur, one hundred and eight thousand francs."

"And no debts?"

"Not a sou."

"That is exemplary. Give me the memorandum if you please."

"Here it is. But when is the presentation to take place? I must tell you that it is the subject of a general curiosity, of endless comments, — I might almost say of anxiety."

"Ah! ah!"

"Yes, from time to time people are seen prowling about the hôtel as if the gates were of glass through which they could see."

"People! do you mean the people in the neighborhood?"

"And others; the mission of the ambassador being a secret one, you may be sure that the police will soon interest themselves in ascertaining its object."

"I have thought as you do," said Beausire, somewhat uneasy.

"See, Monsieur," said Ducorneau, taking Beausire to the grating of a window which looked on the street, "look, do you see that man in an old brown coat?"

"Yes, I see him."

"How he watches, eh?"

"That is true! What do you think that man is?"

"How should I know? One of Monsieur de Crosne's spies, perhaps."

"Probably."

"Between ourselves, Monsieur, Monsieur de Crosne is not the equal of Monsieur de Sartines. Did you know Monsieur de Sartines?"

"No, Monsieur, no."

"Oh! he would have found out all about you long ago. It is true you take precautions —"

A bell rang.

"The ambassador calls me," said Beausire, hurriedly, for the conversation was becoming embarrassing; and opening the door quickly he knocked down two of the partners, who, one with a pen behind his ear, the other with a broom in his hand, — the one a servant of the fourth rank, the other a footman, — had thought the conversation protracted enough to have a serious meaning, and were trying to share in it by the sense of hearing.

Beausire concluded that he was under suspicion, and resolved to exercise greater vigilance. He continued on his way toward the ambassador's room, after giving a friendly grasp of the hand to his two associates.

CHAPTER III.

BEAUSIRE ACTS FOR HIMSELF.

DON MANOEL Y SOUZA was less yellow than usual, — that is to say, his face was red. He had just had a troublesome explanation with the valet; in fact, the explanation was still pending. When Beausire entered, the two gamecocks were plucking each other's last feathers.

"Come, Monsieur de Beausire," said the valet, "you shall decide between us."

"On what subject?" asked Beausire, who assumed the manner of an arbitrator, after exchanging a glance with the ambassador, his natural ally.

"You know," said the valet, "that Monsieur Boehmer is coming to-day to conclude the sale of the necklace?"

"Yes; I am aware of it."

"And that the one hundred thousand francs are to be paid over to him?"

"Yes; I know that also."

"These one hundred thousand francs are the property of the association, are they not?"

"Who doubts it?"

"Ah! Monsieur de Beausire is of my opinion," said the valet, turning toward Manoel.

"Wait, wait!" said the Portuguese.

"I agree with you only on that one point," said Beausire, — "that the one hundred thousand francs belong to the association."

"That is all that I claim. It follows that the safe in which they are kept should not be placed in the only office of the embassy which adjoins the chamber of the ambassador."

"Why not?" asked Beausire.

"And the ambassador," continued the valet, "ought to give each of us a key to that safe."

"By no means," said the Portuguese.

"Your reasons?"

"Ah, yes, your reasons?" said Beausire.

"I am distrusted," said the Portuguese, stroking his beard. "It seems to me that if I am to be accused of an intention to rob the association, I may suspect the association of a wish to rob me. We are all alike."

"Agreed," said the valet; "and precisely for that reason we all have equal rights."

"Then, my dear fellow, if you wish equality to be observed here, you should have decided that all of us in turn should assume the rôle of ambassador. It would have made our position less trustworthy in the eyes of the public; but the associates would have felt more secure."

"In the first place, Monsieur," interrupted Beausire, "you are not acting the part of a loyal associate. Has not Señor Don Manoel an incontestable privilege, as the inventor of the scheme?"

"Ah, yes!" said the ambassador; "and Monsieur de Beausire shares it with me."

"Oh," replied the valet, "the thing once started, there is no more attention paid to privileges."

"Agreed; but attention to proper conduct should still be continued."

"I am not alone in making this demand," murmured the valet, somewhat ashamed. "All our comrades think the same."

"And they are wrong," replied the Portuguese.

"They are wrong," said Beausire.

The valet looked up. "I was wrong myself," he said spitefully, "to ask Monsieur de Beausire's opinion. Of course the secretary would side with the ambassador."

"Monsieur," said Beausire, with astonishing coolness, "you are a knave, whose ears I would cut off if you had any left; but they have been clipped too many times."

"What do you say?" said the valet, drawing himself up.

"We are here by ourselves," said Beausire, "in the ambassador's cabinet, and can settle this business among ourselves. Now, you have just insulted me by saying that I have an understanding with Don Manoel."

"And you have insulted me," said the Portuguese, coldly, coming to the assistance of Beausire.

"And I demand satisfaction, Monsieur."

"Oh, I am no fighter!" cried the valet.

"So I see," replied Beausire; "consequently, you shall be beaten, Monsieur."

"Help!" cried the latter, already seized by Oliva's lover, and almost choked by the Portuguese.

But just as the two chiefs were about to take justice into their own hands, the bell from below announced a visitor.

"Let him alone," said Don Manoel.

"And let him attend to his duty," added Beausire.

"The comrades shall know this," replied the valet, readjusting his dress.

"Oh, tell them what you please! We shall know how to answer for ourselves."

"Monsieur Boehmer!" cried the guard, from below.

"Well, that will settle everything, my dear fellow," said Beausire, giving his adversary a tap on the nape of the neck. "We shall have no more contests about the one hundred thousand francs, since they will disappear with Monsieur Boehmer. Now put on your best behavior as our valet-de-chambre."

The valet went out grumbling, and assumed his humble air, in order properly to introduce the crown-jeweller. After he had left the room, Beausire and the Portuguese exchanged a second glance as significant as the first.

Boehmer entered, followed by Bossange. The faces of both expressed humility and embarrassment, which the keen observers of the embassy saw with anxiety. While they were taking the seats offered by Beausire, the latter continued his scrutiny, watching at the same time the eye of Don Manoel, to keep up a correspondence between them. Manoel assumed his dignified and official demeanor; Boehmer took the initiative in this difficult situation, and explained that political reasons of great importance would prevent them from fulfilling their contract.

Manoel cried out angrily; Beausire gave a "hem!" Monsieur Boehmer became more and more embarrassed.

Don Manoel remarked to him that the bargain had been completed, and that the money on account was ready. Boehmer persisted.

The ambassador, still interpreted by Beausire, replied that his Government had been apprised of the conclusion of the bargain, and that to break it off was an insult to her Majesty.

Monsieur Boehmer said that he had weighed well the importance of these considerations; but to return to his former plan would be impossible.

Beausire refused to accept the retraction; he declared to Boehmer that his conduct was that of a dishonorable business man.

Bossange then took upon himself to defend the honor of trade, thus attacked in his own person and that of his partner; but he was not eloquent.

Beausire interrupted him with this single remark, "You have found a higher bidder."

The jewellers, who did not know much about politics, and who had a very high opinion of diplomacy in general, and Portuguese diplomatists in particular, colored, thinking their motives had been discovered.

Beausire saw that he had hit the nail on the head, and as he wished that this business should be carried through, — since there was a fortune in it, — he pretended to consult his ambassador in Portuguese. Then he said to the jewellers, "Gentlemen, you have had a more advantageous offer. Nothing could be more natural; it proves that the diamonds were offered us at a fair value. Well, her Portuguese Majesty would not wish to obtain a good bargain at the expense of worthy tradesmen. Will you take fifty thousand francs more?"

Boehmer shook his head.

"One hundred thousand, one hundred and fifty thousand francs," continued Beausire, determined to offer a million more rather than lose his share of the fifteen hundred thousand francs.

The jewellers, dazzled by this offer, were for a moment somewhat embarrassed; then, having consulted together, "No, Monsieur," they said to Beausire, "do not take the trouble to tempt us; a will more powerful than ours compels us to sell the necklace in this country. You understand, without doubt, that it is not we who refuse; therefore do not be angry with us. It is from some one greater than ourselves, greater than you, that the opposition comes."

Beausire and Manoel had nothing to say to this. On the contrary, they affected politeness and tried to appear indifferent. They were so intent upon this that they did not observe the valet, who was listening at the door to discover, if possible, what this business was from which they wished to exclude him. This worthy associate was, however, unfortunate enough to slip and fall against the door, making a loud noise.

Beausire ran to the antechamber. "What are you doing here, you rascal?" he cried.

"Monsieur, I bring the morning despatches."

"Good," said Beausire, "now go."

These despatches were letters from Portugal, generally unimportant, but which, passing through their hands before going to Ducorneau, often gave them useful information about the affairs of the embassy.

On hearing the word "despatches" the jewellers rose from their seats much relieved, like persons who receive permission to withdraw after an embarrassing audience. They were allowed to depart, and the valet was ordered to accompany them to the court-yard.

He had scarcely left the staircase when Don Manoel and Beausire, exchanging glances of the kind which promise immediate action, approached each other.

"Well!" said Don Manoel, "the affair has failed."

"Completely," said Beausire.

"Out of one hundred thousand francs, paltry spoils, we shall each have eight thousand four hundred francs."

"Not worth the trouble," replied Beausire.

"It is not. But there in that safe," and he pointed toward the safe so eagerly coveted by the valet, — "there in that safe are one hundred and eight thousand francs."

"Fifty-four thousand each."

"Well! enough said," replied Don Manoel. "Let us share it."

"So be it, but the valet will not leave us a moment if he knows the affair has failed."

"I will think of some way," said Don Manoel, in a peculiar tone.

"And I have found one already," said Beausire.

"What is it?"

"This is it. The valet will soon return?"

"Yes."

"He will demand his share and that of his associates."

"Yes."

"We shall have the whole house on our hands."

"Yes."

"Let us call the valet as if to a secret conference; then leave me to act."

"I begin to understand," said Don Manoel; "go and meet him."

"I was just going to ask you to do so."

Neither would leave his friend alone with the box. Confidence is a rare jewel. Don Manoel replied that his dignity as ambassador prevented him from taking such a step.

"You are not an ambassador to him," said Beausire; "but no matter."

"You are going yourself?"

"No, I will call him from the window," and he hailed the valet from the window just as he was entering into conversation with the guard. The valet, hearing himself called, came up. He found the two leaders in the room next the one containing the safe. Beausire said to him with a smiling face, "I will wager that I know what you were saying to the guard."

"I?"

"Yes; you were telling him that the affair with Boehmer had failed."

"Upon my word, no."

"You lie."

"I swear to you that I was not."

"That is fortunate; for if you had spoken, you would have done a very foolish thing and lost a fine sum of money."

"How so?" cried the valet, in surprise; "what sum of money?"

"You must understand that we three alone possess the secret."

"That is true."

"And that consequently we three possess the one hundred and eight thousand francs, since the others believe that Boehmer and Bossange have carried away the money."

"Morbleu!" cried the valet, transported with joy, "that is true."

"Thirty-three thousand three hundred and thirty-three francs, six sous apiece," said Manoel.

"More! more!" cried the valet; "there is a fraction of eight thousand francs."

"That is true," said Beausire. "Do you agree?"

"Do I agree!" said the valet, rubbing his hands, "I should think so. That is as it should be; that is talking."

"That is talking like a knave," said Beausire, in a voice of thunder. "I said that you were only a rogue. Come, Don Manoel, you who are so strong, seize this fellow for me, and let us show him up to our associates."

"Mercy, mercy!" cried the wretched man, "I was only jesting."

"Come, come!" continued Beausire, "into the dark room with him until we can devise some punishment for him."

"Mercy!" cried the valet, again.

"Take care," said Beausire, who had seized the perfidious valet, — "take care that Monsieur Ducorneau does not hear you!"

"If you do not let me go," said the valet, "I will denounce you all!"

"And I will strangle you!" said Don Manoel, in a voice full of anger, pushing the valet toward a closet near by. "Send away Monsieur Ducorneau," he whispered in Beausire's ear.

The latter did not wait for a repetition of the order; he went quickly into the next room while Don Manoel was shutting up the valet in the dark closet.

A minute passed, but Beausire had not returned.

An idea struck Don Manoel: he was alone and the safe was not ten paces away; to open it, to take from it the one hundred and eight thousand francs, to jump out of a window and run through the garden with his booty was but the work of two minutes to an experienced thief. Don Manoel calculated that Beausire would require five minutes at least to send away Ducorneau and return to the room. He ran toward the door of the room which contained the safe, and found it bolted. He was strong and skilful; he could have opened the door of a city with a watch-key.

"Beausire distrusted me," he thought, "because I alone have the key, and has bolted the door." He forced back the bolt with his sword. On reaching the safe he uttered a terrible cry. There stood the chest with gaping mouth and empty!

Beausire, who had a second key, had entered by another door, and had carried away the money. Don Manoel ran like a madman to the porter's lodge, where he found the guard singing. He found that Beausire had been gone just five minutes.

When the Portuguese by his cries and groans had informed the whole household of what had happened; when to obtain a witness, he had released the valet, — it was only to find them all incredulous and furious. They accused him of being an accomplice of Beausire, who would deliver to Don Manoel his share of the spoils.

There was no longer any mystery; all had unmasked, and worthy Monsieur Ducorneau could not understand with what sort of people he had been associated. He almost fainted when he saw these diplomatists preparing to hang Don Manoel, who could do nothing to help himself.

"Hang Monsieur de Souza!" cried the chancellor, "but that is high treason; take care!"

They determined to throw him into the cellar, fearing his cries would be heard.

At that moment three loud knocks at the door made the associates tremble, and immediately silence was restored among them. The knocks were repeated. Then a shrill voice called out in Portuguese: "Open! in the name of the ambassador from Portugal!"

"The ambassador!" murmured all the rascals, scattering in every direction through the hôtel, running through the gardens, climbing over the roofs and neighboring walls in headlong terror.

The real ambassador, who had in fact arrived, could not enter his own hôtel without the help of the police, who broke open the gate in the presence of an immense crowd, attracted by this curious spectacle.

Then a thorough search was made, and Monsieur Ducorneau was arrested and sent to the Châtelet.

Thus ended the adventure of the sham embassy from Portugal.

CHAPTER IV.

ILLUSIONS AND REALITIES.

BEAUSIRE, when he had cleared the gate, had run at the top of his speed through the Rue Coquilliere to the Rue Saint Honoré. Imagining that he was pursued, he had taken intricate turnings through the streets bordering on our corn-market called Halle aux Blés. After a few moments he felt quite sure that no one could have followed him; he was also quite sure that he was exhausted, and that a good race-horse could not have made better speed than he had made. He sat down on a bag of corn in the Rue de Viarmes, which runs along one side of the market, and pretended to be examining attentively the column of Médicis, which Bachaumont had bought to save it from the hammer of the Demolishers, and had presented to the city.

The fact is that Monsieur de Beausire was looking neither at the column of Monsieur Philibert Delorme nor at the sundial with which it had been adorned by Monsieur de Pingré. He was simply trying to recover his breath. When, after some moments, he had succeeded in doing so he gave himself up to pleasing meditations. "Now, at last," he thought, "my dream is fulfilled; I am owner of a fortune. I shall now be able to become an entirely respectable man; it seems to me that I am already growing fat. I shall make Oliva as respectable as I shall be myself. She is handsome, and she is simple in her tastes. She will not dislike a life of retirement in the country, on a fine farm, which we will call our estate, near a small city where we shall easily pass as of noble rank. Nicole is good; she has but two faults, — idleness and pride."

Only those! Poor Beausire! — two deadly sins!

"And with these infirmities, which I shall respect, — I, the Beausire of doubtful reputation, — I shall have gained an accomplished wife."

Beausire wiped his brow, assured himself that the stolen money was still safe in his pocket, and then, feeling more comfortable in body and in mind, he again reflected. They would not look for him in the Rue de Viarmes, but still they would look for him. The gentlemen of the embassy were not likely to lose, with cheerful resignation, their share of the spoils. They would probably divide themselves into several parties, and would begin by exploring the residence of the thief. There lay all the difficulty. In that house lived Oliva. They would inform her of what had happened, would maltreat her, perhaps, — nay, they might push their cruelty so far as to take her for a hostage. For why should they not speculate on his passion for her?

Beausire was near losing his wits as he contemplated these dangers. Love prevailed over all other considerations. He would not allow any one to touch the object of his love. He started off with the swiftness of an arrow toward the Rue Dauphine.

Beausire relied with great confidence on the rapidity of his movements; his enemies, however active they might be, could not be in advance of him. But for greater assurance he threw himself into a fiacre, to the driver of which he showed a six-franc piece, saying, "To the Pont Neuf;" and the horses flew over the ground.

The evening was closing in. When the carriage had reached the open space behind the statue of Henri IV. Beausire ventured to put his head out of the window and searched with eager eyes the Rue Dauphine. He had had some experience with the police, and had for ten years been accustomed to know the police agents by sight, that he might the more easily avoid them when occasion required. He noticed two men on the end of the bridge toward the Rue Dauphine who, standing some distance apart, were gazing into that street with every appearance of interest. These men were spies.

It was by no means unusual to see spies on the Pont Neuf; for there was a proverb to the effect that in order to see at the same time a prelate, a woman of the town, and a white horse it was necessary only to go to the Pont Neuf. And as white horses, clerical habiliments, and women of the town are always objects of interest to the police, the presence of these two spies did not appear to Beausire to have any special significance. He alighted from the carriage, made himself appear humpbacked, and limping to disguise himself still further, pushed through the crowd and entered the Rue Dauphine. He saw there no sign of what he had apprehended. He could see already the house at whose windows his star, the beautiful Oliva, had so often appeared to him. The windows were closed. Doubtless she was lying on the sofa, or was reading a wicked book, or was enjoying some delicate article of food. Suddenly he thought he saw a soldier lurking in the alley opposite the house; nay, he saw a soldier at one of the windows!

Thoroughly alarmed, Beausire nevertheless had the courage to pass by the house and observe it carefully. What a spectacle! The passage-way was filled with soldiers of the Paris guard, and among them was a commissary from the Châtelet, dressed in black. They were — as Beausire's rapid glance discovered — perplexed and disappointed. Evidently they had failed in their object, whatever it may have been.

Beausire said to himself that Monsieur de Crosne, having received information against him, had undertaken to have him arrested, and had found only Oliva. Inde iræ! hence the signs of disappointment he had noticed. Certainly, if Beausire had been in ordinary circumstances he would have thrown himself into the midst of those soldiers, crying like Nisus, "Here I am! here I am! it is I who have done all!" But the idea that they would get hold of the hundred thousand francs, and boast of their success for the remainder of their lives; the idea that his bold and adroit achievement should have been performed only for the advantage of the police, — this idea prevailed over all his scruples, and stifled even the anxiety of love. "Let me think," he said to himself, "I allow them to capture me; I allow them to take the money. I do no good to Oliva, and I ruin myself. I prove to her that I love her like a madman; but I give her the right to say, 'You are a fool; you should have loved me less, and saved me.' Decidedly the better way is to make good use of my legs and place this money where it will be safe; for money is the root of everything, — liberty, happiness, philosophy."

Thus meditating, Beausire pressed the bank-notes to his heart, and directed his course toward the Luxembourg; for during this last hour he was under the guidance of instinct, and since he had been a hundred times to the Luxembourg Gardens in search of Oliva, he instinctively at this moment went in that direction. For a man so proud of his logic, this was a poor reason.

In fact, the police, who knew the habits of thieves as well as Beausire knew the habits of the police, would naturally have gone to the Luxembourg in search of Beausire. But it was decided that Monsieur de Crosne should have nothing to do with Beausire at this time.

Nicole's lover had hardly turned the corner of the Rue Saint Germain des Prés, when he was nearly run over by an elegant carriage moving rapidly toward the Rue Dauphine. Beausire had just time enough to dodge the pole, — thanks to an agility which is peculiar to the true Parisian. He did not indeed escape the oath of the coachman, or his whip; but the proprietor of a hundred thousand francs will not stop for trifles that concern his dignity, especially when he thinks the police are after him.

Beausire, then, leaped aside, and in doing so he saw in that carriage Oliva and a very handsome man in animated conversation. He uttered a slight cry, which, however, only quickened the speed of the horses. He would have followed the carriage, but it was going toward the Rue Dauphine, the only street in Paris which Beausire was at that moment anxious to avoid. And besides, he began to doubt if he had really seen her; it was a phantom, an hallucination. How could Oliva be riding in that carriage? And besides, had not the police arrested her in the Rue Dauphine?

Poor Beausire, at the end of his resources, mentally and physically, resumed his course toward the Luxembourg, crossed the already deserted garden, and made his way to a small inn outside the barrier, the hostess of which had been friendly to him. There he installed himself. He hid his money under a tile in the chamber-floor, placed the foot of his bedstead on the tile, and went to bed swearing and perspiring. He, however, intermingled with his oaths thanks to Mercury for favors already assured. He was sure that the police would not find him. He was sure that no one would rob him of his money. He was sure that Nicole, even if she were arrested, was guilty of no crime, and that the time when innocent persons were perpetually imprisoned had gone by. He was sure, in short, that his one hundred and eight thousand francs would deliver Oliva, his inseparable companion, from whatever prison might be closed on her. There remained his companions in the embassy; with them his account would not be so easy to settle. He resolved to leave them all in France, as soon as Oliva should have regained her liberty, and set out for Switzerland, the land of liberty and good morals.

Nothing of all that Beausire meditated upon, as he drank his warm wine, took place according to his anticipations; it was so written. Men are almost always wrong in imagining they see what they do not see; they are even more in error when they imagine that they do not see what is really before their eyes.

We are about to explain this to the reader.

CHAPTER V.

OLIVA CHANGES HER RESIDENCE.

If Monsieur Beausire had made use of his eyes, which were excellent, instead of his imagination, which was always dull, he would have spared himself much regret and many mistakes. It was, in fact, Oliva who sat in the carriage, by the side of a man whom he would have recognized if he had looked at him more attentively. Oliva had gone that morning, as usual, to take a walk in the Luxembourg Gardens, and there she had met the strange friend whose acquaintance she had made the day of the Opera-ball.

She was just leaving a restaurant, bestowing a gracious smile on the proprietor, whose constant customer she was, when Cagliostro, emerging from one of the walks, ran up to her and caught her by the arm. She uttered a little cry.

"Where are you going?" he said.

"Why, home, of course, to the Rue Dauphine."

"Just what the people want who are there waiting for you," rejoined the unknown nobleman.

"People — who are waiting for me — how can that be? No one is waiting for me."

"Oh, yes; a dozen visitors at least."

"A dozen visitors!" cried Oliva, laughing; "you might as well say a whole regiment."

"Upon my word, if it had been possible to send a regiment to the Rue Dauphine, it would have been done."

"You astonish me."

"I should astonish you more, if I should allow you to go to the Rue Dauphine."

"Why?"

"Because you would be arrested, my dear."

"Arrested, I?"

"Assuredly; these twelve visitors who are waiting for you are archers sent by Monsieur de Crosne."

Oliva shuddered; certain persons are always afraid of certain things. Nevertheless, after a careful inspection of her conscience, "I have done nothing," she said; "why should I be arrested?"

"Why should any woman be arrested? For some intrigue, some foolishness."

"I have no intrigues."

"But you may have had them."

"Oh, perhaps!"

"They may be wrong in wishing to arrest you, but the fact remains that they do wish to arrest you. Will you go to the Rue Dauphine, notwithstanding?"

Oliva stopped, pale and agitated. "You play with me as a cat plays with a mouse," she said. "Come, if you know anything, tell it to me. Perhaps it is Beausire they want?" and she cast upon Cagliostro a supplicating look.

"Perhaps. I suspect his conscience is less clear than yours."

"Poor fellow!"

"Pity him, if you like; but if he is arrested, there is no need of your following his example."

"What interest have you in protecting me? Why should you concern yourself about me? Come, now," she said boldly, "it is not natural for a man like you —"

"Do not go on, you would say something foolish; and time is precious, because the agents of Monsieur de Crosne, not finding you at home, are quite capable of coming here to look for you."

"Here! do they know that I am here?"

"Not a very difficult thing to know; I knew it! Let me finish what I was saying. As I do take an interest in your person and wish you well, the rest need not concern you. Come, let us go to the Rue d'Enfer. My carriage is waiting for you there. Ah! you doubt still?"

"Yes."

"Well! we will do a very imprudent thing, but which will convince you once for all, I hope. We will drive by your house in my carriage, and when you shall have seen these gentlemen of the police at a safe distance, yet near enough to judge of their intentions, then you will better appreciate my services." While saying this he had led Oliva to the Rue d'Enfer, where they entered the carriage. They were on their way to the Rue Dauphine, where Beausire had seen them. Certainly, if he had called out at that moment, if he had followed the carriage, Oliva would have done all in her power to reach him, in order to share his fate, whatever it might be. But Cagliostro saw the unfortunate man, and diverted Oliva's attention by pointing to the crowd which curiosity had already attracted to her door.

When Oliva perceived that her house was filled by the soldiers of the police, she threw herself into the arms of her protector in such despair that the heart of any other man but this man of iron would have been moved. He only pressed the hand of the young girl, and in order to conceal her lowered the blinds of the carriage.

"Save me! save me!" cried the poor girl, every little while.

"I promise to do so," he said.

"But if these police officers know everything, they will find me, after all."

"No, no; no one can discover you in the place to which you are going; for although they may come to your house to arrest you, they will not think of looking for you at my house."

"Oh," she said in terror, "at your house! we are going to your house?"

"You are mad," he replied; "I should think that you had forgotten our agreement. I am not your lover, my good girl, and do not wish to become so."

"Then it is a prison you are offering me?"

"If you prefer the hospital of Saint Lazare, you are free to go there."

"Well," she replied, almost overcome with fear, "I trust myself to you; do with me as you please."

He took her to the Rue Neuve Saint Gilles, to that house in which he had received Philippe de Taverney. When he had established her in a small room in the second story, where she would be free from the observations of the servants, he said to her: "I assure you that you are yet to be happier than you will be in this place."

"Happy! How can I be happy?" said she, with a heavy heart. "Happy, without liberty, — without a garden in which to take my walks. It is so gloomy here. I shall die here."

"You are right," he said; "I do not wish you to want for anything. You would be uncomfortable here; and besides my servants would see you here at last, and might annoy you."

"Or betray me, perhaps," she added.

"As to that, fear nothing; but that you may have perfect peace of mind, I will try to find you another abode."

Oliva seemed to be somewhat appeased by these promises. Besides, she was pleased with her new apartment, which contained every comfort, and entertaining books with which she could occupy herself.

Her protector left her, saying, "I do not mean to starve you, dear child. If you wish to see me, ring, and I will come immediately if I am at home, or if I am out, as soon as I return." He kissed her hand and left her.

"Ah," cried she, "above all, bring me some news of Beausire!"

"I will give it my first attention," he replied, as he closed the door of her room. Then, as he was descending the stairs, "It will be," he thought, "a profanation to put her in that house in the Rue Saint Claude. But it is important that no one should see her, and in that house no one will see her. At all events, it is better to run the risk of her discovery in that house in the Rue Saint Claude than in any other. Yes, I must make this sacrifice. I will extinguish the last spark of the fire of other days."

The count put on a heavy coat, took some keys from his secretary, from which he selected several which he gazed upon tenderly, and left his hôtel alone and on foot, taking his way along the Rue Saint Louis du Marais.

CHAPTER VI.

THE DESERTED HOUSE.

MONSIEUR DE CAGLIOSTRO went alone to the old house in the Rue Saint Claude which our readers cannot have quite forgotten. The night was coming on when he stopped opposite the gate, and but few persons could be seen on the boulevard. A dog was barking — or rather, howling — in the small enclosure of the convent, and a breath of warm wind bore to the Rue Saint Claude the melancholy tones of the clock of Saint Paul's striking the hour and three quarters. It was quarter of nine o'clock.

The count stopped, as we have said, opposite the carriage-gate, drew a great key from under his overcoat, and applied it to the lock. He had but to turn the key, and then push open the gate. But time had done its work; the wood was swollen at all the joints, and rust had eaten into the hinges. Grass had sprung up through the openings in the pavement, covering the lower part of the gate with its moist emanations. A sort of mastic, like that with which swallows build their nests, filled every space and covered the woodwork. Cagliostro pushed the gate with his hands, then with his shoulder, and finally overcame the resistance, and with a complaining creak the gate yielded before him.

When the gate was open the court-yard was seen, as desolate and moss-grown as an abandoned cemetery. Cagliostro closed the gate behind him. No one had seen him enter, and surrounded as he was by high walls, no one could see him. He could therefore pause a moment to recall his past life, face to face with his former abode. His life was desolate and void; his house was a deserted ruin. Of the twelve steps at the entrance, three only were still whole. Cagliostro ascended the steps, trembling under his feet, and by the aid of a second key entered the large antechamber. There he lighted the lantern he had brought with him. In the dining-room the side-tables had almost lost, through decay, their original forms; the tiles of the floor were slippery with slime. All the doors were open, allowing the imagination freely to penetrate those gloomy depths already visited by death. The count shuddered; for at the end of the salon, where formerly the stairway was approached, he heard a mysterious noise. In other times that noise would have announced a beloved presence, and would have summoned the master of that house, through all his senses, to life, hope, and happiness. That noise, now representing nothing, recalled all the vanished past.

With a frowning brow, and holding his breath, Cagliostro moved forward toward the statue of Harpocrates, near which was the spring by which formerly he opened the door of communication between the concealed and the unconcealed portions of the house. The spring was worked without difficulty, though the worm-eaten woodwork trembled around it. But hardly had the count placed his foot on the secret staircase, when again the strange noise was heard. He reached forward his lantern to discover its cause; he saw nothing but a large snake slowly descending the stairs, and lashing with its tail the sounding steps. The reptile looked calmly at Cagliostro, and glided through a hole in the woodwork and disappeared. It was, no doubt, the Genius of Solitude.

The count continued the ascent, attended on his way by a recollection, or to speak more precisely, by a presence. When the light outlined his moving shadow on the walls, it seemed to him that another was there, revived from the dead to join him in this visit to the mysterious abode. Thus going forward, dreaming as he went, he reached the movable tile which served as an entrance from Balsamo's armory to the perfumed retreat of Lorenza Feliciani. The walls were bare, the rooms empty. On the hearth was a large mass of ashes, in which sparkled a few particles of gold and silver. Those fine ashes, white and perfumed, were the ashes of Lorenza's furniture, which Balsamo had burned even to the last item. Cagliostro stooped and took up a pinch of the ashes, which he slowly and passionately absorbed with his breath. "If only," he murmured, "I could thus absorb a portion of that soul which in other days communicated with this dust!"

Cagliostro abandoned himself to these dreams. The man descended from the heights of philosophy to indulge for a little while in sentiments of the heart, beyond the domain of reason. After evoking the pleasing phantoms of solitude, and resigning them again to Heaven, and when he thought that he had done with human weakness, his eyes rested on an object still shining amid that ruin. He stooped and saw, in a groove in the floor and half-buried under the dust, a small silver arrow, which seemed as if recently dropped from a woman's hair.

The philosopher, the man of science, the prophet, the scorner of humanity, he who would even call Heaven to account with him, this man who had repressed so many sorrows within himself, and had drawn so many drops of blood from the hearts of others, — Cagliostro, the atheist, the charlatan, the mocking sceptic, picked up the silver arrow, pressed it to his lips, and being certain that no one could see him, he suffered a tear to rise to his eyelids as he murmured, "Lorenza!"

And this was all. There was a demon in that man. He had sought the struggle, and for his own happiness had fought it out. After ardently kissing that sacred relic he opened the window, passed his hand between the bars, and threw the bit of metal into the enclosure of the convent. Thus he punished himself for having yielded to emotions of the heart.

"Adieu!" he said to the insensible object which perhaps was lost to him forever. "Adieu, thou souvenir, sent to me doubtless to soften me, to unman me. Henceforth I will think only of the earth. Yes, this house is about to be profaned. What do I say? — it is profaned already. I have reopened the doors; I have brought light within its walls; I have looked into the interior of the tomb; I have trampled on the ashes of the dead. The house is already profaned, then. Let it be so altogether, and for some good purpose.

"A woman yet again will cross this court-yard; a woman will press her feet upon the stairs; a woman will perhaps sing under this roof where lingers yet the last sigh of Lorenza. So be it. All these profanations will have one sole aim, — the advancement of my cause."

He put down his lantern on one of the steps of the staircase. "All this staircase must come down," he said. "All the inside structure must be taken down. Mystery will take its flight. The house will continue to be a hiding-place, though no longer a sanctuary."

The count wrote hastily upon his tablets the following lines: —

To Monsieur Lenoir, my architect:

Clear up court-yard and vestibules. Repair coach-house and stables. Pull down the interior pavilion. Reduce the hôtel to two stories. Eight days.

"Now," said he, "let us see if the windows of the little countess are visible from here."

He approached a window on the second story. He could see from there the houses on the farther side of the Rue Saint Claude. Opposite, and at a distance of not more than sixty feet was the lodging occupied by Jeanne de La Motte.

"It is infallible," said Cagliostro; "the two women cannot fail to see each other." He took up his lantern and descended the stairs. An hour later he had returned home, and had sent his plan to the architect.

It remains to be said that on the next day fifty workmen invaded the hôtel; that the sound of the hammer, the saw, and the pickaxe were heard in every quarter; that the grass, piled up in a corner, was beginning to smoke; and that in the evening the pedestrian returning home, faithful to his habit of daily observation, saw in the court-yard a large rat hanging by one leg from a hoop, surrounded by a number of workmen who were making fun of its grizzly mustache and venerable rotundity. That silent tenant of the hôtel had been buried in his hole by the fall of a large stone. Half-dead when the stone was raised by a crane, it had been seized by the tail, and sacrificed to the amusement of the young Auvergnese mixers of plaster. Either through mortification or through asphyxia the rat had died under that treatment. The pedestrian pronounced over it this funeral oration: "Here is one who was happy for ten years. Sic transit gloria mundi."

In eight days the house had been restored, as Cagliostro had directed.

CHAPTER VII.

JEANNE MANAGES THE CARDINAL.

THE Cardinal de Rohan, two days after his visit to Boehmer, received the following note: —

"His Eminence Monsieur le Cardinal de Rohan knows, doubtless, where he is to take supper to-night."

"From the little countess," he said, noting the perfume of the paper; "I will go."

Among the lackeys in Jeanne's service she had noticed one with black hair, brown eyes, and a complexion of the dark hue which indicates the bilious temperament. She inferred from these signs that he was active, intelligent, and self-reliant. She sent for him, and in a short time obtained from him the information she sought. The lackey reported to her that his Eminence had gone twice within two days to the house of Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange.

This was enough for Jeanne. Such a man as Monsieur de Rohan does not drive bargains. Shrewd tradesmen like Boehmer do not let a purchaser go away without buying. The necklace must be sold, — sold by Boehmer, bought by Monsieur de Rohan! And the latter had not said a word about it to his confidante, to his mistress! The indication was a serious one. Jeanne knitted her brows, bit her thin lips, and sent to the cardinal the note we have read.

Monsieur de Rohan came in the evening. He sent before him a basket of Tokay and other delicacies, just as he would have done if he had been going to take supper with La Guimard or Mademoiselle Dangeville.

Jeanne understood the significance of this attention, as of so many others. She allowed nothing the cardinal had sent to be served at the table; and when they were alone she opened the conversation in the following manner: "Indeed, Monseigneur," she said, "there is one thing which pains me very much."

"Oh, what is that, Countess?" said Monsieur de Rohan, with that affectation of anxiety which is not an expression of real alarm.

"Well, Monseigneur! the cause of my grief is the discovery not that you no longer love me, but that you never have loved me."

"Oh, Countess, what is that you say?"

"Do not excuse yourself, Monseigneur; that would be time lost."

"For me," said the cardinal, gallantly.

"No, for me," replied Madame de La Motte, quickly. "Besides —"

"Oh, Countess!" said the cardinal.

"Do not be uneasy, Monseigneur; I am quite indifferent about it."

"Whether I love you or not?"

"Yes."

"And why are you so indifferent?"

"Because I do not love you."

"Countess, do you know that what you have done me the honor to say to me is not at all kind?"

"Indeed, it is true that we are not beginning with pleasant sayings; but it is a fact which may as well be acknowledged between us."

"What fact?"

"That I have never loved you more, Monseigneur, than you have loved me."

"Oh, as for me, you must not say that!" cried the prince, in a tone which was almost truthful. "I have had for you much affection, Countess. Do not put me in the same position with yourself."

"Come, Monseigneur, let us esteem each sufficiently to speak the truth."

"And what is the truth?"

"There is between us a tie very different from that of love."

"What is it?"

"Interest."

"Interest? Fie, Countess!"

"Monseigneur, I will say to you as the Norman peasant said of the gibbet to his son: 'If you dislike it yourself, do not give others a distaste for it.' Fie on interest, Monsieur? how you do go on!"

"Well, then, Countess, let us suppose that we are guided by interest; in what way can I serve your interests and you mine?"

"In the first place, Monseigneur, and before everything else, I have a notion to pick a quarrel with you."

"Do so, Countess."

"You have shown a want of confidence in me, a want of esteem."

"I! — and in what, if you please?"

"In what? Do you deny that after having skilfully dragged from me details which I was dying to give you — "

"Of what, Countess?"

"Of the desire of a certain great lady for a certain thing, you immediately took measures to gratify that desire without informing me."

"'Drag details'? 'the desire of a certain great lady for a certain thing'? 'gratify that desire'! Countess, truly you are an enigma, a sphinx. Ah! I had seen the head and neck of a woman, but I had not yet seen the lion's claws. It appears that you are about to show them to me. Well, be it so."

"No; I will show you nothing at all, Monseigneur, since you have no longer the desire to see anything. I will give you simply and plainly the answer to the enigma: the 'details' are all that happened at Versailles; the 'desire of a certain lady,' that is the queen; and the 'gratification of this desire' of the queen is the purchase which you made yesterday from Messieurs Boehmer and Bossange of their famous necklace."

"Countess!" murmured the cardinal, pale and trembling.

"Come," she said, "why do you look at me with such an air of fear? Did you not yesterday make a bargain with the jewellers on the Quai de l'École?"

A Rohan does not lie, even to a woman. The cardinal was silent. And as he was about to blush, — a thing for which a man never forgives the woman who causes it, — Jeanne hastened to take his hand.

"Pardon, my Prince," she said; "I was anxious to show you how far you had been mistaken with regard to me. You have thought me foolish and wicked?"

"Oh! oh, Countess!"

"In short —"

"Not a word more; let me speak in my turn. I can persuade you perhaps, for now I see clearly with whom I have to deal. I expected to find in you a pretty woman, a woman of intelligence, a charming mistress; but you are better than all that. Listen."

Jeanne drew nearer to the cardinal, leaving her hand in his.

"You, indeed, were willing to be my mistress, my friend, without loving me. You told me so yourself," continued Monsieur de Rohan.

"And I repeat it," said Madame de La Motte.

"You had an object, then?"

"Assuredly."

"The object, Countess?"

"Do you need to have me explain it to you?"

"No, I can guess it. You wish to make my fortune. Is it not certain that my fortune once made, my first care would be to secure yours? Am I mistaken?"

"You are not mistaken, Monseigneur; only, believe me, I have not pursued this object in the midst of antipathies and repugnance, — the road has been agreeable."

"You are an amiable woman, Countess, and it is a pleasure even to talk business with you. I was saying, then, that you had guessed aright. You know that I have in a certain direction a respectful attachment?"

"I saw it at the Opera-ball, Prince."

"That attachment will probably never be reciprocated. Oh, may God keep me from the certainty!"

"Eh!" said the countess, "a woman is not always queen, and you surely are the equal of Monsieur le Cardinal Mazarin."

"He was a very handsome man also," said Monsieur de Rohan, laughing.

"And an excellent prime minister," rejoined Jeanne, with the greatest coolness.

"Countess, in your presence it is needless to think; speaking is much more superfluous. You think and speak for your friends. Yes, I mean to be prime minister. Everything prompts me to it; birth, experience in affairs, a certain consideration which foreign courts manifest toward me, the great sympathy felt for me by the French people —"

"Everything, in short, with one exception."

"Except a repugnance, you mean?"

"Yes, on the part of the queen; and this repugnance is a real obstacle. What the queen likes, the king will also like in the end; what she hates, he detests in advance."

"And she hates me?"

"Oh!"

"Let us be frank. I think we must not stop half-way on this pleasant road."

"Well, Monseigneur, the queen does not like you."

"Then, I am lost! No necklace will help me."

"There is where you may be mistaken, Prince."

"The necklace is bought."

"At least, the queen will see that if she does not love you, you love her."

"Oh, Countess!"

"You know, Monseigneur, that we have agreed to call things by their right names."

"So be it. You say, then, that you do not despair of seeing me, some day, prime minister?"

"I am sure of it."

"I should be vexed with myself if I failed to ask what are your ambitions."

"I will tell you, Prince, when you shall be in a position to gratify them."

"That is to the point. I will wait until that day."

"Thank you; now let us take supper."

The cardinal took Jeanne's hand and pressed it as Jeanne had so much desired to have it pressed some days before. But that time had gone by. She drew away her hand.

"Well, Countess?"

"Let us take supper, I say, Monseigneur."

"But I am no longer hungry."

"Then let us talk."

"But I have nothing more to say."

"Then let us separate."

"Is that what you call our alliance? You dismiss me?"

"In order to belong more truly to one another, Monseigneur," she said, "it is necessary above all that we should belong to ourselves."

"You are right, Countess; pardon me for being again mistaken with regard to you. Oh, I swear that it is for the last time." He took her hand and kissed it so respectfully that he did not see the mocking, diabolical smile of the countess, at the words, "This will be the last time that I shall be mistaken with regard to you."

Jeanne rose, conducted the prince as far as the antechamber. There he stopped and whispered, "What comes next, Countess?"

"It is very plain."

"What shall I do?"

"Nothing. Wait for me.

"And you will go —"

"To Versailles."

"When?"

"To-morrow."

"When shall I hear from you?"

"Immediately."

"Well then, my patroness, I leave everything to you."

"Leave all to me," and she retired to her own apartment, went to bed, and looking vaguely at the beautiful marble Endymion waiting for Diana, "Decidedly, liberty is best, after all," she murmured.

CHAPTER VIII.

JEANNE MANAGES THE QUEEN.

MISTRESS of such a secret, rich in such a future, supported by so powerful friends, Jeanne felt strong enough to move the world.

To appear at court, no longer as a suppliant, no longer as the poor mendicant protected by Madame de Boulainvilliers, but as a descendant of the Valois, with an income of one hundred thousand francs, with a husband who would be a duke; to be called the favorite of the queen, and in this age of intrigue and agitation to govern the State by governing the king through Marie Antoinette, — this was the panorama which unrolled itself before the inexhaustible imagination of the Comtesse de La Motte.

Early in the day she hastened to Versailles. She had no audience appointed; but her faith in her good fortune had become so strong that she did not doubt that etiquette would yield to her desires. And she was right. All the officials of the court, so eager to discover the tastes of the sovereign, had already noticed how much pleasure Marie Antoinette seemed to take in the society of the pretty countess.

Therefore on her arrival, an intelligent usher placed himself in the way of the queen as she was returning from chapel, and said, as if by chance, to one of the gentlemen in waiting, "Monsieur, what can be done for Madame la Comtesse de La Motte-Valois, who has no letter of audience?"

The queen was talking with Madame de Lamballe. On hearing Jeanne's name adroitly spoken by this man, she stopped and turned round.

"Did not some one say that Madame de La Motte-Valois is here?"

"I believe so, your Majesty," replied the man.

"Who says so?"

"This usher, Madame." The usher bowed modestly.

"I will receive Madame de La Motte-Valois," said the queen, as she passed on. Then, as she reached her apartments, "You may conduct her to the bath-chamber," she said.

Jeanne, to whom the man related plainly what he had done, immediately took out her purse, but the usher stopped her by a smile.

"Madame la Comtesse, please let this debt accumulate; you will be able to pay me with better interest."

Jeanne returned the money to her pocket. "You are right, my friend; I thank you. Why," she said to herself, "should I not patronize an usher who has patronized me? I do as much for a cardinal."

Jeanne soon found herself in the presence of her sovereign. Marie Antoinette was grave and rather reserved, — perhaps for the very reason that she had granted the countess this unexpected reception.

"The queen imagines," thought the friend of Monsieur de Rohan, "that I have come again to beg. Before I have spoken twenty words she will have unbent, or will have driven me from her presence."

"Madame," said the queen, "I have not yet had an opportunity to speak to the king."

"Ah, Madame, your Majesty has already been but too good to me, and I expect nothing more. I have come —"

"Why do you come?" said the queen, quick to see any change of manner. "You had not asked for an audience. There is something urgent, perhaps, — for yourself?"

"Something urgent, — yes, Madame; but not for myself."

"For me, then? Come, speak on, Countess!" and the queen led Jeanne into the bath-room, where her women were waiting.

The countess, seeing so many persons about the queen, did not begin the conversation. The queen sent away her women.

"Madame," said Jeanne, "your Majesty sees that I am very much embarrassed."

"Why so? I told you to speak."

"Your Majesty knows — I believe I have told you — the very great kindness which Monsieur le Cardinal de Rohan has shown me?"

The queen frowned. "I do not remember," she said.

"I thought — "

"No matter; go on."

"Well, Madame, his Eminence has done me the honor to pay me a visit."

"Ah!"

"It was with regard to a very good work I have in charge."

"Very well, Countess, very well. I will contribute also — to your good work."

"Your Majesty misunderstands. I have had the honor of saying that I asked nothing. Monsieur le Cardinal, as usual, spoke to me of the kindness of the queen, of her unlimited generosity."

"And asked that I should patronize his protégés?"

"At first he did, your Majesty."

"I will do it, not for Monsieur le Cardinal, but for the unfortunate, whom I always help. Only, tell his Eminence that I am very much straitened."

"Alas, Madame, that is just what I told him! and hence the embarrassment I mentioned just now to your Majesty."

"Ah! ah!"

"I expressed to Monsieur le Cardinal my sense of the generosity which constantly empties your purse, always too narrow for your desires."

"Well?"

"See, Monseigneur," I said, "her Majesty renders herself the slave of her own kindness. She sacrifices herself for the poor. The good which she does brings evil to herself; and therefore I accused myself."

"How so, Countess?" said the queen, who was listening attentively, either because Jeanne had attacked her at her weak point, or because the superior intelligence of Marie Antoinette perceived that this long preamble must be the introduction of something very interesting to herself.

"I told him that your Majesty had given me a large sum of money a few days before; that a thousand times, at least, during two years such instances of your generosity had occurred. I told him that if the queen had been less sensible, less generous, she would have two millions in her coffers, and there would have been no need of denying herself that beautiful diamond necklace, — so nobly, so courageously, but allow me to say, Madame, so wrongly refused."

The queen blushed and looked steadily at Jeanne. Evidently the conclusion had been reached in the last sentence. Was there any snare, or was it all flattery? Certainly, this point unsettled, there could not fail to be some danger for a queen. But Jeanne's face expressed so much sweetness, such candid benevolence and truth, that no one could have accused her of perfidy or adulation. And as the queen herself possessed a soul full of true generosity, and as in generosity there is always strength, and in strength always truth, Marie Antoinette said, with a sigh, "Yes, the necklace is beautiful,—it was beautiful, I mean,—and I am very glad that a woman of taste praises me for having refused it."

"If you knew, Madame," cried Jeanne, "how we come at last to understand the feelings of those who love persons in whom we are interested!"

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, Madame, that on hearing of your heroic sacrifice of the necklace, I saw Monsieur de Rohan turn pale."

"Turn pale!"

"In an instant his eyes were filled with tears. I do not know, Madame, whether it is true that Monsieur de Rohan is a handsome man and an accomplished nobleman, as many pretend him to be; all that I know is that his features, at that moment illumined by the fire of his soul, and furrowed by tears excited by your generous disinterestedness —what am I saying? by your sublime self-denial — will live forever in my memory."

The queen stopped a moment to start a flow of water from the mouth of a gilded swan suspended over the marble bath. "Well, Countess," she said, "since Monsieur de Rohan has appeared to you as handsome and accomplished as you have just said, I advise you not to let him see it. He is a worldly prelate,—a shepherd who gathers the sheep as much for himself as for the Lord."

"Oh, Madame!"

"Well, do I calumniate him? Is it not his reputation? Does he not glory in it? Have you not seen him, on ceremonial days, moving his beautiful hands in the air, — they are beautiful, it is true, — in order to make them whiter, while on those hands, sparkling with the pastoral ring, the devotees fasten their eyes, more brilliant than the diamond of the cardinal?"

Jeanne bowed.

"The cardinal's trophies," pursued the queen, passionately, "are numerous. Some of them have made scandal. The cardinal is a lover like those of the Fronde. Let those praise him who will; I decline to do so."

"Well, Madame," said Jeanne, completely set at ease by this familiarity, "I do not know whether Monsieur le Cardinal was thinking of those devotees when he spoke so fervently of your Majesty's virtues; but I do know this, that his beautiful hands were pressed to his heart."

The queen shook her head, with a forced laugh.

"Indeed!" thought Jeanne, "are things going even better than we could have thought possible? Is spite about to become our auxiliary? Oh, in that case we shall have too many facilities."

The queen quickly resumed her dignified and indifferent demeanor. "Go on," she said.

"Your Majesty freezes me; this modesty, which repels even the homage —"

"Of the cardinal! Oh, yes!"

"But why, Madame?"

"Because I do not believe in his homage, Countess."

"It ill becomes me," replied Jeanne, with the most profound respect, "to defend any one who has incurred your Majesty's displeasure; it is not to be doubted for a moment that he is guilty, since he has displeased the queen."

"Monsieur de Rohan has not displeased me; he has offended me. But I am a queen and a Christian; doubly disposed, therefore, to forget offences," and the queen said this with the majestic kindliness which was peculiar to her.

Jeanne was silent.

"Have you nothing more to say?"

"Your Majesty would suspect me. I should incur your anger, your blame, by expressing an opinion which differed from yours."

"You do not agree with me in my opinion of the cardinal?"

"Not at all, Madame."

"You would not speak so if you knew what Prince Louis had done against me."

"I only know what I have seen him do in your Majesty's service."

"He has made polite speeches?"

Jeanne bowed.

"Courtesies, good wishes, compliments?" continued the queen.

Jeanne was silent.

"You have a lively friendship for Monsieur de Rohan, Countess; I will not attack him in your presence," and the queen began to laugh.

"Madame," replied Jeanne, "I prefer your anger to your raillery. The sentiment Monsieur de Rohan entertains for your Majesty is so respectful that I am sure it would kill him to see the queen laughing at him."

"Oh, oh, he has changed very much, then!"

"But your Majesty did me the honor to tell me, only the other day, that for the past ten years Monsieur de Rohan has been passionately —"

"I was jesting, Countess," said the queen, severely.

Jeanne, reduced to silence, appeared to the queen to have given up the contest; but Marie Antoinette was mistaken. With those women who combine the nature of the tiger and serpent, the moment when they coil themselves is always the moment when they plan a fresh attack; a concentrated repose precedes the spring.

"You speak of those diamonds," said the queen, imprudently. "Confess that you have thought of them."

"Day and night, Madame," said Jeanne, with the joy of a general who on the field of battle sees a decisive false move on the part of his enemy. "They are so beautiful! they will become your Majesty so well!"

"They will become me?"

"Yes, Madame, yes; they will become your Majesty."

"But they are sold."

"Yes, they are sold."

"To the ambassador of Portugal?"

Jeanne shook her head gently.

"No?" said the queen, joyfully.

"No, Madame."

"To whom, then?"

"Monsieur de Rohan has bought them."

The queen sprang up, and then suddenly resuming her cool manner, "Ah!" she said.

"See, Madame," said Jeanne, with an eloquence full of fervor and passion; "Monsieur de Rohan's conduct in this instance has been superb. It was a generous impulse, a noble action; a soul like your Majesty's cannot help sympathizing with all that is good and full of feeling. When Monsieur de Rohan learned — and I acknowledge having informed him of it — of your Majesty's temporary embarrassment, 'What!' he cried, 'the queen of France denies herself what the wife of a farmer-general would not think of denying herself? What! the queen liable to see some day Madame Necker adorned with these diamonds?' Monsieur de Rohan did not know, until I informed him of it, that the ambassador of Portugal intended to buy them; then his indignation redoubled. 'It is no longer,' he said, 'a question of gratifying the queen; it is a question of royal dignity. I know the spirit which pervades foreign courts, —vanity, ostentation. They will laugh at the queen of France who has no money to gratify a legitimate desire; and shall I allow the queen of France to be laughed at? No, never!' And he left me abruptly. One hour later I knew that he had bought the diamonds."

"Fifteen hundred thousand francs?"

"Sixteen hundred thousand francs."

"And what was his intention in purchasing them?"

"That, since your Majesty could not have them, they should not at least belong to any other woman."

"And are you sure that Monsieur de Rohan did not buy this necklace as a present for some mistress?"

"I am sure that it is for the purpose of destroying it, rather than that it should adorn any neck but that of the queen."

Marie Antoinette reflected, and her noble countenance expressed clearly everything that was passing in her soul. "Monsieur de Rohan has done well," she said; "it was a noble action and a delicate expression of devotion."

Jeanne eagerly drank in these words. "Therefore, you will thank Monsieur de Rohan?" continued the queen.

"Oh, yes, Madame!"

"You will add that he has proved to me his friendship, and that I, as an honest man — as Catherine said — accept everything from friendship, on condition that I may return it. Therefore I accept, not the gift of Monsieur de Rohan —"

"What then?"

"But a loan from him. Monsieur de Rohan has been pleased to advance his money, or his credit, for my gratification ; I will reimburse him. Boehmer wanted ready money, I believe ?"

"Yes, Madame."

"How much, — two hundred thousand francs ?"

"Two hundred and fifty thousand francs."

"That is just the amount of the quarterly allowance given me by the king. It has been sent to me this morning, — in advance, to be sure ; but in short, I have it." Then, returning with Jeanne to her chamber, she said to the countess, "Open this drawer, if you please."

"The first one ?"

"No, the second one. Do you see a pocket-book ?"

"Here it is, Madame."

"It contains two hundred and fifty thousand francs. Count them."

Jeanne obeyed.

"Take them to the cardinal and thank him. Tell him that every month I will arrange to pay him thus. The interest can be arranged later. In this way I shall have the necklace which pleased me so much ; and if it embarrasses me to pay it, I shall not at least inconvenience the king." She reflected a moment. "And I shall have gained the knowledge that I have a friend who has served me in a delicate manner — " She paused again. "And a friend who has divined my wishes," she said, offering Jeanne her hand, which the countess eagerly seized. Then, as she was about to leave the room, after another pause, "Countess," she said, in a low tone as if alarmed at what she was about to say, "you may tell Monsieur de Rohan that he will be welcome to Versailles, and that I wish to thank him."

Jeanne rushed out of the room, mad with joy and satisfied pride. She clutched the bank-notes as a vulture clutches its stolen prey.

CHAPTER IX.

THE QUEEN'S POCKET-BOOK.

If ever horses driven to gain a prize flew along the race-course, so flew the poor horses which carried Jeanne de Valois away from Versailles. The coachman, stimulated by the countess, drove them as if they were horses running in the Olympic games, who were to gain for their master two talents of gold, and for themselves a triple ration of hulled barley.

The cardinal was at home when Madame de La Motte came to his hôtel openly and before all the servants. She caused herself to be announced more ceremoniously than when she had gone to see the queen.

"Have you just come from Versailles?" he said.

"Yes, Monseigneur."

He regarded her attentively; she was impenetrable. She saw his agitation, his sadness and distress; but she had no pity.

"Well?" he said.

"Well, tell me, Monseigneur, what do you desire? Speak a little, so that I may not reproach myself too much."

"Ah, Countess, you say that with an air —"

"Sad, is it not?"

"Killing."

"You wished me to see the queen?"

"Yes."

"I have seen her. You hoped that she would allow me to speak of you, — she who several times had evinced her aversion to you, and her displeasure on hearing your name?"

"I see that if I had formed any such desire, I cannot expect to see it fulfilled."

"On the contrary, the queen spoke to me of you."

"Or rather, you have been so good as to speak of me to her?"

"It is true."

"And her Majesty listened?"

"That requires an explanation."

"Do not say another word, Countess. I see how great a repugnance her Majesty has had — "

"No, not very great — I ventured to speak of the necklace."

"You dared to say that I thought — "

"Of buying it for her, yes."

"Oh, Countess, that was sublime! and she listened?"

"Why, yes."

"You told her that I offered those diamonds to her?"

"She refused decidedly."

"I am lost!"

"Refused to accept a gift, yes; but the loan — "

"The loan! And you turned my offer so delicately?"

"So delicately that she accepted."

"I lend to the queen! Countess, is it possible?"

"It is much more than giving, is it not?"

"A thousand times."

"I thought so. All the same, her Majesty accepts."

The cardinal rose, then sat down again. Then coming over to Jeanne and taking her hands, "Do not deceive me," he said; "consider that with one word you can make me the most miserable of men."

"One does not play with passions, Monseigneur, unless they are ridiculous; but men of your rank and merit cannot be ridiculous."

"It is true. Then what you have said — "

"Is the exact truth."

"I have, then, a secret with the queen?"

"A secret — a momentous secret."

The cardinal ran to Jeanne and tenderly pressed her hand.

"I like that clasp of the hand," said the countess; "it is like that of a man to a man."

"It is that of a happy man to a protecting angel."

"Monseigneur, do not exaggerate."

"Oh, but I mean it. My joy, my gratitude — never — "

"But you are exaggerating both the one and the other. To lend a million and a half to the queen — was that all that you desired?"

The cardinal sighed.

"Buckingham would have asked more from Anne of Austria after strewing his pearls on the floor of the royal chamber."

"What Buckingham obtained, Countess, I am unwilling to wish for, even in a dream."

"You can come to an understanding as to that, Monseigneur, with the queen herself; for she desired me to inform you that she will receive you with pleasure at Versailles."

The imprudent woman had no sooner allowed these words to escape her lips than the cardinal turned pale, like a young man receiving the first kiss of love. He felt around him like a man intoxicated, and took hold of the nearest chair to support himself.

"Ah! ah!" thought Jeanne, "it is even more serious than I imagined. I was thinking of a duchy, a peerage, an income of a hundred thousand francs; but I may now go in for a principality, and an income of half a million, for Monsieur de Rohan is not actuated by ambition nor by avarice, but by love!"

Monsieur de Rohan quickly recovered himself. Joy is not a malady of long duration; and as he was a man of steady purposes, he deemed it advisable to talk business with Jeanne that he might the more quickly forget that he had spoken of love; and Jeanne allowed him to do so.

"My friend," said the cardinal, pressing Jeanne in his arms, "what does the queen propose to do in regard to that loan which you suggested to her?"

"You ask that on the supposition that the queen has no money?"

"Precisely."

"Well, the queen proposes to pay you as she would pay Boehmer, with this difference: if she had bought of Boehmer all Paris would have known it, — a thing not to be thought of after her famous saying about the man-of-war. The queen therefore wishes to receive the diamonds by installments, and make payment for them in the same manner. You will afford her the opportunity; you are to her a discreet cashier, and solvent in case she should meet with any obstacle in making the payments, — that is all. She is happy, and she pays; do not ask for more."

"She pays? What do you mean?"

"The queen — a woman who knows everything — knows very well that you have debts, Monseigneur. And then she is proud; she is not a friend who will receive presents. When I told her that you had advanced two hundred and fifty thousand francs —"

"You told her that?"

"Why not?"

"It would make the affair impossible at once."

"It afforded her a reason for accepting your service. 'Nothing for nothing' is the queen's motto."

"Mon Dieu!"

Jeanne quietly felt in her pocket and took out the queen's pocket-book.

"What is that?" asked Monsieur de Rohan.

"A pocket-book containing bank-notes to the amount of two hundred and fifty thousand francs. The queen sends them to you with hearty thanks."

"Oh!"

"The full amount is there; I counted the notes."

"There is no question about that."

"What are you looking at so intently?"

"I am looking at this pocket-book, which I do not recognize as yours."

"It seems to please you, and yet it is neither rich nor handsome."

"It does please me, and I do not know why."

"You have good taste."

"Now you are making fun of me. In what way have I shown good taste?"

"Certainly, since your taste agrees with the queen's."

"This pocket-book —"

"Was the queen's, Monseigneur."

"Do you wish very much to keep it?"

"Oh, very much!"

Monsieur de Rohan sighed. "That is easily conceived," he said.

"Nevertheless, if it would please you," said the countess, with a smile which might have brought a saint to ruin.

"You cannot doubt it, Countess; but I would not deprive you of it."

"Take it."

"Countess!" cried the cardinal, transported with delight, "you are a friend the most precious, the most intelligent, the most —"

"Yes, yes."

"And between us it is —"

"'For life, for death,' — they always say that. No, I have only one merit."

"What is it, then?"

"That of having pushed your affairs with considerable success and with very much zeal."

"If that were your only merit, my friend, I might say that I am almost equal to you, inasmuch as I, while you, poor dear, went to Versailles, — I also was working for you."

Jeanne looked at the cardinal with surprise.

"Yes," he resumed, "a mere trifle. My banker came to propose my taking stock in some enterprise for draining and cultivating a marsh somewhere. He assured me the profit was sure, and I agreed."

"And you did well."

"Oh, you will see in a moment that you always occupy the first place in my thoughts."

"The second, you mean; and that is more than I deserve. But go on."

"My banker gave me two hundred shares, and I took a quarter of them for you."

"Oh, Monseigneur!"

"Let me finish. Two hours later he came again. The sole fact of my subscription for those shares had raised the value of the stock a hundred per cent. He handed me a hundred thousand francs."

"A fine speculation."

"Of which here is your share, dear Countess, — I should say, dear friend," and from the package of two hundred and fifty thousand francs given by the queen he slipped twenty-five thousand francs into Jeanne's hands.

"That is very good of you, Monseigneur, — gift for gift. But what pleases me most is that you thought of me."

"I shall always do so," replied the cardinal, kissing her hand.

"And you may count on the same from me. Au revoir, Monseigneur, soon — at Versailles," and Jeanne took her departure, after giving the cardinal a memorandum of the payments appointed by the queen, the first of which would be five hundred thousand francs in one month from date.

CHAPTER X.

IN WHICH WE AGAIN MEET DOCTOR LOUIS.

PERHAPS our readers, remembering in what a difficult position we left Monsieur de Charny, will be grateful to us for leading them back to that antechamber in Versailles to which the brave sailor, never intimidated by men or elements, had fled in fear of fainting in the presence of three women, — the queen, Andrée, and Madame de La Motte.

When he reached the middle of the antechamber, Monsieur de Charny perceived that he could go no farther. He staggered and held out his arms. It was noticed that his strength had given way, and several persons ran to his relief. The young officer fainted. After some moments he came to himself, and had no suspicion that the queen had seen him, and perhaps, under the first impulse of her anxiety, would have hastened to him, had not Andrée, incited by jealousy rather than by regard for propriety, checked her movement.

It was fortunate, however, that the queen, warned by Andrée, had remained in her chamber; for hardly had the door closed when she heard an usher announcing, "The king!"

As the king passed through the antechamber, attended by several officers of his household, he paused on seeing a man lying on a bench in the recess of a window, and in a condition that seemed to alarm the two guards who were attending to him, who were not accustomed to see officers faint away without reason. So, while supporting Monsieur de Charny, they called out to him: "Monsieur! Monsieur! what, then, is the matter?"

But Monsieur de Charny had no voice and could not reply. The king, understanding from that silence the gravity of the case, moved quickly toward the sufferer. "Why, yes," said he, "yes, it is some one who has lost consciousness."

On hearing the king's voice the two guards turned around, and by a mechanical movement relaxed their hold on Monsieur de Charny, who fell, or rather, sustaining himself with the remains of his strength, slid groaning to the floor.

"Oh! gentlemen," said the king, "what are you doing?"

They hastened to raise Monsieur de Charny, who had again fainted away, and gently placed him in an easy-chair.

"Oh!" cried the king, suddenly, on recognizing the young officer; "why, it is Monsieur de Charny!"

"Monsieur de Charny?" cried the attendants.

"Yes, Monsieur de Suffren's nephew."

These words had a magical effect. Charny was immediately inundated with perfumed waters, as if he were in the midst of women. A doctor arrived and hastily examined the patient. The king, curious in everything pertaining to science, and compassionate toward all suffering, remained through the examination.

The doctor's first care was to open the young man's vest and shirt, to give the air access to his chest; but in doing this he made an unexpected discovery.

"A wound!" said the king, becoming more interested, and coming nearer that he might see more clearly.

"Yes, yes," murmured Monsieur de Charny, trying to raise himself, and looking weakly around; "an old wound which has reopened; it is nothing," and his hand slightly pressed the doctor's fingers.

A physician understands, and ought to understand, everything. This was not a physician of the court, but a surgeon from the city of Versailles. He wished to give himself importance. "Oh!" said he, "an old wound; it pleases you to say so, Monsieur, but its edges are too fresh, the blood is too red, — that wound is not twenty-four hours old."

Charny, to whom that contradiction brought a supply of strength, stood up and said: "I cannot suppose, Monsieur, that you intend to inform me at what time I received my wound. I have told you, and I tell you again, that it is an old wound."

At that moment Charny perceived and recognized the king. "The king!" he said, and immediately buttoned his vest as if ashamed that his weakness had been exposed to a spectator so illustrious.

"Yes, Monsieur de Charny," replied the king; "and I am very glad that I came this way, and may perhaps bring you some relief."

"A scratch, Sire," stammered Charny, — "an old wound, Sire, that is all."

"Old or new," said Louis XVI., "the wound has enabled me to see your blood, — the precious blood of a brave gentleman."

"Whom two hours on his bed will restore to health," added Charny, and he tried to rise again. But he had over-estimated his strength. He became dizzy, tottered on his legs, and fell back again into the armchair.

"Really," said the king, "he is very ill."

"Oh, yes," said the doctor, with a shrewd and diplomatic manner; "but we may save him yet."

The king was a man of honor; he had conjectured that Charny was concealing something. That secret was sacred to him. Many another man would have sought to elicit it from the doctor, who seemed not unwilling to disclose it; but Louis XVI. preferred to leave the secret with its owner. "I do not wish," he said, "that Monsieur de Charny should expose himself to danger by returning home. Let him be cared for here. Send immediately for his uncle, Monsieur de Suffren, and when this gentleman," designating the officious practitioner, "shall have been thanked for his services, let my own physician, Doctor Louis, be summoned."

An officer hastened to execute the king's orders. Two others raised Charny and carried him to the end of the gallery to the chamber of the commander of the guards. Monsieur de Suffren was sent for, and Doctor Louis arrived to take charge of the patient.

We are already acquainted with this man, honest, wise, and modest, of an intelligence less brilliant than useful, — a brave laborer in that immense field of science in which if he who gathers the harvest is more honored, he who opens the furrow is not less honorable.

Behind the doctor, bending over his patient, was Monsieur de Suffren, who, summoned by a messenger, had hastened thither. The illustrious sailor could not understand that sudden illness. When he had taken Charny's hand and looked at his dull eyes, "Strange!" he said, "it is very strange. Doctor, my nephew has never been ill before."

"That proves nothing, Monsieur," replied the doctor.

"The air of Versailles must be very oppressive; for, I repeat, I have seen Olivier at sea for the last ten years, and always vigorous, always erect as a mast."

"It is his wound," said one of the officers.

"What do you mean?" exclaimed the admiral. "Olivier was never wounded in his life."

"Oh, I beg pardon," said the officer, pointing to the crimsoned cambric, "but I thought —"

Monsieur de Suffren saw the blood.

"Enough, enough!" said the doctor, abruptly, after feeling his patient's pulse. "Are we to discuss the origin of the malady? We have the malady itself; let us be content with it, and cure it if we can."

The admiral was pleased with this decided style of speech; it was like that used by surgeons on his vessels. "Is it very dangerous, Doctor?" he asked, with more emotion than he wished to show.

"About as dangerous as a cut of a razor on the chin."

"Good! Thank the king, gentlemen. Olivier, I shall come back to see you."

Olivier moved his eyes and his fingers, as if at the same time to express his thanks to his uncle who was going away, and to the doctor who had persuaded him to go. Then, happy because he was in bed, and in the care of a man full of intelligence and kindness, he pretended to fall asleep. The doctor sent every one away.

Olivier soon slept in fact, not without having given thanks to Heaven for what had happened to him, or rather that no misfortune had happened to him under circumstances so grave. Then he became feverish. He went through again and again, in feverish dreams, the scene with Philippe, the scene with the queen, and the scene with the king, and then fell into that terrible circle which the raging blood throws like a net around the mind. He became delirious. Three hours later they could hear him in the gallery where the guards were on duty. The doctor noticed this, and calling his servant, ordered him to take Olivier in his arms. Olivier uttered plaintive cries.

"Roll the counterpane round his head," said the doctor.

"And what shall I do with him?" asked the servant. "He is too heavy, and he resists. I must have one of the guards to help me."

"You are a poor chicken-heart if you are afraid of a sick man," said the doctor.

"Monsieur—"

"And if you find him too heavy you are not so strong as you thought. I shall have to send you back to Auvergne."

The threat produced its effect. Charny, crying out, howling, and gesticulating, was carried off like a feather by the Auvergnese, in full view of the guards. The latter clustered about the doctor questioning him.

"Gentlemen," said the doctor, shouting to drown Charny's cries, "you can understand that I am not going to walk a league every hour to visit this patient whom the king has confided to me. Your gallery is at the end of the world."

"Where are you taking him, then, Doctor?"

"To my own quarters. I have two rooms here, you know. I shall sleep in one of them, and by day after to-morrow, if no one meddles with him, I will give you a good account of him."

"But, Doctor," said the officer in command, "I assure you that the patient would be well lodged here; we all love Monsieur de Suffren, and—"

"Yes, yes; I know all about this care of comrades for one another. The wounded man is thirsty; they are kind to him, give him drink, and he dies. To the devil with such care as that! it has killed patients enough for me."

Before the doctor had finished speaking, Olivier's cries could no longer be heard.

"Indeed," pursued the worthy doctor, "that was very well thought of! There is only one danger now, — the king will want to see the sick man. And if he sees him, he will hear him. The devil! there is no time to lose. I must speak to the queen; she will give me advice."

The good doctor, having formed this resolution with the promptitude of a man who counts the seconds, deluged the face of the wounded man with cold water, placed him in bed in such a position that he would not hurt himself by turning over or falling. He put a padlock on the window-shutter, double-locked the door of the room, and putting the key in his pocket repaired to the queen, after having assured himself, by listening outside, that Olivier's cries could not be understood, even should they be heard.

It need hardly be said that as a precaution the Auvergnese had been shut up in the room with the sick man.

Near the door the doctor met Madame de Misery, whom the queen had sent to obtain news of the wounded man. She insisted on entering.

"Come along, Madame," he said, "I am just going out."

"But, Doctor, the queen is waiting!"

"I am on my way to the queen, Madame."

"The queen desires —"

"The queen shall know as much as she desires to know, I promise you, Madame. Let us go;" and he did go, so quickly that he forced the first lady in waiting of Marie Antoinette to run in order to keep up with him.

CHAPTER XI.

ÆGRI SOMNIA.

THE queen was awaiting the return of Madame de Misery; she was not expecting the doctor. The latter entered with his accustomed familiarity.

"Madame," he said aloud, "the patient, in whom the king and your Majesty are interested, is doing as well as can be expected in a case of fever."

The queen knew the doctor; she was well aware of his aversion to those persons who, he said, "uttered whole cries for only half sufferings." She had an idea that Monsieur de Charny was exaggerating his condition. Brave women are inclined to underrate the courage of brave men.

"Is the wound a slight one?" she asked.

"Eh! eh!" said the doctor.

"A scratch —"

"Why, no, no, Madame; but whether scratch or wound, all I know is that he has fever."

"Poor fellow! A very violent fever?"

"A terrible fever."

"What!" said the queen, in terror; "I did not think that so suddenly — fever —"

The doctor looked at the queen for a moment. "There are fevers and fevers," he replied.

"My dear Louis, really you frighten me, — you, who are usually so reassuring. I do not know what can have come over you this evening."

"Nothing extraordinary."

"Ah! for instance, you keep turning round; you look from right to left; you appear as if you wanted to confide to me a great secret."

"Eh! perhaps I do."

"I thought so, — a secret about the fever?"

"Why, yes."

"About Monsieur de Charny's fever?"

"Why, yes."

"And you came to tell me this secret?"

"Why, yes."

"Be quick, then. You know how curious I am. Come, let us begin at the beginning."

"Like little Jean?"

"Yes, my dear Doctor."

"Well, Madame?"

"Well, I am waiting, Doctor."

"No; it is I who am waiting."

"What do you mean?"

"For you to question me, Madame. I cannot tell a story very well; but if you ask me questions, I can answer like a book."

"Well, I asked you to tell me how Monsieur de Charny's fever is getting on."

"No; you begin wrong. In the first place, ask me how it happens that Monsieur de Charny is in my apartment, in one of my two little rooms, instead of being in the gallery, or in the guard-room?"

"Well, then, I do ask. Indeed, it is astonishing."

"Well, Madame, I did not leave Monsieur de Charny in this gallery, or in this guard-room, because Monsieur de Charny is not suffering from an ordinary fever."

The queen made a gesture of surprise. "What do you mean?"

"Monsieur de Charny, when he has a fever, is immediately delirious."

"Oh!" said the queen, clasping her hands.

"And," continued Louis, approaching the queen, "when he is delirious — the poor young man! — he says a great many things it would be improper for the gentlemen of the guard, or any other person, to hear."

"Doctor!"

"Ah, Madame, you should not have questioned me if you did not wish me to answer."

"Say on, dear Doctor;" and the queen took his hand. "This young man is an atheist, perhaps, and blasphemes in his delirium."

"Not at all! On the contrary, he is a devotee."

"Perhaps there is something of exaltation in his ravings?"

"Exaltation is the very word."

The queen composed her features, and assuming that superb dignity of manner which always accompanies the actions of princes accustomed to the respect of others and their own self-esteem, — a faculty indispensable to the lords of the earth in retaining self-control, — "Monsieur de Charny," she said, "has been recommended to me. He is the nephew of Monsieur de Suffren, our hero. He has rendered me personal services, and I wish to be to him as a relation, a dear friend. Therefore, tell me the truth; I must and will hear it."

"But I cannot tell you, Madame," replied Louis; "and since your Majesty has such a desire to know about it, I know of no way but for your Majesty to hear it yourself. Then, if this young man should say anything improper, the queen will not be angry at the indiscretion which may have allowed the secret to be divined, nor at the imprudence which might have concealed it."

"I acknowledge your consideration," said the queen; "and since Monsieur de Charny says such strange things in his delirium —"

"Things which your Majesty ought to hear in order to appreciate them," said the good doctor; and he took the trembling hand of the queen.

"But above all, take care," cried the queen; "I can do nothing here without being followed up by some kindly spy."

"I shall be the only one to-night. We have only to go the length of my corridor, which has a door at either end. I will lock that by which we enter, and no one will be near us, Madame."

"I trust to my dear doctor," said the queen, and taking the doctor's arm she glided out of the apartment, palpitating with curiosity.

The doctor kept his promise. Never was king, marching to battle or setting out to make a reconnoissance, — never was queen, seeking an adventure, more carefully attended by a captain of the guards or an officer of the palace.

The doctor locked the first door, and approached the second, against which he placed his ear.

"Well," said the queen, "is your patient in there?"

"No, Madame; he is in the second room. Oh, if he had been in this room you would have heard him at the end of the corridor. Just listen at this door."

She heard, indeed, an inarticulate murmur of moanings. "He is groaning, he is suffering, Doctor."

"Not at all; he does not groan at all. He is speaking distinctly. Stay, I will open this door."

"But I do not wish to go in where he is," cried the queen, drawing back.

"I do not propose that you shall," said the doctor. "I only wish you to listen in the adjoining room, where, without fear of seeing or being seen, you can hear all that the wounded man says."

"All these mysteries, all these preparations, frighten me," murmured the queen.

"How will it be, then, when you have heard him?" replied the doctor, and he went alone into Charny's room.

Dressed in his regimental small clothes, the buckles of which the good doctor had unfastened, his well-formed legs encased in silk stockings, his arms stretched out like those of a corpse, and rigid in the fine, crumpled cambric sleeves, Charny endeavored now and then to raise from the pillow his head, which was as heavy as lead. A hot perspiration was streaming from his forehead, and locks of his hair clung to his temples. Overwhelmed, crushed, inert, he was no more than a thought, a sentiment, a reflection; his body lived no longer but by the flame of thought, constantly springing up in his brain like that of a wick in its alabaster vase.

It is not an empty comparison we have chosen, for this flame, the sole existence of Charny, illuminated, fantastically and softly, certain details which memory alone could not have translated into long poems.

Charny was relating to himself his interview in the coach with the German lady he had met on the road from Paris to Versailles.

"German! German!" he was constantly repeating.

"Yes, a German lady, — we all know that," said the doctor; "on the road to Versailles."

"Queen of France," he exclaimed suddenly.

"Eh!" said the doctor, looking into the room where the queen was standing. "Nothing less than that. What do you say to that, Madame?"

"What a dreadful thing it is," murmured Charny, "to love an angel, a woman, to love her madly, to give one's life for her, and then on approaching her to find nothing more than a queen of velvet and gold, metal and cloth, without a heart!"

"Oh!" said the doctor, with a constrained laugh.

Charny paid no attention to the interruption. "I would love," he said, "a married woman. I would love her with that passion which makes one forget everything else. Well, I will say to that woman: 'There remain to us some happy days on this earth; all those without love which await us in the future will not be equal to these few blessed ones! Come, my well-beloved, so long as you love me and I love you, we shall lead the life of the elect. Afterward, — well, after that will come death, like the life we are living now. Therefore let us enjoy the blessings of love.'"

"Not badly argued for a man in a fever," murmured the doctor, "though the morality of it might be improved."

"But her children!" cried Charny, suddenly, with rage; "she will not leave her two children."

"That is an obstacle, hic nodus," said the doctor, with a sublime mingling of raillery and gentleness, as he wiped Charny's brow.

"Oh!" continued the young man, insensible to everything, "the children could be carried off in the skirt of a travelling coat! Come, Charny, if you can carry off in your arms the mother, who is lighter than a linnet's wing, since you can take her up without feeling any burden but a thrill of love, can you not also carry off the children of Marie — Ah —"

He uttered a terrible cry.

"The children of a king would be a burden so heavy that the void they left would be felt through half the world."

The doctor left his patient and approached the queen. He found her standing, cold and trembling; he took her hand, which was shaking.

"You are right," she said. "This is more than delirium; this young man would incur a terrible danger if he were overheard."

"Listen! listen!" said the doctor.

"No, not another word."

"He is becoming more quiet. Hark! he is praying."

Indeed, Charny had raised himself up and joined his hands; he fixed his great, astonished eyes on vacancy.

"Marie," he said, in a gentle and thrilling tone, "Marie, I have felt that you loved me. Oh, I will say nothing about it. Your foot touched mine in the coach, Marie, and I felt like dying. Your hand fell upon mine — there — there — I will say nothing of it; it is the secret of my life. My blood may flow from my wound, Marie, but the secret shall not issue with it. My enemy has steeped his sword in my blood; but if he knows something of my secret, he knows nothing of yours. Therefore, fear nothing, Marie! do not even tell me that you love me; it is useless; since you blushed, I have nothing more to learn."

"Oh, oh!" said the doctor. "It is no longer fever alone; see how calm he is; it is — "

"It is — " said the queen, with anxiety.

"It is an ecstasy, Madame, and ecstasy resembles memory; it is indeed the memory of a soul recalling heaven."

"I have heard enough," murmured the queen, so agitated that she attempted to flee.

The doctor stopped her. "Madame, Madame," he said, "what do you wish me to do?"

"Nothing, Doctor; nothing."

"But if the king should wish to see his protégé?"

"Ah, yes. Oh, that would be a misfortune!"

"What shall I say?"

"Doctor, I have not an idea; I cannot find a word; this frightful spectacle has unnerved me."

"And you have caught the fever of this ecstatic," said the doctor, in a low voice; "your pulse is at a hundred at least."

The queen did not answer; she withdrew her hand and disappeared.

CHAPTER XII.

ANDRÉE.

THE doctor remained thoughtful, looking after the queen as she withdrew. Then shaking his head, he murmured to himself: "There are in this palace mysteries which are not within the reach of my science. Against some of them I arm myself with a lancet, and pierce the veins to cure them; against others I arm myself with reproach, and pierce the heart. Shall I cure them?"

Then, when the attack was over, he closed Charny's eyes, which had remained open and haggard, bathed his temples with water and vinegar, and bestowed upon him those attentions which change the burning atmosphere that surrounds the invalid into a paradise of delight. Then, seeing that the features of the patient were becoming calm, that the sobs were giving place to sighs, that some vague syllables escaped from his lips instead of furious words, "Yes, yes, there was not merely sympathy, but some powerful influence," he said; "it seemed as if this delirium started up to meet the visitor who has just retired. Yes; human atoms move, as in the vegetable world moves the fecundating dust. Yes; thought has its secret modes of communication; hearts have their hidden approaches."

Suddenly the doctor started, turned, and listened intently. "Well," he murmured, "who can it be now?" He had heard something like a murmur and the rustling of a dress at the farther end of the corridor. "It cannot be the queen," he said to himself. "She would not so soon change her course of action. Let us see."

He went quietly and opened another door communicating with the corridor; and putting out his head without noise, he saw within ten feet of him a woman dressed in a long robe, standing motionless like a statue of despair. The feeble light placed in the corridor was insufficient to illumine it from one end to the other; but the figure was visible in the moonlight, which for a moment was unobscured by clouds.

The doctor noiselessly withdrew, and passing rapidly to the door near which the woman stood, he suddenly opened it. She cried out, reached forth her hands, and met those of Doctor Louis.

"Who is there?" asked the doctor, with more of kindness than of menace in his tone; for he had inferred from her immobility that she was listening with her heart rather than with her ears.

"It is I, Doctor, I," replied a voice, sweet and sad.

Although that voice was not unknown to the doctor, it awakened in his mind only a vague and indistinct remembrance.

"It is I, Andrée de Taverney, Doctor."

"Ah! what is the matter? Is she ill, then?"

"She!" cried Andrée. "Who, then, is she?"

The doctor saw that he had committed an imprudence. "I beg pardon!" he said; "but a little while ago I saw a woman going away. Perhaps it was you?"

"Ah, yes! a woman has been here before me, then?" and Andrée uttered these words with such an accent of curiosity that the doctor could have no doubt as to the sentiment that prompted them.

"My dear child," he replied, "it seems to me that we are playing at cross-purposes. Of whom are you speaking? What do you wish? Explain yourself."

"Doctor," replied Andrée, in melancholy tones that went to the heart, "do not try to deceive me! You may admit to me that a woman has been here, for I saw her."

"Eh! who said that no one had been here?"

"Yes; but a woman, — a woman, Doctor!"

"Certainly, a woman, — unless you would maintain the theory that a woman is a woman only to the age of forty years."

"Then she who came here was forty years old?" cried Andrée, with a sigh of relief.

"When I say forty years, I do not give her whole age by five or six years; but then we must be polite to our friends, and Madame de Misery is one of mine."

"Madame de Misery?"

"Certainly."

"It is, indeed, she who came here?"

"And why the deuce should n't I tell you if it were any one else?"

"Oh, I was thinking — "

"Indeed, women are all alike, — incomprehensible! I thought I knew you; but no, you are as unintelligible as all the rest. It is enough to make one swear!"

"Good Doctor, dear Doctor — "

"Enough. Let us come to the point."

Andrée looked at him anxiously.

"Is she worse than she was?" he asked.

"Who?"

"The queen, of course."

"The queen?"

"Yes, the queen, at whose order Madame de Misery came to seek me a little while ago. She has one of her suffocating spells, with palpitations, — a sad disease, my dear young lady, and incurable. Tell me about her, if you are sent by her, and let us return at once."

The doctor made a movement as if to go from that place; but Andrée gently checked him, and replied, "No, dear Doctor, I did not come on behalf of the queen. I did not even know that she was ill. Poor queen! had I known that — Ah, pardon me, Doctor! but I am no longer aware of what I am saying."

"I see that clearly."

"I know neither what I am saying, nor what I am doing."

"Oh, I know what you are doing! You are turning faint."

In fact, Andrée had withdrawn her hand from the doctor's arm, and it fell lifeless by her side; she leaned forward, white and cold. The doctor held her up, and spoke to her encouragingly.

Andrée then made a violent effort to recover herself. That strong soul which had never allowed itself to be prostrated either by pain or by grief, tightened now its springs of steel. "Doctor," she said, "you know that I am nervous, and that the darkness frightens me. I have lost my way in the dark, and that is why I am in such a state."

"And why in the world do you expose yourself to the risk of losing your way in the darkness? No one, you say, has sent you; nothing has brought you."

"I did not say nothing, Doctor; I said no one."

"Ah! subtleties, my dear patient. We are not very comfortably placed here for considering them. Let us go elsewhere, especially if they are likely to continue."

"Ten minutes, Doctor, is all that I ask of you."

"Ten minutes, so be it, — but not standing; my legs positively forbid that sort of a dialogue. We will go and sit down."

"Where, then?"

"On the bench in the corridor, if agreeable to you."

"And no one will hear us, you think, Doctor?" said Andrée, in alarm.

"No one."

"Not even the wounded man in there!" she continued in the same tone, pointing to the chamber of the invalid.

"No," said the doctor, "if any one could hear us, that poor fellow certainly could not."

Andrée clasped her hands. "My God! is he, then, so ill?" she asked.

"He certainly is not well. But let us speak of what brings you here. Quick, my child, quick; you know the queen expects me."

"Well, Doctor," said Andrée, sighing, "we are speaking of it, it seems to me."

"What! Monsieur de Charny!"

"It is about him, Doctor, — I came to get news of him."

The silence with which the doctor received these words, which he might have expected, was chilling. He was, in fact, comparing Andrée's demeanor with that of the queen. He saw these two women led by the same sentiment, and he judged by the symptoms that this sentiment was a violent love.

Andrée, who was ignorant of the queen's visit, and who could not look into the doctor's heart, full of kindliness and compassion, understood his silence as implying blame. She defended herself against that condemnation, silent though it was.

"It seems to me, Doctor, that you can pardon the step I have taken, since Monsieur de Charny is suffering from a wound received in a duel, and that wound was given by my brother."

"Your brother!" cried Doctor Louis; "it is Monsieur Philippe de Taverney who has wounded Monsieur de Charny?"

"Certainly."

"Oh, I was not acquainted with that fact."

"But now that you know it you find it natural, do you not, that I should make inquiries?"

"Of course, my child," said the good doctor, delighted to find a reason for indulgence. "I was uninformed, and could not conjecture the true explanation." These last words he emphasized in a way which showed Andrée that he adopted her explanation with some reserve.

"Come now, Doctor," said Andrée, leaning with both hands on his arm, and looking in his face; "come, tell me your whole thought."

"Why, I have done so. Why should I make any mental reservations?"

"A duel between two gentlemen is a common thing, it is an every day affair."

"The only thing which would give importance to this duel would be the fact that our two young men had fought about some woman."

"About a woman, Doctor?"

"Yes; about you, for example."

"About me!" Andrée sighed. "No, Doctor, it was not for me that Monsieur de Charny fought."

The doctor had the air of being satisfied with the answer, but he determined in some way or other to have an explanation of the sigh. "Then," he said, "I understand, — it was your brother who sent to obtain an exact account of the wounded man's condition."

"Yes, it is my brother; yes, Doctor," said Andrée.

The doctor looked her in the face. "Oh! I will soon find out the secret of your heart, inflexible soul," he murmured. Then aloud, "Well, then, I will tell you the whole truth, which should be spoken to every one desirous of knowing it. Report it to your brother, and let him make his arrangements accordingly. You understand?"

"No, Doctor; for I do not know what you mean by these words, 'Let him make his arrangements accordingly.'"

"I mean this: up to the present time the king still condemns the fighting of duels. He no longer insists upon the observance of the edicts, it is true; but when a duel has caused scandal, his Majesty banishes or imprisons."

"That is true, Doctor."

"And when unfortunately a man dies, — oh! then, the king is pitiless. Well, advise your dear brother to keep himself in hiding for a little while."

"Doctor," cried Andrée, — "Doctor, Monsieur de Charny is, then, very ill?"

"Listen, dear young lady! I promised you the truth, and here it is: if by this time to-morrow the fever which has just begun, and which is consuming him, should not have subsided, Monsieur de Charny will be a dead man."

Andrée felt that she was going to shriek. She pressed her hand to her throat; she buried her nails in her flesh that she might allay in physical pain this anguish which was tearing her heart. The doctor could not see upon her features the signs of this inward struggle.

Andrée controlled herself like a woman of Sparta. "My brother," she said, "will not fly. He has fought Monsieur de Charny like a brave man; if he had the misfortune to wound him, it was in self-defence; if he has killed him, God will judge him."

"She did not come on her own account," said the doctor to himself; "therefore, it must be for the queen. Let us see if her Majesty has carried her thoughtlessness to such an extreme." Then, speaking aloud to Andrée, "What effect has this duel had on the queen?" he asked.

"The queen? I do not know," replied Andrée. "How does it concern the queen?"

"She likes Monsieur de Taverney, I presume."

"Well, Monsieur de Taverney is safe; let us hope that her Majesty will defend my brother if he is accused."

The doctor, beaten on both sides of his double hypothesis, abandoned the attack. "I am not a physiologist," he said to himself, "I am only a surgeon. Why the devil when I know so much about the play of muscles and nerves, should I trouble myself about the play of womanly caprice and passion?—Mademoiselle, you have learned what you desire to know. Advise Monsieur de Taverney to fly, or not, as you please. My business is to try to save the wounded man—this night; if I do not succeed to-night in saving him, death, which quietly carries on its work, will take him from me within twenty-four hours. Adieu," and he gently, but firmly, closed the door upon her.

Andrée pressed her hand convulsively to her forehead when she found herself alone,—alone with that terrible reality. It seemed to her as if death, of which the doctor had spoken so calmly, had already descended into that chamber, and was stalking through the dark corridor in its white winding-sheet; it seemed as if the breath of this melancholy apparition froze her limbs. She fled to her room, locked the door, and throwing herself on her knees by the side of the bed, "My God!" she cried, with frenzy, while burning tears fell from her eyes,—"my God! thou art not unjust, thou art not unwise, thou art not cruel, my God! Thou who canst do everything, thou wilt not let this young man die, who has done no harm and who is so much loved. My God! we poor human beings believe in the power of thy kindness, although trembling always before the power of thy wrath. But I! — I who pray to thee — I have been sufficiently tried in this world; I have suffered without having committed crime. Well, I have never complained, even to thee; I have never doubted thee. If now when I pray to thee; if now when I entreat; if now when I ask for the life of a young man, — if now thou shouldst refuse me, O my God! I would say that thou hadst made use of all thy power against me, and that thou art a God of wrath, of insatiable vengeance; I would say — oh, I blaspheme; pardon me, I blaspheme! and thou dost not smite me! Pardon! pardon! thou art indeed the God of clemency and mercy!"

Andrée felt her sight failing, her strength giving way; she fell inanimate upon the floor. When she woke from this cold sleep and remembered everything, her fears and her griefs, "My God!" she murmured, in a bitter tone; "thou hast been unmerciful! I love him! Oh, yes, I love him! that is enough, is it not? Now, wilt thou kill him?"

CHAPTER XIII.

DELIRIUM.

God doubtless listened to Andrée's prayer. Monsieur de Charny did not succumb to his attack of fever. On the next day, while she was anxiously waiting for any intelligence which might be received from the sick man, the latter, thanks to the care of good Doctor Louis, was passing from death to life.

Charny once out of danger, Doctor Louis did not give him so much attention ; the subject ceased to be interesting. To the doctor, the living are of very little consequence, especially when they are convalescent or quite well. But at the end of a week, during which Andrée became entirely reassured, the doctor, who remembered the manifestations of his patient during his illness, thought best to remove Charny to a distant place. He wished to expatriate the delirium.

But Charny rebelled against the first attempts. He fastened upon the doctor his eyes sparkling with anger; told him that he was the guest of the king, and that no one had the right to drive away a man to whom the king had offered a shelter. The doctor, who was not patient with intractable convalescents, ordered four valets to come in and quietly remove the wounded man. But Charny caught hold of the frame of his bed, and struck violently one of the men, threatening the others like Charles XII. at Bender.

Doctor Louis tried reasoning. At first Charny was logical enough; but when the valets persisted, he made such an effort that the wound re-opened, and his reason seemed to leave him with the flowing of his blood. He was seized with an attack of delirium more violent than the first. Then he began to cry out that they wished to deprive him of his visions; but it was all in vain, his visions still smiled on him, and she who loved him would come to see him in spite of the doctor's opposition, for she was of too high rank to regard the opposition of any one.

On hearing these words, the doctor, trembling, hastened to dismiss the servants and to sew up the wound, and soon had his patient, physically, in a satisfactory state. But he could not arrest the delirium, which increased to an alarming degree. The situation had so changed in one day that Doctor Louis began to think of resorting to heroic remedies. The sick man would not only ruin himself, he would ruin the queen. From speaking, he passed to shrieking; he began with remembering, and ended with inventing; and the worst feature of the case was that in his lucid moments — and they were many — he was madder than in his fits of madness.

Deeply embarrassed, the doctor, being unable to appeal to the authority of the king, — since the invalid also appealed to that, — determined to go and speak to the queen; and he chose for this purpose a time when Charny was sleeping, fatigued with relating his dreams, and calling up his visions.

He found Marie Antoinette thoughtful, and at the same time radiant with pleasure; for she expected the doctor to give a good account of his patient. But she was much surprised; to her very first question the doctor replied sharply, that the patient was very ill.

"What!" cried the queen, "yesterday he was doing well."

"No, Madame, he was doing very badly."

"Yet I sent Misery, and you replied by a good bulletin."

"I allowed myself to be deceived, and wished to deceive you also."

"What does that mean?" replied the queen, turning very pale. "If he is ill why conceal it from me? What should I fear, Doctor, except a misfortune which is too common, alas!"

"Madame —"

"And if he is doing well, why increase my anxiety, very natural when it concerns a good servant of the king? Therefore, answer frankly, — yes, or no. Is the patient in danger?"

"There is less danger for him than for others, Madame."

"Now the enigmas begin, Doctor," said the queen, impatiently. "Explain yourself."

"It is difficult, Madame," replied the doctor. "It is enough for you to know that the malady of the Comte de Charny is wholly moral. The wound is only an accessory to the sufferings, an occasion for the delirium."

"A moral sickness! Monsieur de Charny!"

"Yes, Madame; and I designate as moral everything that cannot be analyzed by the scalpel. Spare me the pain of saying anything more about it to your Majesty."

"You mean to say that the count —" the queen insisted.

"Do you still wish me to tell you?"

"Of course I wish it."

"Well, I mean that the count is in love; that is what I mean to say. Your Majesty demands an explanation; there it is."

The queen gave a little shrug of the shoulders which signified, "A pretty piece of business!"

"And do you think that can be cured in the same way that a wound is cured, Madame?" continued the doctor. "No; the evil increases, and from temporary delirium Monsieur de Charny will sink into a fatal monomania. Then —"

"Then, Doctor?"

"You will have ruined that young man, Madame."

"Indeed, Doctor, you have most astonishing ways. I shall have ruined this young man! Am I, then, the cause of his madness?"

"Certainly."

"But you shock me, Doctor."

"If you are not the cause of it now," pursued the inflexible doctor, shrugging his shoulders, "you will be later."

"Give me your advice, then, since it is your profession," said the queen, somewhat pacified.

"That is to say, I must give a prescription."

"If you will."

"Here it is, then: 'The young man must be cured by balm or by iron; let the woman whose name he constantly invokes kill him or cure him.'"

"There you exaggerate again," interrupted the queen, becoming impatient. "Kill — cure — grand words! Can you kill a man with a harsh word? Can you cure a poor madman with a smile?"

"Ah! if you are incredulous, — you too," said the doctor; "there is nothing more for me to do but to present my very humble respects to your Majesty."

"But, in the first place, tell me, does it concern me?"

"I know nothing about it, and do not wish to know anything. I only repeat to you that Monsieur de Charny is a reasonable madman; that reason can at once render a man mad and kill him; that madness may render him reasonable and cure him. So, when you wish to free this palace from shrieks, dreams, and scandal, you must act."

"What shall I do?"

"Ah, what? I only make prescriptions; I do not advise. Am I sure of having heard what I have heard, of having seen what I have seen?"

"Come, suppose I understood you, what would happen?"

"Two fortunate things: one, the best for you as for us all, that the sick man, pierced to the heart by that infallible stiletto called reason, would see the termination of his agony, which is just beginning; the other — well — the other — Ah, Madame, excuse me, I was wrong in seeing two issues from this labyrinth. There is only one for Marie Antoinette, for the queen of France."

"I understand you; you have spoken with frankness, Doctor. It is right that the woman on account of whom Monsieur de Charny has lost his reason should return it to him, either by kindness or by force."

"Very well! That is what I mean."

"She must have the courage to go to him and wrest his dreams from him, — that is, the gnawing serpent which is coiled up in the very depths of his soul."

"Yes, your Majesty."

"Then I will send for some one; Mademoiselle de Taverney, for example."

"Mademoiselle de Taverney?" said the doctor.

"Yes; you will have everything ready for the wounded man to receive us comfortably."

"It is done, Madame."

"Without any warning?"

"It must be so."

"But," murmured the queen, "this responsibility for the life or death of a man is more dreadful than you think."

"It is what I assume every day, when I meet with an unknown disease. Shall I attack it by a remedy which kills the disease, or by a remedy which kills the patient?"

"You, — you are very sure of killing the patient, are you not?" said the queen, with a shudder.

"Eh!" said the doctor, with a gloomy air, "even if a man should die for the honor of a queen, how many die every day for the caprice of a king? Come, Madame, come."

The queen sighed and followed the doctor, without waiting for Andrée, who was not to be found.

It was eleven o'clock in the morning; Charny, completely dressed, was sleeping in an arm-chair after the agitation of a terrible night. The window blinds, carefully closed, allowed but a feeble glimmer of light to enter the room. Everything was arranged to soothe the nervous sensibility of the sick man. There was no sound, nothing to touch him, nothing to disturb his sight. Doctor Louis had arranged everything to prevent, if possible, a renewal of the delirious outbreaks. Nevertheless, determined on striking a decisive blow, he did not shrink from a crisis which might even kill his patient. It is true that it might also save him.

The queen, in a morning robe, with her hair elegantly dressed, abruptly entered the corridor which led to Charny's room. The doctor had recommended her not to hesitate, not to knock; but to appear before him suddenly and with resolution, in order to produce a violent effect. She therefore turned so suddenly the knob of the door of the antechamber that a person leaning against the door of Charny's room, — a woman enveloped in a mantle, — had not time to straighten up and regain her self-possession. The agitated countenance and trembling hands of this woman certainly were not indicative of tranquillity.

"Andrée!" cried the queen, in surprise. "You here?"

"I!" replied Andrée, pale and agitated, "I! yes, your Majesty. I! but is not your Majesty here yourself?"

"Oh, oh! a complication," murmured the doctor.

"I looked for you everywhere," said the queen; "where were you?" There was something in these words of the queen which did not express her usual kindness. It was like the beginning of an examination; it was like the announcement of a suspicion.

Andrée was alarmed. She feared especially that her indiscreet step would furnish a clew to her sentiments, so terrible even to herself. Therefore, proud as she was, she determined to utter falsehood for the second time. "Here, as you see," she said.

"Doubtless; but why are you here?"

"Madame," she replied, "they told me that your Majesty had sent for me; therefore I came."

The queen mistrusted still; she persisted in her inquiry. "How did you discover where I had gone?"

"It was easy, Madame; you were with Monsieur le Docteur Louis, and you were seen passing through the small apartments; of course, you could have been coming only to this pavilion."

"Well guessed," continued the queen, still unsatisfied, but speaking not unkindly, — "well guessed."

Andrée made a last effort. "Madame," she said, smiling, "if your Majesty had intended secrecy, you would not have appeared in the open galleries as you did just now in coming here. When the queen crosses the terrace Mademoiselle de Taverney can see her from her apartment, and it is not difficult to follow or precede a person whom we can see at a distance."

"She is right," said the queen; "a hundred times right. I have an unfortunate habit, that of never foreseeing anything; reflecting so little myself, I forget the possibility of reflection in others."

The queen felt, perhaps, that she ought to show indulgence, since she had need of a confidant. Her soul, moreover, not being a compound of coquetry and distrust, like the souls of common women, she had faith in her friendships, knowing that she was able to love. Women who distrust themselves are still more distrustful of others. A great misfortune which coquettes have to endure is that they never believe themselves loved by their lovers.

Marie Antoinette, therefore, quickly forgot the impression produced on her by finding Mademoiselle de Taverney before Charny's door. She took Andrée's hand, made her turn the key in the door, and quickly passing before her, she entered the sick man's chamber, while the doctor and Andrée remained without. When the latter saw the queen thus disappear, she raised toward Heaven a look full of wrath and suffering, — a look that resembled an imprecation. The doctor took her by the arm and led her into the corridor, saying, "Do you think she will succeed?"

"Succeed! Good God! in what?"

"In persuading that poor man to allow himself to be taken away before he dies here of his fever."

"He would, then, be cured should he go away?" cried Andrée.

The doctor looked at her with surprise and uneasiness.

"I think so," he said.

"Oh, may she, then, succeed!" said the poor girl.

CHAPTER XIV.

CONVALESCENCE.

THE queen had walked straight to the arm-chair in which Charny was reclining. The latter, roused by the creaking of her shoes on the floor, looked up. "The queen!" he murmured, trying to rise.

"The queen, yes, Monsieur," Marie Antoinette hastened to say, — "the queen, who knows how you are striving to lose both your reason and your life; the queen, whom you offend in your dreams; the queen, whom you offend when awake; the queen, who has regard for her own honor and your safety! That is her reason for coming to you, Monsieur; and it is not thus you should receive her."

Charny had risen, trembling, bewildered, and at her last words had fallen upon his knees, so overwhelmed by physical suffering and mental anguish that, bowed down like a guilty man, he had neither the strength nor the will to rise.

"Is it possible," continued the queen, touched by this respect and silence, — "is it possible that a gentleman, formerly renowned for his loyalty, can persist in endangering the reputation of a woman? For observe this, Monsieur de Charny, that from our first interview it is not the queen who has appeared to you, but a woman; and you should never have forgotten it."

Charny, much affected by these words, which seemed to come from the heart, endeavored to say a word in his own defence; but Marie Antoinette did not give him time.

"What can I expect of my enemies," she said, "if you give an example of treason?"

"Treason —" stammered Charny.

"Monsieur, you must choose. Either you are mad, and I must prevent you from doing harm; or you are a traitor, and I must punish you."

"Madame, do not say that I am a traitor. From the lips of a king this accusation precedes a sentence of death; from the lips of a woman it means dishonor. As a queen, kill me; as a woman, spare me."

"Are you in your right mind, Monsieur de Charny?" said the queen, in an agitated voice.

"Yes, Madame."

"Are you conscious of the wrong committed against me, of your crime against — the king?"

"My God!" murmured the unfortunate man.

"For you gentlemen forget too easily that the king is the husband of that woman whom you insult by even looking upon her; the king is the father of your future sovereign, my dauphin. The king is a man greater and better than you all, — a man whom I venerate and whom I love."

"Oh!" murmured Charny, with a groan; and he was obliged to place one hand on the floor to support himself.

His cry pierced the queen's heart. She read in the young man's face that he would be stricken with death if she did not promptly draw from the wound the barb she had buried there. It was for this reason that, merciful and kind, and terrified at the paleness and weakness of the culprit, she for a moment thought of calling for aid. But she reflected that the doctor and Andrée might interpret wrongly this fainting-fit of the sick man. She therefore raised him up herself.

"Let us speak," she said, "I as queen, you as a man. Doctor Louis has tried to cure you; this wound, which amounted to nothing, has been rendered dangerous by the extravagances of your brain. When shall this wound be healed? When will you cease to give the good doctor the scandalous spectacle of a madness which causes him anxiety?"

"Madame," stammered Charny, "your Majesty drives me away, I will go away;" and he made so violent an effort to leave the room that, losing his balance, he tottered and fell into the arms of the queen, who had placed herself between him and the door.

Scarcely had he felt the contact of that warm breast which supported him, — scarcely was he enfolded in the involuntary embrace of the arms which held him, when his reason abandoned him entirely; a light breath escaped his lips, which was not a word, and did not dare to be a kiss.

The queen, herself agitated by this close contact, moved by this weakness, had time only to push from her the inanimate body toward the easy-chair, on which it fell; she would then have fled. But Charny's head had fallen back and struck the frame of the chair; a light-red tinge colored the froth which rose to his lips, and a warm drop fell on the hand of Marie Antoinette.

"Oh, so much the better!" he murmured; "just as I would have wished. I shall die, killed by you."

The queen forgot everything. She came back, seized Charny in her arms, pressed his head upon her bosom, and placed her icy hand upon the young man's heart. Love performed a miracle; Charny revived. He opened his eyes, and the vision disappeared. The woman was alarmed when she reflected that she had left a tender remembrance where she intended to leave only a last farewell. She started for the door in such haste that Charny had just time to seize the hem of her dress, exclaiming, "Madame, in the name of the reverence I have for God, less than that which I have for you — "

"Adieu, adieu!" said the queen.

"Madame, oh, pardon me!"

"I pardon you, Monsieur de Charny."

"Madame, one last look!"

"Monsieur de Charny," said the queen, trembling with tenderness and wrath, "if you are not the most miserable of men, you will this night, or to-morrow, either have died or left the palace."

A queen entreats when she commands in such terms as these. Charny, clasping his hands in frenzy, crept on his knees to the feet of Marie Antoinette. The latter had already opened the door to escape the danger more quickly.

Andrée, whose eyes were fixed on that door, saw the young man prostrate, and the queen almost fainting; she saw Charny's eyes shining with hope and pride, and those of the queen downcast, without expression. Struck to the heart, despairing, filled with hatred and scorn, she did not bow her head on seeing the queen return. It seemed to her that God had given too much to this woman in bestowing upon her a throne and beauty, — both superfluous since he had given her this half-hour with Monsieur de Charny.

The doctor, wholly occupied with the success of the negotiation undertaken by the queen, confined himself to saying, "Well, Madame?"

The queen paused a moment to collect herself, and recover her voice, stifled by the beating of her heart.

"What will he do?" said the doctor.

"He will go away," murmured the queen. And without paying any attention to Andrée, who knitted her brows, or to the doctor, who rubbed his hands, she crossed with a rapid step the corridor of the gallery, drawing about her mechanically her lace mantle, and withdrew to her apartment.

Andrée pressed the doctor's hand, who hastened to return to his patient; then, with a step solemn as that of a ghost, she returned to her own room, with her head bowed down, her eyes fixed, and her mind wandering. She had not thought of asking the queen's commands. To a nature like hers the queen was nothing, the rival everything.

Charny, once more under the care of the doctor, did not seem to be the same man that he had been the evening before. Making an extravagant show of strength and hardihood, he plied the doctor so vigorously with questions about his approaching convalescence, the regimen he was to follow, and the means of going away, that the doctor feared a more dangerous relapse, produced by a mania of another nature.

Charny soon undeceived him; he resembled those red-hot irons whose color fades as the intensity of the heat diminishes. The iron is black, and is not hot to the eye, but is yet sufficiently so to consume everything it touches.

The doctor saw that the young man was recovering his calmness and the reasoning power of his days of health. Charny was really so reasonable that he felt obliged to explain to the doctor this sudden change in his determination. "The queen," he said, "by making me ashamed, has cured me quicker than your science, dear Doctor, could have done with your excellent remedies; to attack my self-love, you see, is to master me as they master a horse with a bit."

"So much the better, so much the better," murmured the doctor.

"Yes; I remember that a Spaniard — they are very boastful — told me one day, in order to prove his power of will, that in a duel in which he had been wounded, by merely willing to retain his blood he had been able to prevent its flowing to rejoice the heart of his adversary. I laughed at this Spaniard, yet I am somewhat like him; if my fever, if this delirium with which you reproach me, should show any sign of returning, I would engage to drive them away by saying, 'Delirium and fever, you shall not return!'"

"We have examples of this will-power," said the doctor, gravely. "At any rate, allow me to congratulate you. You are now morally cured?"

"Oh! yes."

"Well, it will not be long before you see the relation between man's moral and physical organization. It is a beautiful theory on which I would publish a book if I had the time. Now that you are sound in mind, you will be sound in body in less than a week."

"Dear Doctor, I thank you."

"And you will begin, then, by going away?"

"Immediately, if you will."

"Let us wait until evening. Let us proceed moderately. To move hastily is always a risk."

"We will wait until this evening, Doctor."

"Are you going far?"

"To the end of the world if necessary."

"That is rather too far for a first journey," said the doctor, with his usual coolness. "We will be satisfied with Versailles to begin with, eh!"

"Versailles it shall be, since you wish it."

"It seems to me," said the doctor, "that there is no need of expatriating yourself, just because you are cured of your wound."

This coolness put Charny on his guard.

"It is true, Doctor. I have a house at Versailles."

"Well, that is what we want; you shall be taken there this evening."

"You have not understood me, Doctor; I wished to make a journey to my estate!"

"Ah, why did you not say so, then? But your estates are not at the end of the world."

"They are on the frontiers of Picardy, fifteen or eighteen leagues from here."

"As I said, that is not far away."

Charny pressed the doctor's hand as if to thank him for his delicacy.

That evening the four valets who had been so rudely treated at their first appearance, carried Charny to his carriage, which awaited him at the gate.

The king, having hunted all day, had just taken supper and was sleeping. Charny, rather disturbed at going away without taking leave, was reassured by the doctor, who promised to excuse his departure on the pretext of the need of change.

Charny, before getting into his carriage, allowed himself the painful satisfaction of gazing, — even until the very last moment, — at the windows in the apartment of the queen. No one could see him. One of the lackeys, carrying a torch in his hand, lighted the way, without allowing the glare to fall upon his face. Charny met upon the steps only a few officers, his friends, who had been forewarned of his departure, so that it might not have the appearance of flight.

Escorted to the carriage by these pleasant companions, Charny could allow his eyes to wander over the windows; those of the queen were brilliantly lighted. Her Majesty, not very well, had received her ladies in her bedchamber. Those of Andrée, dark and gloomy, concealed behind the folds of the curtains a very anxious woman, with palpitating heart, who followed unseen the movements of the sick man and his escort.

The carriage finally departed, but so slowly that every step of the horses resounded on the hard pavement.

"If he is not mine," murmured Andrée, "at least he belongs to no one else."

"If the desire to die should return to him," said the doctor, as he entered his own room, "at least he will not die on my hands. Confound these maladies of the soul! one is not the physician of Antiochus and Stratonice to cure such maladies."

Charny arrived safe and sound at his own house. The doctor went to see him the same night, and found him so well that he hastened to announce that this would be his last visit. The sick man had for his supper the wing of a chicken and a spoonful of Orléans preserves.

The next day he received a visit of his uncle Monsieur de Suffren, and of Monsieur de Lafayette; he received also a messenger from the king. It was very nearly the same on the following day, and after that he was left to himself.

At the end of a week he was able to ride an easy horse; his strength had returned. His house not being sufficiently secluded, he asked of his uncle's physician, and of Doctor Louis also, permission to depart for his estates.

Doctor Louis replied, with confidence, that locomotion was the final remedy in the curing of wounds; that Monsieur de Charny had a good travelling-carriage; and that the road to Picardy was smooth as a mirror; and that to remain at Versailles when one could travel so comfortably would be perfect folly.

Charny had a large baggage-wagon loaded; he went to take leave of the king, who overwhelmed him with kindness; begged Monsieur de Suffren to present his respects to the queen, who was ill that evening and did not receive. Then entering his carriage at the very gate of the royal palace, he set out for the little town of Villers-Cotterets, from which he would proceed to the Château de Boursonnes, situated at about a league distant from that little town which the first poems of Dumoustier had already rendered illustrious.

CHAPTER XV.

TWO BLEEDING HEARTS.

On the day following that on which the queen had been surprised by Andrée, as she fled from Charny on his knees before her, Mademoiselle de Taverney entered, according to her custom, the royal bedchamber at the hour of the morning toilet, before going to Mass.

The queen had not yet received any visitors. She had just read a note from Madame de La Motte, and was in a pleasant mood.

Andrée, paler still than she had been the evening before, displayed in her whole demeanor that serious and cold reserve which attracts attention and compels those of the highest rank to account to the most humble. Simple, severe one might say, in her toilet, Andrée had the appearance of a harbinger of misfortune, either for herself or for others.

It was one of the queen's days of absent-mindedness; therefore she paid no attention to this quiet and serious demeanor of Andrée, — her red eyes, the whiteness of her temples and hands. She turned her head just enough to allow her friendly greeting to be heard, "Good morning, little one."

Andrée waited until the queen should give her an opportunity to speak. She waited, very sure that her silence, her immobility, would finally attract the eyes of Marie Antoinette. And she was right. Receiving no response but that of a ceremonious reverence, the queen turned her head and caught a side view of her face, which expressed such sorrow and severity.

"My God! what is the matter, Andrée?" she said, turning quite round; "has any misfortune happened to you?"

"A great misfortune, yes, Madame," replied the young woman.

"What is it, then?"

"I am going to leave your Majesty."

"Leave me! You are going away?"

"Yes, Madame."

"Where are you going, then? What is the cause of this hasty departure?"

"Madame, I am not happy in my affections —"

The queen looked up.

"My family affections," added Andrée, blushing.

The queen blushed in her turn, and their glances met with a flash like that made by the clashing of two swords.

The queen recovered herself first. "I do not understand," she said; "you were happy yesterday, I thought."

"No, Madame," replied Andrée, firmly; "yesterday was one of the unhappy days of my life."

"Ah!" said the queen, becoming thoughtful. "Explain yourself," she added.

"It would be necessary to fatigue your Majesty with details quite beneath your notice. I have no satisfaction in my family; I have nothing more to hope for in the world; and I come now to ask leave of your Majesty that I may retire to a convent."

The queen rose, and although this petition touched her pride, she approached Andrée and took her hand.

"What is the meaning of this foolish resolution?" she said; "had you not yesterday, as you have to-day, a brother, a father? Were they less troublesome and less harmful than they are to-day? Do you think me capable of neglecting you when you are in trouble? Am I not a mother who receives into her family those who have no mother?"

Andrée trembled like a guilty person, and bowing before the queen she said, "Madame, your goodness penetrates my heart, but it cannot dissuade me. I have resolved to leave the court. I have need of solitude. Do not expose me to unfaithfulness in my duty toward you through the lack of capacity for them which I find in myself."

"Since yesterday?"

"I beg your Majesty not to ask me to speak on this subject."

"Be free," said the queen, bitterly; "only you might have returned the confidence I have so freely given you. But it is foolish to question one who will not speak. Keep your secrets, Mademoiselle, and I hope you will be happier away than you have been here. Only remember one thing, — that my friendship never deserts those I love, whatever may be their caprices, and that I shall never cease to regard you as a friend. Now, Andrée, go; you are free."

Andrée made a reverence and turned to leave the room. When she had reached the door, the queen called her back. "Where are you going, Andrée?"

"To the Abbey of Saint Denis, Madame," replied Mademoiselle de Taverney.

"To the convent! oh! very well, Mademoiselle. Perhaps you have nothing with which to reproach yourself; but had you only ingratitude and forgetfulness that would be too much! You are very culpable toward me. Go, Mademoiselle de Taverney; go."

The result was that without offering any explanations, which the queen in her goodness of heart had expected, without showing any humility, any emotion, Andrée availed herself of the permission of the queen and disappeared. Marie Antoinette could, and actually did, perceive that Mademoiselle de Taverney left the palace immediately.

In fact, Andrée repaired to her father's house, where, as she had expected, she found Philippe in the garden. The brother meditated, the sister acted.

At sight of Andreé, whom her service required to be at this hour at the palace, Philippe advanced, surprised and almost alarmed. Alarmed especially by that gloomy countenance, since his sister never met him but with a smile of tender affection, he began, as the queen had done, by questioning.

Andrée informed him that she had just left the service of the queen; that her resignation had been accepted, and that she was about to enter a convent. Philippe clapped his hands together violently, like a man who has received an unexpected blow.

"What!" he said; "you too, sister?"

"What! I too? What do you mean?"

"It is, then, an accursed contact for our family, that of the Bourbons?" he cried; "you feel compelled to take religious vows! you, religious by inclination, religious in soul; you, the least worldly of women, and at the same time the least capable of lasting obedience to the rules of asceticism. Come, tell me, what complaint have you against the queen?"

"I make no complaint against the queen," replied the young girl, coldly. "You, who had reckoned so confidently on favor at court, you who, more than any other, had a right to count upon it, — why have you not been able to remain there? Why did you stay there only three days? I have been there three years!"

"The queen is sometimes capricious, Andrée."

"If that is so, Philippe, you ought to be able to endure it, — you, a man. I, a woman, ought not to endure it, and I will not. She has her caprices, — very well, her servants are there."

"All this, sister," said the young man, with some constraint, "does not acquaint me with the occasion of your misunderstanding with the queen."

"I have had no misunderstanding with her, I assure you. Had you, Philippe, when you left her? Oh, she is an ungrateful woman!"

"You must forgive her, Andrée. Flattery has injured her somewhat, but she is good at heart."

"As is proved, perhaps, by her conduct toward you, Philippe."

"To what do you refer?"

"You have forgotten already? Oh! I have a better memory. So, in one and the same day, with one and the same resolution, I pay your debt and mine, Philippe."

"Too dearly, it seems to me, Andrée; a woman should not renounce the world at your age, with your beauty. Take care, my dear; if you leave the world now you will regret it when you are old, and will return to it then only to find all your friends estranged from you."

"You did not reason thus, — you, a brave officer, the soul of honor and fine feeling, but caring so little for renown or riches, that where others have acquired titles and gold, you have only contracted debts and fallen in rank, — you did not reason thus, when you said: 'She is capricious, Andrée, she is a coquette, she is perfidious; I prefer not to remain in her service.' Therefore, practically, you have renounced the world, although you may not have entered a monastery; and of us two, the one who comes nearest to taking irrevocable vows is not I who have yet to take them, but you who have already done so."

"You are right, sister, and but for our father — "

"Our father, — ah, Philippe, do not speak thus," replied Andrée, with bitterness. "Ought not a father to be the support of his children, or to accept support from them? It is on these conditions only that he is a father. And I ask, what is our father to us? Have you ever thought of such a thing as confiding a secret to Monsieur de Taverney? Do you believe him capable of confiding in you? No," continued Andrée, with an expression of sorrow, "no, Monsieur de Taverney is a man to live alone."

"I know it, Andrée, but he should not die alone."

These words, spoken with mild severity, reminded Andrée that she was allowing her angry feelings and her hatred of the world to occupy too large a place in her heart.

"I do not wish," she answered, "that you should consider me a daughter without affection; you know that I am a tender sister; but every one in this world has conspired to destroy in me every instinct of sympathy. God gave me at birth, as to every human creature, a soul and a body; with this soul and body every human creature can do as he pleases, for his own happiness in this world and in the world to come. One man whom I knew, took my soul, — Balsamo. A man whom I scarcely knew, and who was not a man in my opinion, took my body, — Gilbert. I tell you, Philippe, that in order to be a good and pious daughter, I needed but a father. But with regard to you, let us see what benefit the service of the great ones of the earth has conferred upon you who loved them."

Philippe hung his head. "Spare me," he said; "the great ones of the earth were in my eyes only creatures similar to myself. I loved them; God has commanded us to love one another."

"Oh, Philippe!" she said, "it never happens upon this earth that the loving heart responds directly to the one who loves it; those whom we have chosen, choose others."

Philippe raised his pale face and contemplated his sister for some time with no expression but that of astonishment. "Why do you say that? what are you driving at?" he asked.

"Nothing, nothing," replied Andrée, generously, who shrank from the idea of going into details and from an exchange of confidences. "I am stricken, brother, I think my mind is wandering; do not pay any attention to my words."

"And yet —"

Andrée came to Philippe, and took his hand. "Enough on this subject, my beloved brother. I have come to entreat you to take me to a convent; I have chosen Saint Denis. Do not be alarmed. I do not mean to take the vows, that will come later if necessary. Instead of seeking in an asylum what most women wish to find there, — forgetfulness, — I go there to remember. It seems to me that I have too long forgotten the Lord. He is the only king, the only sovereign, the one consolation, as he is the only real afflictor. By drawing near to him, now that I understand him, I shall have done more for my happiness than if all the power and love in the world had conspired to make my life happy. Oh for solitude, brother, — solitude, that vestibule of eternal blessedness! In solitude God speaks to the heart of man; in solitude man speaks to the heart of God."

Philippe interrupted Andrée, with a gesture. "Remember," he said, "that I oppose, morally, this desperate purpose; you have not allowed me to judge of the reasons for your despair."

"Despair!" she said, with an expression of supreme scorn; "you said despair! Ah, thank God, I do not leave the court in despair! I! regret it with despair! No, no, a thousand times, no!" and with a movement full of indignant pride she threw over her shoulders a silk mantle which lay near her on a chair.

"This excess of disdain shows a state of mind which cannot last," said Philippe. "You do not like the word 'despair,' Andrée; accept instead the word 'spite.'"

"Spite!" replied the young woman, with a smile full of pride. "You cannot believe, brother, that Mademoiselle de Taverney is so weak as to give up her position in the world from a feeling of spite. Spite is the weakness of coquettes or fools. The eye which is lighted by spite soon overflows with tears, and the fire is extinguished. I have no spite, Philippe. I wish that you would believe me; and in order to do so, you need only examine your own heart when you have some grievance to state. Answer me, Philippe, if to-morrow you should retire to La Trappe, if you should become a Carthusian, what would you call the cause which drove you to this resolution?"

"I should call it an incurable sorrow, sister," said Philippe, with the gentle dignity of an unhappy man.

"Well, Philippe, that is a word which suits me, and which I adopt. It is therefore an incurable sorrow which impels me to seek solitude."

"Well," said Philippe, "brother and sister will not have been unlike in their lives. Once equally happy, they will have still been unhappy in the same degree."

Andrée thought that Philippe, carried away by his emotion, would question her further, and perhaps his inflexible heart would be broken under the pressure of fraternal affection. But Philippe knew from experience that great souls are sufficient unto themselves; therefore he did not disturb Andrée in the stronghold she had chosen.

"On what day, and at what hour, do you intend to set out?" he asked.

"To-morrow, — to-day, even, if there were time."

"Will you not take a last walk with me in the park?"

"No," she said.

He understood by the pressure of the hand which accompanied this refusal that the young woman did not wish to give him an opportunity to work upon her feelings.

"I will be ready whenever you require me," he replied; and he kissed her hand, without another word, which might have caused the bitterness in their hearts to overflow.

Andrée, after having made some preparations for her departure, retired to her room, where she received this note from Philippe, —

"You can see our father at five o'clock this evening. Your taking leave of him is indispensable. Monsieur de Taverney would complain of being deserted, of being treated unkindly."

She answered, —

"At five o'clock I will be with Monsieur de Taverney, and in my travelling-dress. At seven o'clock we can be at Saint Denis. Can you give me your evening?"

For answer, Philippe called out of his window, which was so near to Andrée's room that she could hear him, "At five o'clock let the horses be put to the travelling-carriage."

CHAPTER XVI.

A MINISTER OF FINANCE.

THE queen, before receiving Andrée, had read a note from Madame de La Motte, at which she had smiled. This note contained these words, with all the proper formularies of respect, —

"And your Majesty may rest assured that credit will be granted you, and that the goods will be delivered confidentially."

Therefore the queen had smiled and burned Jeanne's little note. While she was still somewhat gloomy from her interview with Mademoiselle de Taverney, Madame de Misery came to announce that Monsieur de Calonne was waiting for the honor of an audience.

Monsieur de Calonne was a man of infinite talent, who, belonging to the generation born in the latter half of the century, little accustomed to tears and very fond of reasoning, had taken his decision with regard to the misfortune which hung over France, joined his interest with the common interest, said, as Louis XV. had said, "After us the end of the world;" and sought in every direction for flowers wherewith to deck his last moments. He understood affairs, and he was an accomplished courtier. Every woman celebrated for her wit, her riches, or her beauty he had addressed with homage, like that which the bee renders to the plants loaded with aroma and with sweets.

The conversation of seven or eight men and ten to twelve women contained at that time a summary of all knowledge. Monsieur de Calonne could calculate with D'Alembert, reason with Diderot, scoff with Voltaire, dream with Rousseau. Indeed, he was strong enough to laugh openly at the popularity of Monsieur Necker, — Monsieur Necker, the wise and profound, whose system of finance had illumined all France. Calonne, having observed him from every point of view, had finally rendered him ridiculous, even in the eyes of those who feared him most; both the king and the queen, who shuddered at that name, trembled when they heard him mocked in a good-natured way by an elegant statesman who satisfied himself with this reply to such an array of figures, "Of what use to prove that we can prove nothing?"

In fact, Necker had proved only one thing, — his inability to direct the finances. Monsieur de Calonne, however, accepted their management as a burden too light for his shoulders; and from the very first moment one might say that he bent beneath the load.

What did Monsieur Necker want? Reforms. These partial reforms alarmed all minds. Few people profited by them, and those who did profited little; on the contrary, many lost, and lost much. When Necker tried to establish a more just division of taxes, when he undertook to levy taxes on the estates of the nobility and the revenues of the clergy, he was abruptly attempting an impossible revolution. He was dividing the nation and weakening it, when he should have directed all his energy toward leading it on to a general reformation. He pointed out this goal, and by indicating it made its attainment impossible. To speak of reforming an abuse to those who do not wish the abuse reformed is to invite opposition. Is it well to warn the enemy of your intended assault?

This was fully comprehended by Calonne, more truly a friend of the nation, as far as this was concerned, than the Genevese, Necker, — more a friend, we say, as to accomplished facts; for instead of seeking to prevent an inevitable evil, Calonne accelerated the invasion of the scourge. His plan was bold, gigantic, sure; it was to draw into bankruptcy in two years the king and nobility, who would have delayed it for ten years. Then, the bankruptcy being accomplished, he would say, "Now, you who are rich, pay for the poor; for they are hungry, and will devour those who will not feed them."

How it was that the king did not foresee the consequences of this plan, or even divine the plan itself; how it was that the bandage over his eyes seemed to become thicker; how it was that the queen, generally so clear-sighted, was as blind as her husband as to the conduct of this minister, — on these points our history, or rather our romance, and for this it will be welcome, will give some indispensable details.

Monsieur de Calonne entered the queen's apartment. He was tall, handsome, and of distinguished manners. He was a man to make queens laugh and mistresses weep. Well assured that Marie Antoinette had sent for him under the pressure of some urgent need, he entered with a smile on his lips. So many others would have entered with a frowning face, in order to increase the merit of their consent. The queen also was very gracious. She asked the minister to be seated, and said to him a thousand things about nothing. At length she said, "Have we any money, my dear Monsieur de Calonne?"

"Money?" cried Monsieur de Calonne. "Why, yes, we always have money."

"This is very wonderful," replied the queen. "I have known no one but you to give that answer to a demand for money. As a financier you are incomparable."

"How much does your Majesty want?" replied Calonne.

"Explain to me in the first place, I beg of you, how it is that you find money where Monsieur Necker said so often that there was none."

"Monsieur Necker was right, Madame; there was no money in the coffers. On the day of my accession to the ministry, November 5, 1783, — one does not forget such things, Madame, — on examining the public treasury I found only two bags, each containing twelve hundred francs. There was not a farthing less."

The queen laughed. "Very well?" said she.

"Well, Madame, if Monsieur Necker, instead of saying, 'There is no money,' had set himself to work borrowing money, as I have done, — one hundred millions the first year, and one hundred and twenty-five the second, — if he had been sure, as I am, of obtaining for the third year a new loan of eighty millions, Monsieur Necker would have been a true financier. Any one can say, 'There is no money in the treasury;' but it is not every one who can say, 'There shall be money there!'"

"That is what I was saying to you; it was for this reason that I congratulated you. But how are these loans to be repaid? There is the difficulty."

"Oh, Madame," replied Calonne, with a smile of which no human eye could measure the profound, the frightful significance, "I will answer for it, — they shall be paid."

"Have you any new ideas? If so, let me be the first to share them, I beg of you."

"I have an idea, Madame, which will put twenty millions into the pockets of the French, and seven or eight millions into your — I beg pardon — into his Majesty's coffers."

"Those millions will be welcome in both places; but how are they to be obtained?"

"Your Majesty is aware that gold coin is not of the same value in all the States of Europe?"

"I know it. In Spain gold is of more value than in France."

"Your Majesty is right; it is a pleasure to converse with you upon finance. Gold has been worth in Spain, for the last five or six years, something like eight per cent more than in France; so that there is a gain of about eight francs on every ounce of gold exported."

"That is considerable," remarked the queen.

"So much that in a year, if the capitalists knew what I know, there would not remain with us a solitary louis d'or."

"You propose to prevent that result?"

"Immediately, Madame. I am about to increase the price of gold six and two-thirds per cent. Your Majesty will see that not a louis will remain in private coffers when it is known that the Mint will pay that premium on gold. The gold will then be recoined, and every marc will comprise thirty-two louis, instead of thirty as at the present time."

"A present profit and a future profit!" cried the queen. "It is a charming idea, which will win you great applause."

"I hope so, Madame; and I am glad that it is so fully approved by you."

"If you continue to entertain projects like that, I am sure that you will pay all our debts."

"Permit me, Madame, to come back to the subject of your Majesty's wishes?"

"Is it possible, Monsieur, for me to have at this moment —"

"What amount?"

"Oh, a sum much too large, perhaps."

Calonne smiled in a way to encourage the queen.

"Five hundred thousand francs," she said.

"Ah, Madame, how your Majesty frightened me! I thought you were about to make a demand for a serious amount."

"You can let me have it, then?"

"Certainly."

"And without the king — "

"Ah, Madame, that would be impossible. All my accounts are submitted monthly to the king; but he has never been known to read them, — which I consider an honor to myself."

"When may I count on receiving it?"

"When would your Majesty like to have it!"

"Not until the fifth of next month."

"The accounts will be audited on the second; you will have your money on the third, Madame."

"Monsieur de Calonne, I thank you."

"My greatest happiness is to please your Majesty. Do not hesitate to have recourse to my strong-box. It will be a pleasure to your controller-general of finance to be of service to you." He had risen while speaking, and bowed in his most graceful manner.

The queen gave him her hand to kiss. "One word more," she said; "I have some remorse in asking for this money."

"Remorse!" he said.

"Yes; it is to gratify a caprice."

"So much the better, so much the better. Of that sum, then, at least one half will be disbursed to the advantage of our industry, our commerce, or our pleasures."

"That is true, certainly," murmured the queen, "and you have a charming way of consoling me, Monsieur."

"God be praised, Madame! may we never have other remorse than such as your Majesty speaks of, and we shall go straight to Paradise."

"You see, Monsieur de Calonne, it would be too cruel for me to make the poor people pay for my caprices."

"Oh, well," said the minister, with a sinister smile and emphasizing every word, "have no more scruples, Madame, for I declare to you, that it will never be the poor people who will have it to pay."

"How so?" said the queen, in surprise.

"Because the poor people have nothing left," replied the minister, coolly; "and where there is nothing to be had, the king loses his rights." He bowed and left the room.

CHAPTER XVII.

AN UNEXPECTED VISITOR.

Scarcely had Monsieur de Calonne crossed the gallery to return to his own apartments, when a light knock was heard at the door of the queen's boudoir and Jeanne made her appearance. "Madame," she said, "he is there."

"The cardinal?" asked the queen, somewhat astonished at the word "he," which signifies so many things when uttered by a woman. She did not continue. Jeanne had already introduced Monsieur de Rohan, and had withdrawn after pressing stealthily the hand of the protected protector.

The prince found himself alone with the queen, standing a few steps from her. He respectfully offered the usual salutations.

The queen, seeing this reserve so full of tact, was touched; she held out her hand to the cardinal, who had not yet raised his eyes to her.

"Monsieur," she said, "I have been informed of an action of yours which effaces many offences."

"Allow me," said the prince, trembling with an emotion which was not affected, — "allow me, Madame, to declare to you that the offences of which your Majesty speaks would be much extenuated by a word of explanation."

"I do not forbid your justifying yourself," replied the queen, with dignity; "but what you would say would cast a shadow upon the respect and love I feel for my country and my family. You cannot exculpate yourself without wounding me, Monsieur le Cardinal. Let us not play with a fire not yet wholly extinguished, — it might, perhaps, burn your fingers or mine; to see you in the new light, which has revealed you to me as obliging, respectful, devoted — "

"Devoted even to death," interrupted the cardinal.

"That may be. But," said Marie Antoinette, smiling, "at present it is a question only of ruin. You will be devoted even to your own ruin, Monsieur le Cardinal. That would be very brave, very noble. Fortunately, I can set things right. You shall live without being ruined; unless, as they say, you are ruining yourslf."

"Madame — "

"Oh, that is your own business. However, as a friend, since we are now good friends, let me give you some advice: Be economical, it is a pastoral virtue; the king will like you better than if you were extravagant."

"I will become even miserly to please your Majesty."

"The king," replied the queen, with a delicate shade of meaning, "does not like misers either."

"I will become whatever your Majesty may wish," interrupted the cardinal, with ill-disguised passion.

"I was saying to you," said the queen, cutting him short, "that you would not be ruined on my account. You have become surety for me, and I thank you for it; but I have enough to meet my liabilities; therefore do not trouble yourself about this business, which, beginning with the first payment, will concern only myself."

"In order to close the affair, Madame," the cardinal then said, bowing, "it remains for me to present the necklace to your Majesty." At the same time he drew from his pocket the case, which he presented to the queen. She did not look at it, which was a proof of her strong desire to see it, and trembling with joy she placed it upon a small table, without withdrawing her hand from it.

The cardinal attempted some polite remarks, which were very well received, then returned to the subject of their reconciliation. But as she had determined not to look at the diamonds in his presence, and as she was burning with the desire to see them, she listened without giving him her attention. In her preoccupation she allowed the cardinal to take her hand, which he kissed with an air of rapture. Then he took leave, thinking that he might be in the queen's way, — a thought which overwhelmed him with delight. A mere friend is never in the way, and an indifferent person still less so.

He left the queen's presence full of enthusiasm, intoxicated with hope, and ready to prove to Madame de La Motte his unbounded gratitude for having brought the negotiation to so prosperous a conclusion.

Jeanne awaited him in the carriage about a hundred paces outside the gate; she received his ardent protestations of friendship. "Well," she said, after this first explosion of his gratitude, "are you to be Richelieu or Mazarin? Did the Austrian lips give you any encouragement in ambition or love? Are you fairly launched into politics or intrigue?"

"Do not laugh, dear Countess," said the prince; "I am mad with happiness."

"Already!"

"Give me your help, and in three weeks I can be a minister."

"Peste! in three weeks; what a long time! The first payment falls due in a fortnight."

"Oh, all turns out happily. The queen has money and will pay; I shall have had the merit of intention only. It is too little, Countess! on my honor, it is too little! God is my witness that I would willingly have paid the five hundred thousand francs as the price of this reconciliation."

"Make yourself easy," interrupted the countess, smiling, "you will have that merit in addition to the others. Do you desire it much?"

"I confess that I should prefer it; if the queen were under obligation to me —"

"Monseigneur, something tells me that you will have that satisfaction. Are you prepared for it?"

"I have sold the last property I possess, and have mortgaged my income and my livings for the next year."

"You have the five hundred thousand francs, then?"

"I have them; but after this payment, I shall not know what to do."

"This payment," cried Jeanne, "will give us three months of tranquillity. Who knows what may happen in three months?"

"That is true; but the king has charged me to incur no more debts."

"Two months in the ministry will make you square."

"Oh, Countess —"

"Do not be so fastidious. If you will not do it, your cousins will."

"You are always right. Where are you going?"

"Back to the queen to see what an effect your presence has produced."

"Very well. I will return to Paris."

"Why? You should attend the card-party to-night. That would be good policy; do not abandon the field."

"Unfortunately, it is necessary for me to attend a rendezvous, notice of which I received this morning before leaving home."

"A rendezvous?"

"And of rather a serious nature, if I can judge by the contents of this note. See —"

"A man's handwriting!" said the countess; and she read:—

MONSEIGNEUR, — A person wishes to communicate with you in regard to the recovery of an important sum of money. This person will wait on you this evening at Paris, to solicit the honor of an interview.

"Anonymous, — some beggar."

"No, Countess; a man would not wantonly expose himself to being beaten by my servants for having tricked me. Besides, I imagine I have seen this handwriting before."

"Go, then, Monseigneur; there is never any risk to run with people who promise you money. The worst that could happen would be that they never would pay you. Adieu, Monseigneur."

"Countess, au revoir."

"By the way, Monseigneur, I have two things to say to you."

"What are they?"

"If you should unexpectedly receive a large sum of money?"

"Well, Countess?"

"Something you thought you had lost, — a discovered treasure —"

"I understand you, you sly creature; you mean to claim half."

"Upon my word, Monseigneur —"

"You bring me good fortune, Countess; why should I not share with you? It is agreed; and now for the other thing."

"It is this: Do not allow yourself to encroach on those five hundred thousand francs."

"Oh, have no fear on that score."

They then separated. The cardinal returned to Paris surrounded by an atmosphere of celestial happiness. Within two hours the whole aspect of his life was changed. To him as a lover the queen had accorded more than he had dared to hope from her, and as a man of ambition he built great hopes on her apparent favor. The king, skilfully guided by his wife, would be to him the instrument of a prosperous career which thereafter nothing could check.

Prince Louis found his mind teeming with grand ideas. He had more political genius than any of his rivals. He understood the question of reform. He would bring the clergy into harmony with the people, and form one of those solid majorities which hold lasting power by their strength and their justice. To place at the head of this reform movement the queen, whom he adored, and whose unpopularity, always increasing, he would change to an unprecedented popularity, — such was the prelate's dream; and a single tender word from Marie Antoinette might have made this dream a reality.

Had that word been spoken, the cardinal would have renounced his easy conquests; the man of the world would have turned philosopher; the idler would have become an indefatigable worker. It is an easy task for great characters to exchange the paleness of debauchery for the fatigues of study. Monsieur de Rohan would have gone far, urged by love and ambition. On reaching Paris he imagined himself already immersed in work. He burned a boxful of love-letters, called his intendant to give orders for reforms in his expenditures, and had several pens got ready by a secretary, with which to write a paper on England's policy, which he thoroughly understood. After an hour of work he began to recover his self-possession, when the sound of a bell warned him that a visitor had arrived. An usher came to him.

"Who is there?" asked the prelate.

"The person whose letter Monseigneur received this morning."

"The letter without signature?"

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"But that person has a name. Ask him what it is."

The usher went away, and a moment later returned. "Monsieur le Comte de Cagliostro," said he.

The prince started. "Let him come in," he ordered.

The count entered, and the doors were closed behind him.

"Good God!" exclaimed the cardinal; "whom do I see?"

"Is it not true, Monseigneur," said Cagliostro, with a smile, "that I am not much changed?"

"Is it possible?" murmured Monsieur de Rohan, "Joseph Balsamo alive! — he who was believed to have lost his life in that fire. Joseph Balsamo —"

"Comte de Fenix, living, — yes, Monseigneur, and more alive than ever."

"But, Monsieur, under what name, then, do you present yourself? Why have you not kept your old name?"

"Precisely, Monseigneur, because it is old, and it recalls, to myself in the first place, and to others also, too many remembrances that are either melancholy or annoying. For example, to speak of yourself, Monseigneur, — tell me, would you not have refused admission to Joseph Balsamo?"

"I! why, no, Monsieur, no," and the cardinal, still stupefied, even neglected to offer a seat to Cagliostro.

"Then," replied the latter, "your Eminence has a better memory and greater honesty than all other men taken together."

"Monsieur, you formerly rendered me such a service —"

"Is it not true, Monseigneur," asked Balsamo, interrupting, "that I have not changed in respect to apparent age, and that I am a good illustration of the effects of my life-drops?"

"I confess it, Monsieur; but you are above the plane of humanity, — you who dispense liberally gold and health to all."

"As to health, I have nothing to say, Monseigneur; but gold, — no, oh, no."

"You make gold no longer?"

"No, Monseigneur."

"And why not?"

"Because I have lost the last particle of an indispensable ingredient, which my master, the sage Althotas, gave me after his departure from Egypt, — the only receipt of which I never had in my own possession."

"He has kept it?"

"No, — that is to say, yes; kept it and carried it with him to the tomb."

"He is dead?"

"I have lost him."

"How is it that you did not prolong the life of that man, — the indispensable custodian of an indispensable receipt, — you, who, as you say, have kept yourself alive and young through so many centuries?"

"Because, while I have power against disease and wounds, I can do nothing against accident, which destroys before my aid can be invoked."

"And it was an accident which ended the days of Althotas?"

"You should have known, since you were informed of my death."

"That fire in the Rue Saint Claude, in which you disappeared?"

"Killed Althotas, — or rather, the sage, weary of life, devoted himself to destruction."

"That is strange."

"No, it is natural. I have thought, myself, a hundred times, of ending my life."

"Yes, but you have continued to live, nevertheless."

"Because I had chosen for myself the condition of youth, in which vigorous health, passion, and physical enjoyment can still procure me some entertainment; Althotas, on the contrary, had chosen the condition of old age."

"Althotas should have done as you did."

"No, he was a man of profound intelligence and superior wisdom; of all things in the world, he desired only knowledge. Youth, with its imperious passions and pleasures, would have turned him aside from his lofty contemplations. Monseigneur, to think deeply, one must be free from fever, wrapped in impenetrable quiet. An old man meditates better than a young man; and so when sorrow takes hold of him there is no remedy. Althotas died a victim of his devotion to science. As for myself, I lead a worldly life; I waste my time, — I do absolutely nothing. I am a plant; I dare not call myself a flower. I do not live, I vegetate."

"Oh!" said the cardinal to himself, "with this man's resurrection all my surprises come back to me." Then, aloud, "You recall to me, Monsieur, the time when the magic of your words, and the marvels that you performed, doubled all my faculties, and increased, in my estimation, the value of a human being. You recall to me the two dreams of my youth. Do you know that it is ten years since I saw you?"

"I know it, and we have both fallen off since then, Monseigneur. I am no longer a sage; I am now only a man of learning. And as for you, you are no longer a handsome young man; you are now a handsome prince. Do you remember, Monseigneur, that day when in my cabinet I promised you the love of a woman whose blond hair had been submitted to my assistant for inspection?"

The cardinal turned pale and then suddenly red. Terror and joy, in quick succession, arrested the pulsations of his heart. "I remember," he said, "but only confusedly."

"Let us see," said Cagliostro, smiling, "whether I might still pass for a magician. Wait a moment, while I direct my search." He seemed to reflect. "That fair-haired child of your amorous dreams," he resumed, after a silence, — "where is she? what is she doing? Ah! parbleu! I see her, — yes, and you yourself have seen her to-day; nay, you have just come from her presence."

The cardinal pressed an icy hand upon his palpitating heart. "Monsieur," he said, in a tone so low that Cagliostro could hardly hear the words, "for mercy's sake — "

"You would prefer that we should talk about something else?" said the magician, politely. "Oh, I am at your orders, Monseigneur; dispose of me as you please," and he stretched himself unceremoniously on a sofa, to which, during the whole of this interesting conversation the cardinal had not thought of inviting him.

CHAPTER XVIII.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

THE cardinal observed his visitor with an almost stupefied air.

"Well," said the latter, "now that we have renewed our acquaintance, Monseigneur, let us converse, if you please."

"Yes," replied the prelate, gradually collecting himself, "Yes, let us talk about the recovery of that debt which — which —"

"About which I wrote you, you mean. Your Eminence is anxious to know —"

"Oh! it was a pretext, I imagine."

"No, Monseigneur, not the least in the world; it was a reality, and a most serious one, I assure you. This debt is well worth collecting, since it amounts to five hundred thousand francs; that is a considerable sum of money."

"And a sum which you were kind enough to lend me," cried the cardinal, turning pale.

"Yes, Monseigneur, which I lent you," said Balsamo; "I like to see in so great a prince as you so good a memory."

The cardinal had received the blow; he felt the cold perspiration streaming down his face. "I had thought," he said, trying to smile, "that Joseph Balsamo, the supernatural man, had carried my debt to the tomb, as he had thrown my receipt for it into the fire."

"Monseigneur," gravely replied the count, "the life of Joseph Balsamo is indestructible, as is this sheet of paper which you thought destroyed. Death can avail nothing against the elixir of life; fire is powerless against asbestos."

"I do not understand," said the cardinal, stupefied.

"You will understand, Monseigneur, I am sure," said Cagliostro.

"How so?"

"When you recognize your signature," and he offered a folded paper to the prince, who even before opening it, exclaimed, —

"My receipt!"

"Yes, Monseigneur, your receipt," replied Cagliostro, with a slight smile, accompanied by a formal bow.

"But I saw you burn it, Monsieur."

"I threw this paper in the fire, it is true," said the count, "but as I have told you, Monseigneur, by accident you had written on a piece of asbestos, instead of writing on ordinary paper, so that the receipt remained uninjured among the cinders."

"Monsieur," said the cardinal, haughtily, for he thought the presentation of this receipt a proof of distrust, — "Monsieur, believe me, I should not have denied my debt even without this paper; therefore you were wrong to deceive me."

"I deceive you, Monseigneur! I did not for a moment think of it, I assure you."

The cardinal nodded his head. "You made me think, Monsieur, that the debt was cancelled."

"To leave you in calm enjoyment and happy possession of five hundred thousand francs," replied Balsamo, with a slight shrug of the shoulders.

"But, in short, Monsieur," continued the cardinal, "why have you left such a sum for ten years unclaimed?"

"I knew, Monseigneur, that it was safe. Exigencies, play, robbers, have successively diminished my wealth. But knowing that I had this sum in reserve, I have waited patiently until the last moment."

"And the last moment has arrived?"

"Alas! yes, Monseigneur!"

"So that you can no longer wait patiently?"

"It is, indeed, impossible," replied Cagliostro.

"You want it at once?"

"If it please you to pay it,"

The cardinal was at first silent through despair. Then he said, in a hoarse voice, "Monsieur le Comte, we unhappy princes of the earth do not improvise fortunes as quickly as you enchanters, who can command the spirits of darkness and light."

"Oh, Monseigneur, believe me, I should not have asked you for this money if I had not known beforehand that you had it."

"I have five hundred thousand francs!" cried the cardinal.

"Thirty thousand in gold, eleven thousand in silver, and the rest in notes, which are in this Boule cabinet."

The cardinal turned white. "Oh, Monsieur, you knew that?"

"Yes, Monseigneur; and I know that you have made great sacrifices to procure this sum. I have heard that you bought this money at twice its value."

"Oh, that is very true."

"But —"

"But —" cried the unhappy prince.

"But, Monseigneur," continued Cagliostro, "during these ten years, I have often been in want and embarrassment; yet I have kept this paper back, — which represented half a million, — in order not to trouble you. I think, therefore, that we are very nearly quits, Monseigneur."

"Quits, Monsieur!" cried the prince; "oh, do not say that we are quits, since you so generously lent me a sum of such importance; quits! oh, no, no! I shall forever be under obligations to you. Only, Monsieur le Comte, I ask why you, who could at any time during these ten years have demanded this money, have kept silence? During these ten years there have been twenty times when I might have paid you with ease."

"While to-day —"

"Oh, to-day, — I will not conceal it from you," cried the prince, — "this restitution which you exact, for you do exact it, do you not?"

"Alas, Monseigneur!"

"Well, it embarrasses me beyond measure."

Cagliostro made a movement with his head and shoulders which signified, "It cannot be helped, Monseigneur; it is so, and cannot be otherwise."

"But you who know everything," cried the prince, — "you who read hearts, and see through the doors of cabinets, — which is sometimes even worse, — doubtless know also the sacred and mysterious purpose for which this money was destined."

"You are mistaken, Monseigneur," said Cagliostro, in a freezing tone; "no, I do not even suspect it; and my own secrets have brought me so much sorrow, deception, and misery that I no longer seek to penetrate the secrets of others unless they are personally interesting to me. It concerned me to know whether you had this money, because I wished to claim it; but once having ascertained that you had it, I did not trouble myself to think for what purpose it was destined. Besides, if at this moment I knew the cause of your embarrassment, it might seem so grave a matter as almost to force me to waive my claim, which really I cannot afford to do. Therefore I prefer to be ignorant."

"Oh, Monsieur," cried the cardinal, whose pride and sensibility were aroused by these last words of Cagliostro, "do not think that I wish to move you by an account of my personal embarrassments. You have your own interests to consider; they are guaranteed by this note, which bears my signature, that is enough. You shall have your five hundred thousand francs."

Cagliostro bowed.

"I know very well," continued the cardinal, overwhelmed with grief at the thought of losing so much money, so painfully acquired, —"I know, Monsieur, that this paper is merely an acknowledgement of the debt, and fixes no term of payment."

"Your Eminence will pardon me," replied the count; "but I refer to the receipt itself, on which I see written, —

"I acknowledge having received from Monsieur Joseph Balsamo the sum of five hundred thousand francs, which I will pay to him on demand.

"(Signed) LOUIS DE ROHAN."

The cardinal shuddered through his whole frame; he had forgotten not only the debt, but the terms in which it had been acknowledged.

"You see, Monseigneur," continued Balsamo, "that I do not ask the impossible. You cannot pay it; be it so. Only I regret that your Eminence appears to forget that this sum was given voluntarily by Joseph Balsamo, in an hour of great need, to Monsieur de Rohan, whom he did not know. That, it seems to me, was conduct worthy a great nobleman, which Monsieur de Rohan, so great a nobleman in every way, might have imitated by paying it promptly on demand. But you have thought differently, so let us say no more about it; I withdraw my note. Adieu, Monseigneur," and Cagliostro coolly folded the paper and was about to put it in his pocket.

The cardinal stopped him. "Monsieur le Comte," he said, "a Rohan allows no one to give him lessons in generosity. Besides, this would simply be a lesson in honesty. Give me that note, Monsieur, that I may pay it."

It was Cagliostro then who in his turn seemed to hesitate. In fact, the pale face, dilated eyes, the trembling hand of the cardinal seemed to inspire him with a lively compassion.

The cardinal, proud as he was, comprehended this good feeling of Cagliostro, and for a moment hoped that it would be followed by good results. But suddenly the count's expression grew hard, a cloud came over his knitted brows, and he handed the note to the cardinal.

Monsieur de Rohan, struck to the heart, lost not a moment; he went to the cabinet which Cagliostro had spoken of, and drew out a bundle of notes drawn on the treasury of streams and forests; then he pointed with his finger to several bags of money, and opened a drawer which was full of gold. "Monsieur le Comte," he said, "here are your five hundred thousand francs; but I still owe you two hundred and fifty thousand francs, as interest, even supposing you to refuse compound interest, which would make the sum much larger. My intendant shall make up the account, and I will give you security for the payment of this amount, only asking that you will give me time."

"Monseigneur," replied Cagliostro, "I lent five hundred thousand francs to Monsieur de Rohan, who owes me five hundred thousand francs and nothing more. If I had wished to receive interest, I should have stipulated for it in the receipt. As representative of Joseph Balsamo, or his heir, if you please, — for Joseph Balsamo is really dead, — I have no right to anything but the sum specified in the acknowledgment; you pay it, I receive it, and thank you, begging you to accept my respectful salutations. I will take the notes with me, Monseigneur; and as I have need of the whole amount this very day I will send for the gold and silver, which I beg you to have ready for me." And after uttering these words, to which the cardinal was not able to reply, Cagliostro put the bundle of notes in his pocket, bowed respectfully to the prince, in whose hands he left the receipt, and withdrew.

"The misfortune affects me alone," sighed Monsieur de Rohan, after the departure of Cagliostro, "since the queen has the money to pay, and no Joseph Balsamo can come and call upon her for an old debt of five hundred thousand francs."

CHAPTER XIX.

FAMILY ACCOUNTS.

It was the day before that appointed by the queen for the first payment to Boehmer and Bossange. Monsieur de Calonne had not yet fulfilled his promise. His accounts had not been signed by the king. The minister had had many things to occupy his time, and had somewhat forgotten the queen. She, on her side, thought it derogatory to her dignity to refresh the memory of the controller of finance. Having received his promise she waited. She, however, began to grow anxious, and to make inquiries; she was trying to devise some plan for speaking to Monsieur de Calonne, without compromising her queenly dignity, when she received a note from the minister. "This evening," he wrote, "the business with which your Majesty has done me the honor to charge me will be settled by the Council; and the money will be delivered to the queen to-morrow morning."

Marie Antoinette recovered all her gayety, and thought no more of the morrow. She was even seen, during her walks, to seek the most retired spots, as if wishing to withdraw her thoughts from every material and mundane subject. She was still walking with Madame de Lamballe and the Comte d'Artois, who had joined her, when the king withdrew to the Council after dinner.

The king was in an irritable humor. The news from Russia was bad. A vessel had been lost in the Gulf of Lyons. Certain provinces had refused to pay taxes. A fine map of the world, polished and varnished by the king himself, had cracked by reason of the excessive heat; and Europe had split into two parts, at the junction of thirty degrees of latitude with fifty-five of longitude. His Majesty was out of humor with everybody, even Monsieur de Calonne.

In vain the latter produced his fine, scented portfolio, in his most pleasant manner. The king began, silent and morose, to draw on a piece of white paper irregular figures, which signified "Tempest," just as the figures of men and horses signified "Fine weather."

For it was the fancy of the king to make drawings during the meetings of the Council. Louis XVI. did not like to look people in the face, for he was timid. A pen in his hand gave him assurance and support. While he was thus occupied the orator might unfold his arguments; the king, casting a furtive glance, would catch now and then a little of the fire of the speaker's looks, — just enough to prevent his forgetting the man while considering the idea.

If he spoke himself, — and he could speak well, — his drawing took from his discourse every appearance of pretension, for there were no gestures to be made. He could be deliberate in what he said, or animated, as he pleased; the lines upon the paper took the place of oratorical flourishes.

On this occasion, then, the king took up a pen, according to his custom, and the ministers began the reading of their outlines, or of diplomatic notes. The king did not breathe a word; he allowed the foreign correspondence to be gone through with as if he did not understand a word about such matters.

But at last the details of the monthly accounts were reached; then the king raised his head. Monsieur de Calonne had just unfolded his plan relative to the loan projected for the following year. The king began to draw furiously. "Always borrowing money," he said, "without knowing how it is to be paid! That is a problem for you, Monsieur de Calonne."

"Sire, a loan is only turning a stream from one direction to cause it to flow more abundantly in another. In deepening the channel you only increase the supply; therefore let us not think of paying, but only of obtaining present funds, for the problem of which your Majesty speaks is not, 'How can we pay?' but, 'Can we find creditors?'"

The king made his crossed lines in the very darkest shade, but he did not say a word; his lines spoke for themselves.

Monsieur de Calonne having explained his plan, which was approved by his colleagues, the king took the proposal and signed it, sighing meanwhile.

"Now that we have money," said Monsieur de Calonne, "let us spend it."

The king looked at his minister with a wry face, and his crossed lines became one enormous blot.

Monsieur de Calonne presented him a statement consisting of a list of pensions, gifts, and payments to be made. The statement was not long, and was very clear; the king looked over the pages, and ran over the sum total.

"One million one hundred thousand francs for so little! How can this be?" and he let his pen rest.

"Read, Sire, read, and be pleased to remark that of the eleven hundred thousand francs, one single item consists of five hundred thousands francs."

"What item, Monsieur?"

"An advance made to her Majesty the queen, Sire."

"To the queen!" cried Louis XVI. "Five hundred thousand francs to the queen! Eh, Monsieur, that is not possible!"

"Pardon, Sire! but the figures are correct."

"Five hundred thousand francs to the queen!" repeated the king. "There must be some error. Last week — no, a fortnight ago — I paid the queen her quarterly allowance."

"Sire, if the queen has need of money, — and it is well known what use she makes of it, — it is not extraordinary —"

"No, no!" cried the king, who wished his frugality to be publicly known, and felt the need of conciliating the people, so that they would applaud the queen when she went to the Opera. "The queen does not wish for this money, Monsieur de Calonne. The queen told me that a ship of the line was better than jewels. The queen thinks that if France is obliged to borrow money to feed its poor, we who are rich should lend to France. Therefore if the queen needs this money, her merit will be all the greater if she waits for it; and I guarantee that she will wait."

The ministers applauded this patriotic outburst of the king, whom the divine Horace would not have called uxorius at that moment. Monsieur de Calonne alone, who knew the queen's embarrassment, insisted on the allowance being granted.

"Truly," said the king, "you are more interested for us than we are for ourselves. Compose yourself, Monsieur de Calonne."

"The queen, Sire, will accuse me of having shown very little zeal in her service."

"I will plead your cause with her."

"The queen never asks for money but when compelled by necessity."

"If the queen has needs, they are less imperious, I hope, than those of the poor; and she will be the first to acknowledge it."

"Sire —"

"The matter is settled," said the king, resolutely, and he began to draw the crossed lines.

"You cancel this credit, Sire?" said Monsieur de Calonne, in consternation.

"I cancel it," replied Louis XVI., majestically, "and I fancy I hear the queen, in her generosity, thanking me for having so well understood her heart."

Monsieur de Calonne bit his lips. Louis, content with this personal sacrifice, accepted all the other items with blind confidence; and he drew a beautiful zebra, surrounded by zeros, saying, "I have this evening gained five hundred thousand francs, —a pretty good day's work for a king, Calonne. You must carry this good news to the queen; you will see, you will see."

"Ah, my God, Sire!" murmured the minister, "I should be grieved to deprive you of the pleasure of such an avowal. Every one according to his deserts."

"So be it," replied the king. "Let us break up. We have accomplished work enough when that which has been done is good. Ah, here comes the queen; let us go to meet her, Calonne."

"Sire, I beg your Majesty's pardon, but I have my signatures to attend to," and he slipped off as quickly as possible through the corridor.

The king went courageously, and beaming with delight, to meet Marie Antoinette, who was singing in the vestibule, leaning on the arm of the Comte d'Artois.

"Madame," he said, "you have had a pleasant walk, I hope."

"Yes, Sire; and have you had a successful meeting?"

"You may judge of that; I have gained for you five hundred thousand francs."

"Calonne has kept his word," thought the queen.

"Only imagine, Calonne had put you down in his statement for half a million."

"Oh!" said Marie Antoinette, smiling.

"And I — I struck it out. Five hundred thousand francs gained by the stroke of a pen!"

"How, struck out?" said the queen, growing pale.

"Completely. What I have done will be of great advantage to you. Good-evening, Madame, good-evening."

"Sire! Sire!"

"I am very hungry; I am going in. Do you not think my supper has been well earned?"

"But, Sire, listen."

But Louis XVI. skipped off, delighted with his joke, leaving the queen astounded, mute, and dismayed.

"Brother, find Monsieur de Calonne for me," she said finally, to the Comte d'Artois; "there is some trick under all this." Just then the following note was brought to the queen, —

"Your Majesty will have learned that the king refused your grant. It is incomprehensible, Madame, and I retired from the Council sick and full of grief."

"Read," she said, passing the note to the Comte d'Artois.

"And there are those who say that we squander the revenue, sister!" cried the prince. "It is a proceeding — "

"Quite husband-like," murmured the queen.

"I offer you my condolences, dear sister, and it is a lesson for me; I was going to ask for money to-morrow."

"Let Madame de La Motte be immediately sent for," said the queen to Madame de Misery, after long meditation.

CHAPTER XX.

QUEEN AND WOMAN.

THE courier who had been sent to Paris in search of Madame de La Motte, found the countess, or rather did not find her, at the house of the Cardinal de Rohan.

Jeanne had gone thither to pay a visit to his Eminence. She had dined there, had taken supper there, and was conversing with him about that disastrous restitution, when the courier came to inquire if the countess were there. The well-trained guard replied that his Eminence had gone out, and that Madame de La Motte was not there, but that nothing was easier than to give her the message from the queen, since she would probably come to the hôtel in the evening.

"She must repair to Versailles as soon as possible," said the courier, and he departed, having left the same message in all the supposed domiciles of the wandering countess.

But the messenger had hardly gone before the porter, executing his commission without going far, sent his wife to Madame de La Motte with the message as she sat at supper with the cardinal, philosophizing upon the instability of large sums of money.

The countess knew that she must depart immediately. The cardinal himself placed her in a light carriage without armorial bearings, and the countess was driven with such rapidity that in less than an hour she had arrived at the palace. She was introduced without delay into the queen's bedchamber. The only attendant in the apartment was Madame de Misery, who was reading in the small boudoir, the queen's toilet for the night having been completed.

Marie Antoinette was embroidering, or pretending to embroider, listening eagerly for every noise from without, when Jeanne hurried into the room.

"Ah!" cried the queen, "you have come. So much the better. I have news, Countess."

"Good news, Madame."

"You shall judge of that. The king has refused the five hundred thousand francs."

"To Monsieur de Calonne?"

"To everybody. The king will not give me any more money. Such things happen only to me."

"My God!" murmured the countess.

"Incredible, is it not, Countess? To refuse, to cancel the order already drawn up! But it is useless to talk about it. You must return quickly to Paris."

"Yes, Madame."

"And tell the cardinal that since he is so kind, I will accept the five hundred thousand francs until I receive my next quarterly allowance. It is selfish on my part, I know, Countess, but it is necessary."

"Madame," murmured Jeanne, "we are lost! Monsieur le Cardinal has no more money."

The queen started, as if she had just been wounded or insulted. "No more money?" she stammered.

"Madame, an unexpected claim has been made upon Monsieur de Rohan. It was a debt of honor, and he has paid it."

"Five hundred thousand francs?"

"Yes, Madame."

"But —"

"The last money he had; he has no further resources."

The queen was silent, as if stunned by this misfortune. "Am I really awake?" she said. "It is only to me that such things happen. How do you know this, Countess, — that Monsieur de Rohan has no more money?"

"He told me of this disaster not an hour and a half ago, Madame. This disaster is the more irreparable, since the five hundred thousand francs were what they call 'the bottom of the drawer.'"

The queen leaned her head on her hands.

"Something must be done," she said.

"What is the queen going to do?" thought Jeanne.

"You see, Countess, it is a terrible lesson, which will punish me for having committed, without the knowledge of the king, an action of slight importance, of unworthy ambition, or pitiful vanity. I had no need of this necklace, now acknowledge it."

"True, Madame; but if a queen should consult only her needs and her tastes —"

"I wish above all to consult my peace of mind, the happiness of my family. It required nothing less than this first check to prove to me to how much annoyance I was about to expose myself, how fruitful in disgrace the road I had chosen. I renounce it. Let us always proceed frankly and straightforwardly."

"Madame!"

"And as a beginning, let us sacrifice our vanity on the altar of duty, as Monsieur Dorat would say." Then, with a sigh, "Ah, and yet that necklace was very beautiful!" she murmured.

"It is so still, Madame; and it is as good as money too, this necklace."

"From this time forth it is for me but a collection of stones, — stones which, after one has played with them as children play with marbles, are thrown aside and forgotten."

"What does the queen mean?"

"The queen means, dear Countess, that you will take the necklace brought by Monsieur de Rohan, and carry it back to the jewellers, Boehmer and Bossange."

"To return it?"

"Precisely."

"But, Madame, your Majesty has given two hundred and fifty thousand francs as earnest money."

"And that will be a gain of two hundred and fifty thousand francs; my accounts will then agree with those of the king."

"Madame, Madame," cried the countess, "to lose thus a quarter of a million! For it may happen that the jewellers will make some difficulty about returning funds of which they may have disposed."

"I expect it, and intend giving up the earnest money on condition that the bargain shall be broken. Now that I see my way out of the affair I feel easier. This necklace brought with it cares, griefs, fears, suspicions. These diamonds would never have had fire enough to dry all the tears which I feel hanging like clouds over me. Countess, bring me that casket immediately. The jewellers make a good thing of it. Two hundred and fifty thousand francs bonus is a handsome profit; they would make no greater profit by selling it to me, and besides they have the necklace. I think they will not complain, and that no one will know anything about it. The cardinal aimed only to give me pleasure. You will tell him that it is my pleasure not to have this necklace; and if he is a man of sense, he will understand me; if he is a good priest, he will encourage and strengthen me in my sacrifice." The queen held out to Jeanne the closed casket; the latter gently thrust it back. "Madame," said she, "why not try to obtain more time?"

"Ask for time? — no!"

"I said 'obtain,' Madame."

"To ask is to humiliate one's self, Countess; to obtain is to be humiliated. I can understand how one may humiliate himself in behalf of a person he loves, or to benefit a living creature, were it only a dog; but not for the sake of gaining the right to keep these stones, which scorch like burning coals, — no advice could ever persuade me to do that, never! Take away the casket, my dear, take it."

"But consider, Madame, the noise these jewellers may make, — through politeness, at least, and sympathy with you. Your rejection of the diamonds will compromise you as much as your acceptance of them might have done. Every one will know that you have had them in your possession."

"No one will know about it. I no longer owe anything to these jewellers; I will not receive them again. For my two hundred and fifty thousand francs they can at least be silent. And my enemies, instead of being able to say that I spend a million and a half for diamonds, can say only that I lose money in speculation, which is less disagreeable. Take them away, Countess, and cordially thank Monsieur de Rohan for his kindness and his good intentions." With a peremptory movement she placed the casket in Jeanne's hands, who took possession of them with a peculiar emotion.

"You have no time to lose," continued the queen. "The less anxiety the jewellers have to suffer, the more assured we shall be of their silence. Go at once; and let no one see the casket. Go home first; for an immediate resort to the jewellers might arouse the suspicions of the police, who are much interested in what I do. Then, when you have thus eluded the spies, go to the jewellers, and afterward bring me their receipt."

"Yes, Madame; this shall be done, since you so determine."

Jeanne put the casket under her cloak, taking care that its shape should not be perceptible, and entered her carriage with all the zeal which her august accomplice in this act might have desired. In the first place, obeying orders, she went home; she then sent back the carriage to Monsieur de Rohan, so that the coachman should know nothing of her secret. She changed her costume for one less elegant and more appropriate for her nocturnal expedition. Her maid, while rapidly dressing her, noticed that she was thoughtful and preoccupied during that operation, to which usually she gave close attention.

In fact, Jeanne was not thinking of her toilet; her mind was fixed on a new and strange idea suggested by the occasion. She asked herself whether the cardinal would not make a grave mistake in allowing the queen to return the necklace, and whether that error would not imperil the career of which he dreamed, and which, as sharer in the queen's secrets, he might hope to enjoy. To act on the orders of Marie Antoinette without consulting him would be to fail in the most obvious duties of their partnership. Though he was at the end of his resources, might not the cardinal prefer to sell himself rather than see the queen deprived of an object she had so much desired?

"I cannot do otherwise," Jeanne said to herself, "than consult the cardinal. Fourteen hundred thousand francs!" she added; "he cannot obtain fourteen hundred thousand francs." Then turning suddenly to her maid, "Go, Rose," she said.

The maid went out, and Madame de La Motte resumed her meditations. "What a sum! what a fortune! what a brilliant life! How well is all the happiness and splendor to be procured by so much money represented by the little serpent of jewels which glitters in this casket."

Jeanne opened the jewel-case and scorched her eyes by contact with those streaming flames. She took up the necklace, wound it round her fingers, and clasped it in her little hands, saying: "I can thus grasp fourteen hundred thousand francs; for this necklace is worth fourteen hundred thousand francs, and the jewellers would pay that price for it even now. Strange destiny, which suffers the little Jeanne de Valois, an obscure mendicant, to touch the hand of a queen (the first queen in the world), and to hold in her hands, for a little while at least, fourteen hundred thousand francs, — a sum of money which is never allowed to travel alone, but goes attended by an armed escort, or assured by guarantees not less than those of a cardinal and a queen. All this within my ten fingers! How heavy it is, and yet how light! In order to transport the equivalent of this necklace in gold — that precious metal — I should need two horses. To carry it in notes — and are notes always paid? Is there not a signature to write, and an account to keep? And then a note is only paper; it may be destroyed by fire, air, or water. A bank-note is not current in all countries; and it betrays its origin, it reveals the name of its maker and of its bearer. A bank-note, after a certain lapse of time, loses a part of, or all, its value. Diamonds, on the contrary, are of a hard material which can resist everything, and which every one recognizes, appreciates, admires, and is ready to buy, whether in London, Berlin, Madrid, or even in Brazil. Every one knows the value of diamonds, especially of diamonds like these. How beautiful they are! — wonderful, either together or taken singly! Each one by itself is probably worth more, in proportion, than all together are worth. But of what am I thinking?" she said, suddenly. "Come, quick! I must make up my mind either to go to the cardinal or to carry the necklace to the jewellers as the queen directed."

Jeanne rose, still holding the shining diamonds in her hands. "They will be returned to that cold jeweller," she said to herself, "who will weigh them, and polish them with a brush; and they might have shone on the bosom of Marie Antoinette. Boehmer will cry out at first, but will be quieted by the reflection that he has both the profit of the sale and the merchandise itself. Ah, I forgot, — in what form should that receipt be written? It is an important question; yes, the making of that receipt requires diplomacy. It must be conceived in such terms as not to compromise Boehmer, or the queen, or the cardinal, or myself. I can never write it alone; I must have advice. The cardinal — Oh, no; if the cardinal loved me more, or if he were richer and could give me the diamonds —"

She sat down on the sofa, turning the diamonds in her hand; her head was hot, and her mind full of confused thoughts which at times frightened her, and which she repelled with feverish energy. Suddenly her eye became more tranquil, more fixed on the image of a single persistent idea. She was not conscious of the flight of the moments; she was not aware that she was forming a conclusion that could not afterward be changed. Like swimmers who have placed their feet on a quicksand, every movement she made to extricate herself only buried her the more deeply. An hour passed while she thus abandoned herself to the silent, absorbing contemplation of a mysterious purpose. She then rose slowly, pale as an inspired priestess, and rang for her maid. It was two o'clock in the morning. "Find me a carriage, or a wheeled chair if no carriage can be had," said she.

The servant found a carriage in the old Rue du Temple. Madame de La Motte entered it alone. Ten minutes later the carriage stopped at the door of the journalist Reteau de Villette.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE RECEIPT AND THE ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

THE result of that nocturnal visit to Reteau de Villette appeared on the next day. At seven o'clock in the morning Madame de La Motte sent the queen a letter containing the jeweller's receipt in the following words: —

We the undersigned acknowledge the receipt of a diamond necklace which had been sold to the queen for sixteen hundred thousand francs, the diamonds failing to suit her Majesty, who has recompensed us for our trouble and outlay by leaving in our hands the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand francs, previously paid.

BOEHMER AND BOSSANGE.

The queen, at length easy in mind concerning an affair which had given her so much trouble, put the receipt in a drawer, and dismissed the subject from her thoughts.

But, in singular incongruity with this receipt, the jewellers were visited two days later by Cardinal de Rohan, who was still anxious concerning the first payment agreed upon between the jewellers and the queen. He found Boehmer at home. Had there been any failure of payment, any delay or refusal, the camp of the jewellers should show signs of alarm. On the contrary everything indicated quiet and security; and Boehmer received his illustrious patron with effusive demonstrations of pleasure.

"Well," said the cardinal, "to-day is the day appointed for the first payment; the queen has paid you, then?"

"No, Monseigneur; the queen has not been able to give us any money. You know that Monsieur de Calonne was refused by the king. Every one is talking of it."

"Yes, every one is talking of it, Boehmer; and it is that refusal which brings me here to-day."

"But," continued the jeweller, "her Majesty is very kind; she has guaranteed the debt, and we have no more to ask."

"Ah, so much the better!" cried the cardinal; "guaranteed the debt, you say? Very good; but in what. manner?"

"In the most simple and delicate manner," replied the jeweller, — "a manner altogether royal."

"Through the mediation of that bright countess, perhaps?"

"No, Monseigneur, no. Madame de La Motte does not appear in the matter; and this has seemed to us very flattering."

"The countess does not appear? You may believe, however, that she has had to do with the affair, Monsieur Boehmer. Every wise suggestion must have come from her, — I do not intend disparagement of her Majesty, you understand."

"Monseigneur can judge whether her Majesty has been considerate toward us. When the rumor reached us that the king had rejected the order for five hundred thousand francs we wrote to Madame de La Motte."

"When was that?"

"Yesterday, Monseigneur."

"What did she reply?"

"Your Eminence knows nothing about it?" asked Boehmer, with a slight degree of respectful familiarity.

"No; it is three days since I had the honor of seeing the countess."

"Well, Monseigneur, Madame de La Motte responded with a single word, — 'Wait!'"

"In writing?"

"No, Monseigneur, orally. In our letter we begged Madame de La Motte to ask you for an audience, and to warn the queen that the payment was nearly due."

"The word 'wait' was very natural."

"We therefore waited, Monseigneur; and last evening we received by a mysterious courier a letter from the queen."

"A letter? — to you, Boehmer?"

"Or rather an acknowledgment in the proper form, Monseigneur."

"Let me see it," said the cardinal.

"Oh, I would show it to you if we had not sworn to let no one see it."

"And why?"

"Because this reserve is imposed on us by the queen herself, Monseigneur."

"Ah, that is another matter! You are very fortunate, you jewellers, to have letters from the queen."

"For thirteen hundred and fifty thousand francs, Monseigneur," said the jeweller, with a grin, "one may have —"

"Ten millions, a hundred millions, would not pay for some things, Monsieur," replied the prelate, in a severe tone. "In short, then, you have a good guarantee?"

"The best possible, Monseigneur."

"The queen acknowledges the debt?"

"In due form."

"And engages to pay —"

"In three months five hundred thousand francs; and the balance in six."

"And — the interest?"

"Oh, Monseigneur, a single word from her Majesty makes that secure. 'Let us settle this matter,' her Majesty graciously adds, 'between ourselves.' Your Excellency will understand the meaning of that request. 'You will have no reason for regret.' This is over her signature. Therefore, you see, Monseigneur, that from this moment the transaction is, to my partner and myself, an affair of honor."

"Then I am entirely out of your debt, Monsieur Boehmer," said the cardinal, much pleased. "May we soon have business together again."

"Whenever your Eminence may deign to honor us with your confidence."

"But you must notice still in this affair the hand of that amiable countess?"

"We are very grateful to Madame de La Motte, Monseigneur; and it has been agreed between my partner and myself that we will acknowledge her kindness when the full payment for the necklace shall have put us in possession of ready money."

"Hush, hush!" said the cardinal; "you misunderstand me." He returned to his carriage attended by manifestations of respect from all in the house.

We may now lift the mask. The statue is unveiled to all eyes. All our readers understood what plot Jeanne de La Motte was meditating against her benefactress, on seeing her borrow the pen of Reteau de Villette. There was no longer any anxiety in the minds of the jewellers; no more scruples troubled the queen; no uncertainty remained to the cardinal. Three months remained for the perpetration of the theft and the crime; in those three months the ill-omened fruitage would be so far matured that it might be plucked by the felonious hand.

Jeanne paid a visit to the cardinal, who asked her how the queen had contrived to allay so completely the jewellers' eagerness for their money. She replied that the queen had treated with the jewellers confidentially, and had enjoined them to secrecy; that if the queen had paid ready money she would even then have had to exercise too much concealment. But still more was necessary to her since she had bought on credit.

The cardinal assented to this view of the matter, and asked whether the queen was mindful of his good intentions. Thereupon Jeanne drew such a picture of the queen's gratitude that Monsieur de Rohan was enthusiastic, — much more as a man of gallantry than as a subject, more exalted in his pride than in his devotion.

Jeanne, having brought the conversation to a satisfactory conclusion, returned home, and proceeded to execute the plan she had formed. She had resolved to negotiate with some dealer in precious stones the sale of diamonds to the amount of three hundred thousand francs, and then go to England or to Russia, where she could live sumptuously on that sum for five or six years; and at the end of that time she could with less danger begin to sell one by one the remainder of the diamonds. But the event was not in accordance with her wishes. On her first exhibition of diamonds to two experts she was alarmed by their surprise and reserve. One of them offered her a contemptible price; and the other went into ecstasies over the stones, saying he had never seen any equal to them except on Boehmer's necklace.

Jeanne halted. Had she gone a step farther she would have betrayed herself. She understood that imprudence in such a matter meant ruin, and that ruin meant the pillory and perpetual imprisonment. She put the diamonds under lock and key, in the most secret of her hiding-places, and resolved to provide herself with weapons of defence so strong, and offensive arms so sharp, that in case of war they who should come to the encounter would be vanquished in advance.

To have to steer between the curiosity of the cardinal, who would want to know everything, and the indiscretion of the queen, who would be always ready to boast of having refused the necklace, was to be exposed to a terrible danger. A word exchanged between the queen and the cardinal, and all would be discovered. Jeanne comforted herself with the reflection that the cardinal, being in love with the queen, wore a bandage over his eyes, like all other lovers, and consequently would readily fall into any snare which cunning might lay for him, addressed to his love. But this snare must be contrived by a skilful hand, and in such a manner as to entrap both the interested parties. It must be so contrived that in case the queen should discover the theft she would not dare to complain, and that if the cardinal made the discovery he would see that a single word would destroy him. She had to play a masterstroke against two adversaries who would have all the spectators in their favor.

Jeanne did not draw back. Hers was one of those intrepid natures which push evil to heroism, and good to evil. From this time her mind was occupied by a single thought, — how to prevent an interview between the queen and the cardinal. So long as she, Jeanne, was between them all was safe; but if in her absence they should exchange a word, Jeanne's fortune would tumble into ruin.

"They must never meet," she said, — "never! But the cardinal will wish to see the queen; he will endeavor to do so. Let us not wait for him to make the attempt; let us inspire him with the idea. Let him wish to see her; let him demand to see her, — but in such a way that he will be compromised. Yes, but if he only is compromised?" This thought threw her into a painful perplexity. "He alone being compromised, the queen has her remedy. The queen speaks loud; she knows so well how to tear the mask from the face of an impostor.

"What is to be done? That the queen may not be able to accuse, it is necessary that she shall be unable to speak; to close that noble and courageous mouth, its springs must be compressed by the initiative of an accusation. For that man dare not, before a tribunal, accuse his valet of theft, who could be convicted by his valet of a crime as dishonorable. Let Monsieur de Rohan be compromised in relation to the queen, and it is almost certain that the queen will be compromised too. But those two persons interested to discover the secret must not come together by chance."

Jeanne recoiled at first in view of the immensity of the rock suspended over her head. Could she live thus, agitated, terrified, always dreading its fall? How, then, could she escape from the danger? By flight; by exile; by carrying to a foreign land the diamonds of the queen's necklace? Flight would be easy enough. In ten hours, in a good carriage, she would be secure. But what scandal! what disgrace! She would be no longer a woman of rank, but a thief; in safety, but proscribed, — a fugitive whom justice cannot reach, but whom justice can point out; whom the executioner's red-hot iron cannot brand, but whom public opinion breaks in pieces and devours. No, she will not flee. She will be bold and remain. This resolution was confirmed in her mind when she had imagined the possibility of creating between the queen and the cardinal a bond of fear against the day when either of them should discover that a theft had been committed.

Jeanne had calculated how much money she would be likely to gain in two years from the queen's favor and the cardinal's love. She had estimated the revenue from these two sources at five or six hundred thousand francs; after which weariness, disgrace, abandonment, would come to off-set the favor, the confidence, and the influence she had possessed. "By my plan," she said to herself, "I shall gain seven or eight hundred thousand francs."

One may see how Jeanne, notwithstanding her profound intelligence, entered upon the tortuous road which would terminate in disgrace for her, in despair for the others.

"I will remain in Paris," the countess resumed. "I will witness calmly all the play of the two actors, and will permit them to play only in rôles favorable to my interests. I can then select the most favorable opportunity for flight, whether it be some commission on the part of the queen, or her actual displeasure, which I may make a pretext for my departure. But the cardinal must hold no communication with Marie Antoinette. And here lies the great difficulty, for Monsieur de Rohan is in love, he is a prince, he has the privilege of visiting her Majesty several times a year; and the queen, coquettish, eager for homage, and grateful toward the cardinal, will not avoid him if he tries to see her. As to the way in which these august personages may be kept apart, events will furnish it; it is for me to aid events.

"Nothing could be so much to the purpose as to arouse in the queen that pride which is the crown of chastity. There can be no doubt that her fine and sensitive spirit would resent an advance a little too eager on the part of the cardinal. Natures like hers are fond of homage, but they suspect and repel attacks. Yes, the method is infallible. If Monsieur de Rohan can be persuaded to declare himself freely, he will awaken in the mind of the queen a feeling of disgust, of antipathy, which will separate finally, not the prince from the princess, but the man from the woman, the male from the female. In that way arms will be furnished against the cardinal, which in the great day of battle will paralyze all his activities.

"So far, good. But now, again, in making the cardinal offensive to the queen I shall have acted against the cardinal only. The queen's virtue will be more conspicuous, she will be freed from all suspicion, and she will have gained that freedom of speech which facilitates accusations and lends to them the weight of authority.

"What is necessary, then, is a proof against Monsieur de Rohan and against the queen, — a two-edged sword which shall cut in both directions; an accusation which will make the queen turn pale, and will make the cardinal blush, and which, being accredited, will free from all suspicion Jeanne, the confidant of the two guilty principals. What is necessary is a combination behind which, when the occasion requires, Jeanne can intrench herself and say, 'Do not accuse me, or I will accuse you; do not destroy me, or I will destroy you. Leave me my fortune, and I will leave you your honor.' That is worth seeking for, and I will try to discover it. My time is paid for from this time forth."

Madame de La Motte drew her arm-chair to the window, illumined by the sun, buried herself in its soft cushions, and began her search.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE PRISONER.

During these meditations of the countess, a scene of a very different kind was taking place in the Rue Saint Claude, in a house opposite that inhabited by Jeanne.

It will be remembered that Cagliostro had established in Balsamo's old hôtel the fugitive Oliva, who was pursued by the police of Monsieur de Crosne. Mademoiselle Oliva, who had been in a state of great anxiety, had accepted with joy this opportunity to escape both the police and Beausire. She therefore lived retired, concealed, and trembling, in this mysterious dwelling which had been the scene of so many terrible dramas, — more terrible, alas, than the tragi-comic adventure of Mademoiselle Nicole Legay.

Cagliostro had provided most carefully for her comfort. It was very pleasant to her to be under the protection of that grand nobleman, who asked nothing of her, but who seemed to hope for much. "But what did he hope for?" she often asked herself in vain. To Mademoiselle Oliva, Monsieur de Cagliostro, the man who had overawed Beausire and triumphed over the agents of the police, was a benignant God. He was also very much in love, since he respected her. For Oliva's vanity led her to believe that Cagliostro intended some day to make her his mistress. It is a virtue, in the eyes of those women who no longer possess any, to be capable of inspiring a respectful love. That heart is indeed withered, arid, altogether dead, which no longer hopes for love and the respect which goes with it. Therefore Oliva began to build castles in the air, in which, we must confess, poor Beausire very rarely had a place; and the two visits a week paid to her by Cagliostro were eagerly anticipated. At these visits Oliva, bedecked with the pretty things she found on her toilet-tables, assumed grand airs and played the fine lady.

In her fine salon, in the midst of real and refined luxury, the little creature, intoxicated with delight, acknowledged to herself that everything in her past life had been deception and error; that contrary to the assertion of the moralist, "Virtue makes happiness," it was happiness that invariably produced virtue. Unfortunately, there was lacking in the composition of this happiness one element indispensable to its continuance. Oliva was happy, but she was lonely. Books, pictures, musical instruments, were not sufficient to amuse her. The books were soon read through, — such as suited her taste, — and pictures and music afforded her no lasting satisfaction.

It must be admitted that very soon Oliva was heartily tired of her happiness, and began to regret her mornings passed at the windows of the Rue Dauphine, where she used to sit to attract the attention of the passers-by. And then those pleasant walks in the Saint Germain quarter, when, her coquettish shoe raised on heels two inches high, revealing a foot of voluptuous shape, each step of the lovely walker was a triumph, and drew from the admiring spectators little cries, either of fear when she slipped, or of pleasure when in addition to her foot she showed her ankle.

The imprisoned Nicole began to think of these things. It is true that the agents of the police were very formidable personages; that the Hospital, in which women pass their lives in a vile captivity, could not compare with the ephemeral and splendid imprisonment of the Rue Saint Claude. But what availed it to be a woman, and to have the right to be capricious, if one could not sometimes rebel against the good and change it into evil, at least in imagination? Nicole, then, regretted her lost liberty, and in regretting her liberty began to long for Beausire.

We come now to a day of special grief and irritability, when Oliva, having been deprived of all society for two weeks, with nothing to engage her attention, entered upon a very gloomy season of ennui. Having exhausted all means of diversion, not daring to appear at the windows or to go out, she began to lose her appetite, — not, however, the appetite of the imagination, which, on the contrary, increased as the other diminished.

While she was in this state of moral agitation she received an unexpected visit from Cagliostro. He entered as usual by the lower door of the hôtel, and crossing the little garden recently laid out in the court-yard, knocked on the shutters of the apartment occupied by Oliva. Four knocks, at intervals agreed upon between them, were the signal for drawing the bolt which the young woman had thought necessary to demand as a safeguard against a visitor armed with keys.

On hearing Cagliostro's signal, she drew the bolt with a haste which showed her desire for a conference with him. Lively as a Parisian grisette, she rushed forward to meet her noble jailer, and in harsh, impatient tones cried out, "Monsieur, I wish you to know that I am homesick."

Cagliostro, turning his head slightly, looked at her. "You are homesick?" he said, closing the door; "that is a grievous malady."

"I am unhappy here. I shall die here."

"Really!"

"Yes; I have bad thoughts."

"There, there," said the count, quieting her as if she had been a pet spaniel; "if you are not comfortable in my house, do not blame me for it. Keep your anger for the lieutenant of police, who persecutes you."

"You exasperate me with your coolness, Monsieur," said Oliva. "I would rather you flew in a passion; you manage to pacify me, and that makes me mad with rage."

"Acknowledge, Mademoiselle, that you are unreasonable," replied Cagliostro, sitting down at some distance from her, with that affectation of respect, or indifference, which succeeded so well with Oliva.

"It is all very well for you to talk," she said; "you come and go as you like. You breathe the fresh air; you can choose your own pleasures. I vegetate in the space to which you have limited me; I do not breathe, I tremble. I tell you, Monsieur, that your assistance is useless to me if it does not prevent me from dying."

"Dying! you!" said the count, smiling. "Nonsense!"

"I tell you that you are behaving very badly to me; you forget that I love some one deeply, passionately."

"Monsieur Beausire?"

"Yes, Beausire. I love him, I tell you. I never concealed it from you, I believe. You did not imagine I should forget my Beausire?"

"So little did I think so, Mademoiselle, that I bring you news of him."

"Ah!" said Oliva.

"Monsieur de Beausire," continued Cagliostro, "is a charming fellow!"

"Parbleu!" said Oliva, who did not see what the count was driving at.

"Young and handsome."

"Yes; is he not?"

"Full of imagination."

"Full of fire — rather rough toward me; but he who loves well chastises well."

"Your words are golden. You have as much heart as mind, and as much mind as beauty; and I who know this, I who am interested in everything loving in the world, — it is a mania with me, — I have conceived the idea of bringing you and Monsieur Beausire together again."

"You did not have that idea a month ago," said Oliva, with a constrained smile.

"Listen, my dear child; every honest man who sees a pretty woman seeks to please her when he is free, as I am. However, you will acknowledge that if I did pay you some little attention it did not last long, eh?"

"It is true," said Oliva, in the same tone, "a quarter of an hour at the most."

"It was very natural that I should desist, seeing how much you loved Monsieur de Beausire."

"Ah, you are making fun of me!"

"No, upon my honor! You resisted me so vigorously."

"Yes, have I not?" cried Oliva, delighted at being accused of the flagrant crime of resistance. "Yes, you must acknowledge that I resisted."

"It was the consequence of your love," said Cagliostro, phlegmatically.

"But your love, yours," retorted Oliva, "was not very tenacious, then."

"No; I am neither old enough nor ugly enough, neither poor enough nor foolish enough, to run the risk of a refusal. I felt that you would always have preferred Monsieur de Beausire to me, so I made up my mind accordingly."

"Oh, not at all! by no means!" said the coquette. "That famous partnership you proposed to me, — you know what I mean, — the right to give me your arm, to visit me, to pay court to me, with all respect and honor, was there not in that some little remains of hope?" and while saying these words the wily girl cast upon her visitor such ardent glances, from eyes too long idle, that he was hardly able to withstand them.

"I acknowledge it," replied Cagliostro. "Your penetration is so great that nothing can escape it;" and he feigned to turn away his eyes so as not to be dazzled by her glances.

"Let us return to Beausire," she said, piqued at the count's indifference; "what is he doing, and where is he, the dear fellow?"

Cagliostro, looking at her still with some timidity, replied, "I said that I intended to re-unite you."

"No, you did not say that," she murmured, with disdain; "but since you say it now I hold you to it. Go on. Why did you not bring him here? — it would have been kind. He is free — "

"Because," replied Cagliostro, without showing any surprise at this irony, "Monsieur de Beausire, who, like you, has too much imagination, has embroiled himself with the police."

"He too!" cried Oliva, turning pale; for now she felt that she was listening to the truth.

"He too," repeated Cagliostro, politely.

"What has he done?" stammered the young woman.

"A charming frolic, an ingenious piece of jugglery! I call it a farce; but morose persons, Monsieur de Crosne, for instance, — you know how stupid he is, — well, he calls it robbery."

"Robbery!" cried Oliva, terrified. "My God!"

"A very pretty robbery indeed; and one which proves what a taste this poor Beausire has for fine things."

"Monsieur, Monsieur, is he arrested?"

"No; but he is pursued."

"Will you swear to me that he is not arrested, — that he is in no danger?"

"I can assure you that he is not arrested; but as to the second point I will not give you my word. You know, my dear child, that Monsieur de Beausire, with his figure, his appearance, with all his well-known qualities, having been described to the police, would, if he should show himself, be seized by these bloodhounds. Only think what a lucky catch it would be for Monsieur de Crosne to take you both!"

"Oh, yes, yes; he must conceal himself! Poor fellow! I must hide too. Let me leave France, Monsieur. Please to do me this service; because, you see, shut up here, stifled, I could not resist committing some imprudence."

"What do you call an imprudence, my dear girl?"

"Why, showing myself, going out to get some fresh air."

"Do not be alarmed, my dear; you are already very pale, and you would soon lose your beauty, and then Monsieur de Beausire would not love you any longer. No; take as much air as you please, and amuse yourself with looking out of the windows."

"There, Monsieur," cried Oliva, "you are vexed with me, and you also are about to desert me. I offend you perhaps."

"Me! Are you mad? And how could you have offended me?" he said coldly.

"Because a man who takes a fancy to a woman, — a man of your consequence, a handsome nobleman like you, — has a right to be vexed, to be disgusted even, when she is so silly as to repulse him. Oh, do not leave me, do not abandon me, do not hate me, Monsieur!" and the young woman, as frightened now as she had been coquettish, put her arm round Cagliostro's neck.

"Poor little one!" said the latter, imprinting a chaste kiss on Oliva's brow; "how frightened she is! Do not think so badly of me. You were in danger, and I rendered you a service. I had some plans with regard to you; I have given them up, that is all. I have no more hatred to manifest toward you than you have gratitude to offer me. I have acted for myself, you have acted for yourself; therefore we are quits."

"Oh, Monsieur, how good and generous you are!" and Oliva threw both arms, instead of one, round Cagliostro's neck.

But the latter looked at her with his accustomed tranquillity, "You see, Oliva, that if you should offer me your love, I —"

"Well?" said she, with a vivid blush.

"Were you to offer me your adorable person I should refuse, so much do I wish to inspire pure sentiments, free from all feeling of selfishness. You think yourself pledged to me. I should believe your feeling toward me one of gratitude rather than affection, of terror rather than love; let us remain as we are. I fulfil your wishes in this, I know, and anticipate your delicate reserve."

Oliva let fall her beautiful arms, and retired to a distance, ashamed, humiliated, the dupe of Cagliostro's apparent generosity, upon which she had not counted.

"So," said the count, "so, my dear Oliva, it is settled: you will still consider me as your friend; you will have every confidence in me; you will make use of my house, my purse, and my credit, and —"

"And I will say," said Oliva, "that there are men in the world superior to any I ever knew." She spoke these words with a charm and dignity which engraved a line upon that soul of bronze whose body was formerly called Balsamo.

"Every woman is good when you touch the right chord," thought Cagliostro.

"From this evening you shall inhabit the upper story of the hôtel. It is an apartment which consists of three rooms, situated so as to overlook the boulevard and the Rue Saint Claude. The windows look upon Ménilmontant and Belleville. A few persons may see you there; but they are peaceable neighbors, whom you need not fear, — worthy persons who attend to their own affairs and who will never suspect you. Let them see you without exposing yourself unnecessarily; but never allow yourself to be seen by those passing in the street, for the Rue Saint Claude is sometimes explored by the agents of Monsieur de Crosne. At least you will have, up there, air and sunshine."

Oliva clapped her hands joyfully.

"Would you like me to take you there?" said Cagliostro.

"This evening?"

"Certainly, this evening. Does it inconvenience you?"

Oliva looked fixedly at Cagliostro. A vague hope entered her heart, or rather her vain and perverted head.

"Let us go," she said.

The count took a lantern from the antechamber, opened several doors, and ascending a staircase, followed by Oliva, reached on the third story the apartment of which he had spoken. She found her new lodging furnished, decked with flowers, and ready for occupancy.

"I should think I was expected here," she cried.

"Not for you but for myself," said the count. "I like the view from this pavilion, and often sleep here."

Oliva's eyes assumed the yellow tint and flashing expression one sometimes sees in the eyes of cats. She began to speak; Cagliostro stopped her, saying, "You shall want for nothing here; your maid will be with you in a quarter of an hour," and he disappeared, with a low bow accompanied by a gracious smile.

The poor prisoner sat down in perfect consternation, almost crushed, by the bed, which already awaited her in an elegant alcove.

"I comprehend absolutely nothing of what is happening to me," she murmured, following with her eyes the man who was really incomprehensible to her.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE OBSERVATORY.

OLIVA went to bed as soon as the maid whom Cagliostro had sent to her had withdrawn. She slept but little. The thoughts of every nature to which her conversation with the count had given rise, brought only waking dreams or disturbed sleep. We are not happy long when we are too rich or too quiet, after having been too poor or too anxious.

Oliva pitied Beausire; she admired the count, whom she did not in the least understand. She no longer thought him timid; she did not suspect him of insensibility.

She felt very much afraid that her sleep might be disturbed by some sylph, and the slightest noise caused her that agitation known by every heroine of romance who sleeps in the North Tower. At the approach of daylight all these terrors — which, however, were not without a certain charm — fled from her. It can hardly be said that Nicole attained this hour of perfect security without some feeling of coquettish spite, — a shade of feeling indescribable by any pencil but that of Watteau, or by any pen but that of Marivaux or Crébillon, junior.

In the morning she allowed herself to sleep, enjoying the pleasure of absorbing in her flower-decked room the purple rays of the morning sun, of seeing the little birds running along the terrace of her window, where their wings made a charming rustling sound among the rose-trees and the Spanish jasmines.

And it was late, very late, when she felt sufficiently invigorated to seek for motion, too much so to remain idle and recumbent. Then she rose and ran into every corner of this new apartment in which that incomprehensible sylph — how ignorant he must be! — had not been able to find a trap-door through which he might have glided to clap his wings near her bed; and yet sylphs in those days, thanks to the Comte de Gabalis, had lost nothing of their innocent reputation.

Oliva enjoyed the sumptuousness of her apartment the more because it was unexpected. This apartment had been furnished for a man. In it was everything that could make life pleasant; above all, an abundance of light, and fresh, pure air, which would change dungeons into gardens, if it were possible for light and air to penetrate a prison. With childish joy she ran out to the terrace, threw herself down on the tiles among the flowers and mosses, like a snake emerging from its nest. Lying down thus, that she might not be seen from without, she looked between the bars of the balcony at the tops of the trees on the boulevards, the houses in the Popincourt quarter and the chimneys, — a misty ocean, whose unequal waves rose one above the other on her sight. Basking in the sun, listening to catch the noise of rolling carriages, — rather infrequent, indeed, but there was some rolling along the boulevard, — she remained thus very happy for two hours. She even drank the chocolate which the maid brought her, and read a newspaper before she even thought of looking into the street.

It was a dangerous pleasure. The bloodhounds of Monsieur de Crosne, those human hounds who hunt with the nose in the air, might see her. What a frightful awakening after a sleep so sweet!

But this horizontal position could not be maintained forever, pleasant as it might be. Nicole raised herself on her elbow, and then she saw the walnut-trees of Ménilmontant, the great trees of the cemetery, the myriads of houses of all colors which rose one above the other, from the hillside of Charonne to the heights of Chaumont, some surrounded by verdant groves, others upon the edges of the chalky cliffs which were covered with heaths and thistles. And here and there on the roads — narrow, ribbon-like paths, winding round these little mountains — in the vineyards, on the white high-roads, could be seen little living beings: peasants upon their asses, children leaning over the fields they were weeding, and vine-dressers trimming the vines.

This rusticity charmed Nicole, who had always sighed for the beautiful country of Taverney ever since she had left that country for this Paris which had been the great object of her desires. At last she was weary of this distant view, and as she had a comfortable and safe position among her flowers, as she could see without danger of being seen, she lowered her eyes from the mountain to the valley, from the horizon to the houses near her. Everywhere, — that is, in the space occupied by three houses, — Oliva found that the windows were closed, or offered but little to attract attention. Here was a house of three stories, inhabited by aged tenants hanging bird-cages on the outside or feeding cats within; there a four-story house, the garret of which, occupied by an Auvergnese porter, was the only one into which she could look, — the other tenants appearing to be absent, having gone into the country perhaps. Finally, a little to the left, in the third house, could be seen curtains of yellow silk, flowers, and — a suitable piece of furniture for this comfortable place — a soft arm-chair, which, placed near the window, seemed to await the dreamer who should occupy it. Oliva thought that she could distinguish in the deep shadow of this room a figure moving to and fro with regular motion. She restrained her impatience, concealed herself more carefully even than before, and calling her maid, she sought, by entering into conversation with her, to vary the pleasures of solitude by intercourse with a thinking, and better still, a speaking creature.

But the maid, contrary to all tradition, was reserved. She was very glad to explain to her mistress all about Belleville, Charonne, and the Père-Lachaise. She told her the names of the churches of Saint Ambroise and Saint Laurent; she pointed out how the boulevard made a curve in the direction of the right bank of the Seine; but when it came to the neighbors she had not a word to say, — she knew no more about them than her mistress did. Oliva learned nothing about the shadowy apartment with its curtains of yellow silk, nothing about the moving figure, nothing about the arm-chair.

If Oliva had not the satisfaction of learning something about her neighbor beforehand, at least she could promise herself that of making her acquaintance without the aid of another. Therefore she sent away her too discreet servant, that she might apply herself to her exploration without a witness.

The opportunity soon presented itself. The neighbors soon began to open their doors, to take their after-dinner siesta, or dress themselves for their walk in the Place Royale or in the Chemin Vert.

Oliva passed them all in review, with the exception of that restless figure, which, without showing her face, had at last buried itself in the arm-chair, and seemed to be absorbed in silent revery.

It was a woman. She had previously been under the hands of her hairdresser, who had constructed upon her head one of those Babylonian edifices into the composition of which entered minerals and vegetables, to which animals would have been added if Léonard had ever used them, and if a woman of that period would have consented to make a Noah's ark of her head. Then she had settled herself down in her easy-chair, her back supported by pillows so firm that the equilibrium of the body would be maintained and the monument on her head remain intact even though the house were shaken by an earthquake.

Oliva was at length able to remark that this lady with the magnificent head-dress was pretty; that her foot, which she had rested on the window-sill, and which was clad in a rose-colored satin slipper, was delicate and enticing. She admired especially her rounded arms and the contour of her bust; but that which impressed her more than anything was the absorbing nature of her thought, which seemed to render her whole body motionless, and to annihilate her by its power.

This woman, whom we have recognized and whom Oliva could not recognize, did not suspect that any one could see her. The windows opposite hers had never been opened. The hôtel of Monsieur de Cagliostro had never betrayed its secrets, and with the exception of the painters employed to restore it, no living being had been seen at its windows.

To explain this apparent contradiction of Cagliostro's assertion that he sometimes occupied the pavilion, a word will suffice. The count had given orders to have the apartment prepared for Oliva the evening previous, as if he were to occupy it himself. He had, so to speak, lied to himself, so well had his orders been executed.

The lady with the beautiful head-dress remained buried in thought; Oliva imagined that this beautiful dreamer was musing on some disappointment in love.

From the moment she had seen this pensive recluse

Oliva could not withdraw her eyes from her. She imagined that in her she had found her soul's sister. She constructed for her a romance similar to her own romance, thinking, ingenuous girl, that one could not be pretty and elegant and shut up in the Rue Saint Claude without having some serious anxiety in her heart.

When she had created her romantic story, Oliva, like all exceptional natures, allowed herself to be carried away by her fairy story; she took on wings to fly to meet her companion, whom in her impatience she wished to see impelled by wings like her own.

But the lady with the monument did not stir; she seemed to be sleeping in her chair. For two hours she had not moved. Oliva grew desperate. She would not have made to Adonis or poor Beausire one quarter the advances she had made to the unknown.

Weary of the struggle, her feelings changing from tenderness to hatred, she opened and shut her window repeatedly; as often she frightened the birds in the foliage, and made telegraphic signs so compromising that the most obtuse of the agents of Monsieur de Crosne, if he had been passing along the boulevard or the Rue Saint Claude, would not have failed to see them and try to find their meaning.

At length Nicole came to the conclusion that the lady with the beautiful hair must have seen her gestures, understood her signals, but that she scorned them, — that she was either vain or an idiot. Idiot! — with those fine intelligent eyes, such sensitive hands! Impossible.

Vain, yes; a woman of the nobility in those days was accustomed to look down on a mere citizen. Oliva, discerning in the countenance of the young woman all the characteristics of aristocracy, concluded that she was proud, and that it was impossible to move her; therefore she gave up the attempt.

Nicole was not aware that this supposed haughty lady was Jeanne de Valois, Comtesse de La Motte, who, since the evening before, had been in search of an idea; that her purpose was to prevent Marie Antoinette and the Cardinal de Rohan from meeting; that it was still more important that the cardinal, while he did not meet the queen in private life, should firmly believe that he did see her, and should be satisfied with this vision and cease to require the reality.

If Nicole had known all this, she would not have taken refuge, angrily, in the midst of her flowers; and she would not have thrown over the balcony, in so doing, a pot of fraxinella, which fell into the deserted street below with a frightful crash. Oliva, in alarm, looked quickly to see what damage she had caused.

The preoccupied lady was roused by the noise, saw the flower-pot upon the pavement, and ascended from the effect to the cause, — that is, she raised her eyes from the pavement of the street to the balcony of the hôtel, and she saw Oliva. On seeing her she uttered a loud cry, a cry of terror, a cry which was followed by a rapid movement of her whole body, lately so motionless and almost rigid.

Oliva's eyes and those of this lady met at last, questioned each other, penetrating each other.

Jeanne cried out in the first place, "The queen!" Then suddenly clasping her hands and knitting her brows without daring to move, lest she should cause the strange vision to flee, "Oh!" she murmured, "I sought for a way, and I have found it."

At this moment Oliva heard a noise behind her and turned quickly round. The count was in her room; he had noticed the exchange of glances.

"They have seen each other!" he said to himself.

Oliva left the balcony abruptly.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE TWO NEIGHBORS.

From the very moment when the two women had seen each other, Oliva, already fascinated by the grace of her neighbor, no longer affected disdain for her; and moving cautiously among her flowers she returned the smiles which were sent her.

Cagliostro, when visiting her, had not failed to recommend to her the greatest caution, and especially to have nothing to do with her neighbors. This direction had fallen like a thunder-bolt upon Oliva's head, who was already looking forward to pleasant intercourse with her neighbor. She, however, promised to obey him. But he was no sooner gone than she arranged herself on the balcony in such a way as to attract her neighbor's attention. The latter, one may well believe, asked nothing better; and to Oliva's first advances she replied by salutations and by throwing kisses.

Oliva responded cordially to these amiable advances; she noticed that the unknown no longer left the window without bidding her farewell when she went out, or nodding to her when she returned; she seemed to have concentrated all her powers of pleasing upon Oliva's balcony. Such a state of things would naturally be followed by some attempt at a more intimate intercourse. And this is what happened: Cagliostro, coming to see Oliva two days after, complained of a visit which had been made at the hôtel by an unknown person.

"Indeed?" said Oliva, blushing a little.

"Yes," replied the count, "a lady, very pretty, young, elegant, presented herself, and spoke to a valet who had responded to her persistent ringing. She asked this man who the young person was who lived in the pavilion on the third story, your apartment, my dear. This woman certainly meant you; she wished to see you. She must know you; you are discovered then. Take care, the police has female spies as well as men in its service, and I warn you that I could not refuse to give you up, if Monsieur de Crosne should demand it."

Oliva, instead of being frightened, recognized immediately this description of her friend, and although determined to thank her by all the means in her power, she dissembled with the count.

"You do not tremble?" said Cagliostro.

"No one has seen me," replied Nicole.

"Then it was not you she wished to see?"

"I do not think so."

"Yet how could she divine that there was a woman in this pavilion? Ah! take care, take care!"

"Ah, Monsieur le Comte," said Oliva, "why should I fear? If I have been seen, which I do not believe, it will not happen again; and if any one should see me, it would only be at a distance, for the house is impenetrable, is it not?"

"Impenetrable, that is the word," replied the count; "for unless the walls are scaled, which is not easy, or the small entrance-door is opened with a key like mine, which is not very easy either, since I never leave it —" and he showed the key which he used to open the lower door. "Now," he continued, "as I have no desire to lose you, I will lend the key to no one; and as it would be of no advantage to you to fall into the hands of Monsieur de Crosne, you will not allow your wall to be scaled. So, dear child, you are forewarned; manage your own affairs as you please."

Oliva made protestations of every sort, and tried to get rid of the count, who did not insist too much on staying.

The next morning at six o'clock Oliva was out on her balcony, breathing the pure air of the neighboring hills, and darting a curious glance at the closed windows of her courteous friend. The latter, scarcely ever awake before eleven o'clock, showed herself as soon as Oliva appeared. It would seem that she had been watching behind the curtains for an opportunity to see her.

The two women bowed, and Jeanne, putting her head out of the window looked around to see if any one could hear her. No one appeared. Not only the street but the windows of the houses were deserted. She then put both hands to her mouth, so as to form a sort of speaking-trumpet; and with that vibrating and sustained intonation which is not a cry, but which carries sound farther than the simple voice, she said to Oliva, "I wished to pay you a visit, Madame."

"Hush!" said Oliva, starting back with terror. And she put her finger to her lips.

Jeanne, in her turn, darted behind her curtains, thinking some indiscreet person might be in Oliva's room; but she almost immediately appeared again, reassured by Nicole's smile.

"You cannot, then, be seen?" she said.

"Alas!" said Oliva, with a gesture.

"Can you receive letters?"

"Oh, no!" cried Oliva, terrified.

Jeanne reflected some moments.

Oliva, to thank her for her attentions, sent her a kiss, which Jeanne returned with interest; after which, closing her window, she went out.

Oliva felt sure that her friend had thought of some new resource. Jeanne returned in about two hours. The sun was at its height, and the pavement of the street was as hot as the sands of the desert.

Oliva saw her neighbor appear at the window with a cross-bow. Jeanne, laughing, made a sign to Oliva to move away. The latter obeyed, laughing also, and sheltered herself behind her window-blind. Jeanne, aiming with care, discharged a small leaden ball, which, unfortunately, instead of clearing the balcony, struck one of the bars of iron and fell into the street.

Oliva uttered a cry of disappointment; Jeanne, with an angry shrug of the shoulders, looked a moment down into the street to see if she could see her projectile, then disappeared for some minutes. Oliva, also leaning over her balcony, looked down into the street; a rag-picker came along hunting on the right and on the left; did he or did he not see that ball in the gutter? Oliva could not tell; she concealed herself so that she might not be seen.

Jeanne's second effort was more successful. Her bow sent faithfully beyond the balcony into the chamber of Nicole a second ball, around which was wound the following note: —

You interest me, most beautiful lady. I find you charming, and love you on merely seeing you. Are you indeed a prisoner? Do you know that I attempted in vain to visit you? Will the enchanter who thus watches over you ever let me approach you to let me tell you how I sympathize with a poor victim of man's tyranny?

I have, as you see, imagination in the service of my friends. Do you wish to be my friend? It appears that you cannot go out; but you can write, doubtless, and as I go out when I please, throw your answer down to me when I pass under your balcony.

If the shooting of the cross-bow should be dangerous, or if it should be discovered, we will adopt some other means of correspondence. Suspend from the top of your balcony in the dusk a ball of cord and attach your note to it; I will fasten mine to it, and you can draw it up without being seen.

If your eyes tell the truth, I can rely on you for a return of that friendship with which you have inspired me, and together we can conquer the universe.

YOUR FRIEND.

P. S. Did you see any one pick up my first note?

Jeanne did not sign, she had even disguised her handwriting.

Oliva leaped with joy on receiving the note. She replied to it by the following lines: —

I love you as you love me. I am, indeed, a victim of man's wickedness. But he who keeps me here is a protector, and not a tyrant. He comes secretly to visit me once a day. I will explain all this to you later. I prefer to receive your letters drawn up by a thread rather than by means of the cross-bow.

Alas, no, I cannot go out! I am locked in; but it is for my good. Oh, I shall have so much to say to you, if ever I have the good fortune to speak with you! There are so many things that cannot be written.

Your first note was not picked up by any one, unless by a rag-picker who was passing by; but such persons cannot read, and to them lead is lead.

Your friend,

OLIVA LEGAY.

Oliva signed her name, without reserve. She made the countess a signal by pretending to unwind a thread, and when evening came on she dropped the ball into the street. Jeanne was under the balcony, caught the thread and took off the note, — all her movements being communicated to her correspondent by the conducting thread, — and then went home to read what was written. Half an hour later she attached to the fortunate thread a letter containing these words : —

" One can do what he is resolved to do. You are not kept in sight, for I see you always alone. You are, therefore, able to receive visitors, and even to go out yourself. How is your house secured ? — with a key ? Who has that key ? It is he who visits you, is it not ? Does he keep that key so carefully that you cannot steal it from him, or take an impression from it ? There is no question of any wrong-doing ; we are considering only how to procure for you some hours of freedom, and pleasant walks arm-in-arm with a friend who will console you for all your misfortunes, and restore to you more than you have lost. We will plan even, if you wish it, for your entire freedom. We will discuss this subject in all its details at our first interview."

Oliva eagerly devoured the contents of this letter. She felt rising to her cheek the fever of independence, and to her heart the joy of eating forbidden fruit. She had noticed that the count, whenever he visited her to bring her a book or some article of jewelry, deposited his dark-lantern on a side-table, and laid his key on the lantern. She therefore got ready a bit of soft wax, and on the next visit of Cagliostro took an impression of the key. While she was performing this operation the count did not once turn his head ; he was looking at the newly opened flowers on the balcony. Oliva therefore could execute her little project without uneasiness ; and as soon as the count had taken his departure she lowered the impression of the key, enclosed in a box, which Jeanne received together with a note.

The next day, at about noon, the cross-bow — an instrument extraordinary and expeditious, an instrument of communication which, in comparison with the thread, was like the telegraph in comparison with a courier on horseback — discharged a note to Oliva, conceived as follows, —

MY DEAREST FRIEND, — This evening at eleven o'clock, when your jealous keeper shall have left you, you will descend, you will draw the bolts, and you will find yourself in the arms of her who calls herself

YOUR LOVING FRIEND.

Oliva trembled with joy, — even more than when she had received Gilbert's tender letters in the springtime of her early loves and secret meetings. At eleven o'clock she went downstairs without having noticed any sign of suspicion on the part of the count. She found Jeanne at the door, who embraced her tenderly, and took her into a carriage drawn up on the boulevard. Stunned, palpitating, intoxicated, Oliva rode with her friend about two hours, during which the two companions exchanged secrets, kisses, and plans for the future.

Jeanne was the first to suggest that Oliva should return home to prevent suspicion on the part of her protector; she had just learned that that protector was Cagliostro. She feared the genius of this man, and saw no safety for her plans but in the most profound mystery.

Oliva had confided in Jeanne without reserve; Beausire, the police, — she had told everything. Jeanne had represented herself as a girl of rank living with a lover without the knowledge of her family.

One knew all, the other was ignorant of all; such was the friendship declared between these two women. From this day forth they had no need of cross-bow, nor even of the ball of thread, for Jeanne had her key. Oliva could come down to her whenever she pleased. A delicate supper, a secret promenade, were baits always sufficient to lure Oliva.

"Does not Monsieur de Cagliostro suspect anything?" Jeanne sometimes asked anxiously.

"He! indeed, if I should tell him everything he would not believe me," replied Oliva.

A week's enjoyment of these nocturnal escapades had made them necessary to Oliva's happiness. At the end of a week Jeanne's name was more frequently heard from Oliva's lips than had ever been either Gilbert's or Beausire's.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE RENDEZVOUS.

MONSIEUR DE CHARNY had scarcely arrived at his country-seat, and received a few visits, when the doctor ordered him to receive no one, and to keep his room, — an order which was executed with such rigor that not an inhabitant of the canton could see the hero of that naval combat which had made so much noise through all France, and whom all the young girls wanted to see, because he was notoriously brave, and was said to be handsome.

Charny, however, was not so sick in body as was supposed. His malady was confined to his heart and head; but what a malady! — an acute pain, incessant and pitiless, the pain of a memory which consumed as if with fire; the pain of a regret which tore his heart.

Love, after all, is but a delusion. The absent one laments an ideal paradise, instead of regretting a material country; and yet one must admit — however poetical he may be — that the woman truly loved is a paradise rather more material than that of angels.

Monsieur de Charny did not endure this three days. Furious at finding all his dreams dispelled by impossibility, annihilated by space, he caused the order of the physician to be spread through the canton; then intrusting the care of his doors to a faithful servant, Olivier set out in the night from his manor-house, riding a gentle but swift horse. In eight hours he was in Versailles, hiring through his valet a small house situated behind the royal park.

This house, which had been unoccupied since the tragic death of one of the gentlemen of the wolf-hunting train who had cut his throat there, suited Charny admirably; he could be even more completely hidden there than in his own manor-house. It was decently furnished, had two doors, — one opening on a deserted street, the other upon an avenue running round the park, — and from the windows on the south, Charny could easily gain the avenue of elms; for the windows, when the shutters covered with vines and ivy were open, were but doors, only slightly elevated above the ground, through which one could easily jump into the royal park.

This close vicinity to the royal park, although so rarely permitted in those days, was a privilege granted an inspector of the hunt so that he could be conveniently situated for watching over the deer and pheasants of his Majesty.

This solitude was more pleasant to Charny than any other would have been. Was it on account of the country view? We shall soon see.

When he was completely immured in his new abode, when his valet had quieted the respectful curiosity of the neighborhood, Charny, forgetting as he was forgot, began a life the very thought of which would make any one tremble who during his existence in this world has loved or has even heard of love.

In less than fifteen days he knew all the habits of every one connected with the palace, even those of the guards. He knew the hours when the birds came to drink in the marshes, when the frightened deer ran along by. He knew the hours when all was silent; those when the queen walked with her ladies, and when the officers were making their rounds; in a word he lived, although apart from them, with those who inhabited that Trianon, the temple of his insane adorations.

As the weather was fine, as the mild and perfumed nights allowed his eyes to range at greater liberty, he passed a portion of them under the jasmines climbing above his window, listening to the distant noises which came from the palace, watching through the interstices of the foliage the lights which were continually moving, up to the hour of retiring. In a short time the window was not sufficient. He was too distant from that noise and those lights. He leaped from his window to the turf below, sure of meeting at that hour neither dogs nor guards; and he indulged in the delicious, perilous pleasure of going even to the edge of the thicket, to the point which separated the deep shadow from the bright moonlight, there to observe those outlines of light and shadow which were formed on the white curtains of the queen's apartment.

In this way he saw her frequently without her suspecting his presence. He could recognize her a quarter of a league away, when walking with her ladies or with gentlemen of her acquaintance, playing with her Chinese parasol which she held over her large flower-trimmed hat. He never mistook her step nor her attitude for that of another. He knew all the dresses of the queen, and could distinguish through the leaves the long, green frock with bands of black moiré which undulated with her chastely seductive movements.

And when the vision had disappeared, when the night had permitted him to go as far as the statues of the peristyle, to watch the last movements of that beloved shadow, Charny would return to his window, and through an opening in the foliage he had contrived to make, gaze at a distance upon the light shining in the queen's windows, until it disappeared; then he subsisted through the night on memory and hope, as he had fed through the day on observation and admiration.

One night when Charny had returned home, and two hours had passed since he had bidden adieu to the absent shadow, just as he was leaving his window to retire to bed, he heard the noise of a key turning gently in the lock; he returned to his observatory and listened. It was late; it was striking midnight from all the clocks around Versailles. Charny was surprised at hearing this unaccustomed sound.

This refractory lock was that of a little door opening into the park, situated about twenty-five paces from Olivier's house. This gate was never opened, except during the days of the grand hunt when it was thrown open to admit the baskets of game. Charny noticed that those who opened this gate did not speak; they locked the door after them, and entered the avenue which ran along under his windows, concealed from any one walking in the avenue by the shrubbery and hanging vine-leaves. Besides, those who were walking held down their heads and moved with haste. Charny could hardly distinguish them in the darkness; but by the rustling of their garments against the bushes he perceived that they were two women.

These women, on turning into the wide avenue opposite Charny's window, came suddenly into the full moonlight, and Olivier could with difficulty restrain from uttering a cry of joyful surprise at recognizing the form and headdress of Marie Antoinette, and also the lower part of her face notwithstanding the shadow cast upon it by her hat. She held a rose in her hand.

With a palpitating heart, Charny glided from his window into the park. He ran along upon the grass to avoid being heard, hiding behind the largest trees, and keeping in sight the two women whose pace was gradually becoming slower.

What ought he to do? The queen had a companion; therefore she was in no danger. Oh! if she were only alone, he would have braved any torture to approach her and say to her on his knees, "I love you!" Oh, if she were only threatened with some great peril, he would have thrown away his life to save that precious life! As he was thinking all this, dreaming a thousand tender follies; the two women stopped suddenly; one of them — of less stature than the other — spoke a few words in a low voice to her companion and left her.

The queen remained alone; the other lady hastened toward some object which Charny could not yet discern. The queen, beating the ground with her little foot, was leaning against a tree, enveloped in a mantle in such a manner as to cover her head with the hood.

When Charny saw her alone and so pensive, he leaped forward as if to throw himself on his knees before her. But he reflected that he was at least thirty steps away from her, and that before he could run that distance she would see him and take fright; that she would cry out or flee; that her cries would in the first place attract her companion and later some of the guards; that they would search the park and perhaps discover his retreat, and there would be an end forever to secrecy, happiness, and love.

Scarcely had he restrained his almost irresistible impulse when the queen's companion returned, — and not alone. About two steps behind her walked a man of noble stature, enveloped in a large cloak, and wearing on his head a capacious hat.

This man, at sight of whom Monsieur de Charny trembled with hatred and jealousy, did not walk with the gait of a conqueror. Staggering, dragging his feet with hesitation, he seemed like a man feeling his way in the dark, although he had the queen's companion as a guide, and the queen herself was standing before him, white and erect, under the tree. When he saw Marie Antoinette, the trembling which Charny had noticed appeared to increase. The unknown took off his hat and swept the ground with it, so to speak. He came nearer. Charny saw him enter the deep shadow of the tree; he bowed profoundly many times.

The surprise of Charny meanwhile had changed to stupefaction. From stupefaction he was soon to pass to another emotion, painful in a very different way. Why should the queen come into the park at so late an hour? Why had that man come there? Why was he waiting in concealment? Why did the queen send her companion to him instead of going herself? Charny was almost beside himself. He remembered, however, that the queen was interested in mysterious politics; that she sometimes engaged in intrigues with the German courts, — relations of which the king was jealous, and which he severely forbade.

Perhaps this mysterious cavalier was a courier from Schoenbrun or Berlin, some bearer of a secret message, one of those German emissaries whom Louis XVI. had become so reluctant to receive at Versailles. This idea, like the bandage of ice which the doctor applies to a burning and feverish brow, refreshed this poor Olivier, restored to him his senses, and quieted the delirium of his first anger. Besides, the queen retained an attitude full of dignity.

The companion, standing about three paces away, anxious, attentive, watchful, as are the duennas in the pictures of Watteau, disturbed somewhat by her cheerful anxiety Monsieur de Charny's opinion as to the chaste purpose of this meeting. But it is as dangerous to be surprised at a political rendezvous, as it is disgraceful to be surprised at a rendezvous of love; and a lover and a conspirator look very much alike: both have the same cloak, the same quickness of hearing, and the same unsteadiness of limb.

Charny had not much time to give to these reflections. The companion suddenly interrupted the conversation. The cavalier made a movement as if to prostrate himself at the queen's feet; he was receiving doubtless his dismissal after the audience.

Charny hid behind a great tree. Assuredly, the group in separating must pass one by one before him. To hold his breath, to pray the gnomes and sylphs to extinguish every echo, whether of earth or sky, was the only thing left for him to do.

At that moment he thought he saw a light-colored object slipping down from the royal mantle; the gentleman stooped quickly even to the ground, then he arose with a respectful bow and fled, — for it would be impossible to express in any other terms the rapidity of his departure. But he was arrested in his course by the queen's companion, who called him back with a little cry, and when he had stopped, said to him in a low voice, "Stay." He was a very obedient cavalier, for he stopped instantly and waited.

Charny then saw the two women pass, holding each other's arm, two steps from his hiding-place; the air displaced by the queen's gown stirred the blades of grass almost under Charny's hand. He even recognized the perfume he had been accustomed to admire when near the queen, vervain and mignonette mingled together, intoxicating to his senses and awakening pleasing remembrances.

The women passed on and disappeared.

Then, some moments after, came the unknown, of whom the young man had no longer thought while he was watching the queen in her walk to the gate; he kissed passionately, madly, a fresh and perfumed rose, which certainly was that whose beauty Charny had remarked when the queen had entered the park, and which just now he had seen fall from her hand.

A rose, and a kiss upon that rose! What had this to do with an embassy and secrets of State?

Charny was almost beside himself. He was about to rush on this man and snatch the flower from his grasp, when the queen's companion reappeared and called out, "Come, Monseigneur."

Charny believed himself in the presence of some prince of the blood, and to keep himself from falling half-dead on the ground, he supported himself against the tree behind which he had been concealed.

The unknown hastened to the spot whence the voice had issued, and in company with the lady immediately disappeared.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE QUEEN'S HAND.

When Charny returned to his house, quite broken down by this terrible blow, he found that he no longer had the strength to contend against this new calamity by which he was stricken.

So Providence had brought him back to Versailles, and had granted him this precious hiding-place, only to put him on the track of a crime committed by the queen in contempt of conjugal fidelity, of royal dignity, and love's obligations.

Beyond any doubt, the man received in the park was a new lover. Charny, in the fever of the night, in the delirium of his despair, in vain sought to persuade himself that the man who had received the rose was an ambassador, and that the rose was simply the pledge of a secret agreement, and was designed to serve as a substitute for a letter, which might be too compromising. Nothing, however, was of any avail against his suspicions. It remained for him only to examine his own conduct, and to ask himself why, in the presence of such an evil, he had remained so inactive. The instinct which had enjoined that inactivity was, upon reflection, easily understood.

In the most violent crises of experience, action springs at the moment from the deep recesses of the heart and mind; and the instinct by which it is prompted is, in men well trained, a union of habit and reflection acting in the emergency with very great rapidity. If Charny had not acted it was because the secret affairs of his sovereign did not concern him; because in showing interest he would reveal his love; because in compromising the queen he would have betrayed himself; and because it would have been a tactical error to afford to traitors, whom he wished to convict, an example of similar treason committed by himself. If he had not acted it was because in accosting a man honored by the royal confidence he would have incurred the risk of falling into an odious quarrel, through a sort of ambuscade, which the queen never would have forgiven. In fine, the word "Monseigneur," uttered at last by the complaisant companion, was a salutary warning, coming somewhat late, to be sure, which had saved Charny by opening his eyes when he was at the height of his fury. What would have become of him if, while assailing that man, sword in hand, he had suddenly heard him called "Monseigneur."

Such were the thoughts which occupied Charny's mind through all the night and the first part of the following day. After twelve o'clock the events of the night before were no longer of any moment to him. There remained to him only the feverish, consuming suspense in which he awaited the coming of another night, with its possible revelations.

At last the night came, bringing to our ardent watcher gloomy desires and wild thoughts. The noises and movements to which he had been accustomed had for him now new meanings. He saw in the distance the queen walking on the terrace, with lights borne before her. She appeared to him to be thoughtful, uncertain, still agitated by the incident of the previous night.

Gradually all the lights in and about the palace were extinguished, and silence brooded over the park. Charny remembered well the hour of the queen's rendezvous.

Midnight came at length, and his heart was swollen almost to bursting. "Now," he said, "I shall hear the grating of the bolts, and the gate will open." But nothing occurred to break the silence. Charny then reflected — with some surprise that he had not thought of it before — that the same events are not likely to occur on two days in succession; that there was nothing obligatory in this love beyond the love itself; and that these persons would be very imprudent were they to acquire the habit of meeting every day. No; it was very certain that the queen would not repeat so soon the imprudence he had witnessed.

Suddenly there was a grinding of bolts, and the gate was opened. A mortal paleness covered Charny's face when he saw again the two women. "How much she must love him!" he murmured.

The women proceeded precisely as they did in the first instance, and passed by Charny's window with hurried steps. He, as he had done before, leaped from his window, when they had gone so far that they could not hear him, and followed them cautiously. As he went he swore to himself that he would be prudent, firm, impassive. He determined to keep in mind that he was a subject, she a queen; that he was a man, and as such was bound to show respect; that she was a woman, and as such was entitled to consideration. As he could not trust much to his fiery and explosive temper, he flung his sword behind a tuft of mallows at the foot of a chestnut-tree.

Meantime the two ladies had reached the same place where they had paused on their former expedition. Charny again recognized the queen, and saw her again conceal her face under her hood, while her serviceable friend went to seek, in his hiding-place, the unknown person whom she had called "Monseigneur."

Where was that hiding-place? Charny asked himself. There was, indeed, in the direction taken by the queen's companion, the pavilion known as Apollo's Baths, surrounded by tall hedges; but how could the stranger hide himself there? How had he gained access to the place? Charny remembered, then, that on that side of the park there was a small gate like that by which the two ladies had entered. The unknown, doubtless, had a key to that gate. From there he could glide to shelter in Apollo's Baths, where he could lie in waiting until he should be summoned. Yes, that explained everything. By way of the same little gate "Monseigneur" took his departure after his interview with the queen.

A few moments later Charny perceived the cloak and hat which he had observed on the previous occasion. This time the unknown did not show the same respectful reserve in his approach to the queen. He came up with rapid steps and almost running.

The queen, leaning against a tree, seated herself upon the cloak which this new Raleigh spread for her; and while the vigilant friend kept watch, as on the night before, the amorous nobleman knelt on the moss and began talking with the fluency of passion. The queen, with her head drooping, seemed as if yielding to love's sweet melancholy. Charny could not hear what was said; but the manner of the cavalier bore the stamp of poesy and love. His every intonation was equivalent to an ardent protestation.

The queen made no response, and nevertheless the unknown seemed to be speaking with increasing tenderness. It appeared sometimes to the unfortunate Charny that the words spoken were about to become intelligible to him, and he thought that on hearing them he should die of rage and jealousy. But he heard nothing — nothing. Whenever the voice of the speaker was slightly raised, a significant gesture from the watchful companion compelled the impassioned orator to lower the tone of his address.

The queen preserved an obstinate silence. The other, adding entreaty to entreaty, as Charny inferred from the vibrating melody of his tones, obtained from her only the sweet consent of silence, — an inadequate satisfaction for burning lips which had begun to taste of love.

Suddenly, however, the queen seemed to let fall a few murmured words which the unknown alone could hear; and as soon as he had heard them he cried out, so loud that the words reached Charny's ears: "Thank you! oh, I thank my gracious queen! Farewell, then, — till to-morrow."

The queen completely hid her face, already so well concealed.

Charny felt a cold sweat trickling down his temples in large drops.

The unknown saw both hands of the queen extended toward him. He seized them in his own and kissed them so fervently that Charny, looking on, experienced all the tortures which savage humanity has stolen from the infernal regions. The queen then rose suddenly, and seized the arm of her companion. The two then fled together, passing once more very near to Charny in his concealment. The unknown also fled, and Charny, who had not risen from the ground on which he was prostrated by indescribable suffering, thought that he heard the sound of the two gates closing at the same time.

We shall not attempt to depict the situation in which Charny found himself after that horrible discovery. He spent the night coursing furiously through the park, in the alleys, which he reproached, in his despair, for their criminal complicity. Quite beside himself for several hours, he recovered his reason only when he stumbled over the sword which he had thrown aside lest he should be tempted to use it. This sword, which obstructed his course and threw him to the ground, recalled him at once to a consciousness of his power and of his dignity. He discontinued his mad running about, during which he had bruised himself against the trees, and walked directly and quietly along the avenue still impressed by the footsteps of the two ladies and of the unknown.

He went to the place where the queen had been sitting. The mosses still beaten down recalled to him his own misery and the happiness of another. But instead of lamenting, or indulging again in anger, Olivier set himself to reflecting on the nature of this love and the rank of the person by whom it was inspired. He examined the footsteps of that nobleman with the same cool attention which he would have given to those of a wild animal. He went to the gate behind Apollo's Baths. By climbing up and looking over the wall he could see the tracks of a horse, and the grass badly trodden down. "He comes from that direction! He comes not from Versailles, but from Paris;" Olivier said to himself. "He comes alone, — and to-morrow he intends coming again; for he said, 'Till to-morrow.' Till to-morrow, then, let me wait. To-morrow will be the last day of my life, or else I am a coward and have never loved. Come, come," he continued, striking gently on his breast, as a horseman strokes the neck of his horse, "be calm, be strong, for the trial is not yet over."

He then looked around him once more, turning his eyes away from the palace lest he should see the queen's window lighted; for that light would have been still another lie, another stain. The lighted window would mean that the queen's chamber was occupied. But why should one lie in that manner after attaining to the rights of shamelessness and dishonor, when so little distance remains between hidden shame and public scandal?

At length, however, Charny could no longer refrain from looking at the window of the queen's chamber. It was lighted!

"To make a pretence of being in her chamber," said Charny, with bitter irony, "when she is running about the park with a lover! Truly that is chastity gone to waste! She is really too kind, this queen, in assuming this pretence toward us. It is true, however, that she may fear giving annoyance to her husband." And Charny, burying his nails in his flesh advanced with measured steps along the path leading to his lodge.

"They said, 'Till to-morrow,'" he added, after entering. "Yes, till to-morrow — for every one. For to-morrow, Madame, there will be four of us at the rendezvous."

CHAPTER XXVII.

WOMAN AND QUEEN.

THE next night the scene was repeated. The door opened just at midnight, and the two women appeared.

Charny had determined to discover this evening who was the happy personage whom the queen thus favored. He therefore followed the two women, concealing himself behind the shrubbery; but when he arrived at the place where for two nights the meeting of the lovers had taken place, he found no one there. The queen's companion was dragging her Majesty toward Apollo's Baths. A horrible anxiety, a suffering of a new nature overwhelmed him. In his innocent uprightness, he had not supposed that the crime could be carried so far as that.

The queen, smiling and whispering, walked toward the gloomy retreat at the gate of which the unknown gentleman awaited her with extended arms. She entered, also with outstretched arms, and the iron gate closed behind her. Her accomplice remained outside, leaning upon a broken column cushioned by a luxurious growth of foliage.

Charny was mistaken as to his power of endurance, which proved itself unable to resist such a shock. Just as he was about to rush upon the queen's companion to unmask her, to discover who she was, to reproach her, to strangle her perhaps, the blood rushed like a conquering torrent to his temples and his throat, and suffocated him. He fell upon the ground, breathing a feeble sigh, which for a moment startled from her tranquillity that sentinel at the gate of Apollo's Baths. An internal hemorrhage, caused by the re-opening of his wound, had stifled him.

Charny was at length recalled to life by the coldness of the dew, by the dampness of the ground, and by a strong sense of his grief. He staggered as he arose, recognized the locality, became conscious of his own condition, and remembered what had happened. The sentinel had disappeared, not a sound could be heard. A clock in Versailles soon after striking two, he realized that his swoon had been one of long duration.

The frightful vision had disappeared; queen, lover, companion, had had time to flee. Charny was enabled to convince himself of this by observing on the other side of the wall the recent footprints of a horse. These tracks and some broken branches in the vicinity of the gate of Apollo's Baths confirmed his conviction.

The night was one long delirium, and the morning found him still agitated. Pale as death, looking ten years older than the day before, he called his valet to dress him in a black velvet suit, such as was worn by rich persons of the third estate. Gloomy, mute, absorbed in his griefs, he took his way to the Trianon, at the moment when the guard had just been relieved, — that is, at about ten o'clock. The queen was coming from the chapel where she had gone to attend Mass. As she passed by all heads were respectfully bowed, and the officers lowered their swords.

Charny saw some women red with vexation at seeing the queen look so beautiful. Beautiful indeed she was, with her fine hair carried back from her temples, with her delicate features, her smiling mouth, her eyes showing weariness, but sparkling with a soft light. Suddenly she caught sight of Charny; she blushed, and uttered a cry of surprise.

Charny did not bow. He continued gazing at the queen, who perceived from his look that some new misfortune must have occurred. She approached him. "I thought you had gone to your country-seat, Monsieur de Charny," she said severely.

"I have come back, Madame," he said in a tone sharp and almost impolite.

She paused, stupefied, — she, who could always distinguish the least shade of expression.

After this exchange of looks and words which were almost hostile, she turned toward the ladies. "Good-morning, Countess," she said in a friendly way to Madame de La Motte, giving her a familiar glance.

Charny started, and watched more attentively. Jeanne, uneasy under this scrutiny, turned away her head. Charny looked after her as if he were a madman, until she once more turned her face to him. Then he walked round her studying her movements.

The queen, bowing to the right and to the left, was at the same time watching the conduct of those two mutual observers. "Can he have lost his mind?" she thought. "Poor fellow!" and she again approached him. "How is your health, Monsieur de Charny?" she said pleasantly.

"I am very well, Madame, but — thank God! — not so well as your Majesty," and he bowed in such a manner as to frighten the queen more than he had before surprised her.

"There is something in all this," said Jeanne, still watchful.

"Where are you living now?" continued the queen.

"At Versailles, Madame," said Olivier.

"How long have you been here?"

"For three nights," replied the young man, giving expression to his words by look and gesture.

The queen displayed no emotion; Jeanne gave a start.

"Have you not something to say to me?" the queen asked Charny, with angelic sweetness.

"Oh, Madame," replied the latter, "I could say too many things to your Majesty."

"Come, then," she said abruptly.

"I must be watchful," thought Jeanne.

The queen, with rapid steps, walked on to her apartment. What appeared providential to Madame de La Motte was that Marie Antoinette, to avoid the appearance of seeking a tête-à-tête, invited some persons to follow her. Jeanne slipped in among these persons. The queen, on reaching her apartment, dismissed Madame de Misery and all her attendants.

The weather was mild; the sun's heat and light, half-veiled by clouds, were subdued to a gentle softness. The queen opened the window looking on a little balcony; she sat down before her desk loaded with letters; she waited. By degrees the persons who had followed her perceived her desire to be alone, and retired. Charny, impatient, consumed with rage, was crushing his hat in his hand.

"Speak! speak!" said the queen; "you seem to be very much agitated, Monsieur."

"How shall I begin?" said Charny, thinking aloud; "how can I dare accuse at once honor, fidelity, and Majesty?"

"What do you say?" cried Marie Antoinette, turning quickly round with flaming eyes.

"And still, I shall speak only of what I have seen!" continued Charny.

The queen rose. "Monsieur," she said coldly, "it is early in the morning for me to believe that you can be intoxicated; and yet you assume an attitude which is not becoming to young gentlemen before breakfast." She expected to see him overwhelmed by this scornful reproach; but he, motionless as if he had not heard it, said, —

"After all, what is a queen? A woman. And I, what am I? A man, as well as a subject."

"Monsieur!"

"Madame, let us not confuse what I have to say to you by an anger which would end in madness. I think I have proved to you that I have respect for royal dignity; I fear that I have also proved that I have an insane passion for the person of the queen. So make your choice; at which of the two, the queen or the woman, do you prefer that this adorer should cast an accusation of opprobrium and disloyalty?"

"Monsieur de Charny," cried the queen, turning pale and walking up to the young man, "if you do not instantly leave this room, I will have you driven out by the guards."

"I will tell you, then, before being driven out, why you are an unworthy queen, and a woman without honor!" cried Charny, wild with rage. "For the last three nights I have followed you in your park!"

Instead of seeing her give a start of horror at this terrible blow, as he had hoped she would, Charny was surprised to see her raise her head and approach him.

"Monsieur de Charny," she said, taking his hand, "you are in a state which excites my pity. Take care, your eyes flash, your hand trembles, your cheeks are pale, the blood is all rushing to your heart. You are suffering; shall I call for assistance?"

"I saw you," he continued coldly, — "saw you with that man when you gave him the rose, when he kissed your hands, — saw you when you entered Apollo's Baths with him."

The queen passed her hand over her brow as if to assure herself that she was not asleep.

"Come," she said, "sit down, for you will fall if I do not support you, — sit down, I tell you."

Charny fell, in fact, into an easy-chair, and the queen seated herself upon a stool by his side. Then, taking both his hands and looking at him as if she would search his very soul, "Be calm," she said; "quiet this agitation of heart and head, and repeat what you have just said."

"Oh, do you wish to kill me?" murmured the unhappy man.

"Be still, and let me question you. When did you return from your country-seat?"

"Fifteen days ago."

"Where are you lodging?"

"In the house of the huntsman, which I have hired."

"Ah, yes; the house of the suicide, at the edge of the park."

Charny nodded affirmatively.

"You speak of a person whom you saw with me?"

"I speak, in the first place, of you, whom I saw."

"Where did you see me?"

"In the park."

"At what hour? — on what day?"

"At midnight on Tuesday — the first time."

"You saw me?"

"As plainly as I see you now; and I also saw the lady who accompanied you."

"Some one accompanied me? Could you recognize this person."

"I thought I saw her just now; but I should not dare to affirm it. The figure only was the same; as to the face, one always conceals that when one has crimes to commit."

"Very well," said the queen, calmly, "you did not recognize my companion; but me —"

"Oh, you, Madame, I saw you as surely as I see you now!"

The queen stamped her foot with anxiety.

"And — this companion," she said, — "the one to whom I gave a rose? Did you not say you saw me give a rose?"

"Yes; but I could not approach that cavalier."

"But you know him?"

"They called him 'Monseigneur;' that is all I know."

The queen struck her forehead in concentrated anger. "Continue," she said; "Tuesday I gave a rose, — and Wednesday?"

"On Wednesday you gave him your two hands to kiss."

"Oh!" she murmured, biting her hands. "And then on Thursday, — yesterday?"

"Yesterday you passed an hour and a half in Apollo's Baths with that man, where your companion left you alone."

The queen rose impetuously.

"And — you — saw me?" she said, jerking out every syllable.

Charny lifted his hand as if to swear.

"Oh," groaned the queen, in her turn transported with rage, "he swears it!"

Charny solemnly repeated his accusing gesture.

"Me, me?" said the queen, striking her bosom. "You saw me?"

"Yes, you. On Tuesday you wore your green dress with watered stripes; on Wednesday, your frock printed with large blue and red flowers; yesterday, yesterday, the brown silk gown which you wore when I kissed your hand for the first time. It was you, it was really you! I die with grief and shame in saying to you: Upon my life! upon my honor! by my God! it was you, Madame, it was you!"

The queen walked back and forth in the balcony with hurried steps, caring but little whether or not her strange agitation were observed by the spectators in the court-yard below, who were devouring her with their eyes.

"If I should take an oath," she said, — "if I were to swear by my son, by my God, — I have a God, as you have! No, he does not believe me! He will not believe me!"

Charny held down his head.

"Madman!" added the queen, shaking him by the arm with energy; and she dragged him from the balcony into the room. "There must be rare pleasure in thus accusing an innocent, an irreproachable woman; it is a brilliant distinction thus to dishonor a queen. Do you believe me when I tell you that it was not I whom you saw? Do you believe me when I swear on this crucifix that during the past three days I have not left the palace after four o'clock in the evening? Do you wish me to prove by my women, by the king who saw me here, that I could not be elsewhere? No, no; he does not believe me! he does not believe me!"

"I saw you!" Charny coldly replied.

"Oh," cried the queen, suddenly, "I know, I know! Has not this atrocious calumny already been thrown in my face? Was I not seen at the Opera-ball, making scandal for the whole court? Did they not see me at Mesmer's, in a crisis, making scandal for the curious and for the women of the town? You know it well, you who fought for me!"

"Madame, at that time I fought because I did not believe it. Now, I would fight because I do believe it."

The queen raised to heaven her arms, rigid with despair, two burning tears rolled from her cheeks. "My God!" she said, "send me an idea with which to save myself! I do not wish to be despised by this man, O my God!"

Charny was stirred to the very depths of his heart by this simple and earnest prayer. He hid his face in his hands.

The queen, after a moment's reflection, said, "Monsieur, you owe me reparation. This is the one I shall exact of you: Three successive nights you have seen me at night in my park in company with a man. You knew, however, that advantage had already been taken of my resemblance to a woman (I know not who she is) who has in her face and carriage something in common with me, — with me, unfortunate queen! But since you would rather believe that it is I who am running about thus at night; since you insist that it is I, — return to the park at the same hour. Go there with me. If it is I whom you saw yesterday you will, of course, not see me to-night, since I shall be with you; if it is another, why should we not see her together? And if we do see her — Ah, Monsieur, will you regret what you have made me suffer?"

Charny, placing both hands upon his heart, murmured, "You are doing too much for me, Madame. I deserve death; do not crush me with your goodness."

"Oh, I will crush you with proofs!" said the queen. "Not a word to any one. This evening at ten o'clock, wait alone at the door of the huntsman's lodge for that which I have determined to do in order to convince you. Go, Monsieur, and let nothing be suspected outside."

Charny knelt without a word and then withdrew. At the end of the second salon, he passed within view of Jeanne, who looked at him fixedly, and who, with all the others, was waiting to return to the queen's room whenever her Majesty should send for them.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

WOMAN AND DEMON.

JEANNE had noticed Charny's agitation, the queen's anxiety, and the eager desire of both to engage in conversation. To a woman of Jeanne's insight this was more than enough to enable her to divine many things.

After the meeting contrived by Cagliostro between Madame de La Motte and Oliva, the comedy of the last three nights needs no comments.

Jeanne, having returned to the queen's room, listened attentively, and watched every movement of the queen to discover, if possible, any confirmation of her suspicions. But the queen had been for some time distrustful of everybody. She showed no emotion of any kind; Jeanne was therefore reduced to her own conjecture. Already she had ordered one of her lackeys to follow Monsieur de Charny. The lackey returned, and informed her that the count had disappeared in a house at the end of the park near the avenue of elms. "Doubtless," thought Jeanne, "this man is a lover who has seen all."

She heard the queen say to Madame de Misery, "I do not feel well, my dear Misery, and I shall retire to-night at eight o'clock."

As the lady of honor questioned her, "I shall not receive," said the queen.

"It is clear enough," said Jeanne to herself; "he would be stupid indeed who could not understand that."

The queen, still a prey to the emotions caused by her interview with Charny, soon dismissed all her suite. For the first time since her admission at court Jeanne congratulated herself on permission to withdraw.

"Matters are becoming embroiled here," she said; "I must go to Paris! It is time to undo what I have done." And she set out for Paris immediately.

When she reached her own house in the Rue Saint Claude, she found there a superb present of silver plate which the cardinal had sent that very morning. After glancing carelessly at this present, although it was valuable, she looked up from behind her curtains to Oliva's windows, which were not yet opened. Oliva was still asleep, being doubtless much fatigued.

Jeanne then drove to the hôtel of the cardinal, whom she found radiant and elated with joy and pride; seated before his desk, a master-piece of Boule, he was tearing up and re-writing unweariedly a letter which he was always beginning and could never finish.

As the valet announced Madame de La Motte, Monseigneur le Cardinal exclaimed, "Dear Countess!" and he advanced to meet her.

Jeanne received the kisses with which the prelate covered her hands and arms, and placed herself where she could most comfortably sustain her part in the conversation. Monseigneur began with protestations of gratitude which were not deficient in eloquent sincerity.

Jeanne interrupted him. "Do you know?" she said, "that you are a delicate lover, Monseigneur, and that I thank you?"

"For what?"

"It is not for the tasteful gift which you sent me this morning; it is for the precaution you took in not sending it to the pleasure-house. That was delicate indeed. Your heart does not prostitute itself, it gives itself."

"With whom should one act with delicacy if not with you?" replied the cardinal.

"You are not a happy man only, but a triumphant god."

"I confess it, and the happiness frightens me; it troubles me; it renders the sight of other men insupportable to me. I recall that Pagan fable of Jupiter weary of his own light."

Jeanne smiled.

"Have you just come from Versailles?" the cardinal asked eagerly.

"Yes."

"You — have seen her?"

"I — have just left her."

"Did she — say — anything?"

"Eh, what would you have her say?"

"Pardon me; it is no longer curiosity, it is madness."

"Do not ask me anything."

"Oh, Countess."

"No, I tell you."

"How you say that! One would think to see you that you bring bad news."

"Monseigneur, do not compel me to speak."

"Countess! Countess!" and the cardinal turned pale.

"A too great happiness," he said, "is like the culminating point of Fortune's wheel; when you are at its summit, you are at the beginning of its decline. But do not spare me if there is any misfortune; there is none — is there?"

"I will call it on the contrary, Monseigneur, a great good fortune," replied Jeanne.

"It! what do you mean by 'it;' what do you call a good fortune?"

"Not to have been discovered," said Jeanne, dryly.

"Oh!" and he began to smile. "With the precautions of two hearts and one mind —"

"One mind and two hearts, Monseigneur, cannot prevent eyes from looking through the branches."

"Has any one seen?" cried Monsieur de Rohan, in terror.

"I have every reason to believe so."

"Then if we were seen, we were recognized?"

"Oh, as to that, Monseigneur, you cannot believe it; if we were recognized, if this secret were in any one's possession, Jeanne de Valois would already be at the world's end, and you, — you would be dead."

"That is true. All these reservations, Countess, burn me by slow fire. Suppose that we were seen. But persons are often seen walking in the park. Is it not allowed?"

"Ask the king."

"The king knows!"

"Once more I say, if the king knew, you would be in the Bastille, I in the Hospital. But as one misfortune avoided is better than two happy events, I have come to tell you not to tempt Providence a second time."

"What do you say?" cried the cardinal; "what is the meaning of your words, dear Countess?"

"Do you not understand?"

"I am afraid."

"I should be afraid, if you did not reassure me."

"And how can I do that?"

"By not going to Versailles."

The cardinal sprang up. "In the daytime?" he said, smiling.

"In the daytime certainly, but also in the night!"

Monsieur de Rohan shuddered, and dropped the countess's hand. "Impossible!" he said.

"It is my turn to be frank with you," she replied.

"You said, I think, 'impossible.' Why, impossible, if you please?"

"Because my heart is filled with a love which will end only with my life."

"I see that," she interrupted, speaking ironically; "and it is to reach the end more quickly that you persist in returning to the park. Yes; if you go there again, your love will end only with your life, and both would be cut down by the same blow."

"How many terrors, Countess! and you were so courageous yesterday!"

"I have the courage of animals. I am not afraid while there is no danger."

"I have the courage of my race; I am not happy except in the presence of danger."

"Very well; but you will then allow me to tell you —"

"Nothing, Countess, nothing," cried the amorous prelate; "the sacrifice is made, the die is cast; give me death if it must come, — but give me love! I shall go again to Versailles."

"Alone?" said the countess.

"Would you desert me?" said Monsieur de Rohan, in a reproachful tone.

"I, in the first place?"

"She certainly will come."

"You are mistaken, she will not come."

"Is it possible that you came from her to tell me that?" said the cardinal, trembling.

"It is the blow I have been trying to soften for the last half-hour."

"She will not see me?"

"Never, and it is I who advised her to make this decision."

"Madame," said the prelate, in a thrilling voice, "it is wrong for you to plunge the knife into a heart which you know to be so tender."

"It would be much more so, Monseigneur, to allow two mad creatures to be ruined for want of good advice. I give it; let those who will, profit by it."

"Countess, Countess, I would rather die!"

"That is your concern, and it is easily accomplished."

"Death for death," said the cardinal, gloomily. "I prefer the end of a reprobate. Blessed be hell where I shall meet my accomplice!"

"Holy prelate, you are blaspheming!" said the countess; "as subject you are dethroning your queen! as man you are ruining a woman!"

The cardinal seized the countess by the hand and speaking wildly, "Acknowledge that she did not tell you that!" cried he, "and that she will not renounce me thus."

"I speak to you in her name."

"She merely asks for delay?"

"Take it as you please; but observe her order."

"The park is not the only place where we can see each other, — there are a thousand safer places. The queen has even come to your house!"

"Monseigneur, not a word more; I carry a heavy burden, that of your secret. I feel that I have not the strength to bear it a long time. What your indiscretions, chance, or an enemy's malevolence will not effect, remorse will accomplish. I believe her capable, you see, of confessing everything to the king in a moment of despair."

"Good God! is it possible?" cried Monsieur de Rohan, "would she do that?"

"If you should see her, you would pity her."

The cardinal rose precipitately. "What shall I do?" he said.

"Give her the consolation of silence."

"She would think that I had forgotten her."

Jeanne shrugged her shoulders.

"She would accuse me of being a coward."

"When your purpose is to save her? — never!"

"Does a woman pardon a man who deprives her of his presence?"

"Do not judge her as you would judge me."

"I believe her great and strong. I love her for her courage and her noble heart. Therefore she can rely on me as I rely on her. I will see her once more for the last time; she shall know all my thoughts, and what she shall determine upon after having heard me, I will fulfil as if it were a sacred vow."

Jeanne arose.

"As you please," she said. "Go, only you will go alone. I threw the key of the park gate into the Seine as I returned this morning. You will therefore go when you please to Versailles, while I shall set out for Switzerland or Holland. The farther I shall be from the bomb, the less I shall fear when it bursts."

"Countess! you would desert me; you would abandon me! Oh, my God! with whom can I talk about her?"

"Have you not the park and the echoes?" said Jeanne; "you can soon teach them the name of Amaryllis."

"Countess, have pity! I am in despair," said the prelate.

"Well," replied Jeanne, with the brutal energy of a surgeon who decides upon the amputation of a limb; "if you are in despair, Monsieur de Rohan, do not indulge in follies more dangerous than powder, than the plague, than death! If you care so much for this woman, preserve her instead of ruining her; and if you are not altogether deficient in heart and memory, do not risk engulfing in your own ruin those friends who have been devoted to you. But I myself will not play with fire. Will you swear to me that you will not try to see the queen? Not even to see her, you hear, — I do not say speak to her, — for the next fifteen days? If you will swear this, I will remain and may still be of service to you. Are you determined to brave everything, to disregard my prohibition and hers? I shall know it, and ten minutes later I shall set out! You will have to extricate yourself without my aid."

"It is terrible," murmured the cardinal; "the fall from so high a degree of happiness is crushing. Oh, it will kill me!"

"Come, now," whispered Jeanne in his ear, "your love is only self-love."

"To-day it is true love," replied the cardinal.

"Then you must suffer to-day," said Jeanne; "it is one of the conditions of true love. Come, Monseigneur, decide, shall I stay here, or must I start for Lausanne?"

"Remain, Countess, but find me a soothing balm. The wound is too painful."

"Do you swear to obey me?"

"On the honor of a Rohan!"

"Good! your soothing balm is found. I forbid interviews, but I do not forbid letters."

"Really!" cried the madman, reanimated by this hope; "I may write?"

"Try it."

"And — she will answer me?"

"I will endeavor to prevail upon her."

The cardinal covered Jeanne's hand with kisses. He called her his tutelary angel. The demon inhabiting the heart of the countess must have laughed.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE NIGHT.

It was four o'clock in the afternoon of the same day when a man on horse-back stopped on the outskirts of the park, behind Apollo's Baths. The cavalier was riding at a leisurely pace, as if for his own pleasure; he was thoughtful as Hippolytus, and as handsome, and allowed the reins to hang loosely over the neck of his horse.

He stopped at the very same place where for the last three days Monsieur de Rohan had fastened his horse. The ground in this place was trampled by horses' feet, and the bushes which grew around the oak-tree to which the bridle was tied, were broken.

The cavalier alighted. "This place seems to have been well-trampled," he said; and he approached the wall. "Somebody has been climbing the wall; here is a gate that has been recently opened. It is just as I thought.

"No man can have been engaged in wars with the Indians of the savannas without having learned how to distinguish the tracks of horses and men. Now it is fifteen days since Monsieur de Charny returned; for fifteen days Monsieur de Charny has not allowed himself to be seen. This is the gate which Monsieur de Charny has chosen, through which to make his entrance into Versailles." Saying these words the cavalier sighed as if his soul were being drawn from his body.

"Let us leave our neighbor his happiness," he murmured, looking at one of those eloquent tracks left upon the grass and walls. "That which God gives to some, he refuses to others. It is not without some design that God makes some men happy, others miserable; blessed be his will!

"Yet I must have a proof. At what price, by what means can it be gained?

"Oh, nothing more simple. In the bushes, in the night, a man would not be discovered, and from his hiding-place he could see those who would come here. To-night I will be in the bushes."

The cavalier took up his horse's reins, slowly regained his saddle, and without hastening the pace of his horse disappeared around a corner of the wall.

As to Charny, obedient to the orders of the queen, he had shut himself up in his own house awaiting a message from her. Night came, but nothing appeared. Charny instead of watching at the window of the lodge which looked on the park, was watching in the same room, but at another window which looked on the narrow street. The queen had said, "at the door of the huntsman's lodge;" but on the ground-floor, window and door were the same thing. The main thing was to see all that might happen. He looked out into the dark night, hoping every minute to hear the galloping of a horse or the hurried step of a courier. He heard a clock striking half-past ten. Nothing happened. The queen, then, had deceived him. She had made a concession at the first moment of surprise. In her shame she had promised what it had been impossible to fulfil; and, horrible to think, she had promised knowing that she could not perform.

Charny, with that readiness to suspect which characterizes men who are violently in love, began to reproach himself with having been too credulous. "How could

I," he cried, — "I who had seen, — believe such falsehoods, and yield my conviction, my certainty, to a stupid hope?"

He was enlarging with rage upon this fatal idea when the noise made by a handful of sand thrown upon the panes of the other window attracted his attention, and made him rush to look out upon the side toward the park. He saw then in the avenue of elms, enveloped in a large black cloak, the figure of a woman who raised toward him a pale and agitated face. He could not restrain a cry of joy mingled with regret. The woman who was waiting for him, who called him, was the queen! With one bound he reached the place where the queen was standing, and fell at her feet.

"Ah, you are here, Monsieur? it is fortunate," said the queen, in a low and agitated tone; "what were you doing?"

"You! you, Madame! — you yourself! is it possible?" replied Charny, prostrating himself.

"Is this the way you were waiting for me?"

"I was looking for you on the street side, Madame."

"Was I likely to come by the street, when it is so easy to come by the park?"

"I hardly dared hope to see you, Madame," said Charny, with an accent of passionate gratitude.

She interrupted him. "Let us not stay here," she said; "it is too light. Have you your sword?"

"Yes, Madame."

"'T is well. Where did those persons enter whom you saw?"

"By this gate."

"And at what hour?"

"At midnight, on each occasion."

"There is no reason why they should not come again to-night. You have spoken to no one?"

"To no one."

"Let us go into the shrubbery and wait."

"Oh, your Majesty — "

The queen went first. "You must know," she said suddenly, as if anticipating Charny's thoughts, "that I have not amused myself with telling this story to the lieutenant of police. Since I have made a complaint, Monsieur de Crosne should have done me justice. If the creature who usurps my name after having usurped my likeness has not yet been arrested, if all this mystery is not cleared up, you will see that there may be two reasons: either the incapacity of Monsieur de Crosne, — which is of no importance, — or his collusion with my enemies. Now, it seems to me difficult to believe that here, in my own park, any persons should dare to play the ignoble comedy which you have described to me, unless they were sure of direct aid, or tacit complicity. That is my reason for thinking that those who are guilty are so dangerous that I ought myself to assume the task of unmasking them. What do you think about it?"

"I ask your Majesty's permission to say no more on this subject. I am in despair; I have still fears, but I have no longer any suspicions."

"At least you are an honest man," said the queen, eagerly; "you can speak frankly. It is a merit which may wound the innocent if one makes a mistake with regard to them; but the wound that it inflicts is one that can be healed."

"Oh, Madame, it is striking eleven; I tremble."

"Assure yourself that there is no one here," said the queen.

Charny obeyed. He went through all the shrubbery even as far as the walls. "There is no one," he said when he returned.

"Where did the scene take place which you described to me?"

"Madame, just now, as I returned from my exploration, my heart received a terrible blow. I perceived you in the same place where, for the last three nights, I saw — the false queen of France."

"Here!" cried the queen, moving away with disgust from the place where she was standing.

"Under this chestnut-tree, yes, Madame."

"Why, then, Monsieur," said Marie Antoinette, "let us not stay here; for if they came to this spot, they will probably return here."

Charny followed the queen into another avenue. His heart beat so violently that he was afraid he should not hear the noise of the gate in opening. She, silent and proud, waited until the living proof of her innocence should appear.

The clocks announced the hour of midnight. The gate did not open. A half-hour passed, during which Marie Antoinette asked Charny more than ten times if the impostors had been very punctual to their time of meeting.

Three-quarters past midnight struck from the belfry of Saint Louis at Versailles. The queen stamped her foot with impatience. "You see that they will not come to-night," she said. "Such misfortunes happen only to me!" and saying these words, she looked at Charny as if she would quarrel with him had she surprised in his eyes the slightest sign of triumph or irony. But he, growing pale in proportion as his suspicions returned, maintained an attitude so grave and so melancholy that certainly his face reflected at that moment a patience serene as that of martyrs and angels.

The queen took his arm and led him to the chestnut-tree under which they had stood at first. "You said," she murmured, "that it was here that you saw them?"

"In this very place, Madame."

"It was here that the woman gave him a rose?"

"Yes, your Majesty."

The queen was so weak, so weary with her long stay in this damp park, that she leaned against the trunk of a tree, and let her head fall on her breast. Insensibly her limbs gave way; Charny did not offer her his arm, and to save herself from falling, she seated herself hastily upon the grassy turf. Charny stood, as before, motionless and gloomy.

The queen put both her hands to her face, and Charny could see a tear of this queen slipping down between her long, white fingers. Suddenly raising her head, "Monsieur," she said, "you are right; I am condemned. I had promised to prove to-night that you had calumniated me; God does not wish it, — I bow to his will."

"Madame — " murmured Charny.

"I have done what no other woman would have done. I do not speak of queens. Oh, Monsieur, what is a queen who cannot rule even one heart? What is a queen who cannot obtain even the esteem of an honest man? Come, Monsieur, help me to rise that I may go away; do not scorn me to the extent of refusing the assistance of your hand."

Charny threw himself like a madman on his knees. "Madame," he said, striking his head upon the ground, "if I were not a miserable man who loves you, you would pardon me, would you not?"

"You!" cried the queen, with a bitter smile, — "you! you love me, and yet you think me an infamous woman!"

"Oh, Madame!"

"You, you who ought to have a memory, you accuse me of giving a flower here, there a kiss, and yonder my love to another man! Monsieur, no falsehood; you do not love me!"

"Madame, that phantom was there, — that phantom of an amorous queen. Here where I am was the phantom of the lover. Tear out my heart, since those two infernal images live in my heart and devour it!"

She took his hand and drew him toward her with a gesture of excitement. "You saw! you heard! It was certainly I, was it not?" she said in a choking voice. "Oh, it was I! do not try to think otherwise. Well, then, if in this very place, under this very chestnut-tree, seated as I was, you at my feet as was that other, if I press your hands, if I draw you to me, if I take you in my arms, if I say to you, — I, who you say did all this to another; I, who said the same thing to another, did I not? — if I say to you, 'Monsieur de Charny, I have loved, I do love, I shall love but one being in the world, — and you are that one!' my God! my God! would not that be sufficient to convince you that a woman is not infamous who has within her heart, together with the blood of empresses, the divine fire of a love like that?"

Charny uttered a groan like that of a man about to expire. The queen's impassioned words had intoxicated him; he had felt her burning hand upon his shoulder, her warm breast upon his heart, her breath upon his lips. "Let me thank God!" he murmured. "Oh, if I did not think of God, I should think too much of you!"

She arose slowly; she fixed upon him her eyes swimming in tears.

"Will you have my life?" he said, beside himself.

She looked at him silently for a moment. "Give me your arm," she said, "and take me to every place where the others went. In the first place, here, — here a rose was given — "

She drew from her dress a rose, still warm from the fire which had burned in her breast. "Take it!" she said.

He inhaled the sweet odor of the flower, and pressed it to his heart.

"Here that other one gave her hand to be kissed?"

"Both her hands!" said Charny. He shook with excitement on finding his face enclosed in the queen's burning hands.

"Thus is this place purified," said the queen, with an adorable smile. "Now, did they not go to Apollo's Baths?"

Charny paused, stupefied, half-dead, as if the heavens had fallen.

"It is a place," the queen said gayly, "which I enter only in the daytime. Let us go together to see the gate through which this lover fled from the queen."

Joyous, tripping, leaning on the arm of a man the happiest God had ever blessed, she crossed, almost running, the grass-plots which separated the shrubbery from the wall around the park. In this way they reached the gate behind which were tracks of horses' feet.

"It was here, on the other side."

"I have all the keys," replied the queen. "Open the gate, Monsieur de Charny, let us investigate."

They went outside and looked about them; the moon just then came out from a cloud as if to aid them in their investigations. Its white light seemed to cling tenderly to the beautiful face of the queen, who was leaning on Charny's arm while she listened and examined the bushes which surrounded them. When she had satisfied herself that no one was there, she withdrew within the gate, drawing Charny toward her with a gentle pressure. The gate closed behind them just as the clocks were striking two. "Adieu," she said. "Return home. Till to-morrow." She pressed his hand, and without another word disappeared under the elms in the direction of the palace.

On the other side of that gate they had just closed, a man rose from among the bushes, and vanished in the wood on the side of the road. This man carried with him the secret of the queen.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE FAREWELL.

THE queen, next morning, looking bright and beautiful, left her apartment to go to Mass. Her guards had received orders to admit every one.

It was Sunday, and her Majesty on waking had said, "What a beautiful day! living is a pleasure to-day." She seemed to enjoy more than usual the perfume of her favorite flowers; the gifts she bestowed were more magnificent than usual; she seemed more eager for her daily communion with God. She listened to the service with intense devotion; she had never bowed so humbly her majestic head.

While she was fervently praying, the crowd was gathering along the passage from the apartments to the chapel, — as was usual on Sunday, — and even the steps of the staircase were filled with gentlemen and ladies. Among these last shone Madame de La Motte, modestly, but elegantly dressed.

In the double line of gentlemen on the right, Monsieur de Charny was seen, who was receiving many congratulations on his restoration to health, on his return, and especially on his radiant looks.

Favor is a subtile perfume; it is diffused with such facility through the air that real connoisseurs can distinguish its aroma even before the bottle is opened. Olivier had been the queen's friend for only six hours, and every one already called himself the friend of Olivier.

While he was accepting all these felicitations with the gracious manner of a really happy man, and while, as a mark of respect and friendship, all those in the left line passed over to the right, Olivier, compelled to cast his eyes here and there over the group which hovered around him, observed in front of him a face whose gloomy paleness impressed him in the midst of his exaltation. He recognized Philippe de Taverney, in his uniform closed to his chin, and with his hand upon the hilt of his sword.

Since the visits of politeness paid by the latter in his adversary's antechamber after the duel, and since the seclusion of Charny by Doctor Louis, there had been no intercourse between the rivals.

Charny, on seeing Philippe, who was looking at him quietly, without any expression either of kindness or menace, was the first to bow, and his salutation was returned by Philippe in a distant manner. Then, clearing a way through the group around him, "Pardon, gentlemen," said Olivier, "but allow me to perform a polite obligation," and crossing the space between the right and left lines, he came straight to Philippe, who did not stir.

"Monsieur de Taverney," said Charny, bowing even more politely than before, "I should have thanked you for your kind interest in regard to my health, but I arrived only yesterday."

Philippe colored, and looked at him, then cast down his eyes.

"I shall have the honor, Monsieur," continued Charny, "of paying you a visit soon, and I hope that you bear me no ill-will."

"None, Monsieur," replied Philippe.

Charny was just about to extend his hand to Philippe, when the drum announced the queen's approach.

"The queen is coming, Monsieur," said Philippe, slowly, without making any return to Charny's friendly gesture; and he accompanied his words with a reverence which expressed melancholy rather than coldness.

Charny, rather surprised, hastened to rejoin his friends in the line on the right. Philippe remained on the left as if he were a sentinel.

The queen drew near. She was seen to smile upon several persons, and to receive through her attendants the petitions which were presented to her; for she had perceived Charny in the distance, and fixing her eyes upon him, with that fearless courage which she always displayed in her friendships, and which her enemies called immodesty, she said quite loud, "Ask to-day, gentlemen; ask, I cannot refuse anything to-day."

Charny was moved in the very depths of his heart by both the tone and the meaning of these magic words. He trembled with pleasure, which was his only expression of thanks to the queen.

Suddenly the latter was aroused from her pleasant but dangerous contemplation by the sound of a step, by the tones of a strange voice. The step resounded on the pavement at her right, the voice, agitated but grave, said, "Madame!"

The queen perceived Philippe; she could not repress at first a movement of surprise at finding herself thus placed between these two men, of whom she reproached herself perhaps with loving one too little, and the other too much. "You, Monsieur de Taverney," she cried, recovering herself, — "you! you have something to ask of me? Oh, speak!"

"An audience of ten minutes at your Majesty's leisure," said Philippe, without relaxing the severity of his countenance.

"This very moment, Monsieur," replied the queen, casting a furtive glance at Charny, whom she involuntarily dreaded to see in so close proximity with his old adversary; "follow me," and she went on more rapidly when she heard Philippe's step closely following her own, and had left Charny standing with the rest. She continued, however, gathering in her harvest of letters and petitions, issued some orders, and entered her apartment. A quarter of an hour later, Philippe was admitted to the library, where her Majesty was accustomed to receive on Sunday.

"Ah, Monsieur de Taverney, come in," said the queen, playfully, — "come in and assume for me a more smiling countenance. I must confess I am anxious every time a Taverney desires to speak to me. Your family is one of ill-omen. Reassure me quickly, Monsieur de Taverney, by telling me that you have not come to announce some misfortune."

Philippe, more pallid after this introduction than he had been during the scene with Charny, seeing how little feeling the queen manifested in what she said, confined himself to replying, "Madame, I have the honor to declare to your Majesty that this time I bring only good news."

"Ah, you have news for me!" said the queen.

"Alas, yes, your Majesty."

"Ah!" she replied, resuming that gay demeanor which made Philippe so miserable, "there, you have said, 'alas!' 'Unhappy that I am!' a Spaniard would say. Monsieur de Taverney has said, 'Alas!'"

"Madame," replied Philippe, gravely, "a few words will fully assure your Majesty that your noble brow will not be clouded this day at the approach of a Taverney, and also that you will never again be troubled by the fault of a Taverney-Maison-Rouge. From this very day, Madame, the last of this family, to whom your Majesty had deigned to accord some favor, is about to disappear, never again to return to the court of France."

The queen, casting aside the playful air which she had assumed as a resource against the emotions which would probably be excited during this interview, exclaimed, "You are going away!"

"Yes, your Majesty."

"You — too!"

Philippe bowed. "My sister, Madame, has already left your Majesty with regret," he said; "as for myself, I was always useless to the queen, therefore I am going."

The queen seated herself, much agitated by reflecting that Andrée had asked that final leave of absence on the day following the queen's interview with Charny in Louis's apartment, when he had received the first indication of her feeling toward him. "Strange!" she murmured thoughtfully, and did not add another word.

Philippe remained standing like a marble statue, awaiting his dismissal.

The queen, rousing all at once from her lethargy, said, "Where are you going?"

"I intend rejoining Monsieur de Lapeyrouse," said Philippe.

"Monsieur de Lapeyrouse is at Newfoundland," observed the queen.

"I have prepared everything to join him."

"You know that a frightful death has been predicted for him?"

"Frightful? I did not know that; but I was aware that it was to be sudden."

"And you will go?"

"It is for that reason that I wish to rejoin Lapeyrouse," he said, with a sweet and dignified smile.

The queen once more relapsed into her agitated silence.

Philippe still waited respectfully.

That brave and noble nature of Marie Antoinette was aroused, more fearless than ever. She arose, approached the young man, and said to him, folding her arms upon her breast, "Why do you go away?"

"Because I have a great desire to travel," he replied gently.

"But you have already made a tour of the world," replied the queen, deceived for a moment by his heroic calmness.

"Of the New World, yes, Madame," continued Philippe; "but not of the Old and New together."

The queen made a gesture of impatience, and repeated what she had said to Andrée. "These Taverneys are a race of iron, and have hearts of steel. Your sister and you, you are two terrible persons, — friends whom one must finally hate. You are going away, not for the sake of travelling, — you are really weary of that, — but to leave me. Your sister was, she said, summoned by religion; she hides a heart of fire beneath the ashes. But she wished to go, and she has gone. May God make her happy! You, you who might be happy, — you, you are going too! I told you just now that the Taverneys brought me misfortune!"

"Spare us, Madame! If your Majesty would deign to search our hearts, you would find there the most unbounded devotion."

"Listen!" cried the queen, angrily. "You are a Quaker, she a philosopher, — creatures whom it is impossible to move. She imagines the world a Paradise in which one enters only on the condition of being saints; you, you take this world for the infernal regions in which there can be only demons; and both of you have fled from the world, — the one, because you do not find in it what you seek; the other, because you find in it what you do not seek. Am I right? Eh, my dear Monsieur de Taverney, allow human beings to be imperfect; ask of royal families to be only the least imperfect of the human race; be tolerant, or rather, do not be egotistical."

She spoke with too much passion. It gave Philippe an advantage. "Madame," said he, "egotism is a virtue when one makes use of it to increase his adoration."

The queen blushed. "I only know," she said, "that I loved Andrée, and that she left me; that I valued you, and you are going to leave me. It is humiliating to me to see two persons so perfect — I do not jest, Monsieur — abandon my house."

"Nothing can humiliate so august a personage as you," said Taverney, coldly; "shame cannot reach a head so exalted as your own."

"I am trying to think what can have wounded your feelings."

"Nothing has wounded my feelings, Madame," replied Philippe, eagerly.

"Your rank has been confirmed; you are on the high road to fortune. I have distinguished you — "

"I repeat to your Majesty that nothing at court displeases me."

"And if I should tell you to remain — if I should command you to do so?"

"I should have the sorrow of replying to your Majesty by a refusal."

The queen again had recourse to that pause of silent reserve which was to her like a break in the combat to the weary fencer. And as a home-thrust always followed this moment of repose, she suddenly exclaimed, "There is perhaps some one here who displeases you? You are easily offended, you know."

"There is no one who displeases me."

"I thought you had quarrelled — with a gentleman — Monsieur de Charny — whom you wounded in a duel," said the queen, gradually becoming more animated; "and as it is very natural to avoid those we do not like, as soon as you saw that Monsieur de Charny had returned you immediately wished to leave the court."

Philippe made no reply.

The queen, mistaken in her opinion of this man, so loyal and so brave, thought that this was only a case of ordinary jealousy. She followed him up unsparingly. "You knew only to-day," she continued, "that Monsieur had returned. I say to-day! and it is to-day that you ask for permission to retire."

Philippe turned livid rather than pale. Thus attacked, thus trampled underfoot, he avenged himself cruelly. "Madame," he said, "it is true that it is only to-day that I became aware of Monsieur de Charny's return; only I have known it longer than your Majesty thinks, for I met Monsieur de Charny at about two o'clock in the morning at the gate of the park near Apollo's Baths."

The queen became pale in her turn; and after having observed, with admiration mingled with terror, the perfect courtesy of the gentleman, even in his anger, "Well," she murmured, in a faint voice, "go, Monsieur; I will not detain you longer."

Philippe bowed for the last time, and with slow steps retired.

The queen fell overwhelmed upon her chair, saying, "France, country of noble hearts!"

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE CARDINAL'S JEALOUSY.

THE cardinal had passed three successive nights very different from those which were constantly recurring to his imagination. No news from any one, no hope of a visit! This death-like silence, after the agitation of passion, was like the darkness of a cellar after the joyous light of the sun.

The cardinal had at first deluded himself with the hope that his lover — a woman as well as a queen — would wish to know the nature of the passion she had inspired, and whether she would still continue to please. This was a feeling quite masculine, — speaking materially, a two-edged weapon which wounded the cardinal grievously when it was turned against himself.

In fact, receiving nothing, and hearing only silence, as Monsieur Delille says, he feared — unhappy man — that that test had resulted unfavorably to himself. From this thought arose an anguish, a terror, an anxiety of which no one could form an idea who has not suffered from that pervasive neuralgia which turns every nerve connected with the brain into a serpent of fire writhing or distending itself at its own free will.

This anxiety became insupportable to the cardinal; he sent ten times in one half-day to Madame de La Motte's house, and as often to Versailles.

The tenth courier at last brought back Jeanne, who at Versailles was watching Charny and the queen, and secretly congratulating herself on this impatience of the cardinal, to which she would soon owe the success of her enterprise.

The cardinal, on seeing her, shouted, "How can you live in such tranquillity? What! you know how I am tortured, and you, who call yourself my friend, allow this torture to kill me!"

"Eh, Monseigneur," replied Jeanne, "patience, if you please. What I have been doing at Versailles is much more useful than what you have been doing here wishing for me."

"It is impossible that any one should be so cruel!" said his Excellency, somewhat appeased by the hope of obtaining news. "Come, what are they saying, what are they doing down yonder?"

"Absence is a grievous evil, whether one suffers from it at Paris, or has to bear it at Versailles."

"What you say delights me, and I thank you for it; but —"

"But?"

"The proofs!"

"Ah, good God!" cried Jeanne, "what is that you are saying, Monseigneur, — proofs! What is that word? Proofs! Would you be in your right senses, Monseigneur, to go and ask a woman for proofs of her fault?"

"I do not ask a formal document, Countess; I ask a pledge of love."

"It seems to me," she said, looking at his Excellency in a very significant manner, "that you are becoming very exacting, if not very forgetful."

"Oh, I know what you are going to say; I know that I ought to be very well satisfied, — very much honored; but judge of my heart by your own, Countess. How would you like to be thus cast aside after having obtained some appearance of favor?"

"I think you said 'appearance,'" replied Jeanne, in the same mocking tone.

"Oh, you can certainly taunt me with impunity, Countess; it is certain that I have no reason to complain; but I do complain —"

"Then, Monseigneur, I cannot be responsible for your discontent, if you have only frivolous reasons for it, or no reason at all."

"Countess, you treat me badly."

"Monseigneur, I repeat your own words. I follow your own statements."

"Take some inspiration from yourself, instead of reproaching me with my foolishness; help me instead of tormenting me."

"I cannot help you where I see nothing to be done."

"You see nothing to be done?" said the cardinal, dwelling on each word.

"Nothing."

"Well, Madame," said Monsieur de Rohan, with vehemence, "every one, perhaps, does not think as you do."

"Alas, Monseigneur, we are getting angry and no longer understand each other. Your Excellency will pardon me for saying so."

"Angry! yes— Your unkindness drives me to it, Countess."

"And you do not consider whether or not this is injustice?"

"Oh, yes; I admit that if you do not serve me any longer, it is because you cannot; I see that clearly."

"You judge me rightly; why, then, do you accuse me?"

"Because you ought to tell me the whole truth, Madame."

"The truth! I have told you what I know."

"You do not tell me that the queen is perfidious, that she is a coquette, that she leads men on to adore her, and then drives them to despair."

Jeanne looked at him in surprise. "Explain yourself," she said, trembling not with fear, but with joy. In fact, she had just discovered in the jealousy of the cardinal a method of escape — which chance might not have given her — from a very difficult position.

"Acknowledge," continued the cardinal, who could no longer control his passion, "acknowledge, I beg, that the queen refuses to see me."

"I do not say that, Monseigneur."

"Acknowledge that if she does not repel me of her own free will, she thrusts me aside, to avoid giving annoyance to some other lover, in whom my attentions have aroused suspicion."

"Ah, Monseigneur!" cried Jeanne, in a tone so sympathetic that she allowed even more to be suspected than she seemed desirous to conceal.

"Listen," said Monsieur de Rohan; "the last time I was with her Majesty I thought I heard some one moving in the thicket."

"Nonsense!"

"I will tell you what I suspect."

"Do not say another word, Monseigneur; you are insulting the queen. Besides, even if she were so unhappy as to fear the vigilance of a lover, — which I do not believe, — would you be so unjust as to impute to her as a crime a past relation which she sacrifices to you?"

"'Past!' — that is a good word; but it means nothing, Countess, if that past is still present, and is to run on into the future."

"For shame, Monseigneur! You speak as if you would accuse me of having led you into an unfortunate enterprise. Your suspicions, Monseigneur, are injurious to the queen, and also to me."

"Then, Countess, prove to me — "

"Ah, Monseigneur, if you repeat that word I shall think you mean to insult me."

"In short, — do you think she loves me — even a little?"

"Why, Monseigneur, you can easily find out," Jeanne replied, pointing to the table, on which were writing materials. "Sit down there and ask her yourself."

The cardinal seized Jeanne's hand in a transport of joy. "You will take to her the letter?" he asked.

"If I did not give it to her, who would?"

"And — you undertake that I shall have an answer?"

"If you had no answer how would you know what course to take?"

"Oh, now you are as I like to see you, Countess."

"Am I not?" she replied, with her subtle smile.

The cardinal sat down and began to write. He had an eloquent pen, and was a ready writer; nevertheless, he destroyed ten sheets of paper before satisfying himself.

"If you go on in that way," said Jeanne, "you will never come to an end."

"You see, Countess, I am distrustful of my tenderness, — it overflows so freely; it may weary the queen."

"Ah," replied Jeanne, ironically, "write to her like a politician, and she will reply with a diplomatic note; but it is your own affair."

"You are right, — you are a true woman in heart and mind. Stay, Countess, why should we keep a secret from you, who are acquainted with the whole affair?"

She smiled. "You have, indeed," she said, "but little to conceal from me."

"Read over my shoulder; read as fast as I write, if you can, — for my heart is on fire, and my pen will devour the paper."

The cardinal proceeded to write a letter so ardent, so wild, so full of amorous reproaches and compromising protestations, that Jeanne, who followed his pen, said to herself, "He has written what I should not have dared to dictate to him."

The cardinal read over the letter, and said to Jeanne, "Will that do?"

"If she loves you," replied the traitress, "you will have proof of it to-morrow. Meanwhile, you can wait with a tranquil mind."

"Until to-morrow, yes."

Jeanne took the letter, sealed, allowed the cardinal to kiss her eyes, and toward evening returned home. There, after a refreshing change of costume, she sat down to think. The situation was precisely that which she had aimed to bring about. Two steps more and she would reach her goal. Who would be to her the better shield, — the queen, or the cardinal? That letter of the cardinal would render it impossible for him to accuse Madame de La Motte when the time should come for her to compel him to pay the money due for the necklace. Even if the cardinal and the queen should come to an understanding, how would they dare to destroy Madame de La Motte, the custodian of a secret so scandalous? The discussion would take place within closed doors, and Madame de La Motte, on being suspected, would make that fact a pretext for her departure, and would carry abroad the handsome fortune of a million and a half. The cardinal, indeed, would know that Jeanne had the diamonds, and the queen would suspect it; but they would not be eager to noise abroad a matter so closely connected with that of the park, and of Apollo's Baths. A single letter, indeed, was not sufficient foundation for that entire system of defence. However, the cardinal had good pens; he would write seven or eight more. As to the queen, it was quite possible, that, in company with Monsieur de Charny, she was preparing weapons for the use of Jeanne de La Motte.

All this trouble, and all these turnings would lead, at the worst, to flight; and Jeanne, in her meditations, anticipated the probable course of the affair. First would come the default of payment, then the denunciations of the alarmed jewellers. The queen would have recourse immediately to Monsieur de Rohan. But how? Necessarily through Jeanne's intermediation. Jeanne would warn the cardinal and summon him to pay. If he refused, she would threaten to publish his letters. He would pay. The payment made, there would be no longer any danger. In the eyes of the public there would be an intrigue to be explained; but this gave her no anxiety. A million and a half, to save the honor of a queen and of a prince of the Church, was a sum far too small. Jeanne thought she might secure three millions if she should make the effort.

Why was Jeanne so sure of herself upon the question of intrigue? Because the cardinal was certain that on three successive nights he had been with the queen in the shadowy groves of Versailles, and nothing in the world could prove to him that he had been deceived. Only one proof of the deception was in existence, and that proof Jeanne must proceed to remove.

Having reached this point in her meditations, Jeanne approached the window and saw Oliva looking anxiously and inquiringly from her balcony. "Now for us two," she thought, saluting her accomplice affectionately. She made to Oliva the signal agreed upon that in the evening she was to come down to the street.

Overjoyed at the receipt of this communication, Oliva returned to her chamber. Jeanne resumed her meditations.

To destroy the instrument when it has served its purpose is the custom of those who engage in intrigue. But most commonly they fail, either by destroying that instrument in such a manner as to elicit from it a groan which betrays the secret, or by destroying it so incompletely that it may still serve the purposes of others. Jeanne thought that Oliva, devoted as she was to the pleasure of living, would not allow herself to be destroyed without uttering some complaint. It was necessary to invent some story which would induce her to flee of her own free will.

Difficulties arose at every step; but there are minds which take delight in overcoming difficulties.

Oliva, delighted as she was with the society of her new friend, was delighted only relatively, — that is to say, in contemplating that companionship through the windows of her prison she found it charming. But the sincere Nicole did not conceal from her friend that she would much prefer the open day, walks in the sunlight, in short all the realities of life, to these nocturnal expeditions and this fictitious royalty. Jeanne, with her caresses, was an approach to life; the realities of life were — money and Beausire.

Jeanne thoroughly understood this attitude of Oliva, and determined to draw her advantage from it. In short, the object of her approaching interview with Nicole must be to effect the complete disappearance of the only proof of the criminal deception practised in the park of Versailles.

When night came Oliva descended to the street, and Jeanne was waiting for her at the door. They went up the Rue Saint Claude to the deserted boulevard, and there took a carriage.

Oliva began by covering Jeanne with kisses, which Jeanne returned with interest.

"Oh, how tired I am!" cried Oliva; "I have longed for you, watched for you."

"Impossible, my friend, for me to come to you; it would have been too hazardous for us both."

"How so?" asked Nicole, in astonishment.

"A terrible danger, my dear, at which I shudder still."

"Oh, tell me about it quickly!"

"You know that you were weary of your confinement?"

"Alas, yes!"

"And that, for the sake of diversion, you wished to go out?"

"Yes; and in this you kindly aided me."

"You know I told you about that fool of an officer in love with the queen, to whom you bear some resemblance."

"Yes, I know that."

"I was so foolish as to propose to you that we should play a trick on that poor fellow, by making him believe that the queen returned his love."

"Alas!" sighed Oliva.

"I will not recall to you the first two walks we took at night in the garden of Versailles, in company with that poor fellow."

Oliva sighed again.

"Those two nights in which you played your part so well that our poor lover took the matter seriously."

"It was wrong, perhaps," said Oliva, in a low voice;

"for we deceived him, and he did not deserve it; he is a charming man."

"He is, indeed; is he not?"

"Oh, yes."

"But wait; we come now to the danger. To have given him a rose; to have allowed him to say, 'your Majesty;' to have given him your hands to kiss, — these things might pass as jokes. But, my little Oliva, it seems there was something more."

Oliva blushed so deeply that but for the darkness Jeanne must have perceived it. It is true that, intelligent woman as she was, she looked out of the window.

"What do you mean?" stammered Nicole.

"There was a third interview," said Jeanne.

"Yes," said Oliva, hesitating; "you must know that, since you were there."

"Your pardon, dear friend; I was, as usual, at a distance, watching, or pretending to watch, to support the parts we were acting, so that I did not see or hear what took place in the pavilion. I know only what you told me. You told me, as we returned, that you had walked about, that you had conversed, that you had continued the play of the roses and the kissing of hands. I believe everything you told me, my dear."

"Well — but — " said Oliva, trembling.

"Well, my dear, it seems that our madman claims to have received more than the pretended queen has granted him."

"What do you mean?"

"It seems that, intoxicated with delight, he has boasted of obtaining from the queen an indisputable proof of reciprocal passion. The poor devil is mad, decidedly."

"My God! my God!" murmured Oliva.

"He is mad, in the first place, because he lies."

"Certainly," stammered Oliva.

"You would not have exposed yourself to so terrible a danger without telling me of it?"

Oliva shuddered from head to foot.

"How was it likely," continued the terrible friend, "that you, who love Monsieur Beausire, and have me for your friend; that you, solicited by Monsieur le Comte de Cagliostro, and rejecting his attentions, — that you have wantonly given that madman the right — to — say — Oh, no; he has lost his head; there can be no question about it."

"Tell me," cried Nicole; "what is the danger? Let us see."

"It is this. We have to do with a madman, — that is to say, a man who fears nothing and is uncontrollable. If it were a matter of giving a rose, or of kissing hands, there would be nothing to say. A queen has roses in her park, and hands to offer to any of her subjects; but if it were true that at that third interview — Ah, my dear child, I can no longer laugh since that idea has entered my head."

Oliva felt her teeth grinding with terror. "What would be the consequence, my dear friend?" she asked.

"In the first place you are not the queen, — to my knowledge, at least."

"No."

"And having usurped the rank of her Majesty, to commit an — indiscretion of that kind — "

"Well?"

"Well, that is called high treason; and that means a great deal."

Oliva hid her face in her hands.

"After all," continued Jeanne, "since you have not done that of which he boasts, you will be acquitted on the trial. The preceding indiscretions will be punished by an imprisonment of from two to four years, and by banishment."

"Prison! banishment!" cried Oliva, terrified.

"It is not an irreparable evil; but for my own part, I shall take precautions and hide myself."

"You also are anxious?"

"Of course. Will not that madman accuse me at once? Oh, my poor Oliva! it is a joke that will prove very costly to us both."

Oliva burst into tears. "And I," she said, "who can never remain quiet for a moment! Oh, restless spirit! Oh, demon! I am possessed, you see. After this misfortune I shall still rush into another."

"Do not despair; try only to avoid all public scandal."

"Oh, I will shut myself up with my protector. What if I should confess everything to him?"

"A pretty idea! — a man who is keeping you for himself, though now he hides his love, — a man who, on a word from you, will adore you, — you will acknowledge to him that you have committed this imprudence with another! I say 'imprudence,' but there is no knowing what he will suspect."

"My God! you are right."

"Furthermore, the report of this matter will get abroad, and the researches of the magistrates will suggest scruples to your protector. Perhaps to make himself acceptable to the court he will deliver you to the officers."

"Oh!"

"Suppose that he should only drive you from his house, — what would become of you?"

"I see that I am lost."

"And Monsieur de Beausire, when he shall be informed of the affair — " said Jeanne slowly, watching for the effect of this last blow.

Oliva jumped up, and striking with her head the roof of the carriage demolished her head-dress by the contact. "He will kill me! Oh, no," she murmured, "I will kill myself!" Then, turning toward Jeanne, "You cannot save me," she said despairingly, "since you also are in danger!"

"I have," Jeanne replied, "in the interior of Picardy a bit of land, — a farm. If one could gain that refuge secretly, before the matter comes to light, perhaps there would be a chance — "

"But that madman, — he knows you, and would manage somehow to find you."

"Oh, if you were once out of the way, hidden, undiscoverable, I should no longer fear the madman! I should say to him boldly, 'You are a fool to affirm such things! Prove them!' That would be impossible to him. Then I should say to him, quietly, 'You are a coward!'"

"I will set out when and whither you please," said Oliva.

"I think it would be prudent," replied Jeanne.

"Is it best to start immediately?"

"No; wait till I have arranged everything. Do not show yourself even to me. Disguise yourself even to your mirror."

"Yes, yes; you may depend on me, dear friend."

"And for a beginning, let us return; we have nothing more to say."

"Yes; let us return. How much time will you need for your preparations?"

"I do not know, — but listen: from now till the day of your departure I shall not show myself at the window.

When you see me there, understand that the day has arrived, and be ready."

"I will. Thank you, my dear friend!"

They returned slowly toward the Rue Saint Claude, — Oliva not daring to speak another word, and Jeanne meditating too deeply to speak to Oliva. On arriving they embraced each other, and Oliva asked her friend's pardon for all the trouble she had caused by her foolishness.

"I am a woman," replied Madame de La Motte, parodying the Latin poet, "and am familiar with all woman's weakness!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE FLIGHT.

What Jeanne and Oliva had promised they respectively performed. From the next morning Nicole had completely concealed her existence from all the world; no one could suspect that she inhabited that house in the Rue Saint Claude. She remained hidden behind a curtain, or behind a screen, and kept her windows closed, notwithstanding the heat of the weather.

Jeanne, who was making her preparations, — knowing that on the next day the default of the first payment of five hundred thousand francs would occur, — arranged everything in such a manner as to leave no point exposed to danger from the explosion which would ensue. That terrible moment she held in view in all her observations. She had considered the alternative of flight; but flight would be strong evidence against her. She had determined to remain motionless as a duellist after receiving his adversary's blow, — to remain, with the chance of falling, but also with the chance of killing the enemy. With this purpose in view, on the day after her interview with Oliva, she showed herself at the window, at about two o'clock, to announce to the pretended queen that she must be ready to start that evening.

It would be impossible to describe Oliva's condition of mingled joy and terror. The necessity of flight signified danger; the possibility of flight signified safety. She threw an eloquent kiss to Jeanne, and then made her final preparations, putting into her little bundle some of the costly things belonging to her protector.

Jeanne, after her signal, went out to procure a carriage to which she should commit the valuable destiny of Mademoiselle Nicole.

At eleven o'clock on the following night Jeanne entered the Rue Saint Louis in a post-chaise drawn by three strong horses. Upon the box was a man wrapped in a cloak, who showed the postilion which way to go. At the corner of the Rue du Roi-Doré, Jeanne pulled the man's cloak, and the carriage was stopped. The man got down to speak to the mistress.

"Let the carriage remain here, my dear Monsieur Reteau," said Jeanne. "A half-hour will be enough. I will bring here some one who will get into the carriage, and whom you will convey, paying double fees to the postilions, to my little house near Amiens."

"Yes, Madame la Comtesse."

"There you will commit this person to the care of my farmer, Fontaine, who will know what is to be done."

"Yes, Madame."

"I forgot — You are armed, my dear Reteau?"

"Yes, Madame."

"This lady is threatened by a madman. Perhaps an attempt will be made to stop her."

"What shall I do?"

"You will shoot down any one who may attempt to obstruct your course."

"Yes, Madame."

"You asked me for a payment of twenty louis for the affair you know about. I will give you a hundred, and will pay the expenses of your journey to London, where you may see me within three months."

"Yes, Madame."

"Here are the hundred louis. I probably shall not see you here again, for it will be prudent for you to gain Saint Valery, and embark immediately for England."

"You may rely on me."

"It is for your sake."

"It is for us," said Monsieur Reteau, kissing the countess's hand. "I am to wait here, then?"

"Yes; and I will go to bring the lady."

Reteau got into the chaise which Jeanne had vacated, while she with rapid steps hurried to the Rue Saint Claude, and entered her apartment. All was quiet in the neighborhood. Jeanne lighted the candle which, raised above the balcony, was to be the signal for Oliva to descend.

"She is a prudent girl," said the countess to herself, on seeing that Oliva's window remained darkened.

Jeanne raised and lowered her candle three times. There was no response. But she seemed to hear something like a sigh, or a "Yes," thrown almost inaudibly upon the air from under the foliage that surrounded the window.

"She will go down without showing a light," thought Jeanne, — "not a bad idea;" and she herself went down into the street.

The door did not open. Oliva had doubtless encumbered herself with some heavy and troublesome packages.

"The fool," said the countess, grumbling, "how much time she is wasting over her rubbish!"

No one came. Jeanne went over to the opposite door and listened, with her ear close to the large-headed iron nails which studded the door. Still no sound. A quarter of an hour passed in this way; the clocks chimed half-past eleven.

Jeanne walked to the boulevard to see from a distance if the windows were lighted. She thought that she could perceive through the interstices in the foliage a glimmer of light which seemed to come from under the double curtains.

"What is she doing? My God, what can the wretched little thing be about! She did not see the signal, perhaps. Come, we must take courage; let us go up again," and in fact, she again ascended to her own apartment in order to try once more her telegraph of candles. But there was no answer to her signal.

"It must be," said Jeanne, crumpling her ruffles with rage, — "it must be that the hussy is ill and cannot move. Oh, but what does that matter? Living or dead, she must be off to-night."

She again descended her staircase with the swiftness of a hunted lioness. She held in her hand the key which had procured for Oliva so many times the liberty of taking her nocturnal ramble.

Just as she was slipping this key into the lock, she paused. "What if there should be any one up there with her?" thought the countess. "Impossible! I should hear voices, and there would be time to go back. What if I should meet any one upon the staircase — oh!" and she was upon the point of retreating at thought of this danger. The sound of her horses' feet pawing the pavement decided her. "Nothing great is accomplished without danger," she said; "with boldness, danger is avoided." She turned the key in the enormous lock, and the door opened.

Jeanne was acquainted with the localities; her intelligence would have revealed them to her, even if she had not already learned them while waiting for Oliva in the evenings. Jeanne rushed up the stairs which were on the left. There was no noise, no light, no person about.

When she reached the landing-place of Nicole's apartment, she saw under the door a luminous ray; behind the door could be heard the sound of an agitated step.

Jeanne, holding her breath, listened. There was no conversation; Oliva was therefore alone, walking about, preparing for her departure probably. She was not ill certainly, and the only misfortune that had arisen was a slight delay.

Jeanne gently scratched on the door. "Oliva! Oliva!" she said, "my dear little friend!" The step was approaching. "Open! open!" said Jeanne, hurriedly.

The door was thrown open, a deluge of light inundated Jeanne, who found herself standing before a man carrying in his hand a three-branched candlestick. She uttered a fearful scream, and hid her face in her mantle.

"Oliva!" said this man, "is it not you?" and he gently removed the mantle of the countess. "Madame la Comtesse de La Motte!" he exclaimed, in a tone of surprise wonderfully natural.

"Monsieur de Cagliostro!" murmured Jeanne, staggering and almost fainting.

Among all the dangers Jeanne had imagined, she had not thought of this. And this did not seem at first to be very terrible; but on reflecting a moment, and observing the gloomy appearance of that strange man, and his air of profound dissimulation, the danger began to seem frightful to her. She was almost beside herself with fear. She recoiled, and felt an impulse to throw herself down the staircase. Cagliostro politely extended his hand, and invited her to a seat. "To what am I indebted for the honor of your visit, Madame?" he asked in a firm voice.

"Monsieur," stammered the intriguing woman, who could not withdraw her eyes from those of the count, "I came — I was seeking —"

"Allow me to ring, Madame, that I may have those of my servants punished who had the awkwardness, the rudeness, to allow a woman of your rank to present herself thus alone."

Jeanne, trembling, arrested the count's movement.

"It must be," he continued calmly, "that you happened on that rogue of a German who is sometimes intoxicated. He probably did not know you, but opened the door in a stupor and immediately went to sleep again."

"Do not scold him, I beg of you, Monsieur," said Jeanne, speaking more freely, and without suspicion of the snare laid for her.

"It was he, in fact, who opened the door to you, was it not, Madame?"

"I think it was. But you promise me not to scold him?"

"Yes, and I will keep my word," said the count, with a smile. "Now, Madame, will you have the goodness to explain — "

Jeanne, now that she thought she was not suspected of opening the door herself, could lie with confidence concerning the object of her visit.

"I came," she said quickly, "to confer with you, Monsieur le Comte, in regard to certain rumors that are going about."

"What rumors, Madame?"

"Do not urge me, I entreat," she said, with affectation; "the course I am taking is delicate — "

"Search! search!" thought Cagliostro; "as for myself, I have already found."

"You are a friend of his Eminence Monseigneur le Cardinal de Rohan?" said Jeanne.

"Ah! ah!" thought Cagliostro, "go to the end of the thread I hold; but you shall go no farther." Then aloud, "I am in fact on quite good terms with his Eminence."

"And I came," said Jeanne, "to seek information from you about —"

"About?" said Cagliostro, with a slight tone of irony.

"I have told you that my position is delicate, Monsieur; do not take advantage of it. You must know that Monsieur de Rohan has shown me some affection, and I wished to know how far I may count — In short, Monsieur, it is said that you can read the most hidden thoughts and sentiments."

"I need a little more light, Countess, to read what is hidden in your mind."

"Monsieur, it is said that his Eminence loves another; that he is in love with a woman of exalted rank. It is even said —"

Here Cagliostro fixed his eyes, flashing with an angry light, on Jeanne, who almost sank beneath his gaze. "Madame, I do indeed read your mind; but to read more clearly I need some assistance. Will you please answer a few questions?

"How do you happen to come here to consult with me? I do not live here."

Jeanne shuddered.

"How did you get into the house? For there is neither drunken German nor servant of any kind in this part of the hôtel.

"And if it was not myself whom you came to see, whom, then, did you expect to find?

"You do not answer? Well, I will assist you. You entered the house by means of a key which you have now in your pocket. You came to seek a young woman whom I, out of sheer kindness, was sheltering in my house."

Jeanne was completely unbalanced, like a tree torn up by the roots. "And if that be so," she said, in a low voice, "what crime have I committed? Is not a woman permitted to visit a woman? Call her; she will tell you whether our friendship is one that may not be acknowledged."

"Madame," interrupted Cagliostro, "you say that because you know she is not here."

"Not here!" cried Jeanne, alarmed. "Oliva no longer here?"

"Oh," said Cagliostro, "you are perhaps ignorant of her departure, — you, who aided in her abduction!"

"Her abduction! I! I!" cried Jeanne, with some renewal of confidence. "She has been carried away, and you accuse me?"

"I do more, — I convict you," said Cagliostro.

"What is your proof?" asked the countess, with assurance.

Cagliostro took a paper from the table and showed it to her. It was a note addressed to Cagliostro, and read as follows: —

"MONSIEUR AND GENEROUS PROTECTOR, — Forgive me for leaving you. But before all things I love Monsieur de Beausire. He has come for me, — he takes me away; I follow him. Adieu. Receive the expression of my gratitude."

"Beausire!" said Jeanne, petrified. "Beausire! — who did not know Oliva's address!"

"Oh, yes, Madame," replied Cagliostro, showing her a second paper, which he drew from his pocket. "See, I picked this up on the staircase when I came to make my daily visit. It must have fallen from Monsieur de Beausire's pocket."

The countess read, trembling, —

"Monsieur de Beausire will find Mademoiselle Oliva in the Rue Saint Claude, at the corner of the boulevard. He will find her, and take her away immediately. It is a very sincere friend who gives him this advice. There is no time to be lost."

"Oh!" said the countess, crushing the paper in her hands.

"And he has carried her off," said Cagliostro, coldly.

"But who wrote him that letter?" asked Jeanne.

"You, apparently, — you, Oliva's sincere friend."

"But how could he enter here?" cried Jeanne, looking angrily at her impassive interlocutor.

"Cannot one enter by using your key?"

"But since I have it Monsieur de Beausire cannot have it."

"If a person has one key, he may perhaps have two," replied Cagliostro, looking at her intently.

"You have there convincing documents," answered the countess, speaking slowly, "while I have only suspicions."

"Oh, I have suspicions too," said Cagliostro, "as serious as yours." As he said these words he dismissed her by a gesture almost imperceptible.

The countess began to descend the stairs. The entire length of the stairway, which when she arrived was dark and deserted, was now illuminated by the light of twenty candles, held by twenty lackeys, before whom Cagliostro called aloud, and with many repetitions, the name of Madame la Comtesse de La Motte.

Jeanne departed breathing fury and vengeance, as the basilisk breathes fire and poison.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE LETTER AND THE RECEIPT.

THE next day was the day appointed in the queen's letter to the jewellers for the first payment on account of the necklace; and since in that letter her Majesty had enjoined circumspection, they waited in quiet expectation of their five hundred thousand francs, and had a receipt for it written out in the most elegant handwriting that the house could command.

The receipt was not called for. That night the jewellers spent in cruel anxiety and suspense. They reflected that the queen had extraordinary ideas, and she had need of secrecy, — so that perhaps her messenger would not arrive until after midnight.

The coming of the dawn destroyed their chimerical hopes. They took a carriage and drove to Versailles. While Bossange remained in the carriage Boehmer sought to gain admission to the queen. He was informed that, not having a letter of audience, he could not enter. Dismayed and anxious, he insisted, and since he had on several occasions prudently placed here and there among the officers of the antechambers several small articles of value, they contrived to place him where the queen would see him on returning from her walk.

Marie Antoinette, quivering yet with emotion as she recalled that interview with Charny in which she had confessed her love without becoming his mistress, was returning with her heart full of gladness, when she perceived the anxious face of Boehmer, who stood respectfully awaiting her approach.

She gave him a smile, which he interpreted in the most favorable manner, and he ventured to ask for a moment's audience, which the queen promised to give him at two o'clock, — that is, after her dinner. He took the good news to Bossange, who was waiting in the carriage, and who, suffering from a swelled face, did not like to present himself before the queen.

"There is no doubt," they said, while commenting on every word and every gesture of Marie Antoinette, "that her Majesty has in her drawer the sum which she could not obtain yesterday; she has appointed two o'clock because at that hour she will be alone." And they asked each other, as do the companions in the fable, if they should take the amount in notes, in gold, or in silver.

At two o'clock the jeweller was at his post, and was admitted to her Majesty's boudoir.

"What is it now, Boehmer," said the queen, as soon as she perceived him, "do you want to talk of jewels? You are unfortunate in that way, you know."

Boehmer thought that there must be some one concealed in the room and that the queen was afraid of being heard. He assumed therefore an air of intelligence, and looking all around, he replied, "Yes, Madame."

"What are you looking about in that way for?" said the queen, in surprise. "You have some secret, have you?"

He did not answer, being rather shocked by this dissimulation.

"The same secret as before, — a jewel to sell," continued the queen; "something incomparable? Oh, do not be alarmed, — there is no one to hear us."

"Then —" murmured Boehmer.

"Well, what?"

"Then I may say to your Majesty —"

"Say it quickly, my good Boehmer."

The jeweller drew near with a propitiating smile. "I may say to your Majesty that the queen forgot us yesterday," he said.

"Forgot you! in what way?" said the queen, in surprise.

"Why, yesterday — was the date —"

"The date! what date?"

"Oh, I beg pardon, your Majesty, if I allow myself — I know very well that there is some indiscretion. Perhaps the queen is not prepared. That would be a great misfortune, but, in short —"

"Really, Boehmer," cried the queen, "I do not understand a word of what you say to me. Explain yourself, my good friend."

"Your Majesty has, then, lost all recollection of the matter; which is very natural in the midst of so many preoccupations."

"Recollections of what? — I ask once more."

"Yesterday was the day for the first payment on the necklace," said Boehmer, timidly.

"You have sold your necklace, then?" said the queen.

"Why," said Boehmer, looking at her in astonishment, "it seems to me we have."

"And those to whom you sold it have not paid you, my poor Boehmer? So much the worse. They must do as I have done; not being able to pay for the necklace, they must return it to you, leaving you the amount paid on account."

"What does your Majesty say?" stammered the jeweller, who staggered like an imprudent traveller who receives a sunstroke.

"I say, my poor Boehmer, that if ten successive purchasers should return your necklace as I returned it, each leaving you a bonus of two hundred thousand francs, that would give you two millions in addition to the necklace."

"Your Majesty," cried Boehmer, "says that you really returned the necklace?"

"Why, yes, I say so," replied the queen, calmly. "What is the trouble?"

"What!" continued the jeweller, "your Majesty never bought the necklace?"

"Now, what farce is this we are playing?" said the queen, severely. "Is this miserable necklace destined always to deprive people of their senses?"

"Why," said Boehmer, trembling from head to foot, "it seemed to me that I heard from your Majesty's own lips that you had returned — your Majesty said RETURNED — the diamond necklace."

The queen gazed at Boehmer with astonishment, and folded her arms. "Fortunately," she said, "I have something here with which to refresh your memory; for you are a very forgetful man, Monsieur Boehmer, not to say disagreeable," and she went straight to her desk, took from it a paper, which she opened and read over, and then slowly held it out to the unhappy Boehmer. "The style is sufficiently clear, I imagine," she said. And she sat down, the better to observe the jeweller while he read it. The face of the latter expressed at first complete incredulity, then by degrees the most terrible alarm.

"Well," said the queen, "you recognize that receipt, which attests in due form that you have taken back the necklace; and unless you have forgotten also that your name is Boehmer, —"

"But, Madame," cried Boehmer, trembling with mingled rage and terror, "it is not I who signed this receipt."

The queen started back, almost annihilating this man with her flashing eyes. "You deny it?" she said.

"Absolutely! Even were I to leave here my liberty and my life, I would say that I never received the necklace; that I never signed that receipt. Were the block here, and the executioner by its side, I would still repeat, 'No, your Majesty, this receipt is not mine.'"

"Then, Monsieur," said the queen, turning pale, "I have robbed you? I, then, have your necklace?"

Boehmer searched his pocket-book, and drew from it a letter which he handed to the queen. "I do not think, Madame," he said in a tone respectful, but trembling with emotion, — "I do not think that if your Majesty had wished to return the necklace, you would have written this acknowledgment I now present to you."

"But," said the queen, "what is this scrap of paper? I never wrote that! Is that my hand-writing?"

"It is signed," said Boehmer, aghast.

"'Marie Antoinette de France' — you are mad! Am I of France, — I? Am I not Archduchess of Austria? Is it not absurd to say that I wrote that? Come, then, Monsieur Boehmer, the trap is too crude; go and tell your forgers so."

"My forgers —" stammered the jeweller, who came near fainting on hearing these words. "Your Majesty suspects me, Boehmer?"

"But you have suspected me, Marie Antoinette!" said the queen, haughtily.

"But this letter?" he objected, pointing to the paper which she still held.

"And that receipt?" she replied, pointing to the paper he had not given up.

Boehmer was obliged to lean upon a chair; the floor was whirling round beneath him. He breathed spasmodically, and the purple of apoplexy had replaced his livid paleness.

"Give me back my receipt," said the queen. "I hold it as good; and take back your letter signed 'Marie Antoinette de France.' The first lawyer you meet will tell you what it is worth;" and throwing down the note, after tearing from his hands the receipt, she turned her back and withdrew to a neighboring room, abandoning to himself the unhappy man, who was no longer able to form an idea, and who, in violation of all etiquette, allowed himself to sink into an easy-chair.

A few minutes, however, served to restore him; he rushed from the apartment, and went to join Bossange, to whom he related his adventure in such a manner as to excite his partner's suspicions with regard to himself. But he repeated his story so many times, and so clearly, that Bossange began to tear his wig, while Boehmer tore his hair, — a spectacle which, to the passers-by who happened to get a glimpse into the carriage, was painful and comical at the same time.

As it is not possible, however, to pass a whole day in a carriage; and as after having torn hair and wig one comes to the cranium; and as under the cranium there are or should be ideas, — the two jewellers conceived that of forcing, if possible, the queen's door, to obtain some sort of an explanation. They were making their way, therefore, toward the palace in a pitiable state, when they were met by one of the queen's officers, who requested that one of them should go to her Majesty. Their joy and their eagerness to obey may be readily imagined. They were admitted without delay.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE CARDINAL IS SURPRISED.

THE queen seemed to be waiting impatiently; and as soon as she saw the jewellers she exclaimed, eagerly, "Ah, there is Monsieur Bossange; you have reinforced yourself, Boehmer. So much the better."

Boehmer had nothing to say; he was meditating. The best thing a man can do in such a case is to express himself by gesture; Boehmer threw himself at Marie Antoinette's feet. It was an expressive gesture which Bossange, as he was his partner, felt obliged to imitate.

"Gentlemen," said the queen, "I am calm at present, and I will not again become angry. Besides, an idea has presented itself to me which modifies my feelings with regard to you. Doubtless, we are all misled by some little mystery, which is no longer a mystery to me."

"Ah, Madame," cried Boehmer, delighted with these words of the queen, "you suspect me, then, no longer of having committed — oh, what an ugly word to speak — forgery!"

"I beg you to believe that it is as hard for me to hear, as for you to pronounce," said the queen. "No; I do not suspect you longer."

"Does your Majesty, then, suspect any one?"

"Answer my questions. You say that you are no longer in possession of the diamonds?"

"We have them no longer," answered both jewellers together.

"It is of little importance to you to know by whom I returned them, — that is my affair. Have you not seen Madame la Comtesse de La Motte?"

"Your pardon, Madame, we have seen her —"

"And she gave you nothing — from me?"

"No, Madame. Madame la Comtesse only said, 'Wait!'"

"But that letter which professes to be written by me, — who sent it?"

"That letter," replied Boehmer, — "that, which your Majesty had in your hand, was brought to us by an unknown messenger during the night;" and he showed the false letter.

"Ah, ah!" said the queen, "you see, then, that it did not come directly from me." She rang, and a footman appeared.

"Let Madame la Comtesse de La Motte be sent for," said the queen, quietly. "And," she continued, in the same calm manner, "you have seen no one; you have not seen Monsieur de Rohan?"

"Yes, Madame. Monsieur de Rohan came to pay us a visit and inquire —"

"Very well," replied the queen, "we will seek no farther. If the Cardinal de Rohan is still connected with this affair, you would be wrong in giving yourself up to despair. Let me see: Madame de La Motte, in saying that word, 'Wait,' may have wished — No, I understand nothing about it. But go to Monsieur le Cardinal, and relate to him what you have just told me; lose no time, and say to him that I know everything."

The jewellers, revived by this little ray of hope, looked at each other with somewhat less alarm expressed in their faces. Bossange alone, who wanted to put in a word, ventured to say in a low voice, "Nevertheless, the queen has in her hand a forged receipt, and forgery is a crime."

Marie Antoinette knitted her brows. "It is true," she said, "that if you have not received the necklace, this writing is a forgery. But in order to prove the forgery it is indispensable that I should confront you with the person to whom I intrusted the diamonds."

"Whenever your Majesty may wish," cried Bossange. "We do not fear the light; we are honest tradesmen."

"Then, go seek the light from Monsieur le Cardinal; he alone can clear up this affair."

"And will your Majesty permit us to bring you his reply?" asked Boehmer.

"I shall obtain information before you do," said the queen; "I shall be the one to free you from embarrassment in this matter. Go." She dismissed them, and when they had gone, yielding to her anxiety, she sent courier after courier to Madame de La Motte.

The cardinal was at home reading with a rage impossible to describe a short letter which Madame de La Motte had just sent him, as she pretended from the queen. The letter was severe; it deprived the cardinal of all hope. It commanded him to think no more of what had taken place, and forbade him to appear familiarly at Versailles; it appealed to his loyalty not to attempt to renew relations that had become impossible.

In reading these words a second time, the prince jumped up with rage. He spelled out the letters one by one; he seemed to call the paper to account for the cruelties with which an unkind hand had burdened it. "Coquette, capricious, perfidious woman!" he cried out in his despair; "oh, I will have my revenge." He then tried to think of all the foolish pretexts which solace weak hearts in the sorrows of love, but which do not cure the love itself. "Here are four letters," he said, "which she has written me, — all most unjust, one just as tyrannical as another. She received me, then, only through caprice! It is a humiliation I would hardly pardon, even if she did not sacrifice me to a new caprice." And the unhappy man read again with the fervor of hope all these letters, so pitiless in the rigor of their morality.

The last was a master-piece of cruelty; the poor cardinal's heart was pierced through and through by it; nevertheless he loved to such a degree that from a mere spirit of contradiction, he delighted in reading over and over again those harsh words sent from Versailles, according to Madame de La Motte.

It was at this moment that the jewellers presented themselves at the cardinal's hôtel. He was very much surprised at their persistence in asking to be admitted; three times he drove away his valet, who returned a fourth time to the charge, saying that Boehmer and Bossange had announced their determination to remain unless they were cast out by force.

"What does that mean?" said the cardinal. "Allow them to come in."

They entered; their agitated faces bore witness to the fierce struggle, moral and physical, through which they had passed. If they had been conquerors in one of these struggles, the unfortunate men had been vanquished in the other. Never had more distracted brains been summoned to perform their functions in the presence of a prince of the Church.

"In the first place," cried the cardinal, "what is the meaning of this outrage, gentlemen? Do we owe you anything?"

This tone chilled with terror the two partners.

"Are we to have a repetition of the scenes at Versailles?" said Boehmer, glancing at his partner out of the corner of his eye.

"Oh, no, no," replied the latter, adjusting his wig with a very warlike movement. "As for me, I am prepared for all kinds of assaults," and he took a step forward in an almost threatening attitude, while Boehmer, more prudent, remained behind.

The cardinal believed them mad, and told them so plainly.

"Monseigneur," said the desperate Boehmer, cutting short each syllable with a sigh, "give us justice, mercy! Spare this rage, and do not force us to fail in respect to the greatest, most illustrious of princes."

"Gentlemen, either you are not mad and will be thrown out of the windows," said the cardinal, "or you are mad and will be simply put out of the door. Take your choice."

"Monseigneur, we are not mad; we have been robbed!"

"What is that to me?" replied Monsieur de Rohan; "I am not lieutenant of police."

"But you have had the necklace in your possession, Monseigneur," said Boehmer, sobbing; "you will have to go before a magistrate, Monseigneur; you will go —"

"I have had the necklace?" said the prince. "It is the necklace, then, which has been stolen?"

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"Well, what does the queen say?" cried the cardinal, beginning to take an interest.

"The queen has sent us to you, Monseigneur."

"It is very kind in her Majesty. But what can I do about it, my poor men?"

"You can do everything, Monseigneur; you can tell us what has become of it."

"I?"

"Doubtless."

"My dear Monsieur Boehmer, you might address me in such language, if I belonged to a band of robbers who had taken the queen's necklace."

"It is not the queen from whom the necklace was taken."

"From whom, then, good God?"

"The queen denies having had it in her possession."

"What! she denies it!" said the cardinal, with hesitation; "have you not a receipt from her?"

"The queen says that the receipt is a forgery."

"Come," cried the cardinal, "you are losing your senses, gentlemen."

"Is it not true?" said Boehmer to Bossange, who replied by three nods of assent.

"The queen has denied it," said the cardinal, "because there was some one with her when you spoke to her."

"No one, Monseigneur; but that is not all."

"What else, then?"

"Not only has the queen denied it, not only has she maintained that the acknowledgment is a forgery; but she has shown us a receipt proving that we have taken back the necklace."

"A receipt from you!" said the cardinal. "And this receipt?"

"Is a forgery like the other, Monsieur le Cardinal, as you know very well."

"A forgery. Two forgeries. And you say that I know it?"

"Assuredly, since you came to us to confirm what Madame de La Motte had told us; for you yourself knew very well that we had sold the necklace, and that it was in the hands of the queen."

"Let us see," said the cardinal, passing his hand over his brow, "these are very grave matters, it seems to me. Let us understand each other. First, my operations with you."

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"In the first place, a purchase on her Majesty's account of a necklace upon which I paid you two hundred and fifty thousand francs."

"That is true, Monseigneur."

"Then a sale to the queen, — you told me, — on terms fixed by herself over her signature."

"Over her signature."

"Show it to me."

The jewellers drew the letter from the portfolio and handed it to the cardinal.

"Eh! what!" he cried, on glancing at it; "you are children! 'Marie Antoinette de France'! Is not the queen a daughter of the house of Austria? You have been robbed! The writing and the signature are false."

"But then," cried the jewellers, exasperated, "Madame de La Motte must know the thief and the forger."

The truth of that assertion was obvious to the cardinal. "Let us send for Madame de La Motte," said he, with anxiety.

Servants were sent in pursuit of Jeanne, whose carriage could not yet be far off. Meantime the jewellers waited in a corner of the room, exclaiming from time to time, "The necklace, — where is the necklace?"

"You will make me deaf," said the cardinal, losing patience. "Do I know where your necklace is? I delivered it myself to the queen, and that is all I know about it."

"The necklace, or the money!" repeated the two tradesmen.

"Gentlemen, it is no affair of mine," said the cardinal, angrily, and much inclined to have the two jewellers turned out of the house.

"Madame de la Motte! Madame la Comtesse!" they cried; "it is she who has ruined us."

"Madame de La Motte is a person of unimpeachable integrity. You will suspect her at your peril."

"Some one must be guilty," said Boehmer, dolefully. "These two forgeries have been committed by some one."

"By me?" asked Monsieur de Rohan, haughtily.

"Of course, Monseigneur, we would not say that."

"Well, then?"

"In short, Monseigneur, in Heaven's name give us some explanation."

"Wait till I have one myself."

"But, Monseigneur, what are we to answer to the queen? She too cries out against us."

"What does she say?"

"She says it is either you, or Madame de La Motte, who has the necklace."

"Well," said the cardinal, pale with shame and anger, "go and tell the queen — No, tell her nothing. Enough of scandal. But to-morrow I am to officiate in the chapel at Versailles. You may there see me approach the queen and ask her if she has not the necklace in her possession, and you may hear her answer. If then she should deny having it, — then, gentlemen, I am Rohan, I will pay."

On saying these words, with an indescribable loftiness of tone, the prince dismissed the partners, who, close together, backed out of the room.

"Till to-morrow, then," stammered Boehmer, "is it not, Monseigneur?"

"Till to-morrow, at eleven o'clock in the morning, at the chapel of Versailles," replied the cardinal.

CHAPTER XXXV.

FENCING AND DIPLOMACY.

On the following morning, at about ten o'clock, a carriage bearing the arms of Monsieur de Breteuil entered the court-yard at Versailles.

Those readers of this book who recall the history of Balsamo and of Gilbert will remember that Monsieur de Breteuil, the rival and personal enemy of Monsieur de Rohan, had long been watching for an opportunity to give his enemy a mortal blow..

Diplomacy has this advantage over fencing, that it may wait fifteen years, or longer, planning where to strike and how to make its blow effective.

Monsieur had previously sent to request an audience, and found his Majesty dressing to go to Mass.

"Magnificent weather!" said Louis XVI., gayly, on the entrance of his visitor. "See, there is not a cloud in the sky."

"I am much grieved, Sire, to bring with me a cloud to your tranquillity," replied the minister.

"Come, then," cried the king, losing his lively manner, "the day begins badly. What is the matter?"

"I am much embarrassed, Sire, in speaking to you of the matter; and the more so because it does not pertain to the duties of my office, but rather to those of the lieutenant of police. It is about a robbery."

"A robbery!" cried the king; "you are keeper of the seals, and thieves come within the functions of your office. What is it?"

"Well, Sire, the affair is this. Your Majesty has heard of the diamond necklace?"

"Monsieur Boehmer's?"

"Yes, Sire."

"The one which the queen refused?"

"Precisely."

"A refusal through which I obtained a splendid man-of-war, the 'Suffren,'" said the king, rubbing his hands.

"Well, Sire," said the Baron de Breteuil, "that necklace has been stolen."

"Ah, that is bad," said the king. "It was very valuable. But the diamonds can be recognized. To have them cut again would reduce the profit of the theft. They will be left as they are, and the police will find them."

"Sire," interrupted the baron, "this is no common theft. There are certain rumors associated with it."

"Rumors! What do you mean?"

"Sire, it is asserted that the queen has kept the necklace."

"How could she have kept it? In my very presence she refused it, and was unwilling even to look at it. Nonsense, Baron, the queen has not kept the necklace."

"Sire, I have not used the right word. Calumny is always so blind toward sovereigns that it has used a more offensive term. The word 'kept'—"

"Why, Monsieur de Breteuil," said the king, smiling, "I suppose no one imagines that the queen has stolen the necklace?"

"Sire," replied the minister, eagerly, "it is said that the queen renewed in secret the bargain refused in your presence. It is said that the jewellers have a receipt, signed by her Majesty, which shows that the necklace is in her possession."

The king turned pale. "They say that?" he exclaimed. "What, then, will they not say? But it astonishes me, after all. If the queen bought the necklace secretly I should by no means blame her. The queen is a woman, and the necklace is a rare ornament of marvellous beauty. Thank God, the queen can spend a million and a half on her toilet if she is so inclined. I shall approve it; she has been wrong in one respect only, — in concealing from me her wishes. But it is not for the king to deal with that, it concerns the husband. I recognize no right on the part of any one to interfere, even with an ill-natured remark."

The baron bowed before these words of the king, so noble and so strong. But the king had only the appearance of firmness. A moment later he became restless and uneasy. "But," said he, "you spoke of robbery. If there had been a robbery the necklace would not be in the queen's possession. Let us be logical."

"Your Majesty has chilled me by your anger," said the baron; "I cannot continue."

"Oh, my anger! I, angry! As to that, Baron —" and the good king broke out into hearty laughter. "Come, go on, and tell me everything. Tell me even that the queen has sold the necklace to the Jews. Poor woman, she often needs money, and I do not always give it to her."

"I was about to speak of that to your Majesty. The queen, two months ago, asked through Monsieur de Calonne for five hundred thousand francs, and your Majesty refused to sign."

"That is true."

"Well, Sire, that money, it is said, was to serve for the first payment on account of the necklace. The queen, not having the money, refused to pay."

"Well?" said the king, becoming gradually more interested.

"Well, Sire, here begins the story which my zeal obliges me to relate to your Majesty."

"What! you say your story begins here. Good God! what have you then to tell?"

"Sire, it is said that the queen had recourse to a certain person to obtain money."

"To whom? To a Jew, was it not?"

"No, Sire, not to a Jew."

"My God! you say that with a singular expression, Breteuil. Come, then, I know what it is, — some foreign intrigue. The queen has asked for money from her brother — her family. Austria is at the bottom of this."

"Far better if it were so," replied Monsieur de Breteuil.

"What! Far better? Of whom, then, did the queen ask money?"

"Sire, I dare not — "

"You surprise me, Monsieur," said the king, raising his head and assuming the royal tone. "Speak out immediately, if you please, and give me the name of this money-lender."

"Monsieur de Rohan, Sire."

"Indeed! Are you not ashamed to speak to me of Monsieur de Rohan, the most ruined man in the kingdom?"

"Sire — " said Monsieur de Breteuil, lowering his eyes.

"Your manner displeases me. Explain yourself at once."

"No, Sire; nothing in the world can compel me to utter a word derogatory to the honor of my king and that of my queen."

The king frowned. "We are descending very low, Monsieur de Breteuil," said he. "This police report is impregnated with the odors of the place from which it comes."

"All calumny, Sire, exhales a deadly miasma; and for that reason kings purify them by heroic remedies, unless they are willing to see those poisons destroy their honor and their throne."

"Monsieur de Rohan!" murmured the king. "Why, what likelihood — Does the cardinal allow it to be said —"

"It will be proved to your Majesty that Monsieur de Rohan had negotiations with the jewellers, that the sale was arranged by him, and that with him were fixed the terms of payment."

"Is that really true?" cried the king, disturbed by jealousy and anger.

"It is a fact that must come out on the most superficial examination. I pledge myself to its truth."

"You say you pledge yourself to that?"

"Without reservation, — on my responsibility, Sire."

The king began walking up and down his cabinet. "These are terrible things," he said; "but in all this I fail to see that theft of which you spoke."

"Sire, the jewellers have a receipt, signed, they say, by the queen, and the queen should have the necklace."

"Ah," cried the king, with a sudden renewal of hope, "she denies it! — you see that she denies it, Breteuil."

"Eh, Sire, have I permitted your Majesty to think that I was not aware of the queen's innocence?"

"Then you accuse Monsieur de Rohan only —"

"But, Sire, the appearances indicate —"

"A grave accusation, Baron."

"Which perhaps will fail on an examination. But an examination is indispensable. Consider, Sire, that the queen affirms that she has not the necklace; that the jewellers maintain that they sold it to the queen; that the necklace is not to be found; and that the word 'thief' is uttered by the people in connection with the name of Monsieur de Rohan and with the sacred name of the queen."

"It is true; it is true;" said the king, in great anxiety; "you are right, Breteuil; the whole affair must be brought to light."

"Absolutely necessary, Sire."

"Who is passing below there? Do I not see Monsieur de Rohan on his way to the chapel?"

"Not yet, Sire; Monsieur de Rohan cannot yet be going to the chapel. It is not yet eleven o'clock; your Majesty has still half an hour."

"What shall we do, then?—speak to him; summon him?"

"No, Sire; permit me to counsel your Majesty to make no noise over the matter before consulting the queen."

"Yes; she will tell me the truth."

"That is not for a moment to be doubted, Sire."

"Come, Baron, give me all the details of the matter in their order, without reserve."

"I have it all set forth in my portfolio, with the evidence."

"Let us to work then. Wait till I have the door closed. I was to give two audiences this morning, but shall put them off."

The king gave his orders, and resuming his seat threw a last look from the window. "This time," said he, "it is the cardinal. Look."

Breteuil drew near to the window, and from behind the curtain perceived Monsieur de Rohan, who, in the full dress of a cardinal and archbishop, was directing his steps toward the apartment appointed for his use on his official visits to Versailles.

"Here he is at last," said the king, rising.

"So much the better," said Monsieur de Breteuil, "the explanation will not be delayed." He then set himself to exposing the affair to the king with all the zeal of a man bent on the destruction of another. With an infernal art he had brought together everything that would injure the cardinal. The king saw proofs of Monsieur de Rohan's guilt accumulate, but was in despair at not seeing at the same time proofs of the queen's innocence. Thus he suffered for a quarter of an hour, when suddenly cries were heard in the neighboring corridor. The king listened. Breteuil discontinued his reading. An officer knocked at the door of the cabinet.

"What can it be?" asked the king, rendered nervous by the revelations of Monsieur de Breteuil.

An officer entered. "Sire," he said, "her Majesty the queen begs your Majesty to join her in her apartment."

"There is something new," said the king, turning pale.

"Possibly," replied Breteuil.

"I am going to the queen; wait for us here, Monsieur de Breteuil."

"Well, we are nearing the end," murmured the keeper of the seals.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

GENTLEMAN, CARDINAL, AND QUEEN.

At the time when Monsieur de Breteuil had entered the king's cabinet, Monsieur de Charny, pale and agitated, had sent to request an audience of the queen.

The latter was dressing. Through her window which opened on the terrace she saw Charny insisting on admission. She gave orders that he should be admitted. She yielded to the demand of her heart, saying to herself, with a noble pride, that a love like his, pure and spiritual, had the right to enter, at any hour, even the palaces of queens.

Charny entered, tremblingly touched the queen's hand, and said with a stifled voice, "Ah, Madame, what a misfortune!"

"What then is the matter?" cried the queen, turning pale.

"Madame, do you know what I have just learned? Do you know what is said? Do you know of what the king has been informed, or will learn to-morrow?"

The queen shuddered, thinking of that night of chaste delights when perhaps a hostile or a jealous eye had seen her with Charny in the park. "Tell me all; I am strong," she said, putting her hand to her heart.

"It is said, Madame, that you have purchased a necklace of Boehmer and Bossange."

"I returned it," she replied eagerly.

"Listen. It is said that you pretended to return it; that you expected to be able to pay for it; that the king prevented that by withholding his signature from a draft by Monsieur de Calonne; that thereupon you had recourse to some one to obtain the money; and that this person is — your lover."

"You!" cried the queen, with an impulse of sublime confidence. "You, Monsieur? Well, let them say that who will. They cannot take so much pleasure in the word 'lover,' launched as an insult, as there is to us in the word 'friend,' sacred to us henceforth."

Charny for an instant did not reply. He was astonished at the strong and copious eloquence issuing from pure love, — the heart's perfume of every generous woman. But the pause made by him increased the queen's anxiety. She cried out, "Of what are you speaking, Monsieur de Charny? Calumny has a strange language which I do not comprehend. Is it a language that you understand?"

"Madame, please give me your attention; the situation is serious. Yesterday I went with my uncle, Monsieur de Suffren, who had business with the jewellers, Boehmer and Bossange. They related to him a frightful story, invented by your Majesty's enemies. Madame, I am in despair. If you have bought the necklace, tell me so; if you have not paid for it, tell me, — but do not suffer me to believe that Monsieur de Rohan paid for it in your stead."

"Monsieur de Rohan!" cried the queen.

"Yes, Monsieur de Rohan, — he who is regarded as the queen's lover; he from whom the queen borrows money; he whom an unhappy man called Charny saw in the park of Versailles smiling at the queen, kneeling to the queen, kissing the queen's hands; he —"

"Monsieur," cried Marie Antoinette, "if you believe such things it is because you do not love me."

"Oh!" replied the young man, "the danger is urgent.

I have come to ask of you neither frankness nor daring; I come to beg you to render me a service."

"In the first place, what is the danger?"

"The danger, Madame? The cardinal answering for the queen, paying for the queen, ruins the queen. I do not speak of the suffering caused to Monsieur de Charny by this confidential relation with Monsieur de Rohan. No. Of such sufferings one dies, but does not complain."

"You are mad!" said the queen, angrily.

"I am not mad, Madame; but you are unfortunate, — you are lost. I saw you in the park; I was not deceived, I tell you. To-day the horrible, the deadly truth breaks out; Monsieur de Rohan boasts perhaps —"

The queen seized Charny's arm. "Mad! mad!" she exclaimed, with indescribable grief. "In Heaven's name, after what I have told you do not believe me guilty. Oh, Monsieur de Charny, if you do not wish me to despair to-day and to be dead to-morrow, do not say that you suspect me; or rather, flee so far that you may not hear my fall at the moment of my death."

Olivier wrung his hands in an agony of grief. "Listen to me," he said, "if you wish me to render you effective service."

"A service from you!" cried the queen, — "from you, more cruel than my enemies! — a service from a man who despises me! Never, Monsieur, never!"

Olivier drew near the queen and took her hands in his. "You will see," he said, "that I am not a man who moans and weeps. The moments are precious; this evening it will be too late to do what remains to be done. Will you save me from despair by saving yourself from shame?"

"Monsieur!"

"Oh, I shall not be particular as to my words in the presence of death. If you do not listen to me, I tell you, this evening we shall both be dead, — you, from shame; I, from having to see you die. Let us go straight for the enemy, Madame, as in our battles! Let us face the danger! Let us meet death! Let us go together, — I as the obscure soldier in the ranks, but brave, as you shall see; you with Majesty, with strength, in the thickest of the fight. If you succumb, — well, you will not be alone. Look on me as a brother, Madame. You are in need of money — to pay for this necklace?"

"I?"

"Do not deny it."

"I tell you —"

"Do not tell me you have not the necklace."

"I swear to you —"

"Do not swear, if you wish me to love you still."

"Olivier!"

"There is one way left to save your honor and my love. The necklace is worth sixteen hundred thousand francs, of which you have already paid two hundred and fifty thousand. Here is a million and a half; take it."

"What is that for?"

"Do not stop to consider; take it and pay —"

"Your property sold! your lands taken by me and paid away! you despoil yourself for me! You are a good and noble man, and I will no longer palter with a love like that. Olivier, I love you!"

"Accept this money."

"No; but I love you!"

"Monsieur de Rohan, then, is to pay it? Think of it, Madame, it is no longer generosity on your part; it is an overwhelming cruelty. You accept from the cardinal —"

"Come now, Monsieur de Charny, I am the queen, and if I give my subjects either love or fortune, I accept neither from them."

"What then are you going to do?"

"It is you who shall tell me what to do. What do you say Monsieur de Rohan thinks?"

"He thinks that you are his mistress."

"You are cruel, Olivier."

"I speak as if face to face with death."

"What do you say the jewellers think?"

"That since the queen cannot pay, Monsieur de Rohan will pay for her."

"What do you say the public thinks on the subject of the necklace?"

"That you are in possession of it; that you have hidden it; that you will acknowledge it only when it shall have been paid for, either by the cardinal, through his love for you, or by the king through fear of scandal."

"Well, and you, Charny, in your turn, — I look you in the face, and ask, What do you think of the scenes you saw in the park of Versailles?"

"I think, Madame, that you need to prove to me your innocence."

"The Prince Louis, Cardinal de Rohan, grand Almoner of France!" called the voice of an usher from the corridor.

"He!" murmured Charny.

"The proof you require," said the queen.

"You will receive him?"

"I was about to send for him."

"But I —"

"Go into my boudoir and leave the door ajar that you may hear all that is said."

"Madame!"

"Go quickly; here comes the cardinal." She pushed Monsieur de Charny into the room which she had indicated, and ordered the cardinal to be admitted.

Monsieur de Rohan appeared on the threshold, resplendent in his official dress. At some distance behind him came a numerous following, whose costumes shone like their master's. Among these attendants were Boehmer and Bossange, somewhat embarrassed in their court dress.

The queen advanced to meet the cardinal, attempting a smile, which soon died out upon her lips. Louis de Rohan was grave, even sad. He had the calmness of the courageous man who is about to fight, the slightly threatening aspect of the priest who may have to pardon.

The queen pointed to a seat, but the cardinal remained standing. "Madame," he said, bowing, "I had many important things to communicate to your Majesty, who tries in every way to avoid my presence."

"I?" said the queen; "why, so far from avoiding you, I was just about to send for you."

The cardinal cast a glance toward the boudoir. "Am I alone with your Majesty?" he said in a low voice; "may I speak with perfect freedom?"

"With perfect freedom, Monsieur le Cardinal; be unconstrained, we are alone," and she spoke distinctly, as if desirous of being heard by the gentleman hidden in the next room. She enjoyed with pride her courage, and the assurance which Monsieur de Charny would feel at the very first words.

The cardinal had resolved on his course of action. He drew the stool up to the chair of the queen so as to be as far as possible from the folding doors.

"You have a great many preambles," said the queen, affecting gayety.

"The fact is — " said the cardinal.

"The fact is?" repeated the queen.

"The king will not come in?" asked Monsieur de Rohan.

"Have no fear of the king or anybody else," replied Marie Antoinette, quickly.

"Oh, it is you whom I fear," said the cardinal, in an agitated voice.

"Then there is still less reason to be alarmed, for I am not very formidable. Speak with few words, in a loud and distinct voice; I like frankness, and if you are reserved I shall think that you are not a man of honor. Oh, no more gestures; I have been told that you had a grievance against me. Speak, — I am fond of war; I am of a race which knows no fear! You, also; I know that well. With what do you reproach me?"

The cardinal sighed, and rose from his seat as if to breathe more freely. Finally, having mastered his emotion, he began to speak.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

EXPLANATIONS.

"MADAME," said the cardinal, bowing, "you know what is said of our necklace?"

"No, Monsieur; I do not know, and I shall be happy to learn it from you."

"Why has your Majesty compelled me for so long a time to communicate with you only through a third person? Why, if you have any reason for hating me, do you not explain to me what it is?"

"I do not know what you mean, Monsieur le Cardinal, and I have no reason for hating you; but that, I believe, is not the object of our interview. Please to give me some positive information about this miserable necklace; and in the first place, where is Madame de La Motte?"

"I was about to ask that of your Majesty."

"Pardon, but if any one can tell where Madame de La Motte is, you are the one, I think."

"I, Madame, upon what ground?"

"Oh, I am not here to receive your confessions, Monsieur le Cardinal. I had need to speak to Madame de La Motte; I sent for her, and she has been sought for at her house many times; but she has sent no reply. You will acknowledge that this disappearance is strange."

"And I, Madame, am also astonished at her disappearance, for I sent to Madame de La Motte, requesting her to come to see me, and she has treated my request as she did that of your Majesty."

"Then let us leave the countess and speak of ourselves."

"Oh, no, Madame, let us speak of her; for certain words of your Majesty have excited in me a painful suspicion. It seems to me that your Majesty reproached me with being too attentive to the countess."

"I have as yet reproached you with nothing at all, Monsieur."

"Oh, Madame, the fact is that such a suspicion would explain to me all the susceptibilities of your soul, and then I should understand, even in my despair, the severity, otherwise inexplicable, with which you have treated me."

"I no longer understand what you are saying," said the queen. "You are impenetrably obscure; it is not to make the affair more intricate that I ask you for explanations. To the point! to the point!"

"Madame," cried the cardinal, clasping his hands and drawing nearer the queen, "do me the favor not to change the conversation. Two words more on the subject which we were considering just now, and we should understand each other."

"Really, Monsieur, you speak a language which I do not know; let us return to French, I beg. Where is that necklace which I returned to the jewellers?"

"The necklace you returned!" cried Monsieur de Rohan.

"Yes; what have you done with it?"

"I know nothing about it, Madame."

"Well, there is one thing perfectly clear. Madame de La Motte took the necklace, and returned it in my name; the jewellers pretend that they have not received it. I have in my possession a receipt which proves the contrary; the jewellers say that the receipt is a forgery. Madame de La Motte could in one word explain everything; she cannot be found. Well, let us put suppositions in the place of hidden fact. Madame de La Motte wished to return the necklace. You, whose kindly desire it was that I should buy this necklace; you, who brought it to me and offered to pay for it, — an offer — "

"Which your Majesty very unkindly refused to accept," said the cardinal, with a sigh.

"Well, yes; you have persevered in this fixed idea that I should have the necklace, and therefore you did not return it to the jewellers, hoping still that I might be prevailed upon to take it. Madame de La Motte has shown weakness in this matter, — she who knew how impossible it was for me to pay for it, and my unchangeable resolution not to have it, since I had no money. Madame de La Motte, through zeal for me, has conspired with you; and now she fears my anger and will not present herself. Am I right? Tell me that I am. Allow me to reproach you with this inconsiderateness, this disobedience of my formal orders. You shall be absolved by a reprimand, and that will be an end of it. I will do more; I will promise you to pardon Madame de La Motte, so that she may be relieved of her penance. But for mercy's sake, Monsieur, let us have light, light! I do not wish at this moment that a shadow should be cast upon my life; I will not have it, — do you hear?"

The queen had uttered these words so vigorously that the cardinal had neither dared nor been able to interrupt her; but as soon as she had ceased speaking, "Madame," he said, stifling a sigh, "I will reply to all your suppositions. No; I did not persevere in the idea that you ought to possess the necklace, since I was sure that you possessed it already. No; I did not conspire with Madame de La Motte in connection with this necklace. No; it is no more in my possession than in that of the jewellers, or in your own."

"It is not possible!" cried the queen, in amazement. "You, then, have not the necklace?"

"No, Madame."

"You have not advised Madame de La Motte to stay away on account of all this?"

"No, Madame."

"You have not concealed her?"

"No, Madame."

"You do not know what has become of her?"

"No more than you, Madame."

"But then how do you explain all that has happened?"

"Madame, I am forced to confess that I cannot explain it. Moreover, it is not the first time that I have had to complain to the queen of not being understood by her."

"And when was that, Monsieur. I do not recall it."

"Be so kind, Madame," said the cardinal, "as to re-read in imagination my letters."

"Your letters!" said the queen, in surprise. "You wrote to me?"

"Too seldom, Madame, to say all that was in my heart."

The queen rose. "It seems to me," she said, "that we have both been deceived; let us end this little farce. What were you saying about letters? What letters, and what have you upon your heart, or in your heart? I don't remember just what you said."

"My God! Madame, perhaps I have uttered too loud the secret of my soul."

"What secret? Are you in your right mind, Monsieur le Cardinal?"

"Madame!"

"Oh, do not prevaricate! You speak like a man who wishes to lay a snare for me, or who wishes to embarrass me, before witnesses."

"I swear to you, Madame, that I have said nothing — Is there really any one listening?"

"No, Monsieur, a thousand times no! there is no one; so explain yourself fully, and if you are in full possession of your reason, prove it."

"Oh, Madame, why is Madame de La Motte not here? She would help me — she who is our friend — to awaken, if not the attachment, at least the memory, of your Majesty."

"Our friend; my attachment; my memory? I am falling from the clouds."

"Ah, Madame, I entreat you," said the cardinal, stung by the sharp tone of the queen, "spare me! You are at liberty to love no longer; but do not insult me."

"Ah, my God!" cried the queen, turning pale, "what is this man saying?"

"Very well," continued Monsieur de Rohan, boiling with rage, — "very well, Madame, I think I have been sufficiently discreet and reserved not to be so harshly treated; besides, I reproach you only with trivial grievances. I am wrong to repeat them. I should have known that when a queen has said, 'I am no longer willing,' it is a law as imperious as when a woman says, 'I am willing!'"

The queen uttered a wild cry, and seized the cardinal by his lace sleeve. "Tell me quickly, Monsieur," said she, in a trembling voice; "I said, 'I am no longer willing,' and I said, 'I am willing'? To whom did I say the one; to whom did I say the other?"

"Why, you said both to me."

"To you?"

"Forget that you said the one, I shall not forget that you said the other."

"You are a wretch, Monsieur de Rohan! You are a liar!"

"I?"

"You are a coward; you calumniate a woman."

"I?"

"You are a traitor; you insult the queen."

"And you, — you are a woman without heart, a queen without faith."

"Wretch!"

"You have led me by degrees to a mad love for you. You have filled me with hopes."

"Hopes! My God! am I mad? Is he a villain?"

"Would I have dared otherwise to ask audiences at night, which you granted me?"

The queen uttered a cry of rage which was answered by a sigh from the boudoir.

"Would I have dared to come alone into the park of Versailles if you had not sent Madame de La Motte to me?"

"My God!"

"Would I have dared to steal the key which opens that gate near the huntsman's lodge?"

"My God!"

"Would I have dared to ask you to bring the rose which I have here? Adored rose! accursed rose! dried, burned up by my ardent kisses!"

"My God!"

"Would I have compelled you to return the next night and give me both your hands, whose sweetness consumes continually my brain and makes me mad. You are right to call me mad."

"Oh, enough! enough!"

"Finally, would I, in my most furious pride, ever have dared to dream of that third night with its clear sky, its sweet silence, its perfidious loves?"

"Monsieur! Monsieur!" cried the queen, retreating from the cardinal, "you are blaspheming!"

"My God!" replied the cardinal, raising his eyes to heaven, "thou knowest that to keep the love of this woman, I would have given my wealth, my liberty, my life!"

"Monsieur de Rohan, if you wish to preserve all that, you will say right here that you are seeking to ruin me; that you have invented all these horrors; that you did not come to Versailles in the night—"

"I did come," replied the cardinal, nobly.

"You are a dead man if you maintain such language."

"A Rohan never lies. I did come."

"Monsieur de Rohan, Monsieur de Rohan, in the name of Heaven, tell me that you did not come into the park—"

"I would die, if necessary, as you threatened me just now; but I say that I saw you in the park of Versailles, whither Madame de La Motte conducted me."

"Once more," cried the queen, livid and trembling with emotion, "do you retract?"

"No."

"Still again, tell me that you have plotted against me this infamy?"

"No."

"For the last time, Monsieur de Rohan, acknowledge that you may have been deceived, that all this is a calumny, a dream, an impossibility, — I know not what; but confess that I am innocent, that I may be so—"

"No."

The queen drew herself up proudly and solemnly. "You will have, therefore, to deal with the justice of the king, since you defy the justice of God."

The cardinal bowed without speaking.

The queen rang so violently that several of her women entered at once. "Let his Majesty be informed," she said, "that I beg he will do me the honor to come to me."

An officer went to execute this order. The cardinal, determined to face everything boldly, remained in the corner of the room.

Marie Antoinette approached several times the door of the boudoir without entering, as if, having lost her reason, she had found it again on reaching that door.

Within a short time the king entered the room. As the door was thrown open, in the midst of the waiting throng could be seen the agitated faces of Boehmer and Bossange, who felt the storm in the air.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE ARREST.

THE king had scarcely appeared at the door of the queen's cabinet when the queen addressed him vehemently. "Sire," she said, "here is Monsieur le Cardinal de Rohan, who says incredible things; please ask him to repeat them to you."

At these unexpected words the cardinal turned pale. In fact, the position was so strange that he could not comprehend it. Could he repeat to his king, — he the respectful subject, — could he declare to the husband — he the pretended lover — all the rights he thought he had acquired over the queen and the wife?

But the king turned toward the cardinal, thus absorbed in his reflections, and said, "It is with regard to a certain necklace, Monsieur, that you have incredible things to say to me, and I incredible things to hear? Speak, then; I am listening."

Monsieur de Rohan immediately decided upon his course. Of the two difficulties he would choose the least; of the two attacks, he would undergo that which was least dishonorable to the king and queen; and if they should imprudently expose him to the second danger, well, he would meet it like a brave man.

"With regard to the necklace, yes, Sire," murmured his Eminence.

"Why, Monsieur," said the king, "you did then buy the necklace?"

"Sire — "

"Yes, or no?"

The cardinal looked at the queen and did not answer.

"Yes or no?" she repeated. "The truth, Monsieur, the truth; nothing else is asked of you."

Monsieur de Rohan turned away his head, and did not reply.

"Since Monsieur de Rohan will not answer, answer yourself, Madame," said the king; "you must know something of all this. Did you, yes or no, purchase that necklace?"

"No!" said the queen, emphatically.

Monsieur de Rohan shuddered.

"This is the word of a queen!" cried the king, solemnly; "take heed to it, Monsieur le Cardinal."

A smile of scorn rose to Monsieur de Rohan's lips.

"You say nothing?" said the king.

"Of what am I accused, Sire?"

"The jewellers say that they sold a necklace either to you or the queen. They show a receipt from her Majesty."

"The receipt is a forgery," said the queen.

"The jewellers," continued the king, "say that in case the queen fails to pay, they are guaranteed by pledges made by you, Monsieur le Cardinal."

"I do not refuse to pay, Sire," said Monsieur de Rohan. "This must of course be the truth, since the queen allows it to be said," and he smiled more scornfully than before.

"Monsieur le Cardinal," replied the king, "there is nevertheless in this affair a forgery which has compromised the signature of the queen of France."

"There is another forgery," cried the queen, "of which it is not easy to accuse a nobleman, — that by which it is pretended that the jewellers took back the necklace."

"The queen is at liberty," said Monsieur de Rohan in the same tone, "to attribute to me both forgeries; what matters it whether I committed one or two?"

"Be careful," said the king to the cardinal, "you render your position more serious, Monsieur. I tell you to justify yourself, and you have the appearance of accusing others."

The cardinal reflected a moment; then as if succumbing under the weight of this mysterious calumny which would affect his honor, "Justify myself?" he said; "impossible!"

"Monsieur, the jewellers say that a necklace has been stolen from them; by offering to pay for it, you confess that you are guilty."

"Who will believe it?" said the cardinal, with superb disdain.

"Then, Monsieur, if you do not suppose that it will be believed, it shall be believed," and an angry look came over the usually placid face of the king.

"Sire, I know nothing of what is said," replied the cardinal. "I know nothing of what has been done; I can only affirm that I have not had the necklace; I can only say that the diamonds are in the possession of some one who ought to declare himself, but will not, and who obliges me to repeat to him that passage of Scripture, 'Let the punishment fall on the head of the guilty.'"

At these words the queen made a movement to take the arm of the king, who said to her, "The question is between you and him, Madame. For the last time I ask, have you this necklace?"

"No, by the honor of my mother, by the life of my son."

The king, full of joy at this declaration, turned toward the cardinal. "Then the affair is between you and justice, Monsieur," he said; "unless you should prefer to trust to my clemency."

"The clemency of kings is for the guilty, Sire," replied the cardinal; "I prefer the justice of men."

"You will acknowledge nothing, then?"

"I have nothing to say."

"But, Monsieur," cried the queen, "your silence compromises my honor!"

The cardinal was silent.

"Well, then, I will not be silent," continued the queen. "This reserve is terrible to me,-and it pretends a generosity which I disclaim. You must know, Sire, that the crime of the cardinal does not wholly consist in the sale or robbery of the necklace."

Monsieur de Rohan raised his head, and turned pale.

"What is the meaning of this?" said the king, becoming uneasy.

"Madame!" murmured the cardinal, in alarm.

"Oh, no consideration, no fear, no weakness, shall prevent me from speaking; I have here in my heart motives which urge me to proclaim my innocence in the public place."

"Your innocence!" said the king. "Why, Madame, who would be bold enough, or cowardly enough, to force your Majesty to speak that word?"

"I entreat you, Madame," said the cardinal.

"Ah, you begin to tremble. I had guessed aright; your plots need the darkness! Give me the full light of day! Sire, ask Monsieur le Cardinal to tell you what he has just told me here, in this place."

"Madame! Madame!" said Monsieur de Rohan, "take care; you are passing all bounds!"

"What do you say?" said the king, haughtily. "Who speaks thus to the queen? It is not I, I suppose?"

"That is exactly the case, Sire," said Marie Antoinette. "Monsieur le Cardinal speaks thus to the queen because he pretends to have the right to do so."

"You, Monsieur!" murmured the king, becoming livid.

"He!" cried the queen, scornfully, — "he!"

"Monsieur le Cardinal has proofs?" said the king, taking a step toward the prince.

"Monsieur de Rohan has letters, so he says," said the queen.

"Let us see them, Monsieur!" insisted the king.

"Those letters!" cried the queen, angrily, — "those letters! Oh, that is not all," pursued the queen, who was growing more and more animated under the influence of the cardinal's generous silence, "Monsieur le Cardinal has obtained rendezvous."

"Madame, for pity's sake!" said the king.

"For modesty's sake!" said the cardinal.

"In short, Monsieur!" said the queen, "if you are not the basest of mankind, if you hold anything sacred in this world, — if you have proofs, produce them."

Monsieur de Rohan slowly raised his head and replied, "No, Madame, I have none."

"You will not add this crime to the others," continued the queen; "you will not cover me with disgrace. You have an accomplice, a witness in all this; name him, or name her."

"Who is it then?" cried the king.

"Madame de La Motte, Sire," said the queen.

"Ah," said the king, triumphant at seeing his suspicions justified; "well, let me see this woman, — let me question her."

"Ah, yes; but she has disappeared," said the queen. "Ask Monsieur what he has done with her."

"Others must have caused her disappearance," replied the cardinal, "who are more interested to keep her away than I can be. That is the reason why she can no longer be found."

"But, Monsieur, since you are innocent," said the queen, with rage, "help us to find the guilty ones."

But the Cardinal de Rohan, after having darted a last glance, turned his back and folded his arms.

"Monsieur," said the king, deeply offended, "you shall be taken to the Bastille."

The cardinal bowed, then, in a firm tone, said, "Thus attired in my pontifical robes; before the whole court? Consider, Sire, the scandal will be terrible, and will be most heavy for the head on which it shall fall."

"I wish it thus," said the king, very much agitated.

"It is an injustice to which you are prematurely subjecting a prelate, Sire; and torture before accusation is not legal."

"It must be so," replied the king, opening the door of the room to look for some one to whom to give his order.

Monsieur de Breteuil was there; his piercing eyes had divined in the excited appearance of the queen, in the agitation of the king, in the attitude of the cardinal, the ruin of an enemy. The king had hardly finished speaking to him in a low voice, when he cried out aloud, "Arrest Monsieur le Cardinal!"

Monsieur de Rohan trembled. The murmurs he heard throughout the gallery, the agitation of the courtiers, the sudden arrival of the body-guards, gave to this scene a character of ill-omen.

The cardinal passed before the queen without bowing, — an insult which made the blood of the proud princess boil. He bowed very humbly in passing before the king, and assumed when approaching Monsieur de Breteuil an expression of pity so skilfully shaded that the baron must have thought himself insufficiently avenged.

A lieutenant of the guards approached timidly, and seemed to ask of the cardinal himself confirmation of the order he had just heard.

"Yes, Monsieur," said Monsieur de Rohan to him; "yes, it is I whom you are to arrest."

"You will conduct Monsieur to his apartment, while I decide during Mass what is to be done," said the king, in the midst of a death-like silence.

The king remained alone with the queen, the doors still open, while the cardinal slowly withdrew along the gallery, preceded by the lieutenant of the guards, hat in hand.

"Madame," said the king, "you know that this must lead to a public trial, — that is to say, a scandal beneath which will fall the honor of the guilty ones."

"I thank you!" cried the queen, pressing tenderly the hands of the king, "you have taken the only method of justifying me."

"You thank me?"

"With all my soul. You have acted as a king! I, as a queen! Be assured of it."

"It is well," replied the king, full of joy, "we shall at last get at the root of all this villany; and when the serpent shall have been once crushed beneath our feet, I hope we shall live in peace and happiness." He kissed the queen's brow and returned to his own apartments.

At the extremity of the gallery, Monsieur de Rohan had found Boehmer and Bossange half-fainting in each other's arms. Then, some paces farther on, the cardinal perceived his courier, who, frightened at this disaster, was watching for a look from his master.

"Monsieur," said the cardinal to the officer who conducted him, "can I send word home that I am arrested?"

"Oh, Monseigneur, if no one sees you."

The cardinal thanked him; then addressing his courier in German, he wrote a few words upon a page of his prayer-book which he tore off and let fall at the feet of his courier.

"I follow you," he said to the officer, and they disappeared together.

The courier pounced upon this paper like a vulture on his prey, rushed out of the palace, mounted his horse, and fled to Paris. The cardinal could see him galloping along the road, through one of the windows of the staircase as he was descending with his guide.

"She ruins me," he murmured; "I save her! It is for you, my king, that I do this; it is for you, my God, who commands the forgiveness of injuries, it is for you that I forgive others. Forgive me!"

CHAPTER XXXIX.

DOCUMENTS IN EVIDENCE.

THE king had scarcely got back to his room, and signed the order for the committal of Monsieur de Rohan to the Bastille, when Monsieur le Comte de Provence entered the cabinet, making signs to Monsieur de Breteuil which the latter could not comprehend. These signs, however, were not addressed to the keeper of seals, but were intended to attract the attention of the king, who every little while glanced into a looking-glass opposite which he was sitting while inditing his order. The count at last succeeded; the king perceived the signs, and dismissing Monsieur de Breteuil, "Why did you make those signs to Breteuil?" he said to his brother.

"Oh, Sire!"

"That vivacity of gesture, that preoccupied air means something."

"Doubtless, but —"

"You are at liberty to keep silent, brother," said the king, with an air of vexation.

"Sire, I have just learned of the arrest of Monsieur le Cardinal de Rohan."

"Well, why should this news cause you such agitation? Is it because Monsieur de Rohan did not appear to you to be guilty? Have I done wrong to strike at even the powerful?"

"Wrong? by no means, brother. You have not been wrong; I did not mean to say that."

"It would have surprised me very much, Monsieur le Comte de Provence, if you had taken the part, against the queen, of a man who sought to dishonor her. I have just seen the queen, brother; a word from her sufficed —"

"Oh, Sire, God forbid that I should accuse the queen! Her Majesty — my sister — has no more devoted friend than I. How many times has it happened that I have defended her, on the contrary, and it may be said without reproach, even against yourself?"

"Indeed, brother, has she been accused so often?"

"I am unfortunate, Sire; you attack me at every word. I would say that the queen herself would not believe me, if I appeared to doubt her innocence."

"Then you rejoice with me in the humiliation of the cardinal, in the prospect of the trial which will ensue, in the scandal which will terminate the calumnies which no one would utter against a simple woman of the court?"

"Yes, Sire, I approve entirely the conduct of your Majesty; and I say that all is as it should be with regard to the affair of the necklace."

"Pardieu! brother," said the king, "nothing could be more transparent. Has not Monsieur de Rohan been boasting of the familiar friendship of the queen, concluding in his own name a bargain for the diamonds she has refused, and allowing it to be said that these diamonds had been taken by the queen, or by some one for the queen? It is monstrous! It is as she said: 'What would people have believed if I had Monsieur de Rohan for an associate in this mysterious traffic?'"

"Sire."

"And then, you do not know, brother, that calumny never stops half-way; that the inconsiderateness of Monsieur de Rohan compromises the queen, but that the rehearsal of this inconsiderateness dishonors her."

"Oh, yes, brother; yes, I repeat it, you have been entirely right as far as the affair of the necklace is concerned."

"Well, what do you mean?" said the king, in surprise. "Is there anything else?"

"But, Sire — the queen must have told you — "

"Told me — what?"

"Sire, you wish to embarrass me. It is impossible that the queen should not have told you — "

"Told me what, Monsieur? What is it?"

"Sire — "

"Ah, the pranks of Monsieur de Rohan, his concealments, his pretended correspondence?"

"No, Sire, no."

"What then can you mean? — the interviews the queen granted to Monsieur de Rohan on this business of the necklace — "

"No, Sire; it is not that."

"All that I know is this, — that I have absolute confidence in the queen, which she merits by her nobility of character. It would have been very easy for her Majesty not to have said a word of all this. By at once cutting short all this mystery, which was becoming a scandal, she has shown that she appealed to me before appealing to the public. She has selected me as her confessor, her judge; the queen has therefore told me all."

"Well, then," replied the Comte de Provence, "once more you are questioning my friendship and my respect for the queen, my sister. If you proceed against me with this susceptibility I shall be afraid to say anything lest I who am her advocate pass for an accuser or an enemy. And yet see how illogical you are. The queen's confessions have already led to the discovery of a truth which justifies my sister. Why should you not wish to see more, so that the queen's innocence may be more clearly revealed?"

"To the point, advocate, to the point! What do you know more than the queen has told me?"

"Nothing, Sire, and everything. Let me know first just what the queen has told you."

"The queen has told me that she has not the necklace."

"Good!"

"She says that she did not sign the receipt given to the jewellers."

"Very good!"

"She says that the report of an arrangement with Monsieur de Rohan is false, — an invention of her enemies."

"Very good, Sire."

"She says that she has never given Monsieur de Rohan the right to think that he was more to her than one of her subjects, — a person indifferent to her, unknown."

"Ah! — she has said that?"

"And in a tone that admitted no answer; the cardinal did not venture to reply."

"Then, Sire, if the cardinal did not reply, he confessed himself a liar; and by this disavowal he aids the currency of other rumors of preferences accorded to certain persons by the queen."

"Eh, great God! is there more to come?" cried the king, in a tone of deep discouragement.

"Nothing but what is very absurd, as you will see. Since it is established that Monsieur de Rohan did not walk with the queen — "

"What!" cried the king, "is it pretended that Monsieur de Rohan has taken walks with the queen?"

"Which has been denied by the queen herself, Sire, and by the disavowal of Monsieur de Rohan. But, in short, when that is settled inquiry arises, — malignity is so persistent, — how it came about that the queen should walk in the night in the park of Versailles."

"In the night! — in the park! — the queen!"

"And with whom she walked," continued the count, quietly.

"With whom?" murmured the king.

"Certainly. All eyes are fixed upon the queen, — especially observant of what she does at night."

"But, brother, what you say is infamous! Be careful!"

"Sire, I repeat it, — and with so much indignation that I am sure your Majesty will feel impelled to discover the truth."

"What, Monsieur! It is said that the queen walks with company, in the night, in the park of Versailles?"

"Not with company, Sire, — in private. Oh, if rumor had said 'with company,' it would have been of no consequence."

The king broke forth angrily, "You will prove to me, Monsieur, what you have said."

"Oh, easily, very easily. There are four certificates. The first is by my captain of the hunt, who saw the queen, two nights in succession, leaving the park by the gate near the huntsman's lodge. Here it is; read it."

The king took the paper with trembling hands, read it, and returned it to his brother.

"Here is one, Sire, that is more interesting. It is that of the night-guard at Trianon. He declares that in the parks all was quiet, except on the night when her Majesty the queen was taking a walk, leaning on a gentleman's arm. See, the report is explicit."

The king read, shuddered, and dropped his arms by his sides.

"The third," continued the count, quietly, "is that of the guard at the eastern gate. This man saw and recognized the queen as she was leaving the park. Look, Sire: he says that from the distance he was unable to recognize the gentleman from whom her Majesty was parting, but from his general appearance thought him to be an officer. He adds, curiously enough, that the presence of her Majesty could not be doubted, because she was accompanied by the queen's friend, Madame de La Motte."

"The queen's friend!" cried the king, furiously. "Yes, it is so written, — 'the queen's friend.'"

"The last," continued the count, "seems to be more definite than all the others. It is that of the master of the locks, charged with seeing that all the gates are locked at night. He certifies that he saw the queen going into Apollo's Baths with a gentleman."

The king snatched the paper from the hands of the count, and read it.

Meanwhile the Comte de Provence continued, "It is true that Madame de La Motte remained outside, at a distance of twenty paces, and that the queen remained only about an hour in that pavilion."

"But the name of the gentleman?" cried the king.

"Sire, he is not named in this report; but if your Majesty will glance at one other certificate — It is that of a gamekeeper who was watching for game near Apollo's Baths."

"Dated on the following day," said the king.

"Yes, Sire. He saw the queen go out of the park by the little gate, and look around her. She was leaning on the arm of Monsieur de Charny."

"Monsieur de Charny!" cried the king, beside himself with rage and shame. "Well, well — Wait for me here, Count; I am going at last to get at the truth of this matter," and he rushed out of his cabinet.

CHAPTER XL.

A LAST ACCUSATION.

When the king left the queen's room she ran to the boudoir, where Monsieur de Charny had heard everything. She pushed open the door, and then having closed that into the corridor, she fell exhausted into an armchair, and silently awaited the judgment of Monsieur de Charny. The count came out from the boudoir, pale and melancholy.

"Well?" said the queen.

"Madame," he replied, "you see that everything is opposed to our friendship. If my own conviction should not wound you, still there is public opinion. After the scandal that has now burst forth, there can be no peace for you, no rest for me."

"Then," said the queen, with much emotion, "all that I have just done, — this commotion, this perilous attack on one of the highest noblemen in the kingdom, my open hostility to the Church, my good name exposed to parliamentary discussion, — all this does not satisfy you? I say nothing of the confidence of the king, destroyed forever. What is the king? — only a husband;" and she smiled, with so bitter sadness that tears gushed from her eyes.

"Oh," cried Charny, "you are the most noble, the most generous of women! If I do not reply at once as my heart urges me, it is because I feel my inferiority, and dare not profane that sublime heart by asking for a place in it."

"Monsieur de Charny, you think me guilty?"

"Madame!"

"Monsieur de Charny, you have believed the words of the cardinal?"

"Madame!"

"Monsieur de Charny, I demand that you tell me what impression the attitude of Monsieur de Rohan has left on your mind."

"I must say, Madame, that Monsieur de Rohan has not acted like the madman you said he was, nor like a weak man, as some might have thought him. He is acting on sincere convictions. He loves you, and at this moment is the victim of an error which must lead him to ruin, and you —"

"Me?"

"You, Madame, to inevitable dishonor."

"My God!"

"Before me rises a threatening spectre, — that odious woman, Madame de La Motte, who has disappeared when her evidence might restore to us tranquillity, honor, security. That woman is your evil genius, the scourge of royalty; that woman, whom you have imprudently admitted to a knowledge of your secrets, alas! perhaps of your intimacy —"

"My secrets! my intimacy! Ah, Monsieur, I beg of you —"

"Madame, the cardinal affirmed very clearly — and proved it — that you had arranged with him the purchase of the necklace."

"Ah, you come back to that, Monsieur de Charny!" said the queen, blushing.

"Pardon, pardon! You see that my heart is less generous than yours, — that I am unworthy to share your thoughts. I seek to assuage, and I only irritate."

"Monsieur," said the queen, assuming a haughty and angry manner, "what the king believes, all the world may believe. I shall not be more accommodating to my friends than to my husband. It seems to me that a man can no longer wish to see a woman when he has lost his respect for her. I am not speaking of you, Monsieur," she said, checking herself suddenly. "I am not a woman, I am a queen; you are not a man, but, for me, a subject."

Charny bowed so low that the queen had reason to think the humility of this subject quite sufficient.

"I advised you," she said suddenly, "to remain on your estates. That would have been more prudent. Remote from the life of the court, which is made so uncongenial to you by your habits, your rectitude, and — allow me to say — your inexperience, you might have judged more correctly those who play their part upon that stage. In order to preserve the optical illusion, Monsieur de Charny, we ought to keep on our rouge and our high heels in presence of the multitude. Too ready to condescend, I have neglected, as a queen, to maintain toward those who loved me the dazzling pomp of royalty. Ah, Monsieur de Charny, the crown on the head of a queen enables her to dispense with chastity, gentleness, intelligence, and especially affection. She is a queen, Monsieur; she rules, — to what purpose should she be beloved?"

"I cannot tell you, Madame," replied Charny, with agitation, "how much I am distressed by your Majesty's severity. I had forgotten that you were my queen; but — render me that justice — I have never forgotten that, above all other women, you are entitled to my respect and my — "

"Do not finish; I am not soliciting. Yes; as I said, absence is necessary to you. Something tells me that your name will at length be involved in this matter."

"Madame, it is impossible!"

"You say, 'impossible.' Think then of the power of those who, for the last six months, have been playing with my reputation, — with my life. Have not you said that the cardinal is acting from sincere conviction, in consequence of an error into which he has fallen? Those who cause such convictions, Monsieur le Comte, — those who create such errors will be able to prove that you are disloyal to the king and a disgraceful friend to me. Those who can invent so readily what is false, will they not discover what is true? Lose no time then; the danger is serious. Withdraw to your estates; avoid the impending scandal. I do not wish that my fate should drag you down, and that your career should be destroyed. I who, thank God! am endowed with the strength of innocence; I who have no stain upon my life; I who am resolved to open my breast to my enemies that they may see the purity of my heart, — I shall resist. For you there will be ruin, disgrace, perhaps the prison. Take back your money, so nobly offered, and receive the assurance that not one of the generous impulses of your soul has escaped my knowledge, that your doubts have not wounded me, and that I have sympathized with your sufferings. Depart, I say, and seek elsewhere what the queen of France cannot give you, — faith, hope, happiness. Before the matter can come to trial before parliament, fifteen days must elapse. Go, then! Your uncle has two vessels ready, at Cherbourg and at Nantes; make your choice. But at all events, go away from me. I am the bearer of misfortune; avoid me. I valued but one thing in the world; that fails me, and I am lost."

On saying these words the queen rose abruptly, and seemed to indicate the termination of the interview. Charny approached her respectfully, but eagerly. "Your Majesty," he said in an agitated voice, "has shown to me my duty. It is not on my estates, it is not outside of France, that the danger lies, but at Versailles, where you are suspected; at Paris, where you are to be judged. You cannot have a more loyal witness, a more resolute support, than I; I shall remain. Those who know so many things will say them; but at least we shall have the happiness — dear to courageous hearts — of meeting our enemies face to face. Let them tremble before the majesty of an innocent queen, and the courage of a man superior to them all. Yes; I shall remain, Madame, and be assured your Majesty need no longer hide your thoughts from me. Every one knows that I do not run away from danger. You know that I have no fear; you know too that in order to avoid me it is not necessary to send me into exile. Oh, Madame, hearts that are separated can understand each other; at a distance aspirations are even more ardent than in proximity. Fear nothing! I shall be near enough to help you, to defend you, but not near enough to disturb or injure you. You did not see me, did you, during the time that I lived near you, watching your movements, counting your steps, living your life? Well, it will be so again; for I cannot obey your wish, — I cannot go away. Besides, what difference would it make? Would you, in any case, have thoughts of me?"

The queen made a movement which separated her from the young man. "It shall be as you please," said she; "but — you have understood me — I am not a coquette, Monsieur de Charny. It is the privilege of a queen to think what she says, and to say what she thinks. I avail myself of that privilege. One day, Monsieur, I distinguished you among those who surrounded me. I do not know what drew my heart toward you. I thirsted for a friendship strong and pure; and I allowed you to perceive this, did I not? It is so no longer; I no longer think as I thought then. Your soul is no longer kindred to my own. I avow it to you frankly. Let us spare each other."

"It is well, Madame; I never thought that you had chosen me; I never thought — Ah, Madame, I cannot bear the idea of losing you. Madame, I am mad with jealousy and fear. Madame, I will not suffer you to tear your heart from me; it is mine, you have given it to me, and no one shall take it from me but with my life. Be a woman, be kind to me; do not abuse my weakness, for just now you blamed me for my doubts, and now you crush me with your own."

"Heart of a child, — heart of a woman," said the queen, "you wish me to depend on you! Fine protectors we should be for each other! Weak, — oh, yes; indeed you are weak, and I, alas! am not stronger than you."

"I should not love you," murmured Charny, "were you other than you are."

"What!" exclaimed the queen, in tones of passionate eagerness, "this queen accursed; this queen who is ruined; this woman on whom parliament is to sit in judgment, whom public opinion will condemn, whom her husband, her king, will perhaps drive from him, — this woman still finds a heart that loves her?"

"A servant who worships her, and who offers her all the blood of his heart in exchange for the tear she has just now shed."

"That woman," cried the queen, "is blessed, is proud, is the first among women, the happiest of all! That woman is too happy, Monsieur de Charny; I know not how that woman could have complained, — forgive her!"

Charny fell at the feet of Marie Antoinette, and kissed them in a transport of religious love.

At that moment the door was thrown open, and the king appeared, trembling, thunderstruck, on the threshold. He had surprised the man accused by Monsieur de Provence at the feet of Marie Antoinette.

CHAPTER XLI.

A PROPOSAL OF MARRIAGE.

THE queen and Charny exchanged glances so full of terror that their most cruel enemy would have pitied them both. Charny rose and saluted the king with profound respect.

"Ah," said the king, in a hollow voice, "Monsieur de Charny!"

The count replied only by another salutation. The queen felt that she was lost.

The king continued, "Monsieur de Charny, it is not honorable to a gentleman to be caught in the act of robbery."

"Robbery!" murmured Charny.

"Robbery!" repeated the queen, who seemed to hear again hissing in her ear those horrible accusations respecting the necklace, and imagined that the count was also about to be soiled by them.

"Yes," pursued the king; "kneeling before another's wife is robbery; and when that wife is a queen, Monsieur, we call it high treason."

The count was about to speak; he was about to protest his innocence, when the queen, eager in her generosity, not willing that the man she loved should be accused of an unworthy act, came to his aid. "Sire," she said eagerly, "it seems to me you are assuming a habit of evil suspicions and unfavorable suppositions which I warn you are unfounded. I see that respect enchains the count's tongue; but I who know his goodness will not allow him to be accused without defending him." She paused, exhausted by her emotion, terrified at the falsehood which she would be obliged to invent, and in despair because she could think of none.

But this hesitation, which appeared so odious to the proud spirit of the queen, was really the salvation of the woman. In these horrible encounters, where the honor, even the life, of the woman surprised is often at stake, a minute gained is sufficient to save her, as a second lost is enough to ruin her. The queen by instinct had seized the favorable moment for delay; she had checked the suspicions of the king, and restored the confidence of the count.

"Do you mean to say," replied Louis XVI., leaving the rôle of king to assume that of the anxious husband, "that I did not see Monsieur de Charny there on his knees before you, Madame? Now, when a man is permitted to kneel thus, it must be — "

"It must be, Monsieur," said the queen, severely, "that a subject of the queen of France has a favor to ask of her — "

"A favor to ask of you!" cried the king.

"And a favor I cannot grant," pursued the queen. "Otherwise, Monsieur de Charny would not have needed to entreat upon his knees, I assure you; and I should have joyfully granted his wish to a gentleman for whom I have a particular esteem."

Charny breathed again. The eye of the king had become uncertain; his brow had gradually relaxed from its unusual threatening air which surprise had caused it to assume.

Meanwhile Marie Antoinette, angry at being compelled to utter a falsehood, and in despair at not finding one to utter, was searching distractedly for some plausible fiction. She had expected, by acknowledging herself powerless to grant the count the favor he solicited, to restrain the curiosity of the king, and had hoped that the examination would stop there. She was mistaken. Any other woman would have been more prudent by showing less haughtiness; but for her it was torture to utter an untruth before the man she loved. To exhibit herself in this false light was to conclude all the falsehoods and stratagems of the park intrigue by a denouement as infamous; it was almost acknowledging herself guilty, — it was worse than death. She hesitated still. She would have given her life that it might be Charny who should invent the lie; but he, the loyal gentleman, did not even think of doing so. He was afraid, in his delicacy, of seeming even disposed to defend the honor of the queen.

Marie Antoinette awaited in fearful suspense the question of the king.

"Come, Madame, what is this favor which Monsieur de Charny has solicited in vain, and for which he kneels before you? I shall perhaps be more happy than you, Madame, and Monsieur de Charny will not be under the necessity of kneeling before me."

"Sire, I told you that Monsieur de Charny asked something impossible."

"But tell me, at least, what it is."

"What can a man ask on his knees?" the queen asked herself; "what can he beg of me that it is impossible to grant? Let me see! let me see!"

"I am waiting," said the king.

"Sire, it is — what Monsieur de Charny asks is a family secret."

"There are no secrets from the king, — the sovereign of his kingdom, and a father interested in the honor and safety of his subjects, who are his children, — even," added Louis XVI, with great dignity, "when these unnatural children attack the honor and the safety of their father."

"Monsieur de Charny," cried she, her mind disturbed and her hands trembling, "wished to obtain from me — "

"What, Madame?"

"Permission to marry."

"Really!" cried the king, at first reassured, then relapsing again into his jealous anxiety. "Well, then," he said, without remarking the suffering of the poor woman in uttering these words, or how pale Charny had become on seeing this suffering; "well, why is it impossible for Monsieur de Charny to marry? Is he not a man of good family? Has he not a handsome fortune? Is this woman whom Monsieur de Charny desires to marry a princess of the blood, or is she already married? Tell me her name, and if she be in neither of these two positions, I will remove every difficulty to please you."

The queen, induced by the still increasing danger, urged on by the consequences even of the first falsehood, replied quickly, "No, Monsieur, no; there are difficulties which even you cannot overcome."

"All the more reason that I should know the thing which is impossible to the king," interrupted Louis XVI., with rising anger.

Charny looked at the queen, who seemed about to fall. He would have gone to her but the king's immobility prevented him. By what right could he who was nothing to this woman, offer his hand or his assistance to her whom her husband and her king abandoned.

"What power is that?" she asked herself, "against which the king cannot contend? Give me this idea, give me this aid, my God!" Suddenly a gleam of light shot across her mind. "Ah, God himself sends me this aid," she murmured. "Those who belong to God cannot be taken from him even by the king." Then, raising her head, "Monsieur," she said to the king, "the person Monsieur de Charny wishes to marry is in a convent."

"Ah," cried the king, "that is an objection; in fact it is very difficult to take from God that which is his, to give it to man. But it is strange that Monsieur de Charny should have conceived so sudden a passion; no one has ever spoken to me about it, — not even his uncle, who can obtain anything he asks of me. What is the name of this woman whom you love, Monsieur de Charny?"

The queen was in agony. She was about to hear a name pronounced by Olivier; she was about to undergo the tortures consequent upon her falsehood. Charny might utter the name of one formerly loved, — a still fresh memory of the past; or the name of one whom he was beginning to love, — a vague hope of the future. To escape this terrible blow, Marie Antoinette cried out suddenly: "Why, Sire, you know the person whom Monsieur de Charny asks to marry; it is — Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney."

Charny uttered a cry, and hid his face in his hands. The queen placed her hand upon her heart, and fell almost fainting upon her chair.

"Mademoiselle de Taverney!" repeated the king, — "Mademoiselle de Taverney, who has retired to the convent at Saint Denis?"

"Yes, Sire," the queen said in a weak voice.

"But I do not know that she has yet taken her vows?"

"But she is to take them."

"We will make a condition to that," said the king. "And yet," he added, with a remnant of mistrust, "why should she take vows?"

"She is poor," said Marie Antoinette; "you have enriched only her father," she added severely.

"That is a wrong I will repair, Madame; Monsieur de Charny loves her —"

The queen shuddered, and darted at the young man an eager look as if imploring him to deny it. Charny looked steadily at Marie Antoinette, and did not reply.

"It is well," said the king, who took this silence for respectful assent; "and doubtless Mademoiselle de Taverney loves Monsieur de Charny? I will give Mademoiselle de Taverney as dowry the five hundred thousand francs which, the other day, I refused to Monsieur de Calonne, who wanted them for you. Thank the queen, Monsieur de Charny, for relating to me this affair and securing the happiness of your life."

Charny took a step forward and bowed, — looking like a white statue to which, for a moment, life had been miraculously imparted.

"Oh, that is worth the trouble of getting down on your knees again," said the king, with a touch of that vulgarity which, in him, qualified the traditional nobility of his race.

The queen shuddered, and impulsively extended her hands to the young man. He kneeled down and kissed them, praying to God that in that kiss upon the queen's cold hands he might give up his life.

"Now," said the king, "we will leave to Madame the charge of your affairs. Come, Monsieur, come." He went out first, and so quickly that Charny was able to look back for an instant and see in the eyes of the queen the ineffable grief of an eternal farewell. Then the door was closed between them, — a barrier henceforth impassible to innocent love.

CHAPTER XLII.

SAINT DENIS.

THE queen remained alone, and in despair. So many blows had assailed her at the same time that she did not know which one had given her the most pain. After having remained an hour in this state of doubt and dejection, she said to herself that it was time to seek a way out of her difficulties. The danger was increasing. The king, proud of a victory he had obtained over appearances, would hasten to spread the report of it. It might happen that this report would be so received outside that the advantage to be gained by the deception would all be lost. That deception, alas! how the queen reproached herself with it; how gladly she would have recalled what she had said; how much she wished to take away, even from Andrée, the chimerical happiness which she would perhaps refuse.

Here was another difficulty. Who could be sure that so proud a person as Mademoiselle de Taverney would consent to sacrifice her liberty, or her future, for the advantage of a queen whom only a few days before she had left in enmity. Then, if Andrée should refuse, — and that was probable, — all this scaffolding of falsehood would fall. The queen would appear to be an intriguing woman of small intellect, Charny a mere liar, and the calumny would be transformed into an accusation, perhaps, of adultery.

Marie Antoinette felt that her reason was giving way under these reflections; she sank her burning head between her hands and meditated. In whom could she confide? Who was her friend, — Madame de Lamballe? Oh, she was pure reason, — cold and inflexible reason! She could think of no one but Mademoiselle de Taverney herself, whose invincible steadfastness and perfect purity would enable her to sympathize with the heavy sorrows of a queen. She would go then to Andrée, relate to her her misfortunes, and entreat her to sacrifice herself. Of course Andrée would refuse, because she was not one of those who allow themselves to be imposed upon; but by degrees, softened by her entreaties, she would consent. Besides, a delay might be obtained. The king, appeased by the apparent consent of the affianced parties, might finally forget. Then a voyage would settle everything, and after a while Charny and Andrée might declare that they had annulled their engagement; thus no one would surmise that the projected marriage had been a feint.

In this way the liberty of Mademoiselle de Taverney would escape being compromised; and Charny would not lose his own. The queen would not suffer from the remorse of having sacrificed the happiness of two beings to save her own honor; and yet that honor, which was also that of her husband and her children, would be transmitted unsullied to the future queen of France.

When she had fortified herself by these arguments and reflections, Marie Antoinette determined on going to Saint Denis.

It was then three o'clock, the hour at which a grand ceremonious dinner had been ordered; then came presentations and the reception of visits. The queen received everybody with a serene countenance, and an affability which did not derogate from her well-known pride. She affected, even with those whom she considered her enemies, a calmness which is not ordinarily shown by guilty persons.

Never had there been so great a crowd at court; never had curiosity more narrowly investigated the features of a queen in peril. Marie Antoinette faced it all, confounded her enemies, and enchanted her friends. Those who were indifferent became zealous, and the zealous enthusiastic. Indeed, she appeared so lovely and so noble that the king publicly offered her his congratulations.

Then, when all this was over, laying aside her smiles, and resuming her painful thoughts, — alone, all alone in the world, — she changed her costume, put on a gray silk dress, and a gray hat trimmed with ribbons and blue flowers, entered her carriage, and without guards, accompanied only by one lady, she was driven to Saint Denis. She asked to see Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney in the parlor.

The latter, on her knees, wrapped in her white woollen robe, was watching through her window the moon rising behind the linden-trees, and in the poetry of the early night she found the theme of all the prayers, fervent and passionate, which she addressed to God to relieve the anguish of her soul. She was drinking in long draughts of the bitter pain of voluntary absence. This torture is known only to brave souls; it is at once a torture and a pleasure. It resembles in its anguish all ordinary griefs; at the same time it almost amounts to a pleasure, — which they alone can feel who know how to sacrifice happiness to pride.

Andrée had left the court of her own free will. Proud as Cleopatra, she could not bear the idea that Monsieur de Charny had thought of another woman, even if that woman were the queen. She had no proof of his burning passion for another; but had she not seen him pass by her indifferently? Had she not suspected the queen of possessing, innocently no doubt, his homage and preference? Of what use, after that, to remain at Versailles? To beg for compliments? To obtain from time to time the offer of an arm, or the help of a hand, when in their walks the queen would lend her the polite attentions of Charny, because she could not just at that moment accept them herself?

No; no cowardly weakness, no such compromise for this heroic soul. Life with love and preference; the cloister with love and wounded pride! "Never! never!" the proud Andrée said to herself; "he whom I love in secret; he who is for me but a cloud, a portrait, a remembrance, — he never offends me, he always smiles on me, he smiles only on me."

Her mute contemplations of pure love, the divine ecstasies of the solitary dreamer, constituted a life more suited to the untamable Andrée than the brilliant fêtes at Versailles, where she would be under the necessity of bowing down before rivals, and would be haunted by the fear of divulging the secret shut up in her heart.

While Andrée was in the midst of her meditations, one of the sisters came to tell her that the queen was in the large parlor and wished to see her.

Strange thing! Andrée, whose heart was softened by love, needed no more than this to make her spring forward to meet this perfume wafted to her from Versailles, — a perfume she had cursed the evening before, — the more precious in proportion as it was remote from her; precious as everything which evaporates, as everything which is forgotten; precious as love. "The queen," she murmured, — "the queen at Saint Denis! The queen calls for me!"

Andrée threw over her shoulders the long mantle worn by nuns, and without pausing for a glance at her mirror, followed the sister who had come for her. But almost immediately she began to be ashamed of the joy she felt. "Why does my heart bound?" she said to herself. "How does it concern me that the queen comes hither? Come, be calm, unworthy nun; thou belongest neither to God nor to the world, — try, at least, to belong to thyself."

Thus Andrée reprimanded herself as she descended the stairs. Controlling herself, she banished from her cheeks the fugitive flush of haste, and checked the rapidity of her movements. When she entered the reception-room she was cold and pale. On hearing her name announced, and seeing Marie Antoinette in the chair of the abbess, and around her the most noble heads of the chapter bowed in reverence, Andrée was seized with a sudden agitation, and paused in her approach.

"Ah!" said the queen, half smiling; "come nearer, Mademoiselle; I wish to speak with you."

Andrée approached, and bowed her head.

"You will permit me, Madame?" said the queen, turning toward the superior.

The superior replied with a reverence, and left the salon, followed by the nuns.

The queen remained alone with Andrée.

CHAPTER XLIII.

A DEAD HEART.

THE queen opened the conversation. "You are here then, Mademoiselle," she said, with an expressive smile. "You make a strange impression on me, dressed thus as a nun."

Andrée made no reply.

"To see a former companion," continued the queen, "already lost to the world, in which we others continue to live, is like receiving a warning from the grave. Are you not of my opinion, Mademoiselle?"

"Who then," replied Andrée, "would venture to give a warning to your Majesty? Even death cannot forewarn the queen."

"How is that?"

"Because, Madame, a queen is appointed, by virtue of her station, to endure in this world only the unavoidable hardships. All that can mitigate hardship, she possesses. All that another has which she can use for her own comfort, she takes from that other."

The queen made a movement of surprise.

"And that is her right," Andrée hastened to add. "Others are, to the queen, only so many subjects, whose property, honor, and life are hers."

"These are doctrines that astonish me," said the queen, speaking slowly. "You make of a sovereign, in this country, a sort of ogress who devours the fortunes and the happiness of the citizens. Am I a woman of that kind, Andrée? Have you then really had occasion to complain of me?"

"Your Majesty had the goodness to ask me that question on the day I left you. I replied then, as I now reply, 'No, Madame.'"

"But sometimes," continued the queen, "one is wounded by an injury which is not personal to one's self. Have I, then, by offending any one in whom you are interested, deserved the harsh words that you have spoken? Andrée, the retreat which you have chosen is an asylum against all the evil passions of the world. God there teaches us gentleness, patience, forgetfulness of injuries. In coming hither to meet a sister in Jesus Christ, am I to find a forbidding face and bitter words? Must I, coming as a friend, encounter the reproaches, or the veiled hostility, of an irreconcilable enemy?"

Andrée raised her eyes, astounded by that gentleness of the queen, usually so haughty and severe toward her servants. "Her Majesty well knows," she said, "that the Taverneys cannot be enemies to the queen."

"I understand," replied the queen; "you cannot forgive me for my coldness to your brother; and he, perhaps, accuses me of fickleness, even of caprice."

"My brother is too respectful a subject to accuse the queen," said Andrée, maintaining the same unyielding formality.

The queen saw clearly that she would excite suspicion by increasing the dose of honey with which she had sought to pacify this Cerberus. She therefore made a pause. "At any rate," she resumed, "having occasion to come here to speak with Madame, I wished to see you and to assure you that I am always your friend."

Andrée perceived the change in the queen's tone. She feared that she had given offence; and she feared still more that she had exposed her hidden wound to the clairvoyant eye of a woman. "Your Majesty covers me with honor and happiness," she said in a melancholy tone.

"Do not speak so, Andrée," replied the queen, pressing her hand; "you will break my heart. What! cannot a wretched queen have a friend in whom she can confide, and in whose eyes she may look without seeing there self-interest or resentment? Yes, yes, Andrée; direct your envy toward those queens, those mistresses of the fortunes, honor, and lives of all. Oh, yes, they are queens; they possess the gold and the blood of their subjects, — but their hearts? Never! never! Hearts cannot be taken; they must be given."

"I assure you, Madame," said Andrée, shaken by the warmth of these words, "that I have loved your Majesty as much as I shall ever love in this world." In saying these words she blushed and inclined her head.

"You — have — loved me!" said the queen; "You love me then no longer?"

"Oh, Madame!"

"I ask nothing of you, Andrée. Accursed be the cloister which so soon extinguishes memory in certain hearts."

"Do not blame my heart," said Andrée, quickly; "it is dead."

"Your heart is dead! You, Andrée, young and beautiful, — you say your heart is dead! Ah, do not trifle with those funereal words. The heart is not dead in one who still retains that smile, that beauty; do not say that, Andrée."

"I repeat to you, Madame, that nothing at the court, nothing in the world, has now any interest for me. I live here like the grass and the plants; and I have pleasure here which I alone can understand."

"What! you find pleasure in the convent?" exclaimed the queen.

"I adopt with happiness the life of retirement."

"There is nothing, then, which urges you toward the joys of the world?"

"Nothing."

"My God!" thought the queen, "am I not to succeed? I will tempt her; if that fails I will resort to entreaty. Oh, to entreat her to that! to entreat her to accept Monsieur de Charny, — great God, what wretchedness!"

The queen shuddered, but controlling her emotion, she said, "Andrée, you have expressed your contentment in such terms that you have robbed me of a hope which I had entertained."

"What hope, Madame?"

"We will not speak of it, since you are so decided."

"But, Madame, though it be only for your own satisfaction, explain to me —"

"To what purpose? You have retired from the world, have you not?"

"Yes, Madame."

"Willingly?"

"Oh, with all my heart!"

"And you are satisfied with the course you have taken?"

"More than ever."

"You see, then, it is superfluous for me to speak. God is my witness, I thought for a moment that I might make you happy."

"Me?"

"Yes, you, who were ungratefully upbraiding me. But now that you are cherishing other joys, — and you know better than I your own tastes, — I relinquish —"

"But, Madame, do me the honor to give me some idea."

"Oh, it is very simple; I wished to draw you back to the court."

"Oh!" cried Andrée, with a bitter smile, "I return to court! No, no! Never, Madame! — much as it may cost me to disregard your Majesty's wishes."

The queen was much agitated. Her heart was filled with an indescribable grief. She, the mighty ship, was wrecked upon an atom of granite. "You refuse?" she murmured, and to hide her distress, she covered her face with her hands.

Andrée, thinking her overcome with sorrow, knelt by her, and sought to mitigate the wound she had given to friendship, or to pride. "Come, now, tell me," she said, "what you would have done with me at court, — with me, a nobody, without fortune, under a ban, whom every one avoids because I am not even able — unfortunate that I am — to arouse in women the vulgar anxiety of rivalry, or in men the vulgar sympathy that springs from difference of sex. Ah, Madame, leave the poor nun to her retirement."

"Ah," said the queen, raising her eyes, "the position which I was about to offer you gives a direct contradiction to all the humiliations of which you complain. The marriage in question would have made you one of the first ladies in France."

"A — marriage!" stammered Andrée, stupefied.

"You refuse?" said the queen, more and more discouraged.

"Oh, yes; I refuse, I refuse!"

"Andrée —"

"I refuse, Madame; I refuse."

Marie Antoinette then prepared herself, with an oppressed heart, to begin her entreaties. She arose, and stood undecided, trembling, distracted; but before she could utter the first word of her supplication, Andrée, seizing her robe, under the impression that she was going away, exclaimed, —

"At least, Madame, do me the kindness of naming to me the man who would accept me as his companion. I have suffered so many humiliations in my life that the name of that generous man —" she smiled with bitter irony — "will be," she continued, "a balm which I shall henceforth apply to all wounds of my pride."

The queen hesitated, but she was impelled to go on to the end. "Monsieur de Charny," she said in a dull, indifferent tone.

"Monsieur de Charny!" cried Andrée, with a sudden explosion, "Monsieur Olivier de Charny!"

"Monsieur Olivier, yes," said the queen, looking at the young girl in surprise.

"The nephew of Monsieur de Suffren?" continued Andrée, with glowing cheeks and eyes shining like stars.

"The nephew of Monsieur de Suffren," replied the queen, more and more amazed at the sudden change in Andrée.

"It is to Monsieur Olivier that you wish to marry me?"

"To him."

"And — he consents?"

"He asks for you in marriage."

"Oh, I accept, I accept," cried Andrée, wild with joy. "It is I whom he loves! — I whom he loves as I love him!"

The queen, with a suppressed groan, drew back, pale and trembling. She fell, crushed, into an arm-chair, while the overjoyed Andrée kissed her knees and her robe, covered her hands with tears of delight, and devoured them with burning kisses.

"When shall we set out?" she asked at length, when she was able to speak.

"Come," murmured the queen, who felt as if her life were departing, and who wished, before dying, to save her honor. She rose, leaning on Andrée, whose ardent kisses sought her icy cheeks.

When Andrée left her to make ready for the departure, the queen exclaimed, "My God! is not this enough of suffering for a single heart? And yet, I thank thee. Thou hast saved my children from disgrace; thou hast given me the right to die wearing the royal mantle."

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE BARON UNDERSTANDS.

WHILE the queen was deciding the destiny of Mademoiselle de Taverney at Saint Denis, Philippe, whose heart was torn by all that he had discovered, pushed on his preparations for departure. A soldier, accustomed to range over the world, needs no long time to pack his trunks and put on his travelling-cloak ; and Philippe had special reason to hasten his departure from Versailles, — he would avoid witnessing the threatened dishonor of the queen. When he had completed his preparations, he sent word to Monsieur de Taverney the elder that he wished to speak with him.

The baron had just returned from the palace in a very agreeable state of mind. He had laid in a new supply of scandals and small infamies, and was happy. Instead, therefore, of waiting for Philippe to come to him, he himself on receiving the message went immediately to Philippe's room. He entered without warning, and found the room in that state of disorder which signifies an intended departure.

Philippe expected no outbreak of affectionate regret when his father should be informed of his purpose, nor, on the other hand, did he anticipate complete indifference. But he was greatly astonished on hearing his father cry out joyously," Ah, very good ! he is going away ; he is going away ! "

Philippe looked at his father in surprise.

"I was sure of it," continued the baron; "I might have predicted it. Well played, Philippe, well played!"

"What do you mean, Monsieur? What is it that is well played?"

The old man winked at Philippe, as a sign to him to dismiss his valet. Philippe obeyed. The baron closed the door on the heels of the retiring valet, and then turning to Philippe, "Admirable!" he said in a low voice, — "admirable!"

"You bestow compliments on me, Monsieur," replied Philippe, "without my knowing how I have deserved them."

"Ah! ah! ah!" said the old man, dancing about.

"Unless all this hilarity, Monsieur, is occasioned by my departure, which rids you of my company."

"Oh! oh! oh!" laughed the old baron, on another note. "There, there, don't restrain yourself before me,— it is not worth while. You know I am not taken in — Ah! ah! ah!"

Philippe crossed his arms, and wondered if the old man was losing his mind. "Taken in by what?" he asked.

"By your departure of course. Do you imagine that I believe in your departure?"

"You do not believe in it?"

"Your servant is no longer here; there is no use in being so reserved. Well, I admit that you had no other course to take; you have taken this, — very good!"

"Monsieur, you surprise me."

"Yes; it is surprising enough that I should understand this matter. But Philippe, there is no man living more curious than I am; and when I am curious I investigate. There is no man more fortunate than I in making discoveries; and so I have found out that you are making a pretended departure, and I congratulate you."

"I am pretending?" said Philippe, in bewilderment.

The old man went up to him, touched his breast with his bony fingers, like those of a skeleton, and with a manner more and more confidential said, in a low tone, "On my word of honor, had you not resorted to this expedient I am sure all would have been discovered. You act in season; to-morrow would have been too late."

"Monsieur," said Philippe, in an icy tone, "I protest that I do not understand one word — one single word — of all that you have done me the honor to say to me."

"Where will you hide the horses?" continued the old man. "You have a mare that is easily recognized. Take care she is not seen when you are believed to be in — By the way, to what place do you pretend you are going?"

"I am going to Taverney-Maison-Rouge, Monsieur."

"Good, — very good. You pretend to go to Maison-Rouge. No one will go there to inquire. But be prudent; there are many eyes fixed on you both."

"On us both! Who, then?"

"She is impetuous, you know," continued the old man; "she has fits of passion that might ruin everything. Be careful; you must be more reasonable than she — "

"Why," said Philippe, with rising anger, "I really believe that you are seeking to amuse yourself at my expense. That is not kind; nor is it wise, for you expose me, sorrowful and irritated as I am, to a failure in my respect toward you."

"Ah, well, — respect; I dispense with it. You are old enough to manage your affairs, and you manage them so well that you inspire me with respect. Come, give me an address to which I may send you information, if anything should happen."

"To Taverney, Monsieur," said Philippe, thinking that the old man was coming to his senses.

"Eh! to Taverney, — eighty leagues. Do you imagine that when I may have urgent advice to give you, I shall amuse myself with killing couriers on the road to Taverney, for the sake of appearances? Come, now; I don't ask you to give your address at your house in the park, — my messengers might be followed, or my livery recognized; give me another address at a distance that may be covered in a quarter of an hour. What the devil! you have imagination. A man who does for his love affairs what you have done for yours is a man of resources."

"A 'house in the park,' 'love affairs,' 'imagination'! Monsieur, we are playing at enigmas, and you keep the key to yourself."

"Your reserve becomes offensive," said the father, angrily. "One would think you are afraid of being betrayed by me!"

"Monsieur!" said Philippe, exasperated.

"Very well; very well! Keep your secrets to yourself; keep the secret of the huntsman's lodge that you have hired."

"I — have hired the huntsman's lodge?"

"Keep the secret of your walks at night between two adorable friends."

"I — I have taken walks?" murmured Philippe, turning pale.

"Keep the secret of those kisses dropped like honey beneath the flowers and the dew."

"Monsieur!" roared Philippe, mad with jealousy, "will you be silent?"

"It is good, I say again; all that you have done, I have known. Had you any suspicion that I knew it? Mordieu! that should inspire you with confidence. Your intimacy with the queen, your prosperous adventures, your excursions to Apollo's Baths, — great God! these are life and fortune to us all. Have no more fear of me, Philippe; confide in me."

"Monsieur, you fill me with horror!" cried Philippe, covering his face with his hands.

It was really horror which the unhappy Philippe felt toward the man who attributed to him all the happiness of another, and who, intending to congratulate him, scourged him with the successes of his rival.

All that the father had learned and guessed, all that common rumor had ascribed to Monsieur de Rohan or the Comte de Charny, he had placed to the account of his son. According to his understanding of the matter, it was Philippe whom the queen loved, and by degrees was secretly lifting to the heights of favoritism.

When Philippe had discovered this new slough of infamy he shuddered, as he saw himself plunged into it by the one person who should have made a stand with him for honor. But the blow had been so violent that he remained stunned and silent, while the baron went on chattering with more energy than ever.

"See," said he, "you have achieved a master-stroke of art; you have thrown every one off the scent. This afternoon fifty eyes have said to me, 'It is Rohan.' A hundred have said to me, 'It is Charny.' Two hundred have said to me, 'It is Rohan and Charny.' Not one, mark you, not one said, 'It is Taverney.' I repeat, you have achieved a masterpiece, and the least I can do is to offer you my congratulations. It is a connection that honors you both, my dear fellow, — her, because she has taken you; you, because you have a hold on her."

At the moment when Philippe, now rendered furious, flashed lightning glances at the pitiless old man — glances portending a storm — the noise of a carriage was heard in the court-yard, and presently the valet was heard exclaiming, "Mademoiselle! it is Mademoiselle!" And several voices repeated, "Mademoiselle!"

"What! Mademoiselle?" said Taverney. "Who can it be?"

"It is my sister!" murmured Philippe, at the window, seized with astonishment on recognizing Andrée as she alighted from a carriage.

"Your sister!" repeated the old man. "Andrée? Is it possible?"

The valet came, and informed Philippe that Andrée was in the boudoir adjoining the grand salon, and wished to see him.

"Let us go to her," cried the baron.

"It is to me that she wishes to speak," said Philippe, bowing to the old man; "I will go first, if you please."

At that moment a second carriage rolled noisily into the court-yard.

"What the devil!" said the baron; "still another? This is an evening of adventures."

"Monsieur le Comte Olivier de Charny!" cried the guard to the footmen.

"Conduct Monsieur le Comte to the salon," said Philippe; "Monsieur le Baron will receive him. I am going to the boudoir to speak with my sister."

The two men slowly descended the stairs.

"For what does the count come here?" Philippe asked himself.

"For what has Andrée come here?" the baron asked himself.

CHAPTER XLV.

THE FATHER AND THE DAUGHTER.

THE salon of the hôtel was situated in the front part of the ground-floor. On its left was the boudoir, with a door opening upon the staircase leading to Andrée's apartment. To the right was another smaller salon, through which one must pass in order to enter the large salon.

Philippe went straight to the boudoir where his sister was waiting for him. As soon as he had opened the door Andrée rushed to meet him, throwing her arms about his neck with a joyful air, to which this sad lover, this unhappy brother, had been for a long time unaccustomed.

"Good Heavens! what can have happened?" asked the young man.

"Something happy! oh, yes, something very happy, brother!"

"And you have come here to tell me of it?"

"I shall never go back!" cried Andrée, in a transport of joy.

"Speak lower, little sister," said Philippe; "the wainscoting of this house is not accustomed to joyful sounds; and more than that, there is in the little room next us a person who will hear you."

"A person?" said Andrée, "who can it be?"

"Listen," replied Philippe.

"Monsieur le Comte de Charny!" said the valet, announcing Olivier as he passed from the small parlor into the salon.

"He! he!" cried Andrée, redoubling her caresses to her brother. "Oh, I know what he has come for!"

"You know it?"

"Yes, I know it, — so well that I perceive the disordered state of my dress; and as I foresee the moment when I shall myself enter that salon to hear with my own ears what Monsieur de Charny has to say —"

"Do you speak seriously, my dear Andrée?"

"Listen, listen, Philippe! and then let me go up to my own room. The queen has brought me back somewhat hastily; I am about to exchange my convent-robe for the attire — of a betrothed." And when she had spoken this word to Philippe in a very low tone, and accompanied it with a joyous kiss, Andrée, buoyant with happiness, ran up the stairs to her apartment.

Philippe remained alone, and putting his ear to the door communicating with the salon, listened. Monsieur de Charny was already there. The Baron de Taverney, in his turn, came into the room, and advanced to salute the count with studied politeness.

"To what," he said, "do I owe the honor of this unexpected visit, Monsieur le Comte? At all events, I beg you to believe that it overwhelms me with joy."

"I have come, Monsieur, ceremoniously, as you see, and I beg you will excuse me for not bringing with me my uncle, Monsieur de Suffren, as I ought to have done."

"What!" stammered the baron; "but I excuse you, my dear Monsieur de Charny."

"It would have been more consistent with propriety, I know, considering the request I am about to make."

"A request?" said the baron.

"I have the honor," said Charny, in a voice full of emotion, "to ask of you the hand of Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney, your daughter."

"My daughter!" murmured the baron; "you ask of me Andrée in marriage?"

"Yes, Monsieur le Baron; unless Mademoiselle de Taverney should feel some repugnance to this union."

"How is this?" thought the old man. "Can the favor of Philippe have already become so marked that one of his rivals hopes, by marrying his sister, to profit by it? Upon my word, not so badly played, Monsieur de Charny!" Then aloud, with a smile, "This suit is so honorable for our house, Monsieur le Comte," he said, "that I accept it with much pleasure, as far as I am concerned; and as I desire that you should bear with you a full consent, I will go to call my daughter."

"Monsieur," interrupted the count, coldly, "that would be unnecessary trouble. The queen has been kind enough to consult Mademoiselle de Taverney on this subject, and your daughter's reply was favorable to me."

"Ah!" said the baron, more and more astounded, "it is the queen —"

"Who has taken the trouble to go to Saint Denis; yes, Monsieur."

The baron rose. "There only remains for me, then, to inform you as to the condition of Mademoiselle de Taverney's pecuniary affairs. I have upstairs the deeds of her mother's property. You do not marry a rich girl, Monsieur le Comte; and before deciding anything —"

"There is no need of it, Monsieur le Baron," said Charny, dryly. "I am rich enough for both; and Mademoiselle de Taverney is not the sort of woman to be bargained for. But it is indispensable that I should make some statement of my own affairs."

He had just finished these words when the door of the boudoir opened, and Philippe appeared, pale and agitated, one hand in the breast of his coat, and the other convulsively clinched.

Charny bowed ceremoniously, and Philippe responded in the same manner.

"Monsieur," said Philippe, "my father was quite right to propose to inform you as to the pecuniary condition of the family; we both of us have explanations to make. While Monsieur le Baron goes to find the papers of which he speaks, I shall have the honor of considering the question with you more in detail;" and Philippe, with a look of authority not to be disregarded, dismissed the baron, who went out ill at ease, fearing that something was about to happen which would prevent this marriage.

Philippe accompanied the baron to the door of the little parlor, in order to be sure that this room was empty. Then returning, "Monsieur de Charny," he said, crossing his arms as he stood before the count, "how is it that you dare to ask my sister in marriage? Is it in order better to conceal your love for that woman whom you pursue, — with that woman whom you love? Is it because if you were married it perhaps would not be said so freely that you had a mistress?"

"Indeed, Monsieur," said Charny, staggering.

"Is it," added Philippe, "that having become the husband of a woman who would be always about your mistress, you would have greater facilities for seeing this adored mistress?"

"Monsieur, you are going beyond all bounds."

"It is, perhaps, — and I think this more apt to be the case," continued Philippe, drawing nearer to Charny, — "you think, doubtless, that having become your brother-in-law I should not disclose what I know of your past love."

"What you know?" cried Charny, terrified. "Take care! take care!"

"Yes," said Philippe, becoming excited; "your renting the wolf-hunter's lodge, your mysterious walks in the park of Versailles in the night, your pressing of hands, your sighs, and especially that tender interchange of glances at the small gate of the park —"

"Monsieur, in the name of Heaven! — Monsieur, say that you know nothing of all this!"

"I know nothing!" cried Philippe, with bitter irony. "How know nothing? — I who was concealed in the shrubbery behind Apollo's Baths when you came out with the queen on your arm!"

Charny started back two paces like a man who had received his death-blow. Philippe looked at him in stern silence. He let him suffer; he let him expiate by this momentary torture the hours of ineffable delight with which he had just reproached him.

Charny recovered his self-control. "Well, Monsieur," he said to Philippe, "even after what you have said, I ask of you the hand of Mademoiselle de Taverney. If I were only a mean calculator, as you accused me of being only a moment ago, — if I were about to marry for my own sake, I should be so miserable that I should be afraid of a man who possesses my secret and that of the queen. But the queen must be saved, Monsieur!"

"And in what manner is the queen lost? Because Monsieur de Taverney saw her press the arm of Monsieur de Charny and raise to heaven her eyes moist with happiness? Is the queen lost because I know that she loves you? Oh, that is no reason for sacrificing my sister, Monsieur; and I will not allow her to be sacrificed."

"Monsieur," replied Olivier, "shall I tell you why the queen is lost if this marriage does not take place? It is because this very morning, while Monsieur de Rohan was being arrested, the king surprised me on my knees before the queen."

"My God!"

"And the queen, questioned by the jealous king, replied that I was kneeling to ask of her the hand of your sister. That is the reason, Monsieur, why the queen will be lost if I do not marry your sister. Do you understand now?"

A two-fold noise cut short Olivier's sentence, — a shriek and a sigh. The one came from the boudoir, and the other from the little parlor. Olivier ran to the room from which the sigh had come; he saw Andrée de Taverney dressed in white like a bride. She had heard all, and had fainted. Philippe ran to the little parlor from which the cry had issued. He there saw the body of the Baron de Taverney, whose hopes this revelation of the queen's love for Charny had completely crushed. The baron, struck with apoplexy, had breathed his last; and the prediction of Cagliostro was fulfilled.

Philippe, who comprehended everything, even the disgrace of this death, silently left the dead body, and returned to the salon where Charny was contemplating, trembling, and without daring to touch it, this beautiful girl, now cold and inanimate.

Philippe, with swelling heart, his eyes wet with tears, had the courage to resume the conversation by saying to Monsieur de Charny, "Monsieur le Baron de Taverney has just died. I am now the head of my family. If Mademoiselle de Taverney survives, I will give her to you in marriage."

Charny looked at the baron's dead body with horror, at the form of Andrée in despair. Philippe tore his hair with his hands, and uttered to Heaven a cry which might move the heart of God upon his eternal throne.

"Comte de Charny," he said, after having quieted the tempest within him, "I make this engagement for my sister, who does not hear me. She will sacrifice her happiness for the queen, and I may sometime be happy enough to give my life for her. Adieu, Monsieur de Charny; adieu, my brother-in-law," and bowing to Olivier, who could not leave the room without passing near one of the two victims, Philippe raised Andrée in his arms and gave free passage to the count, who went out through the boudoir.

CHAPTER XLVI.

AFTER THE DRAGON, THE VIPER.

It is now time to return to those personages of our history whom necessity and intrigue as well as historical truth have forced into the background.

Oliva was getting ready for flight according to Jeanne's advice, when Beausire, informed by an anonymous letter, — Beausire, panting with impatience to see Nicole once more, found himself conducted right into her arms. He carried her away from Cagliostro's house while Monsieur Reteau de Villette was waiting in vain at the end of the Rue du Roi-Doré.

In order to find the happy lovers whom Monsieur de Crosne had so much interest in discovering, Madame de La Motte, who felt sure that she had been duped, set every person on whom she could rely to search the country for them. It may be easily imagined that she would prefer watching over her secret herself to leaving it to the care of others, and for the success of the plan she had in hand it was indispensable that Nicole should not be forthcoming. It is impossible to depict her suffering as each of her emissaries returned with a report that their search was unavailing. At this time, also, she was receiving, in her hiding-place, order after order to appear before the queen to answer for her conduct with regard to the necklace. One night, closely veiled, she set out for Bar-sur-Aube, where she had a small house; and having arrived there by cross-roads and without being recognized, she took time to examine her position in its true light. She thus gained two or three days in which to commune with herself. Two days of such solitude would be sufficient to this profound soul for the struggle through which she must pass before so mastering body and mind that her conscience, being discharged from service, would not return, and that her blood might not mount to her face to betray shame or surprise.

The king and queen, who had instituted a search for her, were not informed of her having established herself at Bar-sur-Aube until she had already prepared herself for war. They sent a messenger to bring her back to Versailles.

At about the same time Jeanne heard of the cardinal's imprisonment. "The queen has burned her ships," she coldly meditated. "It is impossible for her to revoke what she has done. In refusing to come to an understanding with the cardinal and pay the jewellers she is playing double or quits. That proves that she is acting without reference to me, and that she has no suspicion of the forces at my command."

While Jeanne was contemplating thus her defensive armor, a messenger suddenly presented himself before her and announced that he was charged to return her to the court.

The messenger proposed to take Jeanne directly to the king; but she, with her usual cunning, said to him, "Monsieur, you love the queen, do you not?"

"Can you doubt it, Madame la Comtesse?"

"Well, then, in the name of that loyal love, and of the respect you cherish for the queen, I adjure you to conduct me first to her."

The officer objected.

"You must know," said Jeanne, "even better than I, what is in question; and therefore you must know that it is necessary for the queen to have a secret interview with me."

The messenger, acquainted with the calumnious rumors that filled the air of Versailles, concluded that he would really render a service to the queen by taking Madame de La Motte to her at once.

Imagine the haughtiness and pride of the queen on seeing in her presence that demon whom as yet she did not know, but whose treacherous influence in her affairs she suspected. Imagine Marie Antoinette, inconsolably widowed in her love, blighted by the breath of scandal; Marie Antoinette, crushed by the insult of an accusation which she could not refute, — imagine her, after so many sufferings preparing to put her foot on the head of the serpent which had bitten her.

Supreme disdain, anger unrestrained, the hatred of woman for woman, the sense of an incomparable superiority in position, — such were the weapons of one of the adversaries. The queen began by calling in two of her women as witnesses.

Cast-down eyes, closed lips, a reverence slow and solemn, a heart full of mysteries, a mind full of ideas, despair her impelling power, — such was the second champion.

Madame de La Motte, on seeing the two witnesses, said to herself, "Good! here are two witnesses who will very soon be dismissed."

"Ah, here you are at last, Madame!" cried the queen. "You have been found at last!"

Jeanne bowed a second time.

"You were in hiding then?" said the queen, impatiently.

"I in hiding! No, Madame," in a soft and slightly tremulous voice, as if she were oppressed by the royal presence; "had I been in hiding I should not have been found."

"You had fled, however, — call it as you please."

"That is to say, I left Paris, — yes, Madame."

"Without my permission?"

"I did not think my presence so necessary to your Majesty that I must give you notice of a week's absence."

"Eh! you are right, Madame. Do you, then, hold any office at court?"

There was too much contempt in these last words. "Madame," she replied, with humility, "I hold no office at court, it is true; but your Majesty honored me with a confidence so precious to me that I held myself more bound to you by gratitude than others are by official duty."

Jeanne had found that word "confidence" after a search for the fitting word, and laid much stress upon it.

"That 'confidence,'" said the queen, with a contempt more crushing than before, "we shall give its place in the account. Have you seen the king?"

"No, Madame."

"You will see him."

Jeanne bowed. "That will be a great honor for me," she said.

The queen for a moment sought to calm herself that she might enter properly upon the examination. Jeanne took advantage of the pause to exclaim, "But, mon Dieu! Madame, how harsh your Majesty is toward me! I tremble all over."

"You have not reached the end," said the queen, abruptly. "Do you know that Monsieur de Rohan is in the Bastille?"

"I have been told so, Madame."

"You of course know the cause of his imprisonment?"

Jeanne looked steadily at the queen, and turning toward the two women, whose presence seemed to annoy her, replied, "I do not know, Madame."

"You know, however, that you have spoken to me of a necklace, do you not?"

"A diamond necklace, — yes, Madame."

"And that in the name of the cardinal you proposed an arrangement for the purchase of that necklace?"

"That is true, Madame."

"Did I accept or refuse that arrangement?"

"Your Majesty refused."

"Ah!" said the queen, with satisfaction, and also with surprise.

"Your Majesty even gave two hundred thousand francs on account," added Jeanne.

"Well, — afterward?"

"Your Majesty, not being able to pay, sent back the diamonds to the jewellers."

"By whom did I send them?"

"By me."

"And you, what did you do with them?"

"I," said Jeanne, deliberately, and conscious of the weight of the words she was about to speak, "I gave them to Monsieur le Cardinal."

"To Monsieur le Cardinal! And why, if you please, instead of returning them to the jewellers?"

"Because, Madame, Monsieur de Rohan being interested in the affair, — to give pleasure to your Majesty, — I should have wounded him had I not given him the opportunity to bring it to a proper conclusion."

"How then did you obtain from the jewellers a receipt for the necklace?"

"Monsieur de Rohan gave me that receipt."

"And that letter which it is said you gave the jewellers as coming from me?"

"Monsieur de Rohan begged me to deliver it."

"It is then Monsieur de Rohan who is at the bottom of this affair?"

"I do not understand your Majesty," said Jeanne, assuming a vacant air.

"That receipt from the jewellers is a forgery!"

"A forgery!" innocently exclaimed Jeanne. "Oh, Madame!"

"The pretended letter of acceptance, signed, it is said, by me, is a forgery!"

"Oh!" cried Jeanne, apparently more astonished than before.

"You will have to be confronted with the Cardinal de Rohan, that the affair may be cleared up."

"Confronted! Why, Madame, what need is there for my being confronted with the cardinal?"

"He himself demands it."

"He?"

"He has sought you everywhere."

"But, Madame, it is impossible."

"He wished to prove to you, he said, that you had deceived him."

"Oh, then, Madame, I demand to be confronted with him."

"You will be, Madame, you may rest assured. So then you deny knowing where the necklace is?"

"How should I know?"

"You deny having aided Monsieur le Cardinal in certain intrigues?"

"Your Majesty has every right to disgrace me, but none to insult me. I am a Valois, Madame."

"The cardinal has maintained, in the king's presence, calumnies which he expects to support by serious proof."

"I do not understand."

"The cardinal declares that he has written to me."

Jeanne looked steadily at the queen, and made no reply.

"Do you hear me?" asked the queen.

"I hear, yes, your Majesty."

"And what do you reply?"

"I will reply when I am confronted with Monsieur le Cardinal."

"Meanwhile, if you know the truth, give us your assistance?"

"The truth, Madame, is that your Majesty blames me without cause, and is severe toward me without reason."

"That is not an answer."

"I shall however make no other here, Madame," and Jeanne looked again toward the two women.

The queen understood, but did not yield. Her curiosity could not prevail over her self-respect. The whole attitude of Jeanne seemed to indicate that she was in possession of an important secret. Perhaps by gentleness the queen might win from her that secret; but she rejected that method as unworthy of her.

"Monsieur de Rohan has been sent to the Bastille," said Marie Antoinette, "for saying too much; beware, Madame, of incurring the same fate through saying too little."

Jeanne dug into her hands with her nails, but she smiled. "To a pure conscience," she said, "what matters persecution? Will the Bastille convict me of a crime that I have not committed?"

The queen looked at Jeanne angrily. "Will you speak?" she asked.

"I have nothing to say, Madame, except to you."

"To me? Very well, is it not to me that you are now speaking?"

"Not to you alone."

"Ah, that is it!" cried the queen. "You wish for secrecy, for closed doors. You fear the scandal of a public avowal, after inflicting on me the scandal of public suspicion."

Jeanne drew herself up. "Let us say no more about it," she said. "I was proposing to render you a service."

"What insolence!"

"I submit respectfully to the wrongs inflicted by my queen," said Jeanne, without changing color.

"You will sleep in the Bastille to-night, Madame de La Motte."

"Be it so, Madame. But before going to bed I shall, as usual, pray that God will preserve to your Majesty honor and happiness."

The queen, rising in great anger, went into the adjoining chamber, and violently slammed the door. "After overcoming the dragon," said she, "I shall certainly crush the viper."

"I know her game by heart," thought Jeanne. "I think that I have won."

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE PURSUER OVERTAKEN.

MADAME DE LA MOTTE was imprisoned, as the queen had wished. Nothing could be more agreeable to the king, who instinctively hated the woman.

Meantime the Cardinal de Rohan was living at the Bastille as a nobleman might have lived in a hired house. Everything was granted him on demand, except liberty.

The law-proceedings were at first of a trivial character, considering the rank of the persons accused. There was great astonishment that a Rohan should be charged with theft, and for that reason the governor of the Bastille and all the officers showed great deference and respect to the cardinal as to a person who was unfortunate. To them he was not a person accused, but a man who had fallen out of favor; and when it was rumored that he was a victim to the intrigues of the court, public sympathy rose to public enthusiasm. And Monsieur de Rohan, one of the chief nobles of the kingdom, did not understand that the love of the people was bestowed on him only for the reason that he was persecuted by those more noble than he. The last victim of despotism, he was in fact one of the earliest revolutionists in France.

Since the day of his incarceration the cardinal had persistently demanded to be confronted with Madame de La Motte, and at length he obtained that satisfaction. His interview with her was marked by a noticeable incident. The countess, who was permitted to speak low whenever she spoke of the queen, at last succeeded in saying to the cardinal, "Send every one away, and I will give you the information you want."

Then Monsieur de Rohan expressed a desire to be left alone with the countess; but this was refused. His counsel, however, was permitted to have an interview with her. In this interview Jeanne denied all knowledge as to what had become of the necklace, and broadly intimated that it should have been given to her. And when the counsel cried out, astounded by this audacity, she asked him if the service she had rendered to the queen and the cardinal was not worth a million.

The advocate repeated this to the cardinal, who turned pale and bowed his head; he saw that he had fallen into a trap. But while he was thinking that he must stifle the affair before it should bring ruin to the queen, it was represented to him that his honor was at stake; accused as he was of theft he must push the matter to a verdict, that his innocence might be established. But to prove his innocence it would be necessary to prove his relations with the queen, — that is to say, her criminality.

When this consideration was presented to Jeanne she replied that she was not disposed to accuse either the queen or the cardinal, but if they persisted in making her responsible for the necklace she might be obliged to show that the queen and the cardinal had a secret reason for charging her with falsehood.

When these words were reported to the cardinal he expressed his scorn for her who could thus speak of sacrificing him. He added that up to a certain point he could understand Jeanne's conduct, but the queen's he could not understand at all.

The queen, in her turn, was informed of what the cardinal had said, and became very angry. She directed a private examination to be made as to the mysterious phases of the affair. The great grievance of the nocturnal interviews then came out, and was enlarged upon by scandal-mongers. Then the queen found herself in danger. Jeanne, when in presence of those who represented the queen, declared that she understood nothing of what was said to her; but with those who represented the cardinal, she was less discreet, and frequently reiterated, "If they do not leave me in peace I will speak out."

This delicate reserve, this modesty, so complicated the situation that no examining judge dared to prosecute the inquiry.

Had the cardinal been less firm, — more ready to speak? Had he to some friend avowed his love-secret? We ought not so to think, for the prince was a noble-hearted and devoted man. But whether he had spoken or not, a rumor that he had been at Apollo's Baths with the queen, at midnight, was spread around. The question was not now, "Did the queen steal the diamonds?" — a question sufficiently dishonoring, — but, "Has the queen permitted the necklace to be stolen by some one who had penetrated the secret of her adulterous love?"

Thus Madame de La Motte had succeeded in averting the difficulty. Thus the queen found herself forced into a path which could lead only to dishonor. She was not cast down; she resolved to fight. The king supported her resolution; the ministry also sustained her with all their resources.

From this time all the enginery of the prosecution was directed against Jeanne, and a diligent search was made for the necklace. The queen, by accepting the issue as presented, threw back upon Jeanne the crushing charge of robbery.

Jeanne perceived that she had taken a false course and that the queen, in submitting to the accusation of adultery and withstanding public opinion, engaged the cardinal to imitate her. She was sure that these two loyal souls would at last come to an understanding, and would fathom the mystery. Even if they should fall, they would in their fall crush beneath them the little Valois, princess of a stolen million, who had no money at hand to bribe the judges.

While affairs were in this state an incident occurred which changed their complexion.

Monsieur de Beausire and Mademoiselle Oliva were living prosperously and happily in the country, when one day Beausire, who had left Oliva at home while he went hunting, fell into company with two of the detectives whom Monsieur de Crosne had scattered over all France in search for the key to this intrigue.

The two lovers knew nothing of what was happening at Paris; they were thinking only of themselves. Beausire on that day had started out to chase the hare. He started a covey of partridges, which drew him out of his course. And thus in looking for that of which he was not in search, he found what he did not wish to find. The detectives too were searching for Oliva, and found Beausire. Such are the usual caprices of the chase.

One of these detectives was a person of intelligence. When he was sure of his man, instead of making the arrest then and there, he said to his companion, "Beausire hunts; he is therefore free and prosperous. He perhaps has five or six louis in his pocket, and two or three hundred at home. Let us therefore arrest him at home, and make him pay a ransom."

Thereupon they followed Beausire wherever he went, and joined in his sport with ostentatious eagerness.

Beausire, observing them, was at first astonished, then angry. But being still reluctant to make new acquaintances, he sent his gamekeeper to question them. The strangers replied that they were shooting with their friend, the gentleman yonder, pointing to Beausire. The gamekeeper therefore conducted them to him.

"Monsieur de Linville," said the gamekeeper, "these gentlemen say that they are shooting with you."

"With me!" cried Beausire, angrily. "Ah, indeed!"

"So, then," said one of the detectives, in a low tone, "you are Monsieur de Linville, my dear Beausire?"

Beausire was startled; he had so carefully concealed his name. He looked at the men with a frightened air, and dismissed the gamekeeper.

"You know them, then?" said the latter.

"Yes; we have recognized one another," replied one of the detectives.

Beausire was then left alone with the strangers, very uncertain how he could speak to them without compromising himself.

"Ask us to breakfast, Beausire," said the more adroit detective, "at your house."

"At my house! but —" cried Beausire.

"You will not be so impolite to us, Beausire!"

Beausire lost his self-possession, and led them, or rather was led by them, to his house. The detectives, as soon as they saw the house, began to praise its beauty, its situation, and the fine view it commanded. "How well," said one of them, "a man might hide himself here!"

Beausire shuddered at this pleasantry, and led the way into his court-yard, welcomed by the barking of his dogs. The detectives followed him, with every observance of ceremony.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

THE TURTLE-DOVES ARE CAGED.

BEAUSIRE had his reasons for entering by the court-yard gate; he wished to make noise enough to put Oliva on her guard. Beausire, although knowing nothing of the affair of the necklace, knew enough about the Opera-ball and Mesmer's vat to dread Oliva's being seen by strangers. He acted wisely; for the young woman, hearing the dogs bark, looked down into the court, and saw that Beausire was accompanied by two men; therefore she did not go down to meet him as usual. Unfortunately, it being necessary to order breakfast, an awkward servant asked two or three times if he should get directions from Madame. This word attracted the attention of the two bloodhounds. They rallied Beausire very pleasantly upon this concealed lady. Beausire allowed them to jest, but did not allow them to see Oliva.

A substantial repast was served, to which the two agents of Monsieur de Crosne did honor. They drank a great deal, and frequently to the health of the absent lady. The police agents thinking it inhuman to prolong the suspense of their host, adroitly led the conversation to the subject of the pleasure of meeting old acquaintances. Beausire asked in what place and under what circumstances he could have met them before.

"We were," said one of them, "the friends of one of your associates in a little affair you entered into in company with several others, — the affair of the embassy of Portugal."

Beausire turned pale. "Ah, certainly," he said, trembling with embarrassment, "and you come in behalf of your friend?"

"That is a good idea," one of the men said to the other; "to demand restitution in the name of an absent friend is a moral action."

"My dear Monsieur Beausire, it would be agreeable to us if you would return to one of us that friend's share, — about ten thousand francs, I believe."

"At the very least; for we will say nothing of interest," said the positive companion.

"Gentlemen," replied Beausire, "a man does not keep ten thousand francs in his house in the country."

"We understand that, dear Monsieur; and we do not ask the impossible. How much could you give us at once?"

"I have fifty or sixty louis, — no more."

"We will take those to begin with, and thank you for your courtesy."

"Ah," thought Beausire, charmed at their easy way of arranging matters, "they are easily satisfied! Are they, perchance, as much afraid of me as I am of them? Let us try;" and he began to reflect that these gentlemen, were they to cry out very loudly, would only the more clearly acknowledge themselves his accomplices, which with the provincial authorities would be a bad recommendation. Beausire concluded that these men would declare themselves perfectly satisfied, and would preserve an absolute silence. He even went so far as to repent not having offered them thirty louis instead of sixty; he meant to get rid of them, however, as soon as he had paid them that amount.

But he reckoned without his guests; they were too comfortable under his roof, and were enjoying that blissful content arising from a good digestion.

"Beausire is a charming friend," said the positive to his friend. "The sixty louis he has given us are pleasant to take."

"I will give them to you immediately," cried the host, alarmed to see his guests breaking out into somewhat bacchanalian familiarity.

"There is no hurry," said the two friends.

"Yes, yes; I shall not have a free conscience until I have paid you. One either has delicate feelings, or he has not," and he was about to leave them to get the money.

A good sheriff's officer, having once caught his victim, never lets him escape from his grasp or his sight. Therefore both the men, with admirable accord, began to cry out, "Monsieur Beausire! my dear Beausire!" and they seized him by the skirt of his green shooting-jacket.

"What is the matter?" asked Beausire.

"Do not leave us, for mercy's sake!" they said, forcing him to sit down again.

"But how can I give you the money if you do not let me go upstairs for it?"

"We will go with you," replied the positive, with alarming tenderness.

"But it is — my wife's chamber," replied Beausire.

"Oh, indeed!" cried the first of the agents, "why do you conceal your wife from us?"

"Yes," said the second. "Are we not presentable?"

"If you knew what we are doing for you, you would be more polite," continued the first.

"And you would give us all that we ask," added the second, boldly.

"It seems to me that you are taking a very high tone, gentlemen," said Beausire.

"We want to see the wife," replied the positive.

"And I declare to you that I will put you both out of doors," cried Beausire, who thought that he was stronger than they, intoxicated as they were.

They replied by a burst of laughter which should have made him prudent. He paid no attention to it, and obstinately continued, "Now you shall not have even the money I promised you, and you shall get out of the way at once."

They laughed more obstreperously than before.

Beausire, trembling with rage, said, "I understand you. You will make a noise, and you will speak out; but if you speak of these things you will be ruined as well as I."

They continued to laugh; the joke seemed a pleasant one. It was their only answer.

Beausire thought he could terrify them with a vigorous measure, and rushed toward the staircase, not like a man who is going in search of louis, but like a furious man who goes in quest of a weapon. The officers rose from the table, and ran after Beausire, and caught hold of him with their large hands. The latter cried out; a door opened and a woman appeared, agitated, terrified, upon the threshold. When they saw her the two men let Beausire go, and uttered a cry, — a cry of joy, of triumph, of wild delight. They recognized the woman who resembled so strongly the queen of France.

Beausire, who thought that the men were disarmed by the appearance of a woman, was soon and cruelly undeceived. The positive approached Mademoiselle Oliva, and in a tone not very polite, "Ah, ah," he said, "I arrest you!"

"Arrest her!" cried Beausire; "and why?"

"Because Monsieur de Crosne has ordered us to do so," replied the other agent, "and because we are in the service of Monsieur de Crosne."

"You see what comes of not behaving prettily," said the positive to Beausire.

This agent was not logical, and his companion remarked to him, "You are wrong, for if Beausire had behaved more prettily, he would have introduced us to Madame, and so in any case we should have taken her."

Beausire had pressed both hands to his burning forehead. An idea presented itself to him; it at once revived him. "Did you come to arrest me?" he said to the agents.

"No, that was mere chance," they said innocently.

"No matter, you might have arrested me, and for sixty louis you would have set me at liberty."

"Oh, no; our intention was to demand sixty more."

"And we have really received only a promise; now for one hundred and twenty louis we will give you your liberty."

"But — Madame?" said Beausire, trembling.

"Oh, Madame, — that is different," replied the positive.

"Madame is worth two hundred louis, you mean?"

The detectives again broke out with that terrible laugh, which now, alas! Beausire understood.

"Three hundred," he said, "four hundred — a thousand louis if you will leave her at liberty." Beausire said this with flashing eyes. "You do not answer," he continued. "You know that I have money, and you mean to make me pay. Very well; I will give you two thousand louis, — forty-eight thousand francs, — a fortune for both of you, if you will leave her at liberty."

"You love her very much then," said the positive.

It was Beausire's turn to laugh; and his ironical laughter was so frightful, it declared so vividly his love and desperation, that the two detectives judged it prudent to take some precautions. They drew each a pair of pistols.

"Not for a hundred thousand crowns," said one of them, "would we give up this woman. The Cardinal de Rohan will pay us five hundred thousand francs for her, and the queen a million."

Beausire raised his eyes with an expression which would have softened the heart of any other savage beast than an agent of police.

"Come, let us be going," said the positive. "You must have here a carriage of some sort; have it made ready for Madame, — you owe her as much as that."

"And as we are good fellows," said the other, "we will take no advantage of you. We will arrest you for form's sake, but on the road will allow you to escape. Is n't that generous, eh?"

"Wherever she goes," replied Beausire, "I will go. I will never leave her while this life lasts."

"Oh, nor in the other!" added Oliva, frigid with terror.

"Well, so much the better," said the positive; "the more prisoners we bring to Monsieur de Crosne, the more he laughs."

A quarter of an hour later, Beausire's carriage set forth from his house, with the two captive lovers and their guards.

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE QUEEN'S LIBRARY.

THE effect produced by this capture on Monsieur de Crosne may be imagined. He repaired to Versailles in a carriage, which was followed by another carefully closed. He ordered the two carriages to be driven to Trianon, and there he alighted, leaving the closed carriage in charge of his clerk. He had previously sent to the queen a request that she would meet him there.

When Monsieur de Crosne was admitted to the presence of the queen, she at once inferred from his radiant manner that he was the bearer of good news.

"Madame," said the magistrate, after he had kissed her hand, "is there here a room from which you can see all that happens in an adjoining room without being seen yourself?"

"There is my library," replied the queen, "into which I can look from the breakfast-room, through openings specially designed for that purpose."

"Very good, Madame. Be pleased, then, to go with me into the breakfast-room, and give orders that my clerk may be admitted to the library, with what he brings."

Ten minutes later, the queen with much agitation was looking into the library through the secret openings. She saw a veiled form enter the library. The clerk removed the veil, and the queen uttered a cry of fright. It was Oliva, dressed in one of the favorite costumes of Marie Antoinette. It was Marie Antoinette herself, less the blood of the Cæsars. The queen thought she was looking at herself in a mirror; she gazed eagerly at the apparition.

"What says your Majesty to this resemblance?" said Monsieur de Crosne, triumphant at the effect he had produced.

"I say — I say — Monsieur —" stammered the queen, bewildered. "Ah, Olivier," she thought, "why are you not here?"

"What does your Majesty desire?"

"Nothing, Monsieur, nothing except that the king should be informed —"

"And that Monsieur de Provence should see this woman, — is not that your wish, Madame?"

"Oh, thanks, Monsieur de Crosne, thanks! But what will be done with this woman?"

"Is it really to this woman that everything which has been done is to be attributed?" asked Monsieur de Crosne.

"You have, doubtless, obtained a clew to the conspiracy?"

"Very nearly so, Madame."

"And Monsieur de Rohan?"

"Monsieur de Rohan knows nothing of this at present."

"Oh," said the queen, hiding her face in her hands, "that woman yonder, Monsieur, is — I see it now — the whole cause of the cardinal's error!"

"That may be, Madame; but if there was error on the cardinal's part, there was crime on the part of some other person!"

"Make a thorough investigation, Monsieur; you have in your hands the honor of the house of France."

"And be assured, Madame, that it is in good hands," replied Monsieur de Crosne.

"And the prosecution?"

"Is going on. Everything is denied; but I shall at the proper time bring forward that piece of convincing testimony which you have in your library."

"And Madame de La Motte?"

"She does not know that I have found this girl. She accuses Monsieur de Cagliostro of having deceived the cardinal almost to the point of destroying his reason."

"And Monsieur de Cagliostro?"

"Monsieur de Cagliostro, who has been questioned, has promised to come to see me this morning."

"He is a dangerous man."

"He will be a useful man. Stung by a viper like Madame de La Motte, he will absorb the venom, and furnish us with a counter-poison."

"You hope for revelations from him?"

"I am sure to have them."

"Why do you think so, Monsieur? Oh, tell me all that can reassure me."

"These are my reasons, Madame: Madame de La Motte lived in the Rue Saint Claude —"

"I know that!" said the queen, blushing.

"Yes; your Majesty did that woman the honor of being charitable to her."

"Has she not repaid me well? Well, she lived in the Rue Saint Claude."

"And Monsieur de Cagliostro lived exactly opposite."

"And you suppose —"

"That the secret of either one of these two neighbors would be known to the other. But pardon, Madame, it is nearly time for me to meet Monsieur de Cagliostro in Paris; and I would not for the world delay receiving his explanations."

"Go, Monsieur, go; and let me again assure you of my gratitude."

"This," she cried, weeping bitterly, when Monsieur de

Crosne had left the room, "is the beginning of my justification. I shall read my triumph on every face, but that of the only friend to whom I wish to prove my innocence, that one I shall not see!"

In the mean time Monsieur de Crosne was hastening to Paris, to his own house where Monsieur de Cagliostro was waiting for him. The latter knew all that had happened. On the day before, he was on his way to Beausire's house to urge him to leave France, when on the road he saw him sitting in the carriage between the two officers. Oliva was hidden on the back seat.

Beausire saw the count, recognized him, and immediately the idea occurred to him that this mysterious and powerful nobleman might be of use to him. He reminded the agents of the proposal they had made to allow him to escape; they accepted the one hundred louis which he offered them, and let him go notwithstanding Oliva's tears. Beausire whispered in the ear of his mistress, "Hope; I am going to do something to save you." And he ran off in the direction that Cagliostro had taken. The latter had no need to seek further for Beausire, since Beausire was returning to Paris. It would be expedient, however, to wait for Beausire, if by chance the latter should send after him. Cagliostro therefore waited at a turn in the road for about half an hour, when he saw the unhappy lover of Oliva approaching, pale and out of breath. Beausire, on seeing that the count's carriage had stopped, uttered a cry of joy.

"What is the matter, my boy?" said the count, helping him to a seat beside him.

Beausire related his lamentable story, to which Cagliostro listened in silence.

"She is lost!" said the count.

"How can that be?" cried Beausire.

Cagliostro then related to him what he did not know before,— the intrigue of the Rue Saint Claude and that of Versailles.

Beausire almost fainted. "Save her! save her!" he said, falling upon his knees in the carriage, "and I will give her to you if you love her still."

"My friend," replied Cagliostro, "you are in error; I never loved Mademoiselle Oliva; my only object was to take her from that life of debauchery which you made her share."

"But —" said Beausire, surprised.

"That astonishes you? Know then that I am one of the directors of a moral reform society, whose aim is to snatch from vice all who offer any chance of cure. I took Oliva away from you to cure her. Ask her if she has ever heard from my lips a word of gallantry; ask her if my services in her behalf have not always been disinterested!"

"All the more reason, Monsieur; save her! save her!"

"I will try; but this will depend on you, Beausire."

"Ask of me my life."

"I will not ask so much as that. Return to Paris with me, and if you will follow my instructions to the letter, perhaps we can save your mistress; this on one condition only."

"What is that, Monsieur?"

"I will tell you on our way back to Paris."

"Oh, I consent to it in advance; oh, to see her again! to see her again!"

"That is just what I intend; in less than two hours you shall see her again."

"And I shall embrace her?"

"I think so; and you will also tell her what I am about to say to you."

Cagliostro went back to Paris with Beausire. In two hours, — it was evening, — he had overtaken the chaise; and in another hour Beausire was purchasing of the two police agents, for fifty louis, the privilege of embracing Nicole, and of whispering to her the instructions of the count. The officers were charmed with this passionate love. They calculated on receiving fifty louis at least at every second relay. But the chaise of Cagliostro was rapidly bearing Beausire to Paris, where the former was to keep his appointment with Monsieur de Crosne.

CHAPTER L.

CAGLIOSTRO'S REVELATIONS.

MONSIEUR DE CROSNE knew as much about Cagliostro as a skilful lieutenant of police can know of a man living in France; he looked upon him as a mountebank of noble rank.

This Monsieur de Crosne was a man of strong mind, acquainted with all the resources of his office, well received at court, indifferent to favor, never compounding with his pride, — a man not easily influenced. Cagliostro could not have offered to him, as to Monsieur de Rohan, louis still hot from his furnace; Cagliostro could not have presented to him, as Balsamo had done to Monsieur de Sartines, the muzzle of a pistol. From him Balsamo had not a Lorenza to demand, but to him Cagliostro must give an account of himself. This was the reason why, instead of waiting to be summoned, he had demanded an audience of the magistrate. Monsieur de Crosne felt the advantage of his position, and was prepared to use it. Cagliostro felt the awkwardness of his own, and was trying to get out of it.

Monsieur de Crosne expected from Cagliostro revelations with regard to the necklace and the practices of Madame de La Motte. In that he was at a disadvantage. He had, however, the right to question and imprison; in this lay his superiority. He received the count like a man who feels his importance, but who does not wish to be wanting in politeness, not even to a charlatan.

"Monsieur," said the lieutenant of police, "you have asked an audience of me; I have come from Versailles expressly to grant it."

"Monsieur, I thought you might have some interest in questioning me about matters that are taking place; and as a man who knows your merit and the importance of your functions, I have come to you."

"Question you?" said the magistrate, affecting surprise; "but about what, Monsieur; and in what capacity?"

"Monsieur," replied Cagliostro, frankly, "your attention has been much occupied with Madame de La Motte and the disappearance of the necklace."

"Can it be that you have found it?" asked Monsieur de Crosne, in an almost bantering tone.

"No," said the count, gravely. "But if I have not found the necklace, I at least know that Madame de La Motte lived in the Rue Saint Claude."

"In the house opposite yours, Monsieur; I know it also," said the magistrate.

"Then, Monsieur, you know what Madame de La Motte has been doing— Let us say no more about it."

"On the contrary," said Monsieur de Crosne, with an indifferent air, "let us talk about it."

"Oh, there was nothing of importance in that, except in regard to little Oliva," said Cagliostro; "but since you know all about Madame de La Motte, I have nothing new to tell you."

At the name of Oliva, Monsieur de Crosne started. "What did you say of Oliva?" he asked. "Who is this Oliva?"

"You do not know? Ah, Monsieur, that is a curious thing, about which I am surprised that I have to inform you. Imagine to yourself a very pretty girl, blue eyes, and face of the most perfect oval, — you see, a sort of beauty which reminds one of her Majesty the queen."

"Ah, ah!" said Monsieur de Crosne. "Well?"

"Well, this girl was living a bad life which it gave me pain to see; she was formerly in the service of an old friend of mine, Monsieur de Taverney —"

"The baron who died the other day."

"Precisely, yes; the one who is dead. She had, besides, been in the service of a man of science, whom you do not know, Monsieur le Lieutenant of Police, and who — But I am repeating, and I see that I am wearying you."

"Monsieur, please go on, I beg. This Oliva, you were saying —"

"Was leading a bad life, as I have had the honor of telling you, with her lover, one of your most ordinary rascals, whom probably you do not know —"

"A certain Beausire, perhaps?" said the magistrate, happy to appear well-informed.

"Ah, you know him; that is surprising," said Cagliostro, with admiration. "Well, one day when this Beausire had beaten her, and robbed her of more than was usual, she came to me for protection, and I good-naturedly allowed her to occupy some corner in one of my hôtels —"

"She was living in your house?" cried the magistrate, surprised. "Oh, that was the reason my agents could not find her."

"What! was this little girl searched for? Has she committed some crime of which I am ignorant?"

"No, Monsieur, no; go on, I entreat you."

"Oh, I have finished. I lodged her at my house, — that is all."

"No, no, no! Monsieur le Comte, that is not all, since you seemed just now to associate Oliva's name with that of Madame de La Motte."

"Ah, on account of their being neighbors," said Cagliostro.

"You interest me very much, Monsieur, — more than you can imagine; for this Oliva whom you claim to have lodged in your house, I found in the country."

"You found her?"

"With Monsieur de Beausire — "

"Well, now, I suspected that," cried Cagliostro. "She was with Beausire? Ah, very well, very well! Amends must be made to Madame de La Motte."

"What! — what do you mean?" replied Monsieur de Crosne.

"I say, Monsieur, that having for a moment suspected Madame de La Motte, I will make her full and complete reparation."

"Suspected her? — of what?"

"Good God! can you listen patiently to all this gossip? Well, then, I will tell you that just when I believed this Oliva to be reclaimed, some one carried her away from me."

"Carried her away? — from your house?"

"From my house."

"That is strange!"

"And I could have sworn that it was Madame de La Motte."

Monsieur de Crosne drew near to Cagliostro, and said, "Come, tell me this exactly, if you please!"

"Oh, Monsieur, now that you have found Oliva with Beausire, nothing can induce me to think of Madame de La Motte, her attentions, or her correspondence."

"Were Madame de La Motte and Oliva acquainted?"

"Intimately; and Madame de La Motte found a way to take Oliva out with her every night."

"Every night! Are you sure of that?"

"As sure as a man can be of anything he has seen or heard."

"Oh, Monsieur, you are telling me things for which I would pay at the rate of a thousand francs a word! Are you the friend of Monsieur de Rohan?"

"I believe so."

"Then you must know how much that element of intrigue, called Madame de La Motte, enters into his scandalous affair. Or perhaps you know the consequences of those promenades of Oliva and Madame de La Motte?"

"Monsieur, there are things of which the prudent man should always be ignorant," replied Cagliostro, sententiously.

"Have you proofs that Madame de La Motte had corresponded with Oliva?"

"A hundred."

"What are they?"

"Notes from Madame de La Motte which she shot into Oliva's room with a cross-bow. Some of these notes, rolled round pieces of lead, fell into the street; my servants and myself picked up several."

"Monsieur, would you deliver them up to the officers of the law?"

"Oh, Monsieur, they are of so innocent a nature that I should have no scruples in doing so."

"And the proofs of their connivance, of their meetings?"

"A thousand."

"I ask for only one."

"The strongest. It appears that Madame de La Motte had obtained the means of entering my house to see Oliva; for I saw her there myself the very day when the young woman disappeared."

"Ah! and why did she go, since Oliva had disappeared?"

"I could not understand that at first myself. I had seen Madame de La Motte alight from a post-chaise which was waiting in the Rue du Roi-Doré. My servants had seen the carriage standing there for a long time, and I supposed that Madame de La Motte wished to attach Oliva to herself."

"And you allowed her to do it?"

"Why not? Madame de La Motte is a charitable lady; she is received at court."

"Mademoiselle Oliva was living in your house?" said Monsieur de Crosne, meditating profoundly; "and Mademoiselle Oliva and Madame de La Motte were acquainted, visited each other, went out together?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"Ah, Madame de La Motte was seen in your house the day that Oliva was carried off?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"And you thought that the countess wished to attach this girl to herself?"

"What else could I think?"

"What did Madame de La Motte say when she did not find Oliva at your house?"

"She seemed to be confused."

"Do you think Beausire carried her off?"

"I think so only because you told me that he did carry her off; otherwise, I should suspect nothing. Who could have told the man where Oliva was?"

"Oliva herself."

"I do not think so, for she might have gone to him without sending for him to take her away; and he could not have got into the house if Madame de La Motte had not sent him a key."

"She had a key?"

"That cannot be doubted."

"On what day was she carried off?" said Monsieur de Crosne.

"Oh, Monsieur, in regard to that I cannot be mistaken; it was the night before Saint Louis' Day."

"That is it!" cried the lieutenant of police, — "that is it! Monsieur, you have just rendered a signal service to the State. Can I rely on your delivering up these proofs of which you speak?"

"I am ready, Monsieur, to submit to the demands of justice in all things."

"Well, Monsieur, I shall remind you of your promise. I hope to have the honor of seeing you again," and he dismissed Cagliostro, who said to himself as he was retiring, —

"Ah, Countess, viper! you wished to accuse me! I think that you have bitten on a file; look out for your teeth!"

CHAPTER LI.

EXAMINATIONS.

While Monsieur de Crosne was holding his interview with Cagliostro, Monsieur de Breteuil presented himself at the Bastille to interrogate Monsieur de Rohan, on behalf of the king. Monsieur de Rohan refused to reply; and when the baron insisted, he said that the matter now was in the hands of the parliament and the judges, and he would leave it there.

Monsieur de Breteuil, withdrawing from this attempt without having obtained any satisfaction, sought and obtained an interview with Madame de La Motte. He explained to her, briefly, the dangers of her situation. She replied that she had proofs of her innocence which she would furnish on the proper occasion; that she would answer nothing except in presence of the cardinal, and after she should be informed what charges he allowed to weigh against her.

Monsieur de Breteuil then told her that the cardinal held her responsible for everything.

"Everything?" said Jeanne, — "even the theft?"

"Even the theft."

"Please say to Monsieur le Cardinal," said Jeanne, coolly, "that I advise him not to persist in so bad a method of defence."

Monsieur de Breteuil was not satisfied. He promised everything to Madame de La Motte if she would clearly accuse some one. "Take care!" he said; "in saying nothing, you accuse the queen. If you persist in that you will be found guilty of treason. That means disgrace, — perhaps the halter."

"I do not accuse the queen," Jeanne replied; "but why do they accuse me?"

"Accuse some one!" insisted Breteuil; "it is your only way to save yourself."

But Jeanne kept silent; and that first interview between her and the keeper of the seals was without result.

Meantime the rumor got abroad that proofs had come to light; that the diamonds had been sold in England; and that Monsieur de Villette had been arrested there.

The first assault which Jeanne had to sustain was of an alarming character. Confronted with Reteau, whom she believed to be her ally unto death, she with terror heard him humbly acknowledge that he was a forger; that he had forged both the jeweller's receipt and the queen's letter. Being asked with what motives he had committed these crimes, he replied that he had been instigated to them by Madame de La Motte.

Jeanne furiously denied Reteau's testimony. She declared that she had never seen him. Then she received two severe shocks; she was crushed by the evidence of two witnesses. One of these was the driver of the carriage in which she had made her nocturnal expedition on the night and at the hour stated by Reteau; and the other was one of Cagliostro's servants, who affirmed that on a certain evening he had seen Monsieur Reteau de Villette seated in a post-chaise, from which Madame de La Motte had just alighted.

Thereupon Jeanne violently attacked Cagliostro, who, she declared, had worked upon the Cardinal de Rohan's mind with his incantations and sorceries, and had thus inspired him with culpable ideas against the royal Majesty.

That was the first link in the accusation of adultery.

Monsieur de Rohan defended himself and Cagliostro at the same time. He was so obstinate in his denial that Jeanne, in desperation, at length openly charged the cardinal with a mad passion for the queen.

Cagliostro demanded that he too should be imprisoned, that he might prove his innocence to all the world. His request was granted.

Accusers and judges became more interested, — as always happens on the first appearance of truth, — and public opinion immediately ranged itself with the cardinal and Cagliostro against the queen.

The unfortunate princess, to make clear her determination to prosecute the suit, secured the publication of the reports made to the king in regard to her nocturnal walks, and summoned Monsieur de Crosne to tell all he knew.

This blow, skilfully calculated, fell upon Jeanne with crushing force. She denied that there had been any nocturnal walks by her connivance, or to her knowledge. She declared false the certified reports that she had been seen in the park in company with the queen or with the cardinal.

At this stage in the proceedings, when Jeanne was loudly protesting that she had never been in the Versailles park at night, and that she had never been cognizant of any private relation between the queen and the cardinal, — at that moment Oliva appeared, a living witness who changed public opinion and destroyed the edifice of lies erected by the countess.

Oliva's appearance was a terrible blow to the cardinal. He perceived at last that he had been tricked in the most infamous manner. That man, full of delicacy and noble passion, had been betrayed by an adventuress and a woman of the town into an attack on the queen, — a woman whom he loved, and who was altogether innocent! When he saw Oliva, that queen of the cross-roads, and recalled the rose, the clasped hands, the Baths of Apollo, he turned pale, and would have poured out his blood at the feet of Marie Antoinette had he seen her at that moment.

But the cardinal could not admit Oliva's identity without acknowledging that he was in love with the actual queen. The avowal of his error would be an accusation, a stain. He therefore remained silent, and allowed Jeanne to deny everything.

Efforts being renewed to induce Jeanne to give some explanation, she coolly replied, "The best way of proving that the queen did not walk by night in the park is to exhibit a woman who resembles the queen, and who pretends that she was in the park. You exhibit her; it is very fine."

This infamous insinuation met with success, and once more hid the truth. But when Oliva, with innocent anxiety, gave all the details and all the proofs, omitting nothing, she obtained a more ready belief than had the countess.

Jeanne then resorted to a desperate expedient, — she confessed that she had conducted the cardinal to Versailles; she declared that he had insisted on seeing the queen that he might give her assurance of his respectful devotion. She declared further that those walks in the park were taken with the knowledge of the queen, who, concealed in the shrubbery, listened with stifled laughter to the passionate words of the amorous Monsieur de Rohan.

The queen was helpless against this last accusation, for she could not prove it to be false; because Jeanne, driven to extremities, declared that she would publish all the love-letters written to the queen by the cardinal, and because in fact she had those letters, burning with mad passion. And Mademoiselle Oliva could not prove that any one was, or was not, listening behind the shrubbery. In short there were too many persons interested in taking these lies for positive truths. The queen was helpless.

CHAPTER LII.

THE LAST HOPE LOST.

After examinations without number, in which the cardinal had maintained his calm and courteous demeanor even toward Jeanne, and Jeanne had conducted herself boisterously, the opinion of the public, and of the judges especially, became at last fixed.

No new incidents could be adduced; revelations were exhausted. Jeanne perceived that she had produced no favorable effect on the minds of her judges. She therefore, in the retirement of her prison-cell, once more examined her resources.

By all those who were in the train of Monsieur de Breteuil, Jeanne was urged to spare the queen, but to accuse the cardinal without mercy. From those who were connected with the cardinal — a powerful family, judges favoring the cause of the people, the clergy fruitful in resources — came the advice to tell all the truth, to unmask the intrigues of the court, and to stimulate the commotion to such a point that all crowned heads should take alarm.

This party seemed sure of victory. The popular enthusiasm was in favor of the cardinal. Men admired his patience, and women his discretion. Men were angry that he should have been so basely deceived; women were slow to believe that he had been deceived. To very many Oliva had no real existence, or if she existed she had been invented by the queen for the occasion.

Jeanne thought it all over. Her lawyers abandoned her; the judges made no secret of their aversion; the Rohan party vigorously assailed her; in public opinion she was scorned. She resolved on a last blow, which should make the judges anxious, frighten the cardinal's friends, and arouse anew the popular feeling against the queen. Her plan was to make it appear that she had been anxious throughout to shield the queen, but that she must reveal everything if driven too hard; that as to the cardinal, she had only imitated his reserve, but that if he should speak out, she would follow his example, and they would prove their innocence.

In pursuance of this plan Jeanne wrote the following letter to the queen: —

MADAME, — Notwithstanding all that is painful in my position, I have not complained. All the expedients employed to extort a confession from me have only strengthened my resolution not to compromise my sovereign.

Nevertheless, though persuaded that my constancy and my discretion entitle me to relief from my present embarrassment, I confess that the efforts made by the cardinal's family make me fear that I shall become their victim.

A long imprisonment, endless examinations, disgrace, and despair at finding myself accused of a crime of which I am innocent have enfeebled my courage, and I fear that my constancy will yield to so many blows dealt at the same time.

By a single word Madame can put an end to this miserable affair, through the mediation of Monsieur de Breteuil, who can give to it, in the eyes of the minister (the king), the appearance which his intelligence will suggest to him, without compromising Madame in any way. It is the fear of being compelled to reveal all which necessitates the step I am now taking; and I am persuaded that Madame will consider the motives which have urged me to it, and that she will give orders for delivering me from my painful situation.

I am, with profound respect, Madame's very humble and obedient servant, —

COMTESSE DE VALOIS DE LA MOTTE.

Either this letter would be delivered to the queen, and would alarm her to such a degree that she would conclude to end the struggle by setting Jeanne at liberty, or — which was more probable — it would be delivered to the governor of the prison, and by him to the judges. Jeanne had, in short, so expressed herself that the letter, fall where it might, would deposit a leaven of hatred, distrust, and irreverence toward the queen.

Jeanne wrote at the same time a letter to the cardinal, as follows : —

MONSEIGNEUR, — I cannot conceive why you so obstinately persist in silence. It seems to me that you should place unreserved confidence in our judges ; our condition would be the better for it. As to myself, I am resolved to remain silent until you will support my word. But why do you not speak? Explain all the circumstances of this mysterious affair, and I swear that I will confirm all that you say. Consider, Monsieur le Cardinal, that if I speak first, and you disavow what I say, I am lost. I shall not escape her vengeance who wishes to sacrifice us both.

But you have nothing like that to fear from me ; you know my devotion. If she proves to be implacable, your cause will always be my own ; I would sacrifice everything to shield you from her hatred.

P. S. I have written to her a letter which will, I hope, persuade her, if not to speak the truth, at least not to crush us, — who have no crime with which to reproach ourselves, except our error, or our silence.

This artful letter was delivered to the cardinal during their last examination in the great parlor of the Bastille. It was observed that the cardinal turned red, and then pale, shuddering at such audacity. He went out to recover his breath.

At the same time the countess handed the letter which she had written to the queen to the Abbé Lekel almoner of the Bastille, who had accompanied the cardinal to the parlor and was devoted to his interests.

The almoner refused to take the letter.

"Well, then," said Jeanne, resorting to intimidation, "say to the cardinal that I have still one recourse left, — that of publishing the letters which he wrote to the queen. I shall be sorry to do so, but for our common advantage I will do it."

The almoner still refused.

"Take notice," said Jeanne, "that you reduce me to the necessity of making use of Monsieur de Rohan's letters."

"Very well," replied the abbé, "make use of them, Madame."

"But," replied Jeanne, trembling with anger, "these proofs of a secret correspondence with her Majesty will cause the cardinal's head to fall on the scaffold!"

At that moment the door was opened, and the cardinal, superb in his wrath, appeared on the threshold. "You may cause the head of a Rohan to fall on the scaffold, Madame," he said; "it will not be the first time the Bastille has witnessed that spectacle. But if that is to be, I declare to you that I shall not reproach the scaffold on which my head shall roll, provided I may see that on which you will be branded as a thief and a forger. Come, Abbé, come!"

The cardinal turned his back to Jeanne, and going out with the almoner, left to the companionship of rage and despair that miserable creature who could make no movement without sinking deeper into that deadly slough in which she was soon to be covered out of sight.

CHAPTER LIII.

THE BAPTISM OF LITTLE BEAUSIRE.

MADAME DE LA MOTTE had failed in all her calculations; Cagliostro had failed in none of his. On his imprisonment he perceived that he had at last a pretext for open war on that monarchy which for so many years he had sought to undermine. He then got ready the material for that famous letter from London which appeared about a month later, and was the first blow on the walls of the old Bastille, the first hostile act of the Revolution, the first shock preceding that of July 14, 1789.

In that letter Cagliostro said: "I am asked if I shall ever return to France. Assuredly I shall — when the Bastille shall have become a public promenade. God speed the day!"

Oliva meanwhile allowed not a word to escape her lips which might compromise her protector. What she said was injurious to Madame de La Motte alone; she openly and clearly set forth her innocent participation in a hoax intended, she said, for a gentleman whose name was Louis.

While the captives were in prison Oliva had not seen her dear Beausire; but she had not been altogether abandoned by him, as will be seen. She had the memorial of her lover for which Dido longed when she said, "Ah, if I might only have a little Ascanius playing on my knees!"

In the month of May, 1786, a man was waiting on the steps of the porch of Saint Paul's Church. He appeared to be agitated, and was looking steadily toward the Bastille. One of Cagliostro's German servants came and stood beside him. This man tried to check Beausire's wild impatience, saying to him, in a low tone, "Wait, wait; they will come."

"Ah," said Beausire, "it is you!"

As Beausire, still not satisfied with "They will come," continued to gesticulate beyond all reason, the German whispered to him, "You will attract the police. My master promised you news; I am here to give it to you."

"Give it! give it, my friend!"

"Lower. The mother and child are doing well."

"Oh! oh!" cried Beausire, in an indescribable transport of joy. "She is delivered! She is safe!"

"Yes, Monsieur; but I beg you, let us go aside."

"Is it a girl?"

"No, Monsieur, a boy."

"So much the better. Oh, my friend, how happy I am! how happy I am! My hearty thanks to your master. Tell him that my life, — all that I have is his. But why did you say, 'They will come'? Who will come?"

"The physician of the Bastille and the nurse."

"They are coming here? — and for what?"

"To have the child baptized."

"I am to see my child!" cried Beausire, jumping about. "Do you say that I shall see Oliva's son? — here, immediately?"

"Here, immediately; but be calm, I beg! Patience!"

Beausire drew nearer to the German. "Is she comfortable?" he asked, clasping his hands.

"Very comfortable," replied the other. "Oh, here is a carriage coming!"

"Yes, yes!"

"It stops —"

"There is something white — lace —"

"The child's mantle."

"My God!" and Beausire was obliged to support himself against one of the pillars as he saw alighting from the carriage the nurse, the physician, and one of the Bastille turnkeys. After they had entered, Beausire followed them. The priest, recognizing the nurse and the physician, who had come to him on several occasions like this, greeted them with a bow and a smile. Beausire bowed and smiled with the priest.

The door of the sacristy was then closed, and the priest began to write the words of registration. When he asked the name of the child, the physician said, "It is a boy, and that is all I know about it."

Four bursts of laughter accented these words, which seemed to Beausire not very respectful.

"He must have some kind of a name, if only the name of a saint," said the priest.

"Yes; the young lady wishes him to be called Toussaint."

"There they are then, all of them," replied the priest, with an hilarious burst of laughter at his pun.

Beausire began to lose patience, but the German restrained him.

"Well," said the priest, "with such a name as that, with all the saints for his patrons, we can get along without a father. Let us write: To-day is presented a male child, born yesterday at the Bastille, son of Nicole Oliva Legay and — father unknown."

Beausire darted to the priest's side, and seizing him by the wrist, cried out, "Toussaint has a father as well as a mother; he has a tender father, who will not deny his own offspring. Write, I pray you, that Toussaint, born yesterday of Mademoiselle Nicole Oliva Legay, is the son of Jean Baptiste Toussaint de Beausire, here present!"

The astonishment caused by these words may readily be conceived. The pen fell from the hands of the priest, and the child almost fell from the arms of the nurse. Beausire received it in his own, covered it with eager kisses, and dropped on its brow the baptism of paternal tears.

The spectators, accustomed though they were to dramatic scenes, were much affected, — except the priest, who maintained his composure, and even expressed doubts as to the statements made by Beausire. Beausire placed on the font three louis d'or, which were more effective than his tears in establishing his good faith and the fact of his paternity. The priest bowed, and pocketed the money, and requested Beausire to write in the registry his declaration that he was the child's father.

"I!" cried Beausire, "why, I would write it with my blood!" and he seized the pen with joyous eagerness.

"Take care!" said the turnkey Guyon; "it is dangerous to write in public registers!"

"Thanks for your advice, friend!" said Beausire, proudly; "but to deny the son of my wife — "

"Your wife?" cried the physician.

"Legitimate?" cried the priest.

"May God restore her to liberty," said Beausire, trembling with joy, "and the next day Nicole Legay will take the name of De Beausire."

"Meantime you are running a risk!" said Guyon. "I think they are looking for you."

All agreed, however, not to betray him.

Beausire wrote his declaration in verbose and magniloquent terms, as if narrating an exploit of which he was proud. Then, having read anew the completed certificate, he embraced his son, slipped ten louis under his mantle, suspended from his neck a ring designed for the mother, and proud as Xenophon on his retreat, he opened the door of the sacristry, and marched forth without any precaution of concealment.

The witnesses of the baptism also withdrew and regained their carriage, still astonished by the adventure. Beausire stood looking after them, sent several kisses to his son, and when the carriage had disappeared, retreated to an asylum known only to himself, Cagliostro, and Monsieur de Crosne, — that is to say, Monsieur de Crosne fulfilled a promise he had made to Cagliostro, and left Beausire undisturbed.

When the child was taken back to the Bastille, and the nurse had informed Oliva of these surprising adventures, the latter, putting Beausire's ring on her thickest finger, began to weep, and said, "I will at least be a good mother!"

CHAPTER LIV.

THE STOOL OF INTERROGATION.

THE day at last arrived when the judgment of the court of parliament was to be invoked by the concluding speech of the procureur-general.

The bearing of the accused was as before: Oliva was frank and timid; Cagliostro, calm and superior; Villette, downcast and in tears; Jeanne, insolent, threatening, and venomous; the cardinal, unaffected, meditative, absent-minded.

In the public mind the question still was, which of the two accused persons had stolen the necklace? This question involved another: Had the queen just reason for her accusation of the cardinal? and this was, politically, a question of importance. Had Monsieur de Rohan believed that he had the right to speak to the queen as he had spoken to her; to act in her name as he had acted? Had he been, in fact, a secret agent of Marie Antoinette, — an agent repudiated as soon as the affair made a noise?

In a word, had the cardinal acted in good faith, as a confidant of the queen? If he had acted in good faith, the queen must have been implicated in those intimacies which she had denied, and which Madame de La Motte had insinuated to have existed.

The procureur-general began his speech. He was the organ of the court, and spoke in the name of outraged royal dignity. He demanded that Villette should be condemned to the galleys; that Jeanne de La Motte should be branded, scourged, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment; that Cagliostro and Oliva should be dismissed from the case; and that the cardinal should be compelled to acknowledge himself guilty of language offensive to royal Majesty, and then should be banished from the presence of the king and queen, and deprived of his offices and dignities.

This demand divided the parliament, and terrified the accused. The royal will had been so strongly expressed that had the demand been uttered twenty-five years earlier, though then already parliament had begun to vindicate its prerogative, the idea of the infallibility of the throne would have prevailed. But fourteen counsellors, only, adopted in full the conclusions of the procureur-general, and there was a division in the assembly.

The last examination of the accused was then entered upon, — a formality almost useless under existing circumstances. The custom was that the accused should appear before the judges on a small wooden seat, dishonored by the contact of those who had passed from it to the scaffold. The forger Villette occupied it first, who begged for pardon with prayers and tears. No one took any interest in him; he was, and appeared to be, only a rascal of the common sort. Dismissed by the court, he went weeping to his prison-cell.

Then came Madame de La Motte, who made a strong impression on the assembly. She had been already exposed to the first of the insults to which she was to be subjected; she had been compelled to ascend by the small stairway, like a common criminal. The heat and noise and general movement troubled her at first, and her eyes were unsteady. Then the officer who had her in charge led her quickly to the stool placed at the centre of the half-circle, which bore some resemblance to the block on a scaffold. On seeing that she was expected to occupy that degrading seat, Jeanne de La Motte, who proudly called herself Valois, and as she thought controlled the fortunes of a queen of France, turned pale, and cast angry glances about her, as if to intimidate the judges who would permit that outrage. Seeing however no indication of sympathy on the faces around her, she placed herself, almost fainting, on the stool of interrogation.

In the examination that followed, Jeanne still pursued her method of vague insinuation against the queen. Of her own innocence she spoke more decidedly; and she managed to draw from the examining judge an inquiry as to the letters which were said to have been interchanged between the queen and the cardinal.

Jeanne, in reply, declared that she was unwilling to say anything which might compromise the queen, and that no one could answer on that subject better than the cardinal himself. "Ask him," she said, "to produce those letters, or copies of them; read them, and satisfy your curiosity. As to myself, I cannot affirm whether those letters were written by the queen and by the cardinal. They seem to me, on the one hand, too free and familiar to have been written by a sovereign to a subject, and on the other hand too irreverent to have been written by a subject to a queen."

The deep, significant silence which followed this attack might have warned Jeanne that she had succeeded only in arousing horror in the minds of her enemies, terror in the minds of her partisans, and incredulity in the minds of her impartial judges. She left the stool of interrogation with the pleasing hope that the cardinal too must sit on it. That revenge would almost have satisfied her. But on turning back for a last look at the degrading seat which she was forcing a Rohan to occupy, she saw that it had been removed and that an arm-chair stood in its place. She uttered a cry of rage, and hastened from the hall in frenzied excitement.

The cardinal arrived in his carriage, attended by the governor of the Bastille. On his entrance he was greeted by a murmur of respect and sympathy. He was pale, and somewhat agitated. He manifested in his demeanor that respect and condescension due to judges from an accused person who accepts and invokes their jurisdiction. When he began to speak, his trembling utterance, broken by sighs, and his humble bearing moved his audience to sympathy. He spoke slowly, offered excuses rather than proofs, supplications rather than arguments, and at length stopping short, — he the man of eloquent speech! — by that paralysis of mind and courage produced more effect than all the advocates with all their arguments had produced.

After the cardinal, came Oliva. The most ardent haters of the monarchy were shocked on seeing the living copy of Marie Antoinette queen of France sitting on the stool of thieves and forgers.

Then came Cagliostro, the least guilty of all. He was not asked to sit, though the arm-chair remained by the side of the stool. The court feared to question him, and he was speedily dismissed.

The court then announced that the trial was at an end, and their deliberations would begin immediately. The crowd slowly withdrew along the streets and the quays, intending to return soon to hear the judgment, which all agreed could not be long delayed.

CHAPTER LV.

A WAY OF ESCAPE.

WHILE the cardinal, on the terraces of the Bastille, discussed with Cagliostro the probable result of their defence; while Oliva, in her cell, caressed her child; and Reteau, in his, thought of the crowns promised by Monsieur de Crosne, — Jeanne, having retired to the room of the keeper's wife, Madame Hubert, endeavored to soothe her agitation by noise and action.

This room, high and large like a hall, was lighted by a large window looking toward the quay and covered by an iron grating. Here Madame de La Motte spent the days of her imprisonment in company with Madame Hubert, her son, and her husband. She had won their sympathy; she had managed to persuade them that the queen was very guilty. A day was to come when in that same hall another keeper, pitying the misfortunes of another prisoner, would believe her innocent because so gentle and so kind, — and that prisoner would be the queen.

Madame de La Motte, then, was proposing to forget, in the society of her friends, the troubles which assailed her, and repay them by her gay humor for the kindness they had shown her. But she found them anxious and embarrassed. Alarmed by this she sought to elicit an explanation from Madame Hubert; but she and those with her were noncommittal.

Jeanne perceived, in a corner by the fireplace, an abbé who was an occasional guest of the house. He had been secretary of the preceptor of Monsieur le Comte de Provence. He was a man of simple manners, though somewhat cynical. After a long-continued absence from Madame Hubert's house, he had become a frequent visitor there since the arrival of Madame de La Motte.

"I am sure," said Jeanne, "that they are talking more freely up yonder than we are talking here."

These words were greeted with a feeble murmur of assent.

"Up yonder?" said the abbé, feigning ignorance, "where, Madame la Comtesse?"

"In the hall where my judges are in consultation."

"Oh, yes, yes," said the abbé. And again there was silence.

"I think," Jeanne resumed, "that my course to-day produced a good effect. Do you not think it did?"

"Why, yes, Madame," timidly replied the keeper; and he rose as if to go out.

"What is your opinion?" asked Jeanne, turning to the abbé. "Does not the affair look well for me? They have brought forward no evidence."

"It is true, Madame," said the abbé, "you have much to hope; and yet suppose that the king —"

"Well, the king; what will he do?"

"Eh, Madame! the king cannot consent to be found in the wrong."

"He must then have Monsieur de Rohan condemned, and that is impossible."

"That indeed is improbable."

"But in this cause," Jeanne hastened to say, "the cardinal and I are in the same situation."

"Not at all," replied the abbé; "you are mistaken, Madame. One of the accused will be absolved, — but only one. A culprit is necessary to the king; otherwise what will become of the queen?"

"It is true," said Jeanne, in a dull tone. "The king needs a culprit; well, Monsieur de Rohan will serve the purpose as well as I."

A silence ensued, alarming to the countess. The abbé was the first to speak. "Madame," he said, "the king does not bear malice, and when his first anger is satisfied he will forget all that has happened."

"But what do you call a satisfied anger?" asked Jeanne, ironically.

"A condemnation — any — would be a satisfaction."

"Any, Monsieur!" cried Jeanne, "that is a fearful word. Any! why that means every!"

"Oh, I speak only of seclusion in a convent," replied the abbé, coldly. "That is the idea, according to rumor, which the king is likely to adopt in reference to you."

Jeanne looked at him with terror, which soon gave place to furious excitement.

"Seclusion in a convent!" she exclaimed. "That is to say, a lingering death which shall appear to be an act of clemency! Tortures of hunger, of cold, of penances! No; enough of punishment, enough of shame, enough of suffering for the innocent, while the guilty one is powerful, free, honored! Death, rather, at once; but the death I choose to punish myself with for having been born into this infamous world!"

Uttering these words Jeanne rushed to the sideboard to seize a knife. The keeper, Madame Hubert, and the abbé threw themselves upon her, and prevented her reaching it. She then, with cries too violent to be natural, rushed into an adjoining cabinet, seized an enormous porcelain vase, and struck her head with it repeatedly. The vase was shattered, and Jeanne's face was covered with blood. They got her into a chair, and bathed her with perfumed waters and vinegar. She had fainted, after frightful convulsions.

When she came to herself the abbé thought she was suffocating. "See," he said, "that grating intercepts light and air. Can we not give the poor woman a chance to breathe?"

Madame Hubert, forgetting everything, ran to a closet in the chimney, and took out a key with which she opened the grating.

"Ah!" said the abbé, "I was not aware that the grating could be thus opened with a key. Why in the world are such precautions needed?"

"It is the order," replied the keeper.

"Yes, I understand," said the abbé, significantly; "that window is only seven feet from the ground; it opens on the quay. Were prisoners to escape from your room they would find themselves at liberty without meeting either turnkey or sentinel."

"Precisely," said the keeper.

The abbé remarked that Madame de La Motte had heard and understood; that she had started even, and that she had raised her eyes to the closet, fastened only by a brass button, where the keeper deposited the key to the grating. That was all he wanted. His presence seemed no longer needed. He took leave; but coming back he said, "What a crowd there is in the square! All go with such eagerness in that direction that not a soul is left on the quay."

The keeper leaned out. "It is true," said he.

"Is it not thought," continued the abbé, speaking always as if Madame de La Motte could not hear him, — but she heard every word, — "is it not expected that the judgment will be rendered during the night? That cannot be, — can it?"

"I do not imagine," said the keeper, "that it will be rendered before to-morrow morning."

"Well, then," continued the abbé, "try to let that poor Madame de La Motte have a little rest; she must need it."

"Let us withdraw to our chamber," said the worthy keeper to his wife, "and leave Madame here in the easy-chair, — unless she prefers going to bed."

Jeanne, on the point of rising, met the eye of the abbé, who was watching for her reply. She fell back, and feigned sleepiness. The abbé then retired, and the keeper and his wife also went out, after quietly locking the grating, and putting back the key in its place.

As soon as she was alone Jeanne opened her eyes. "The abbé advises me to flee," she thought. "Could any one more clearly point out the necessity of flight, and the means? To threaten me with condemnation before judgment is rendered, is the act of a friend who urges me to recover my liberty. I have only to open that closet, then that grating, and I shall be on the deserted quay. To escape! Oh, liberty! — the joy of recovering my riches, of repaying to my enemies all that I have suffered!" She darted to the closet, seized the key, and drew near to the lock of the grating. Suddenly she thought she saw on the bridge the dark form of a man. "Some one is there," she said to herself; "perhaps the abbé, awaiting my escape; he is ready to help me. Yes, but if it were a trap; if, descending to the quay, I should be surprised in the attempt to escape? Flight is confession of crime, — at least, of fear. Whence comes that man! He seems to be connected with Monsieur de Provence; but he may be an emissary of the queen, or of the Rohans. They would pay heavily for a false move on my part — Yes, some one is there, watching! To make me escape some hours before the judgment! My God! may it not be that my enemies have information of my acquittal? Who knows but they wish to parry that terrible blow to the queen by a proof, or a confession of my guilt? That proof, that confession, would be afforded by my flight; I will remain."

Jeanne from that moment remained convinced that she had escaped a snare. She smiled, and with a firm step went to the closet, and placed in it the key of the grating. Then drawing her arm-chair nearer to the window, she watched that man who waited for her, and who at length disappeared as the first rays of daylight enabled her to distinguish the water of the river from the river-banks.

CHAPTER LVI.

THE JUDGMENT.

On the morning of the next day Jeanne awaited, with sanguine expectation, the news of her acquittal and release. She was not allowed to go out in search of information; but placing herself at the window she listened anxiously to the sounds from the neighboring square. Soon she heard a noisy outbreak of cries, bravos, and clapping of hands, — a noise which frightened her, for she could not imagine that it was for her that so much sympathy was declared.

"A fine day for the cardinal!" said a sort of attorney's clerk, as he passed by.

"For the cardinal!" Jeanne repeated. "There is news then that the cardinal is acquitted." She returned hastily to the hall. "Madame, Madame!" she said to the woman Hubert, "what is this I hear? — 'a fine day for the cardinal!' What is the meaning of that?"

"I do not know," replied Madame Hubert.

Jeanne looked at her steadily. "Ask your husband, I beg of you!" she said.

Madame Hubert did as requested, and her husband replied from without, "I do not know."

"What then," said Jeanne, impatiently, "could those passers-by mean? They of course were speaking with reference to the trial."

"Perhaps they meant," said the kind-hearted Hubert, "that if Monsieur de Rohan should be acquitted it would be a fine day for him."

"Do you think he will be acquitted?" cried Jeanne, clinching her hands.

"That may happen."

"I, also?"

"Oh, you, Madame, — you as well as he; why not?"

Jeanne returned to the window.

"I think you are wrong, Madame," said the keeper, "in thus exposing yourself to emotions arising from distorted information. Why not wait quietly till your counsel, or Monsieur Frémyn, arrives to read to you — "

"The judgment — No! no!" and she continued to listen.

A woman was passing with friends. "He shall have my bouquet," she cried, "and a hundred others, the dear man! Oh, if I can I will kiss him!"

"And I, too," said a companion.

"I would like to have him kiss me," said a third.

"Of whom can they be speaking?" thought Jeanne.

"He is a handsome man; you do not show bad taste," said another of the company, and they passed on.

"Still the cardinal!" murmured Jeanne. "He is acquitted! he is acquitted!"

"Eh, Madame!" said Hubert and his wife, speaking together, "why should you not wish a poor prisoner to be set free?"

Jeanne, unwilling to lose their sympathy, hastened to say, "You do not understand me. Can you believe me so wicked as to wish harm to my companions in misfortune? Oh, yes! may the cardinal be acquitted; but let me know at least what is decided in regard to me. Believe me, my friends, it is my impatience that makes me appear as I do."

Hubert and his wife looked at each other as if to measure the extent of the information they would impart. A flash of light from Jeanne's eyes stopped them as they were on the point of speaking.

"You tell me nothing?" she cried, perceiving her mistake.

"We know nothing," they replied, in a low tone.

At that moment Hubert was called out of the room. His wife, remaining alone with the captive, sought to divert her attention. But in vain. All Jeanne's intelligence was devoted to catching the sounds that came to her from without.

Suddenly there was a great noise in the square, accompanied by a tumultuous rush of the crowd. The shouts were continuous; they seemed to be directed toward a covered carriage drawn by two horses, which were so impeded by the crowd that they could move only slowly. The countess recognized the two men who were the objects of that enthusiasm. They were the Cardinal de Rohan and the Comte de Cagliostro.

That manifestation of public sympathy with the victims of the queen — for so they were called — inspired Jeanne with a transient joy. But then, "What!" said she, "they are already free, — and I, I know nothing! Why is it that I can learn nothing?" She shuddered.

Another noise of shouting drew her attention toward the Pont-au-Change. A carriage, surrounded by a multitude, was descending the hill toward the bridge. In the carriage Jeanne recognized Oliva, smiling and holding up her child, — Oliva, rejoicing in her freedom, and enjoying also the pleasantries addressed to her (a little free sometimes) and the kisses that were sent to the fresh-looking, attractive girl. On the bridge a post-chaise was waiting. In it Monsieur Beausire was hiding behind one of his friends, who alone ventured to expose himself to the public admiration. The latter made a sign to Oliva, who descended from her carriage, and getting into the post-chaise fell into the arms of Beausire, who almost stifled her in his embrace, and covered her with tears and kisses. Nor did he breathe freely until at Saint Denis they changed horses, without having been disturbed by the police.

Meantime Jeanne, seeing all these persons at liberty, happy, honored, asked why she alone received no news. "By what refinement of cruelty do they withhold from me that part of the judgment which concerns me?"

"Calm yourself, Madame," said Hubert, entering the room, — "calm yourself."

"It is impossible that you do not know. You know! you know! Tell me!"

"Madame —"

"If you are not a savage, tell me! You see how I suffer!"

"We are forbidden, Madame, to reveal judgments, the reading of which is the duty of the clerk of the courts."

"Why, then, it is so frightful that you do not dare to tell it!" cried Jeanne, in a transport of rage which alarmed the keeper.

"No," said he; "calm yourself, — calm yourself."

"Speak, then!"

"Will you be patient, and will you do nothing to compromise me?"

"I promise, I swear it, — speak!"

"Very well; Monsieur le Cardinal is acquitted."

"I know it."

"Monsieur de Cagliostro is discharged."

"I know it! I know it!"

"Mademoiselle Oliva is dropped from the accusation."

"Go on! go on!"

"Monsieur Reteau de Villette is condemned to the galleys."

"And I? and I?" cried Jeanne, in great excitement.

"Patience, Madame, patience. Is this what you promised me?"

"I am patient; come, speak! what of me?"

"Banishment!" said the keeper, in a low voice, turning away his eyes.

A flash of joy shone in the eyes of the countess, which she immediately extinguished. Then, with a loud cry, she pretended to faint, and fell into the arms of her friends.

"What then would have been the consequence," whispered Hubert to his wife, "if I had told her the truth?"

"Banishment!" thought Jeanne, while pretending she was ill, — "it is liberty, wealth, vengeance; it is all that I have hoped. I have won!"

CHAPTER LVII.

THE PUNISHMENT.

JEANNE was still awaiting the arrival of the clerk who, according to the keeper, would read the sentence pronounced against her. Released from the agony of suspense, she was saying to herself, "What matters it to me that Monsieur de Rohan has been adjudged less guilty than I? Do they punish me for a fault? No. Had I been duly recognized as a Valois; had I been able, like the cardinal, to hedge myself about with princes and dukes, — they would have refused nothing to the poor Comtesse de La Motte, and certainly would have spared the descendant of the Valois the disgrace of the stool of interrogation.

"But why occupy myself with the past, which is dead? Here ends the great business of my life. Banished! I am banished; that is to say, I can carry my million whither I will, and nothing can hinder me — young, beautiful, celebrated — from living as I please, either with my husband, if he too is banished (and I know that he is free), or with the friends that youth and fortune always provide.

"Let any one say to me, then, — to me the condemned; to me the banished; to me the disgraced, — that I am not richer than the queen, more honored, more fully acquitted. For she was not concerned for my condemnation; the earth-worm is of no consequence to the lion. She was concerned to have Monsieur de Rohan condemned, and Monsieur de Rohan is acquitted.

"Now how will they proceed to communicate to me my sentence, and have me conducted out of the kingdom? Will they revenge themselves on a woman by subjecting her to a strict execution of the law? Will they put me in the keeping of archers to be taken to the frontier? Will some one say to me solemnly, 'Unworthy one, the king banishes you from his kingdom'? No, my masters are good-natured; they wish me no harm. Their anger is directed against the good people of Paris who shout under their windows, 'Long live Monsieur le Cardinal!' 'Long live Cagliostro!' 'Long live the parliament!' Oh, yes; that is their real enemy, — the people. I counted on the moral support of public opinion, — and I have succeeded!"

At this point in her meditations a recollection of Reteau de Villette crossed her mind. "Poor fellow!" she said, with a wicked smile. "It is he who pays for all. Always some paltry soul is needed for expiation, and the emergency which calls it up devours it. Poor Reteau! The wretched creature now pays for his diatribes against the queen, and for his forgeries. God, who allots to every one his part in the world, appointed to him beatings, intermittent louis d'or, ambuscades, concealments, and at last the galleys. This is the fate of trickery without intelligence, of cunning without boldness, of aggression without perseverance and strength."

Jeanne took dinner with her keepers in a very happy state of mind; but they had wholly lost their cheerfulness; they did not even affect to conceal their embarrassment. Jeanne attributed this coldness to the condemnation pronounced against her, and said so to them. They replied that nothing was sadder to them than the sight of those against whom sentence had been pronounced.

Jeanne was so happy that she wished to be alone; and she intended, after dinner, to retire at once to her chamber. She was agreeably surprised when Hubert said to her, with solemn constraint, "Madame, we are under orders not to keep with us persons who have been condemned by parliament."

"Good!" said Jeanne to herself; "he anticipates my wishes." She rose from the table. "I should not wish," she said, "to involve you in disobedience; that would be a poor return for all your kindness. I will therefore retire to my chamber."

She watched for the effect of these words. Hubert rolled a key in his fingers. His wife turned her head away, as if to hide her emotion.

"But," added the countess, "where will they come to read me my sentence; and when?"

"They are waiting, perhaps, till Madame shall be in her own room," Hubert hastened to say.

"Decidedly," thought Jeanne, "he sends me away." A vague feeling of anxiety troubled her for a moment, but was immediately dismissed.

Seeing that Jeanne was leaving, Madame Hubert went up to her quickly, and seized her hands, with an impulse of pity which did not escape the countess's observation. This time she felt something like fright, but this feeling also she easily banished from a soul full of joy and hope. Nevertheless, she would have liked to ask Madame Hubert for an explanation of her pity. She opened her mouth for that purpose; but Hubert took her hand, with more decision than politeness, and led her to the door.

The countess found in the corridor eight archers waiting, — she wondered for whom, or for what. In advance of the archers was the turnkey who every evening conducted her to her chamber. He went on before Jeanne, as if to show her the way.

"I am to return to my room?" asked the countess.

"Yes, Madame," replied the turnkey.

Jeanne took hold of the iron railing and ascended the stairs, preceded by the man. Reassured, she suffered herself to be locked in her chamber, and even thanked the turnkey, who immediately withdrew.

As soon as she was alone, Jeanne began to give vent to the joy she had so long concealed. Suddenly she heard steps in the corridor, the jingling of keys, a key in the lock of her door.

"What now?" thought she, lifting her head and listening.

The turnkey entered.

"What is it, Jean?" asked Jeanne, in her gentle, careless tone.

"Will Madame please to follow me?" said he.

"Whither?"

"Downstairs, Madame."

"Downstairs, — what do you mean?"

"To the office."

"For what, if you please?"

"Madame —"

Jeanne took a step toward him, as he hesitated, and then she saw, in the corridor, the archers whom she had noticed before. "Come," she said, with some agitation, "tell me why they summon me to the office."

"Madame, Monsieur Doillot your counsel is there, and wishes to see you."

"At the office? Why not here?"

"Madame, Monsieur Doillot has received letters from Versailles, which he wishes to communicate to you."

Jeanne failed to notice that this reply was no answer. "Letters from Versailles!" she said to herself, — "from the court! Has the queen, then, interceded for me? Is it possible that — But why waste time in guessing, when in two minutes I can know the truth?" Then, to the turnkey, "Wait for me a moment while I arrange my dress."

"I will wait, Madame; but I beg you to consider that Monsieur Doillot has but little time to spare."

Jeanne closed the door, and in five minutes had completed her preparations, in such eager haste was she to receive the expected order for her departure. She followed the turnkey downstairs in the excitement of joyous anticipation; but instead of turning to the left, toward the office, the turnkey turned toward a small door at the right.

"Where are you going, then?" Jeanne asked. "The office is not there."

"Come, come, Madame," said the turnkey, in a coaxing manner, "this is the way to the place where Monsieur Doillot is awaiting you." He passed through in advance, drawing after him the prisoner, who heard the door close, and bolts on the outside pushed noisily to their places. She was surprised, but seeing no one in the darkness, hazarded no questions. She took two or three steps forward, and stopped. By aid of a faint light, penetrating an iron grating covered with spiders' webs and dust, she discovered that she was in a dungeon, alone with her conductor

"Monsieur," she said, subduing her terror, "why are we here? Where is Monsieur Doillot, to whom you were to conduct me?"

The turnkey made no reply. He turned around as if to see whether the door by which they had entered was securely closed. Jeanne followed this movement with terror. The idea came to her that she had to do with one of those amorous jailers described in the romances of the period, who, when their prey is about to escape them, constitute themselves tyrannic masters of the fair captive, and offer liberty in exchange for love.

Jeanne was strong, and had no fear of being taken by surprise; nor was she encumbered by modesty. She approached the turnkey, smiling, and said, "My friend, what do you want? Have you something to say to me? The time of a prisoner within reach of liberty is precious. It is an ugly sort of rendezvous you have selected for your conversation with me."

The turnkey did not understand her, and made no reply. He sat down and waited.

"But," said Jeanne, "I ask you again, why are we here?" She began to think the man was crazy.

"We are waiting for Monsieur Doillot," replied the turnkey.

Jeanne shook her head. "Monsieur has chosen badly his time and place for communicating to me the letters from Versailles. It is not possible that he should make me wait here. No; there is something else."

She had hardly spoken these words when a door, which she had not noticed, was opened in front of her. Beyond this door was an obscure passage, and beyond that Jeanne caught a momentary glimpse of an open place thronged with eager-looking men and women. Three men appeared at the door. Behind them Jeanne could see four bayonets. The three men entered the dungeon, and the door was closed.

Jeanne passed from surprise to surprise, — or rather, from anxiety to terror. Her name was called before she had recovered herself sufficiently to exclaim. He who called her name was the youngest of the three men. He was dressed in black, kept his hat on his head, and held in his hand a roll of papers. "You are, Madame," he said, "Jeanne de Saint-Rémy de Valois, married to Marie Antoine Nicolas, Comte de La Motte?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"You were born at Fontette, July 22, 1756?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"You reside at Paris, in the Rue Saint Claude?"

"Yes, Monsieur; but why these questions?"

"Madame, I am sorry that you do not recognize me; I have the honor to be the clerk of the court."

"I recognize you."

"Then, Madame, I may perform the duty of my office, recognized by you."

"To what, if you please, does your official duty call you?"

"To read to you, Madame, the sentence pronounced against you by the court."

Jeanne shuddered. "You are," she said, "Breton the clerk; but who are these two gentlemen with you?"

The clerk was about to answer, when the turnkey, moved by pity or by apprehension, rushed to him and whispered, "Don't tell her!"

Jeanne heard him, and looked at those two men more attentively. Their aspect frightened her, and she recoiled.

The clerk went nearer to her, and said, "On your knees, Madame, if you please."

"On my knees!" cried Jeanne, — "on my knees! — I, a Valois, on my knees!"

"It is the order, Madame," said the clerk, bowing.

"But, Monsieur, one is obliged to kneel only after being sentenced to a degrading punishment, and banishment is not so regarded in the law of France."

"I have not told you, Madame, that you were condemned to banishment," said the clerk, in a tone of sadness.

"To what, then, am I condemned?" cried Jeanne.

"You will learn that by listening to the sentence, Madame; and you will first, if you please, kneel down."

"Never! never!"

"Madame, it is ordered that if the condemned refuses to kneel, force must be employed —"

"Force! — to a woman?"

"A woman has no more right than a man to fail in respect to the king and the law."

"And to the queen!" cried Jeanne, furiously, "for I recognize in this the hand of an angry woman."

"You are wrong in accusing the queen, Madame. She has nothing to do with the judgments of the court. Come, Madame, I entreat; spare us the necessity of violence. On your knees!"

"Never! never! never!"

The clerk made a sign to the two men who had entered with him, who thereupon seized Jeanne, and dragged her to the middle of the dungeon in spite of her cries and shrieks.

"It is useless to cry out in this way," said the clerk; "no one outside can hear you, and you cannot hear me read the sentence."

"Allow me to hear it standing, and I will listen in silence," said Jeanne, panting.

"Whenever a culprit is to be whipped," said the clerk, "the punishment —"

"Whipped!" shrieked Jeanne, — "whipped! Ah, you scoundrel, whipped!"

Her cries became so appalling that all the men, bewildered, thought only of meeting force by force; they threw themselves upon Jeanne, and forced her down. But she resisted victoriously; when they would place her in a kneeling posture, she made her muscles as stiff as steel, meanwhile inflicting serious wounds with her feet and hands. One of the men took hold of her feet, and held them as in a vice. Two others held her by the wrists, and all called on the clerk to read the sentence.

"I will never allow a sentence to be read that condemns me to infamy," cried Jeanne, struggling with superhuman strength; and she uttered such cries and shrieks that she could not hear a word of what was read to her. When she thought he had finished, she became silent, and sought to recover strength for a renewal of the struggle.

"And," calmly continued the clerk, "the sentence is to be executed, as usual, in the court-yard of the Palace of Justice."

"Publicly!" howled the unhappy woman. "Oh—"

"Monsieur de Paris," said the clerk, to one of the men with him, "I place this woman in your hands."

"Who, then, is that man?" asked Jeanne, in a last paroxysm of rage and terror.

"The executioner," said the clerk, bowing and readjusting his ruffles.

The two men took hold of Jeanne, and lifted her up to carry her toward the passage-way which she had seen when the door was opened. It is impossible to describe the resistance she made. That woman, who ordinarily would have fainted on receiving the slightest wound, sustained for nearly an hour the harsh treatment and the blows of the executioner and his assistant. She was dragged to the outer door without ceasing for a moment to utter the most frightful cries.

Beyond this door was the court-yard, to which a crowd of two or three thousand spectators had been drawn by the erection of the scaffold. From every direction cries arose, "Here she is! here she is!" together with epithets not complimentary to the condemned, and here and there remarks not very considerate of the judges. For Jeanne had calculated correctly; since her condemnation, fixing her attitude of hostility to the queen, a party had been formed in her favor.

But Monsieur de Crosne had taken his precautions. The front rows were occupied by spectators who were devoted to those who paid the expenses of the spectacle. The anger against the queen had been utilized in her favor; the supporters of the cardinal hooted Jeanne, who had separated her cause from his. So that on her appearance there were loud cries of, "Down with La Motte! down with the forger!"

Jeanne was almost at the end of her strength, but not at the end of her rage. In her clear, vibrating, metallic voice she launched a few words which, as if by enchantment, stilled the noisy murmurs. "Do you know who I am?" she said. "Do you know that I am of the blood of your kings? Do you know that in me they strike at, not a culprit, but a rival? — not a rival only, but an accomplice?"

Here she was interrupted by the cries of persons in Monsieur de Crosne's employment. But she had awakened curiosity, if not interest; and the curiosity of a mob is a thirst that must be assuaged. The silence proved to Jeanne that they wished to hear more.

"Yes," she repeated, "an accomplice! In me they punish one who knows the secrets of —"

"Be careful!" whispered the clerk.

She turned around. The executioner held a whip in his hand. "Mercy! mercy!" she cried, in a heart-rending tone.

The hootings of the crowd drowned her voice. Jeanne clung to the executioner's knees, and succeeded in getting hold of his hand; but he raised the other hand, and let the whip fall gently on the countess's shoulders. Strange to say, when she found that the executioner was sparing her, she rushed upon his assistant, and sought to overcome him, and throw herself from the scaffold. But suddenly she sprang back. This man held in his hand a red-hot iron which he had that moment withdrawn from a brazier. He raised this iron, and Jeanne started back with a wild cry. "Branded!" she exclaimed, — "branded!"

The mob replied by a terrible cry. "Yes! yes!" roared three thousand mouths.

"Help! help!" cried Jeanne, beside herself, trying to break the cords with which they had bound her hands.

Meantime the executioner was tearing, being unable to open, the dress of the countess, and while with a trembling hand he parted the torn material he tried to seize the hot iron offered by his assistant. But Jeanne rushed upon the assistant, making him draw back, for he did not dare to touch her; so that the executioner, unable to grasp the sinister implement, expected from the crowd some denunciation of himself. The multitude, excited, and beginning to admire that vigorous defence, manifested their impatience; the confusion became threatening.

"Make an end of it," cried a voice from the front ranks, — an imperious voice, which doubtless the executioner recognized; for by a mighty effort he threw Jeanne down, bending her nearly double, and with his left hand, inclining her head. She sprang up again, more heated than the iron with which she was threatened, and in a voice that rose above the tumult, "Cowardly Frenchmen!" she cried, "you do not defend me! You suffer me to be tortured!"

"Be silent!" said the clerk.

"Be silent!" said the commissary.

"Silent! Ah, yes!" replied Jeanne. "To what does silence bring me? Yes, I submit to the disgrace; it is my own fault."

"Ah! ah! ah!" cried the crowd, not understanding her meaning.

"Be silent!" repeated the clerk.

"Yes, my fault," said Jeanne, still struggling; "for if I had been willing to speak out —"

"Be silent!" roared the clerk, the commissary, and the executioners.

"Had I been willing to tell all I know about the queen, — well, I might have been hanged, but I should not have been dishonored."

She could say no more; for the commissary leaped upon the scaffold, followed by agents of the police who gagged the unhappy woman, and delivered her, palpitating, bruised, her face swollen, livid, bleeding, to the two executioners. One of these again bent down his victim, at the same time seizing the iron, which his assistant succeeded in handing to him. But Jeanne, like a serpent, eluded his grasp, and springing up once more, she turned with frenzied excitement toward the executioner, and offered her breast to him, defying him with her eyes. The fatal instrument which was aimed at her shoulder struck her on the right breast, marking its smoking and consuming furrow in the living flesh, and wringing from the victim, gagged as she was, one of those moans which have no equivalent in sounds produced by the human voice.

Jeanne was vanquished by the pain and shame; she fainted. The executioner took her on his shoulder, and with uncertain steps bore her down the ignominious ladder.

The multitude, silent, either because they approved or because they were filled with consternation, did not withdraw until the doors of the prison were closed once more upon the victim. Then they slowly retired, and the place resumed its ordinary tranquillity.

At the end of the bridge two men, young and thoughtless, conversed as follows, —

"Do you really believe, Maximilien, that it is Madame de La Motte whom the executioner has branded?"

"They say so, but I do not believe it," replied the taller of the two.

"No," said the other, a small man of vulgar appearance; "it is not Madame de La Motte whom they have branded. As they have found a Mademoiselle Oliva as a way of escape for the queen, so they have found a pretended Madame de La Motte to confess the forgery. You will say that she was branded, — bah, a farce for which the executioner and the victim were paid."

"It is a great deal to consent to be branded on the breast," replied the taller speaker. "The farce of which you speak seems to me not proved. You are more of a doctor than I, and you must have smelt the burning flesh."

"A mere matter of money, I tell you. They have paid some one who was condemned to be branded — "

"There, there," said he who had been called Maximilien, "I will not follow you on that ground; it is not solid."

"But you yourself said just now that you did not believe it was Madame de La Motte who had been branded."

"No; I still do not believe it," said the young man, smiling.

"Who was it then?"

"It was the queen," said the young man, in a sharp tone, to his sinister-looking companion; and he accented the words with his indescribable smile.

The other drew back, laughing explosively at the jest; then, looking around him, "Adieu, Robespierre," he said.

"Adieu, Marat," replied the other; and they separated.

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE MARRIAGE.

At noon of the same day the king came forth from his cabinet, and took his way to the square salon, in which already was the queen, surrounded by her little court. Marie Antoinette, pale beneath her rouge, listened with forced attention to the questions regarding her health addressed to her by Madame de Lamballe and Monsieur de Calonne. But she often glanced furtively at the door, — eagerly, as if desiring to see; and timorously, as if afraid to see.

"The king!" cried one of the ushers.

Louis XVI. stood on the threshold, and his eyes sought, first of all, Marie Antoinette. She rose and advanced to meet the king, who gracefully kissed her hand. "You are wonderfully beautiful to-day, Madame," said he.

She smiled sadly, and again searched vaguely among the throng.

"The bridal party have not yet arrived?" asked the king.

"Sire," replied the queen, with a violent effort at self-control, "Monsieur de Charny is here, and waits in the corridor till your Majesty shall order him to come in."

"Charny is there?" cried the king. "Let him come in at once."

Some of the gentlemen withdrew to carry the order to Monsieur de Charny. The queen nervously placed her hand on her heart, and sat down with her back to the door.

"Why, it is noon," said the king; "the bride should be here."

Monsieur de Charny appeared at the door in time to hear the king's words, to which he immediately replied, "Your Majesty will pardon the involuntary delay of Mademoiselle de Taverney. Since her father's death she has not left her bed. To-day she rises for the first time, and she would have been here already but for a fainting-fit by which she has been attacked."

"That dear child loved her father so much! Well, since she has found a good husband, let us hope that she will be consoled."

The queen listened in a motionless attitude, but the blood left her face to fill her heart.

"Monsieur de Breteuil," said the king, suddenly, "have you sent the order for Cagliostro's banishment?"

"Yes, Sire," replied the minister, with humility.

"And that La Motte, who calls herself Valois, — is she not to be branded to-day?"

"At this moment, Sire, it is probably done."

The queen's eyes sparkled; a murmur of forced approbation was heard in the salon.

"It will annoy Monsieur le Cardinal to know that his accomplice has been branded," continued the king, with a persistence in severity which was unusual with him. Having uttered that word "accomplice," applied to an accused person acquitted by the parliament, — a word that scourged the idol of the Parisians, and stigmatized as a thief and a forger one of the princes of the Church, one of the first noblemen in France, — the king, as if in supporting the honor of his wife he would send a solemn defiance to the clergy, to the nobles, to the parliaments, to the people, looked around with eyes in which flamed that anger and that majesty which no one had seen in France since the eyes of Louis XIV. had closed in eternal sleep.

Not a murmur, not a word of assent responded to that vengeance which the king was taking on all who had conspired to dishonor the monarchy. He approached the queen, who held out both her hands with an expression of profound gratitude.

At this moment Mademoiselle de Taverney appeared, looking more like a ghost than a bride. Philippe held her by the hand. She advanced with quick steps, seeing nothing, hearing nothing, depending on her brother's guidance. Thus she approached the king. Philippe pressed her hand; she opened her eyes and saw Louis XVI. smiling upon her. She made a reverence, and a murmur of the spectators applauded her beauty.

"Mademoiselle," said the king, taking her hand, "they tell me you are suffering, and that afflicts me. But I must do what I can for the happiness of those who serve me as does Monsieur de Charny. Should you not marry him to-day I could not be present at the ceremony, since I set out to-morrow with the queen on a journey through France. Come with me to the queen, Mademoiselle, and thank her; for her Majesty has a strong affection for you." Thus speaking, he led Andrée to Marie Antoinette.

The queen, much agitated, could hardly raise her eyes; she saw only Andrée's marriage-robe.

"To the chapel, gentlemen," said the king, and all followed the king and queen.

The Mass was begun immediately. The queen listened with her head buried in her hands, and praying with all the strength of her soul.

Monsieur de Charny, pale and handsome, was as cool and brave as in the midst of battle, but was suffering much more.

Philippe gave all his attention to his sister, trembling and tottering, and was ready to support her by word and gesture.

Andrée uttered no prayer; she formed no wishes. She had nothing to hope, nothing to fear. Henceforth she was nothing in the eyes of men, nothing to God. "Am I a Christian?" she asked herself. "Am I like other persons? Hast thou appointed me to a righteous life, — thou, who art called the sovereign Arbiter? Thou hast always punished me, who have never sinned. Thou hast provided that I should have for a mortal enemy the only man whom I have loved! No; the things of this world and the laws of God do not concern me; doubtless I was cursed before my birth. It is very strange. Here is a man the sound of whose name alone would make me die of happiness. Had he come to ask me for myself, I should have been obliged to kneel at his feet, and beg his pardon for my fault of other days, — for thy fault, my God; and he perhaps would have repulsed me. And now this man marries me; and it is he who will beg for pardon on his knees. It is strange, strange indeed."

The ceremony concluded, the assembled party congratulated the newly married couple. The Admiral de Suffren, on the return from the chapel, took Andrée's hand, and in Olivier's name promised her the happiness she so much deserved. Andrée thanked the admiral, and begged him to conduct her to the king that she might thank him.

Charny followed at a distance, without daring to approach her.

The admiral crossed the grand salon, and conducted Andrée to the king, who kissed her on the forehead and said, "Madame la Comtesse, go to the queen; she has a nuptial present for you."

Having spoken these words, which seemed to him very gracious, the king withdrew, followed by the court, leaving the young bride despairing in Philippe's arms.

"Oh," she murmured, "it is too much! It is too much, Philippe! I thought that I had already endured enough."

"Courage!" said Philippe, in a low tone. "Only this one trial more, sister."

"No, no," said Andrée; "I cannot. If she speaks to me, if she congratulates me, I shall die."

"You will die if you must, my dear sister; and in that you will be happier than I."

Philippe uttered these words so sadly that Andrée, as if stimulated by a goad, rushed forward and entered the library, where the queen, notwithstanding the season, — for it was the month of June, — was sitting by a fire.

Andrée remained standing, trembling with anger and with weakness too, and waited for the word which should strike her to the heart.

A minute — a century — elapsed before the queen made any motion. Then she rose, leaning on the chair, and with trembling fingers took a paper from the table. She advanced toward Andrée, and without speaking, placed the paper in her hands.

Between these two hearts speech was superfluous. Andrée took the paper, and read it. It was as follows: —

Andrée, you have saved me. My honor is preserved by you; my life is yours. In the name of that honor, which costs you so much, I declare to you that you may call me your sister. Try me; you will not see me blush. I intrust you with this paper, — it is the pledge of my gratitude; it is the dowry which I give you. Your heart is noble ; it will be able to appreciate the present I bestow on you.

MARIE ANTOINETTE DE LORRAINE D'AUTRICHE.

Andrée looked at the queen. She saw her eyes moistened with tears, as with drooping head she awaited a response. She slowly crossed the room, placed in the fire the queen's note, and bowing profoundly, but still without speaking, she passed out of the library. Marie Antoinette made a movement to stop her, to follow her ; but the inflexible countess, leaving the door open, went to rejoin her brother in the salon.

Philippe called Charny, took his hand and placed it in that of Andrée, while on the threshold of the library behind the portière, which she held aside with her arm, the queen witnessed the painful scene.

Charny withdrew like the bridegroom of Death carried off by his livid bride, — looking back at the pale face of Marie Antoinette, who, as she thought, saw him disappearing forever.

At the gate of the palace two travelling-carriages were waiting. Andrée got into the first, and as Charny prepared to follow her, "Monsieur," she said, "you are, I believe, setting out for Picardy."

"Yes, Madame."

"And I am going to the place in the country where my mother died. Adieu." Charny bowed without replying. Andrée departed alone.

"Have you remained to tell me that you are my enemy?" said Olivier to Philippe.

"No, Monsieur ; you are not my enemy, since you are my brother-in-law."

Olivier offered his hand, got into the second carriage and departed.

Philippe, left alone, wrung his hands in the agony of despair, and said in a voice choked by emotion, "My God, for those who do their duty on the earth, dost thou reserve some little joy in heaven? Joy!" he exclaimed, looking once more toward the palace, "I speak of joy! Those only can look with hope to the future life who there will meet with hearts who love them. No one here below loves me; I have not even the happiness of wishing to die."

THE END.

ANGE PITOU.

CHAPTER I.

IN WHICH THE READER IS MADE ACQUAINTED WITH THE HERO OF THIS HISTORY, AS WELL AS WITH THE COUNTRY IN WHICH HE FIRST SAW THE LIGHT.

On the borders of Picardy and the province of Soissons, and on that part of the national territory which, under the name of the Isle of France, formed a portion of the ancient patrimony of our kings, and in the centre of an immense crescent formed by a forest of fifty thousand acres which stretches its horns to the north and south, rises, almost buried amid the shades of a vast park planted by Francis I. and Henry II., the small city of Villers-Cotterets. This place is celebrated from having given birth to Charles Albert Demoustier, who, at the period when our present history commences, was there writing his "Letters to Émilie on Mythology," to the unbounded satisfaction of the pretty women of those days, who eagerly snatched his publications from each other as soon as printed.

Let us add, to complete the poetical reputation of this little city, whose detractors, notwithstanding its royal château and its two thousand four hundred inhabitants, obstinately persist in calling it a mere village, — let us add, we say, to complete its poetical reputation, that it is situated at two leagues' distance from Laferté-Milan, where Racine was born, and eight leagues from Château-Thierry, the birthplace of La Fontaine.

Let us also state that the mother of the author of "Britannicus" and "Athalie" was from Villers-Cotterets.

But now we must return to its royal château and its two thousand four hundred inhabitants.

This royal château, begun by Francis I., whose salamanders still decorate it, and finished by Henry II., whose cipher it bears entwined with that of Catherine de Médicis and encircled by the three crescents of Diana of Poictiers, after having sheltered the loves of the knight-king with Madame d'Étampes, and those of Louis-Philippe of Orleans with the beautiful Madame de Montesson, had become almost uninhabited since the death of this last prince; his son, Philippe d'Orléans, afterwards called Égalité, having made it descend from the rank of a royal residence to that of a mere hunting rendezvous.

It is well known that the château and forest of Villers-Cotterets formed part of the appanage settled by Louis XIV. on his brother Monsieur, when the second son of Anne of Austria married the sister of Charles II., the Princess Henrietta of England.

As to the two thousand four hundred inhabitants of whom we have promised our readers to say a word, they were, as in all localities where two thousand four hundred people are united, a heterogeneous assemblage.

First, of a few nobles, who spent their summers in the neighboring châteaux and their winters in Paris, and who, mimicking the prince, had only a lodging-place in the city.

Secondly, of a goodly number of citizens, who could be seen, let the weather be what it might, leaving their houses after dinner, umbrella in hand, to take their daily walk, — a walk which was regularly bounded by a wide ditch which separated the park from the forest, situated about a quarter of a league from the town, and which was called, doubtless on account of the exclamation which the sight of it drew from the asthmatic lungs of the promenaders, satisfied at finding themselves, after so long a walk, not too much out of breath, the "Ha! ha!"

Thirdly, of a considerably greater number of artisans, who worked the whole of the week, and only allowed themselves to take a walk on the Sunday; whereas their fellow-townsmen, more favored by fortune, could enjoy it every day.

Fourthly and finally, of some miserable proletarians, for whom the week had not even a Sabbath, and who, after having toiled six days in the pay of the nobles, the citizens, or even of the artisans, wandered on the seventh day through the forest to gather up dry wood or branches of the lofty trees, torn from them by the storm, — that mower of the forest, to whom oak-trees are but as ears of wheat, — and which it scattered over the humid soil beneath the lofty trees, the magnificent appanage of a prince.

If Villers-Cotterets (Villerii ad Cotiam Retiæ) had been, unfortunately, a town of sufficient importance in history to induce archæologists to ascertain and follow up its successive changes from a village to a burgh and from a burgh to a city, — the last, as we have said, being strongly contested, — they would certainly have proved this fact, that the village had begun by being a row of houses on either side of the road from Paris to Soissons; then they would have added that its situation on the borders of a beautiful forest having, though by slow degrees, brought to it a great increase of inhabitants; other streets were added to the first, diverging like the rays of a star and leading towards other small villages with which it was important to keep up communication, and converging towards a point which naturally became the centre, — that is to say, what in the provinces is called The Square, — around which the handsomest buildings of the village, now become a burgh, were erected, and in the middle of which rises a fountain, now decorated with a quadruple dial; in short, they would have fixed the precise date when, near the modest village church — the first want of a people — arose the first turrets of the vast château, the last caprice of a king; a château which, after having been, as we have already said, by turns a royal and a princely residence, has in our days become a melancholy and hideous receptacle for mendicants under the direction of the Prefecture of the Seine.

But at the period at which this history commences, royal affairs, though already somewhat tottering, had not yet fallen to the low degree to which they have fallen in our days; the château was no longer inhabited by a prince, 't is true, but it had not yet become the abode of beggars; it was simply uninhabited, excepting the indispensable attendants required for its preservation; among whom were to be remarked the doorkeeper, the master of the tennis court, and the house steward; and therefore the windows of this immense edifice, some of which looked toward the park and others on a large court aristocratically called the square of the château, were all closed, which added not a little to the gloominess and solitary appearance of this square, at one of the extremities of which rose a small house, regarding which the reader, we hope, will permit us to say a few words.

It was a small house, of which, if we may be allowed to use the term, the back only was to be seen. But, as is the case with many individuals, this back had the privilege of being the most presentable part. In fact, the front, which was towards the Rue de Soissons, one of the principal streets of the town, opened upon it by an awkwardly constructed gate, which was ill-naturedly kept closed eighteen hours out of the twenty-four, while the back was gay and smiling; that is to say, on the back was a garden, above the wall of which could be seen the tops of cherry, pear, and plum trees, while on each side of a small gate by which the garden was entered from the square was a centenary acacia-tree, which in the spring appeared to stretch out their branches above the wall to scatter their perfumed flowers over the surrounding grounds.

The abode was the residence of the chaplain of the château, who, notwithstanding the absence of the master, performed mass every Sunday in the seignorial church. He had a small pension, and besides this had the charge of two purses, — the one to send a scholar yearly to the college of Plessis, the other for one to the seminary at Soissons. It is needless to say that it was the Orleans family who supplied these purses, — founded, that of the seminary by the son of the Regent, that for the college by the father of the prince, — and that these two purses were the objects of ambition to all parents, at the same time that they were a cause of absolute despair to the pupils, being the source of extraordinary compositions, which compositions were to be presented for approval of the chaplain every Thursday.

Well, one Thursday in the month of July, 1789, a somewhat disagreeable day, being darkened by a storm, beneath which the two magnificent acacias we have spoken of, having already lost the virginal whiteness of their spring attire, shed a few leaves yellowed by the first heats of summer, after a silence of some duration, broken only by the rustling of those leaves as they whirled against each other upon the beaten ground of the square, or by the shrill cry of the martin pursuing flies as it skimmed along the ground, eleven o'clock resounded from the pointed and slated belfry of the town hall.

Instantly a hurrah, loud as could have been uttered by a whole regiment of fusileers, accompanied by a rushing sound like that of the avalanche when bounding from crag to crag, was heard; the door between the two acacia-trees was opened, or rather burst open, and gave egress to a torrent of boys, who spread themselves over the square, when instantly some five or six joyous and noisy groups were formed, — one around a circle formed to keep peg-tops prisoners, another about a game of hop-scotch traced with chalk upon the ground, another before several holes scientifically hollowed out, where those who were fortunate enough to have sous might lose them at pitch and toss.

At the same time that these gambling and playful scholars — who were apostrophized by the few neighbors whose windows opened on this square as wicked do-no-goods, and who, in general, wore trousers the knees of which were torn, as were also the elbows of their jackets — assembled to play upon the square, those who were called good and reasonable boys, and who, in the opinion of the gossips, must be the pride and joy of their respective parents, were seen to detach themselves from the general mass, and by various paths, though with slow steps, indicative of their regret, to walk, basket in hand, towards their paternal roofs, where awaited them the slice of bread and butter, or of bread and preserved fruit, destined to be their compensation for the games they had thus abjured. The latter were, in general, dressed in jackets in tolerably good condition, and in breeches which were almost irreproachable ; and this, together with their boasted propriety of demeanor, rendered them objects of derision and even of hatred to their worse-dressed and, above all, worse-disciplined companions.

Besides the two classes we have pointed out under the denomination of gambling and well-conducted scholars, there was still a third, which we shall designate by the name of idle scholars, who scarcely ever left school with the others, whether to play in the square or to return to their paternal homes ; seeing that this unfortunate class were almost constantly, what in school language is termed "kept," which means to say, that while their companions, after having said their lessons and written their themes, were playing at top or eating their bread and jam, they remained nailed to their school benches or before their desks, that they might learn their lessons or write their themes during the hours of recreation, which they had not been able to accomplish satisfactorily during the class, when, indeed, the gravity of their faults did not demand a punishment more severe than that of mere detention, such as the rod, the cane, or the cat-o'-nine-tails.

And had any one followed the path which led into the schoolroom, and which the pupils had just used, in the inverse sense, to get out of it, he would, — after going through a narrow alley, which prudently ran outside of the fruit garden and opened into a large yard which served as a private playground, — he would, as we have said, have heard, on entering this courtyard, a loud harsh voice resounding from the upper part of a staircase, while a scholar, whom our impartiality as historians compels us to acknowledge as belonging to the third class we have mentioned, that is to say, to that of the idle boys, was precipitately descending the said staircase, making just such a movement with his shoulders as asses are wont to do when endeavoring to rid themselves of a cruel rider, or as scholars when they have received a sharp blow from the cat-o'-nine-tails, to alleviate the pain they are enduring.

"Ah! miscreant; ah! you little excommunicated villain," cried the voice, "ah! you young serpent, away with you, off with you; vade, vade! Remember that for three whole years have I been patient with you; but there are rascals who would tire the patience of even God himself. But now it is all over. I have done with you. Take your squirrels, take your frogs, take your lizards, take your silk-worms, take your cock-chafers, and go to your aunt, go to your uncle if you have one, or to the devil if you will, so that I never more set eyes upon you; vade, vade!"

"Oh, my good Monsieur Fortier, do pray forgive me," replied the other voice, still upon the staircase and in a supplicating tone; "is it worth your while to put yourself into such a towering passion for a poor little barbarism and a few solecisms, as you call them?"

"Three barbarisms and seven solecisms in a theme of only twenty-five lines!" replied the voice, in a rougher and still more angry tone.

"It has been so to-day, sir, I acknowledge; Thursday is always my unlucky day; but if by chance to-morrow my theme should be well written, would you not forgive me my misfortunes of to-day? Tell me, now, would you not, my good Abbé?"

"On every composition day for the last three years you have repeated that same thing to me, you idle fellow, and the examination is fixed for the first of November, and I, on the entreaty of your aunt Angelique, have had the weakness to put your name down on the list of candidates for the Soissons purse; I shall have the shame of seeing my pupil rejected, and of hearing it everywhere declared that Pitou is an ass, — Angelus Petovius asinus est."

Let us hasten to say — that the kind-hearted reader may from the first moment feel for him all the interest he deserves — that Ange Pitou, whose name the Abbé Fortier had so picturesquely Latinized, is the hero of this story.

"Oh, my good Monsieur Fortier! oh, my dear master!" replied the scholar, in despair.

"I, your master!" exclaimed the abbé, deeply humiliated by the appellation. "God be thanked, I am no more your master than you are my pupil. I disown you, — I do not know you. I would that I had never seen you. I forbid you to mention my name, or even to bow to me. Retro, miserable boy, retro!"

"Oh, Monsieur l'Abbé," insisted the unhappy Pitou, who appeared to have some weighty motive for not falling out with his master, "do not, I entreat you, withdraw your interest for me on account of a poor halting theme."

"Ah!" exclaimed the abbé, quite beside himself on hearing this last supplication, and running down the first four steps of the staircase, while Ange Pitou jumped down the four bottom ones and made his appearance in the courtyard, — "ah! you are chopping logic when you cannot even write a theme; you are calculating the extent of my patience, when you know not how to distinguish the nominative from the accusative."

"You have always been so kind to me, Monsieur l'Abbé," replied the committer of barbarisms, "and you will only have to say a word in my favor to my lord the bishop."

"Would you have me belie my conscience, wretched boy?"

"If it be to do a good action, Monsieur l'Abbé, the God of mercy will forgive you for it."

"Never! never!"

"And besides, who knows, the examiners perhaps will not be more severe towards me than they were towards my foster-brother, Sebastian Gilbert, when last year he was a candidate for the Paris purse; and he was a famous fellow for barbarisms, if ever there was one, although he was only thirteen years old, and I was seventeen."

"Ah! indeed; and this is another precious stupidity which you have uttered," cried the abbé, coming down the remaining steps, and in his turn appearing at the door with his cat-o'-nine-tails in his hand, while Pitou took care to keep at the prudent distance from his professor which he had all along maintained. "Yes, I say stupidity," continued the abbé, crossing his arms and looking indignantly at his scholar; "and this is the reward of my lessons in logic. Triple animal that you are! it is thus you remember the old axiom, — Noli minora, loqui majora volens. Why, it was precisely because Gilbert was so much younger, that they were more indulgent towards a child — a child of fourteen years old — than they would have been to a great simpleton of nearly eighteen."

"Yes, and because he is the son of Monsieur Honoré Gilbert, who has an income of eighteen thousand livres from good landed property, and this on the plain of Pillaleux," replied the logician, in a piteous tone.

The Abbé Fortier looked at Pitou, pouting his lips and knitting his brows.

"This is somewhat less stupid," grumbled he, after a moment's silence and scrutiny. "And yet it is but specious, and without any basis: Species, non autem corpus."

"Oh, if I were the son of a man possessing an income of eighteen thousand livres!" repeated Ange Pitou, who thought he perceived that his answer had made some impression on the professor.

"Yes, but you are not so, and to make up for it, you are as ignorant as the clown of whom Juvenal speaks, — a profane citation," the abbé crossed himself, "but no less just, — Arcadius juvenis. I would wager that you do not even know what Arcadius means?"

"Why, Arcadian, to be sure," replied Ange Pitou, drawing himself up with the majesty of pride.

"And what besides?"

"Besides what?"

"Arcadia was the country of donkeys, and with the ancients, as with us, asinus was synonymous with stultus."

"I did not wish to understand your question in that sense," rejoined Pitou, "seeing that it was far from my imagination that the austere mind of my worthy preceptor could have descended to satire."

The Abbé Fortier looked at him a second time, and with as profound attention as the first.

"Upon my word!" cried he, somewhat mollified by the incense which his disciple had offered him; "there are really moments when one would swear that the fellow is less stupid than he appears to be."

"Come, Monsieur l'Abbé," said Pitou, who, if he had not heard the words the abbé had uttered, had caught the expression of a return to a more merciful consideration which had passed over his countenance, "forgive me this time, and you will see what a beautiful theme I will write by to-morrow."

"Well, then, I will consent," said the abbé, placing, in sign of truce, his cat-o'-nine-tails in his belt and approaching Pitou, who observing this pacific demonstration, made no further attempt to move.

"Oh, thanks, thanks!" cried the pupil.

"Wait a moment, and be not so hasty with your thanks. Yes, I forgive you, but on one condition."

Pitou hung down his head, and as he was now at the discretion of the abbé, he waited with resignation.

"It is that you shall correctly reply to a question I shall put to you."

"In Latin?" inquired Pitou with much anxiety.

"Latinè," replied the professor.

Pitou drew a deep sigh.

There was a momentary silence, during which the joyous cries of the schoolboys who were playing on the square reached the ears of Ange Pitou. He sighed a second time, more deeply than the first.

"Quid virtus, quid religio?" asked the abbé.

These words, pronounced with all the pomposity of a pedagogue, rang in the ears of poor Ange Pitou like the trumpet of the angel on the day of judgment; a cloud passed before his eyes, and such an effect was produced upon his intellect by it, that he thought for a moment he was on the point of becoming mad.

However, as this violent cerebral labor did not appear to produce any result, the required answer was indefinitely postponed. A prolonged noise was then heard, as the professor slowly inhaled a pinch of snuff.

Pitou clearly saw that it was necessary to say something.

"Nescio," he replied, hoping that his ignorance would be pardoned by his avowing that ignorance in Latin.

"You do not know what is virtue!" exclaimed the abbé, choking with rage; "you do not know what is religion!"

"I know very well what it is in French," replied Ange, "but I do not know it in Latin."

"Well, then, get thee to Arcadia, juvenis; all is now ended between us, pitiful wretch!"

Pitou was so overwhelmed that he did not move a step, although the Abbé Fortier had drawn his cat-o'-nine-tails from his belt with as much dignity as the commander of an army would, at the commencement of a battle, have drawn his sword from the scabbard.

"But what is to become of me?" cried the poor youth, letting his arms fall listlessly by his side. "What will become of me if I lose the hope of being admitted into the seminary?"

"Become whatever you can. It is, by heaven! the same to me."

The good abbé was so angry that he almost swore.

"But you do not know, then, that my aunt believes I am already an abbé?"

"Well, then, she will know that you are not fit to be made even a sacristan!"

"But, Monsieur Fortier —"

"I tell you to depart — limine linguæ."

"Well, then," cried Pitou, as a man who makes up his mind to a painful resolution, but who in fact does make it, "will you allow me to take my desk?" said he to the abbé, hoping that during the time he would be performing this operation a respite would be given him, and the abbé's heart would become impressed with more merciful feelings.

"Most assuredly," said the latter; "your desk, with all that it contains."

Pitou sorrowfully reascended the staircase, for the schoolroom was on the first floor. On returning to the room — in which, assembled around a large table, and pretending to be hard at work, were seated some fourteen boys — and carefully raising the flap of his desk to ascertain whether all the animals and insects which belonged to him were safely stowed in it, and lifting it so gently that it proved the great care he took of his favorites, he walked with slow and measured steps along the corridor.

At the top of the stairs was the Abbé Fortier, with outstretched arm, pointing to the staircase with the end of his cat-o'-nine-tails.

It was necessary to run the gauntlet. Ange Pitou made himself as humble and as small as he possibly could, but this did not prevent him from receiving, as he passed by, a last thwack from the instrument to which Abbé Fortier owed his best pupils, and the employment of which, although more frequent and more prolonged on the back of Ange Pitou, had produced the sorrowful results just witnessed.

While Ange Pitou, wiping away a last tear, was bending his steps, his desk upon his head, towards Pleux, the quarter of the town in which his aunt resided, let us say a few words as to his physical appearance and his antecedents.

CHAPTER II.

IN WHICH IT IS PROVED THAT AN AUNT IS NOT ALWAYS A MOTHER.

Louis Ange Pitou, as he himself said in his dialogue with the Abbé Fortier, was, at the period when this history commences, seventeen and a half years old. He was a tall, slender youth, with yellow hair, red cheeks, and blue eyes. The bloom of youth, fresh and innocent, was expanded over his wide mouth, the thick lips of which discovered, when extended by a hearty laugh, two perfectly complete rows of formidable teeth, — particularly formidable to those of whose dinner he was about to partake. At the end of his long bony arms were solidly attached hands as large as beetles, legs rather inclined to be bowed, knees as big as a child's head, which regularly made their way through his tight black breeches, and immense feet, which, notwithstanding, were at their ease in calfskin shoes reddened by constant use; such, with a sort of cassock of brown serge, a garment something between a frock-coat and a blouse, is an exact and impartial description of the ex-disciple of the Abbé Fortier.

We must now sketch his moral character.

Ange Pitou had been left an orphan when only twelve years old, the time at which he had the misfortune to lose his mother, of whom he was the only child. That is to say, that since the death of his father, which event had occurred before he had attained the years of recollection, Ange Pitou, adored by his poor mother, had been allowed to do whatever he thought fit, which had greatly developed his physical education, but had altogether retarded the advancement of his moral faculties. Born in a charming village called Haramont, situated at the distance of a league from the town, and in the centre of a wood, his first walks had been to explore the depths of his native forest, and the first application of his intelligence was that of making war upon the animals by which it was inhabited. The result of this application, thus directed towards one sole object, was, that at ten years old Pitou was a very distinguished poacher, and a bird-catcher of the first order; and that almost without any labor, and above all without receiving lessons from any one, but by the sole power of that instinct given by nature to man when born in the midst of woods, and which would seem to be a portion of that same instinct with which she has endowed the animal kingdom. And therefore every run of hare or rabbit within the circle of three leagues was known to him, and not a marshy pool, where birds were wont to drink, had escaped his investigation. In every direction were to be seen the marks made by his pruning-knife on trees that were adapted to catching birds by imitating their calls. From these different exercises it resulted that in some of them Pitou had attained the most extraordinary skill.

Thanks to his long arms and his prominent knees, which enabled him to climb the largest standard trees, he would ascend to their very summits, to take the highest nests, with an agility and a certainty which attracted the admiration of his companions, and which, in a latitude nearer to the Equator, would have excited the esteem even of monkeys. In that sport, so attractive even to grown people, in which the bird-catcher inveigles the birds to light upon a tree set with limed twigs, by imitating the cry of the jay or the owlet, — birds which, among the plumed tribe, enjoy the bitter hatred of the whole species, and to such an extent that every sparrow, every finch or tomtit, hastens at the call in the hope of plucking out a single feather from the common enemy, and, for the most, leave all their own, — Pitou's companions either made use of a natural owlet or a natural jay, or with some particular plant formed a pipe, by aid of which they managed to imitate indifferently the cry of either the one or the other of these birds. But Pitou disdained all such preparations, despised such petty subterfuges. It was upon his own resources that he relied, it was with his own natural means that he drew them into the snare. It was, in short, his own lips that modulated the shrieking and discordant cries, which brought around him not only other birds, but birds of the same species, who allowed themselves to be enticed, we will not say by this note, but by this cry, so admirably did he imitate it. As to the sport in the marshy pools, it was to Pitou the easiest thing in the world, and he would certainly have despised it as a pursuit of art had it been less productive as an object of profit. But notwithstanding the contempt with which he regarded this sport, there was not one of the most expert in the art who could have vied with Pitou in covering with fern a pool that was too extensive to be completely "laid," — that is the technical term; none of them knew so well as he how to give the proper inclination to his limed twigs, so that the most cunning birds could not drink either over or under them; and finally, none of them had that steadiness of hand and that clear-sightedness which must insure the due mixture, though in scientifically unequal quantities, of the rosin, oil, and glue, in order that the glue should not become either too fluid or too brittle.

Now, as the estimation of the qualities of a man changes according to the theatre on which these qualities are produced, and according to the spectators before whom they are exhibited, Pitou, in his own native village, Haramont, amidst his country neighbors, — that is to say, men accustomed to demand of nature at least half their resources, and, like all peasants, possessing an instinctive hatred of civilization, — Pitou enjoyed such distinguished consideration that his poor mother could not for a moment entertain the idea that he was pursuing a wrong path, and that the most perfect education that can be given, and at great expense, to a man, was not precisely that which her son, a privileged person in this respect, had given, gratis, to himself.

But when the good woman fell sick, when she felt that death was approaching, when she understood that she was about to leave her child alone and isolated in the world, she began to entertain doubts, and looked around her for some one who would be the stay and the support of the future orphan. She then remembered that ten years before, a young man had knocked at her door in the middle of the night, bringing with him a newly born child, to take charge of which he had not only given her a tolerably good round sum, but had deposited a still larger sum for the benefit of the child with a notary at Villers-Cotterets. All that she had then known of this mysterious young man was that his name was Gilbert, but about three years previous to her falling ill he had reappeared. He was then a man about twenty-seven years of age, somewhat stiff in his demeanor, dogmatical in his conversation, and cold in his manner; but this first layer of ice melted at once when his child was brought to him, on finding that he was hale, hearty, and smiling, and brought up in the way in which he had directed, — that is to say, as a child of nature. He then pressed the hand of the good woman and merely said to her, —

"In the hour of need calculate upon me."

Then he had taken the child, had inquired the way to Ermenonville, and with his son performed the pilgrimage to the tomb of Rousseau, after which he returned to Villers-Cotterets. Then, seduced, no doubt, by the wholesome air he breathed there, by the favorable manner in which the notary had spoken of the school under the charge of the Abbé Fortier, he had left little Gilbert with the worthy man, whose philosophic appearance had struck him at first sight; for at that period philosophy held such great sway that it had insinuated itself even among churchmen.

After this he had set out again for Paris, leaving his address with the Abbé Fortier.

Pitou's mother was aware of all these circumstances. When at the point of death, those words, 'In the hour of need calculate upon me,' returned to her recollection. This was at once a ray of light to her; doubtless Providence had regulated all this in such a manner that poor Pitou might find even more than he was about to lose. She sent for the curate of the parish; as she had never learned to write, the curate wrote, and the same day the letter was taken to the Abbé Fortier, who immediately added Gilbert's address, and took it to the post-office.

It was high time, for the poor woman died two days afterwards. Pitou was too young to feel the full extent of the loss he had suffered. He wept for his mother, not from comprehending the eternal separation of the grave, but because he saw his mother cold, pale, disfigured. Then the poor lad felt instinctively that the guardian angel of their hearth had fled; that the house, deprived of his mother, had become deserted and uninhabitable. Not only could he not comprehend what was to be his future fate, but even how he was to exist the following day. Therefore, after following his mother's remains to the churchyard, when the earth, thrown into the grave, resounded upon her coffin, when the modest mound that covered it had been rounded off, he sat down upon it, and replied to every observation that was made to him as to his leaving it, by shaking his head and saying that he had never left his mother Madeleine, and that he would remain where she remained.

He stayed during the whole of that day and night, seated upon his mother's grave.

It was there that the worthy Doctor Gilbert, — but have we already informed the reader that the future protector of Pitou was a physician? — it was there that the worthy doctor found him, when, feeling the full extent of the duty imposed upon him by the promise he had made, he had hastened to fulfil it, and this within forty-eight hours after the letter had been despatched.

Ange was very young when he had first seen the doctor, but it is well known that the impressions received in youth are so strong that they leave eternal reminiscences. Then the passage of the mysterious young man had left its trace in the house. He had there left the young child of whom we have spoken, and with him comparative ease and comfort; every time that Ange had heard his mother pronounce the name of Gilbert, it had been with a feeling that approached to adoration; then again, when he had reappeared at the house a grown man, and with the title of doctor, when he had added to the benefits he had showered upon it the promise of future protection, Pitou had comprehended, from the fervent gratitude of his mother, that he himself ought also to be grateful, and the poor youth, without precisely understanding what he was saying, had stammered out the words of eternal remembrance and profound gratitude which had before been uttered by his mother.

Therefore, as soon as he saw the doctor appear at the grated gate of the cemetery, and saw him advancing towards him amid the mossy graves and broken crosses, he recognized him, rose up and went to meet him, for he understood that to the person who had thus come on being called for by his mother he could not say no, as he had done to others; he therefore made no further resistance than that of turning back to give a last look at the grave, when Gilbert took him by the hand and gently drew him away from the gloomy enclosure. An elegant cabriolet was standing at the gate; he made the poor child get into it, and for the moment leaving the house of Pitou's mother under the guardianship of public faith and the interest which misfortune always inspires, he drove his young protégé to the town and alighted with him at the best inn, which at that time was called The Dauphin. He was scarcely installed there when he sent for a tailor, who, having been forewarned, brought with him a quantity of ready-made clothes. He with due precaution selected for Pitou garments which were too long for him by two or three inches, — a superfluity which, from the rate at which our hero was growing, promised not to be of long duration. After this he walked with him towards that quarter of the town which we have designated, and which was called Pleux.

The nearer Pitou approached this quarter, the slower did his steps become, for it was evident that he was about to be conducted to the house of his aunt Angélique; and notwithstanding that he had but seldom seen his godmother, — for it was Aunt Angélique who had bestowed on Pitou his poetical Christian name, — he had retained a very formidable remembrance of his respectable relative.

And in fact there was nothing about Aunt Angélique that could be in any way attractive to a child accustomed to all the tender care of maternal solicitude. Aunt Angélique was at that time an old maid between fifty-five and fifty-eight years of age, stultified by the most minute practices of religious bigotry, and in whom an ill-understood piety had inverted every charitable, merciful, and humane feeling, to cultivate in their stead a natural dose of avaricious intelligence, which was increased day by day from her constant intercourse with the bigoted old gossips of the town. She did not precisely live on charity; but besides the sale of the thread she spun upon her wheel, and the letting out of chairs in the church, which office had been granted to her by the chapter, she from time to time received from pious souls, who allowed themselves to be deceived by her pretensions to religion, small sums, which from their original copper she converted into silver, and then from silver into golden louis, which disappeared not only without any person seeing them disappear, but without any one ever suspecting their existence, and which were buried, one by one, in the cushion of the arm-chair upon which she sat to work; and when once in this hiding-place, they rejoined by degrees a certain number of their fellow-coins, which had been gathered one by one, and like them destined thenceforth to be sequestered from circulation until the unknown day of the death of the old maid should place them in the hands of her heir.

It was, then, towards the abode of this venerable relation that Doctor Gilbert was advancing, leading the great Pitou by the hand.

We say the great Pitou, because from three months after his birth Pitou had been too tall for his age.

Mademoiselle Rose Angélique Pitou, at the moment when her door opened to give ingress to her nephew and the doctor, was in a perfect transport of joyous humor. While they were singing mass for the dead over the dead body of her sister-in-law in the church at Haramont, there was a wedding and several baptisms in the church of Villers-Cotterets, so that her chair-letting had in a single day amounted to six livres. Mademoiselle Angélique had therefore converted her pence into a silver crown, which, in its turn, added to three others which had been put by at different periods, had given her a golden louis. This louis had at this precise moment been sent to rejoin the others in the chair-cushion, and these days of reunion were naturally days of high festivity to Mademoiselle Angélique.

It was at the moment, and after having opened her door, which had been closed during the important operation, and Aunt Angélique had taken a last walk round her arm-chair to assure herself that no external demonstration could reveal the existence of the treasure concealed within, that the doctor and Pitou entered.

The scene might have been particularly affecting, but in the eyes of a man who was so perspicacious an observer as Doctor Gilbert, it was merely grotesque. On perceiving her nephew, the old bigot uttered a few words about her poor dear sister, whom she had loved so much; and then she appeared to wipe away a tear. On his side the doctor, who wished to examine the deepest recesses of the old maid's heart before coming to any determination with respect to her, took upon himself to utter a sort of sermon on the duties of aunts toward their nephews. But by degrees, as the sermon was progressing and the unctuous words fell from the doctor's lips, the arid eyes of the old maid drank up the imperceptible tear which had moistened them; all her features resumed the dryness of parchment, with which they appeared to be covered; she raised her left hand to the height of her pointed chin, and with the right hand she began to calculate on her skinny fingers the quantity of pence which her letting of chairs produced to her per annum. So that chance having so directed it that her calculation had terminated at the same time with the doctor's sermon, she could reply at the very moment, that whatever might have been the love she entertained for her poor sister, and the degree of interest she might feel for her dear nephew, the mediocrity of her receipts did not permit her, notwithstanding her double title of aunt and godmother, to incur any increased expense.

The doctor, however, was prepared for this refusal. It did not, therefore, in any way surprise him. He was a great advocate for new ideas; and as the first volume of Lavater had just then appeared, he had already applied the physiognomic doctrines of the Zurich philosopher to the yellow and skinny features of Mademoiselle Angélique.

The result of this examination was, that the doctor felt assured, from the small sharp eyes of the old maid, her long and pinched-up nose and thin lips, that she united in her single person the three sins of avarice, selfishness, and hypocrisy.

Her answer, as we have said, did not cause any species of astonishment. However, he wished to convince himself, in his quality of observer of human nature, how far the devotee would carry the development of these three defects.

"But, Mademoiselle," said he, "Ange Pitou is a poor orphan child, the son of your own brother, and in the name of humanity you cannot abandon your brother's son to be dependent on public charity."

"Well, now, listen to me, Monsieur Gilbert," said the old maid; "it would be an increase of expense of at least six sous a day, and that at the lowest calculation; for that great fellow would eat at least a pound of bread a day."

Pitou made a wry face: he was in the habit of eating a pound and a half at his breakfast alone.

"And without calculating the soap for his washing," added Mademoiselle Angélique; "and I recollect that he is a sad one for dirtying clothes."

In fact, Pitou did sadly dirty his clothes, and that is very conceivable, when we remember the life he had led, climbing trees and lying down in marshes; but we must render him this justice, that he tore his clothes even more than he soiled them.

"Oh, fie, Mademoiselle," cried the doctor, "fie, Mademoiselle Angélique! Can you, who so well practise Christian charity, enter into such minute calculations with regard to your own nephew and godson?"

"And without calculating the cost of his clothes," cried the old devotee most energetically, who suddenly remembered having seen her sister Madeleine busily employed in sewing patches on her nephew's jacket and knee-caps on his small-clothes.

"Then," said the doctor, "am I to understand that you refuse to take charge of your nephew? The orphan who has been repulsed from his aunt's threshold will be compelled to beg for alms at the threshold of strangers."

Mademoiselle Angélique, notwithstanding her avarice, was alive to the odium which would naturally attach to her if from her refusal to receive her nephew he should be compelled to have recourse to such an extremity.

"No," said she, "I will take charge of him."

"Ah!" exclaimed the doctor, happy to find a single good feeling in a heart which he had thought completely withered.

"Yes," continued the devotee, "I will recommend him to the Augustin Friars at Bourg Fontaine, and he shall enter their monastery as a lay-servant."

We have already said that the doctor was a philosopher. We know what was the meaning of the word philosopher in those days.

He therefore instantly resolved to snatch a neophyte from the Augustin brotherhood, and that with as much zealous fervor as the Augustins, on their side, could have displayed in carrying off an adept from the philosopher.

"Well, then," he rejoined, plunging his hand into his deep pocket, "since you are in such a position of pecuniary difficulty, my dear Mademoiselle Angélique, as to be compelled, from your deficiency in personal resources, to recommend your nephew to the charity of others, I will seek elsewhere for some one who can more efficaciously than yourself apply to the maintenance of your nephew the sum which I had designed for him. I am obliged to return to America. I will, before I set out, apprentice your nephew Pitou to some joiner, or a smith. He shall, however, himself choose the trade for which he feels a vocation. During my absence he will grow bigger, and on my return he will already have become acquainted with his business, and then — why, I shall see what can be made of him. Come, my child, kiss your aunt," continued the doctor, "and let us be off at once."

The doctor had not concluded the sentence when Pitou rushed towards the antiquated spinster; his long arms were extended, and he was in fact most eager to embrace his aunt, on the condition that this kiss was to be the signal, between him and her, of an eternal separation.

But at the words "the sum," the gesture with which the doctor had accompanied them, the thrusting his hand into his pocket, the silvery sound which that hand had incontinently given to a heap of crown-pieces, the amount of which might have been estimated by the tension of the pocket, the old maid had felt the fire of cupidity mount even to her heart.

"Oh," cried she, "my dear Monsieur Gilbert, you must be well aware of one thing!"

"And what is that?" asked the doctor.

"Why, good heaven! that no one in the world can love this poor child half so much as I do."

And entwining her scraggy arms round Pitou's neck, she imprinted a sour kiss on each of his cheeks, which made him shudder from the tips of his toes to the roots of his hair.

"Oh, certainly," replied the doctor; "I know that well, and I so little doubted your affection for him that I brought him at once to you as his natural support. But that which you have just said to me, dear mademoiselle, has convinced me at the same time of your good-will and of your inability, and I see clearly that you are too poor to aid those who are poorer than yourself."

"Why, my good Monsieur Gilbert," rejoined the old devotee, "there is a merciful God in heaven, and from heaven does he not feed all his creatures?"

"That is true," replied Gilbert; "but although he gives food to the ravens, he does not put out orphans as apprentices. Now, this is what must be done for Ange Pitou, and this, with your small means, would doubtless cost you too much."

"But yet, if you were to give that sum, good Doctor."

"What sum?"

"The sum of which you spoke, the sum which is there in your pocket," added the devotee, stretching her crooked finger toward the doctor's coat.

"I will assuredly give it, dear Mademoiselle Angélique," said the doctor; "but I forewarn you it will be on one condition."

"And what is that?"

"That the boy shall have a profession."

"He shall have one, and that I promise you on the faith of Angélique Pitou, most worthy Doctor," cried the devotee, her eyes riveted on the pocket which was swaying to and fro.

"You promise it?"

"I promise you it shall be so."

"Seriously, is it not?"

"On the truth of the living God, my dear Monsieur Gilbert, I swear to do it."

And Mademoiselle Angélique horizontally extended her emaciated hand.

"Well, then, be it so," said the doctor, drawing from his pocket a well-rounded bag; "I am ready to give the money, as you see. On your side, are you ready to make yourself responsible to me for the child?"

"Upon the true cross, Monsieur Gilbert."

"Do not let us swear so much, dear Mademoiselle, but let us sign a little more."

"I will sign, Monsieur Gilbert, I will sign."

"Before a notary?"

"Before a notary."

"Well, then, let us go at once to Papa Niguet."

Papa Niguet, to whom, thanks to his long acquaintance with him, the doctor applied this friendly title, was, as those know who are familiar with our work entitled "Joseph Balsamo," the notary of greatest reputation in the town.

Mademoiselle Angélique, of whom Master Niguet was also the notary, had no objection to offer to the choice made by the doctor. She followed him therefore to the notary's office. There the scrivener registered the promise made by Mademoiselle Rose Angélique Pitou, to take charge of and to place in the exercise of an honorable profession Louis Ange Pitou, her nephew, and so doing should annually receive the sum of two hundred livres. The contract was made for five years. The doctor deposited eight hundred livres in the hands of the notary; the other two hundred were to be paid to Mademoiselle Angélique in advance.

The following day the doctor left Villers-Cotterêts after having settled some accounts with one of his farmers, with regard to whom we shall speak hereafter; and Mademoiselle Pitou, pouncing like a vulture upon the aforesaid two hundred livres payable in advance, deposited eight golden louis in the cushion of her arm-chair.

As to the eight livres which remained, they waited, in a small delf saucer which had, during the last thirty or forty years, been the receptacle of clouds of coins of every description, until the harvest of the following two or three Sundays had made up the sum of twenty-four livres, on attaining which, as we have already stated, the above-named sum underwent the golden metamorphosis, and passed from the saucer into the arm-chair.

CHAPTER III.

ANGE PITOU AT HIS AUNT'S.

We have observed the very slight degree of inclination which Ange Pitou felt towards a long-continued sojourn with his Aunt Angélique; the poor child, endowed with instinct equal to, and perhaps superior to, that of the animals against whom he continually made war, had divined at once, we will not say all the disappointments — we have seen that he did not for a single moment delude himself upon the subject — but all the vexations, tribulations, and annoyances to which he would be exposed.

In the first place — but we must admit that this was by no means the reason which most influenced Pitou to dislike his aunt — Doctor Gilbert having left Villers-Cotterêts, there never was a word said about placing the child as an apprentice. The good notary had indeed given her a hint or two with regard to her formal obligation; but Mademoiselle Angélique had replied that her nephew was very young, and above all, that his health was too delicate to be subjected to labor which would probably be beyond his strength. The notary, on hearing this observation, had in good faith admired the kindness of heart of Mademoiselle Pitou, and had deferred taking any steps as to the apprenticeship until the following year. There was no time lost, the child being then only in his twelfth year.

Once installed at his aunt's, and while the latter was ruminating as to the mode she should adopt whereby to make the most of her dear nephew, Pitou, who once more found himself in his forest, or very near to it, had already made his topographical observations in order to lead the same life at Villers-Cotterêts as at Haramont.

In fact, he had made a circuit of the neighborhood, in which he had convinced himself that the best pools were those on the road to Dampleux, that to Compiègne and that to Vivières, and that the best district for game was that of the Wolf's Heath.

Pitou, having made this survey, took all the necessary measures for pursuing his juvenile sport.

The thing most easy to be procured, as it did not require any outlay of capital, was bird-lime; the bark of the holly, brayed in a mortar and steeped in water, gave the lime; and as to the twigs to be limed, they were to be found by thousands on every birch-tree in the neighborhood. Pitou therefore manufactured, without saying a word to any one on the subject, a thousand of limed twigs and a pot of glue of the first quality; and one fine morning, after having the previous evening taken on his aunt's account at the baker's a four-pound loaf, he set off at daybreak, remained out the whole day, and returned home when the evening had closed in.

Pitou had not formed such a resolution without duly calculating the effect it would produce. He had foreseen a tempest. Without possessing the wisdom of Socrates, he knew the temper of his Aunt Angélique as well as the illustrious tutor of Alcibiades knew that of his wife Xantippe.

Pitou had not deceived himself in his foresight, but he thought he would be able to brave the storm by presenting to the old devotee the produce of his day's sport; only he had not been able to foretell from what spot the thunder would be hurled at him.

The thunderbolt struck him immediately on entering the house.

Mademoiselle Angélique had ensconced herself behind the door, that she might not miss her nephew as he entered, so that at the very moment he ventured to put his foot into the room, he received a cuff upon the occiput, and in which, without further information, he at once recognized the withered hand of the old devotee.

Fortunately, Pitou's head was a tolerably hard one, and although the blow had scarcely staggered him, he pretended, in order to mollify his aunt, whose anger had increased, from having hurt her fingers in striking with such violence, to fall, stumbling as he went, at the opposite end of the room; there, seated on the floor, and seeing that his aunt was returning to the assault, her distaff in her hand, he hastened to draw from his pocket the talisman on which he had relied to allay the storm, and obtain pardon for his flight. And this was two dozen of birds, among which were a dozen redbreasts and half-a-dozen thrushes.

Mademoiselle Angélique, perfectly astounded, opened her eyes widely, continuing to scold for form's sake; but although still scolding, she took possession of her nephew's sport, retreating three paces towards the lamp.

"What is all this?" she asked.

"You must see clearly enough, my dear little Aunt Angélique," replied Pitou, "that they are birds."

"Good to eat?" eagerly inquired the old maid, who, in her quality of devotee, was naturally a great eater.

"Good to eat!" reiterated Pitou; "well, that is singular. Redbreasts and thrushes good to eat! I believe they are, indeed!"

"And where did you steal these birds, you little wretch?"

"I did not steal them; I caught them."

"Caught them! how?"

"By lime-twigging them."

"Lime-twigging, — what do you mean by that?"

Pitou looked at his aunt with an air of astonishment; he could not comprehend that the education of any person in existence could have been so neglected as not to know the meaning of lime-twigging.

"Lime-twigging?" said he; "why, zounds! 't is lime-twigging."

"Yes; but, saucy fellow, I do not understand what you mean by lime-twigging."

As Pitou was full of compassion for the uninitiated, "Well, you see, Aunt," said he, "in the forest here there are at least thirty small pools; you place the lime twigs around them, and when the birds go to drink there, as they do not — poor silly things! — know anything about them, they run their heads into them and are caught."

"By what?"

"By the birdlime."

"Ah! ah!" exclaimed Aunt Angélique, "I understand; but who gave you the money?"

"Money!" cried Pitou, astonished that any one could have believed that he had ever possessed a penny; "money, Aunt Angélique?"

"Yes."

"No one."

"But where did you buy the birdlime, then?"

"I made it myself."

"And the lime-twigs?"

"I made them also, to be sure."

"Therefore, these birds —"

"Well, Aunt?"

"Cost you nothing?"

"The trouble of stooping to pick them up."

"And can you go often to these pools?"

"One might go every day."

"Good!"

"Only, it would not do."

"What would not do?"

"To go there every day."

"And for what reason?"

"Why, because it would ruin it."

"Ruin what?"

"The lime-twigging. You understand, Aunt Angélique, that the birds which are caught —"

"Well?"

"Well, they can't return to the pool."

"That is true," said the aunt.

This was the first time, since Pitou had lived with her, that Aunt Angélique had allowed her nephew was in the right, and this unaccustomed approbation perfectly delighted him.

"But," said he, "the days that one does not go to the pools one goes somewhere else. The days we do not catch birds, we catch something else."

"And what do you catch?"

"Why, we catch rabbits."

"Rabbits?"

"Yes; we eat the rabbits and sell their skins. A rabbit-skin is worth two sous."

Aunt Angélique gazed at her nephew with astonished eyes; she had never considered him so great an economist. Pitou had suddenly revealed himself.

"But will it not be my business to sell the skins?"

"Undoubtedly," replied Pitou; "as Mamma Madeleine used to do."

It had never entered the mind of the boy that he could claim any part of the produce of his sport excepting that which he consumed.

"And when will you go out to catch rabbits?"

"Ah! that 's another matter; when I can get the wires," replied Pitou.

"Well, then, make the wires."

Pitou shook his head.

"Why, you made the birdlime and the twigs."

"Oh, yes, I can make birdlime and I can set the twigs, but I cannot make brass wire; that is bought ready made at the grocer's."

"And how much does it cost?"

"Oh, for four sous," replied Pitou, calculating upon his fingers, "I could make at least two dozen."

"And with two dozen how many rabbits could you catch?"

"That is as it may happen, — four, five, six perhaps, — and they can be used over and over again if the gamekeeper does not find them."

"See, now, here are four sous," said Aunt Angélique; "go and buy some brass wire at Monsieur Dambrun's, and go to-morrow and catch rabbits."

"I will lay them to-morrow," said Pitou, "but it will only be the next morning that I shall know whether I have caught any."

"Well, be it so; but go and buy the wire."

Brass wire was cheaper at Villers-Cotterets than in the country, seeing that the grocers at Haramont purchased their supplies in the town; Pitou, therefore, bought wire enough for twenty-four snares for three sous. He took the remaining penny back to his aunt.

This unexpected probity in her nephew almost touched the heart of the old maid. For a moment she had the idea, the intention, of bestowing upon her nephew the penny which he had not expended; unfortunately for Pitou, it was one that had been beaten out with a hammer, and which, in the dusk, might be passed for a two-sous piece. Mademoiselle Angélique thought it would never do to dispossess herself of a coin by which she could make cent per cent, and she let it drop again into her pocket.

Pitou had remarked this hesitation, but had not analyzed it; he never could have imagined that his aunt would give him a penny.

He at once set to work to make his wires. The next day he asked his aunt for a bag.

"What for?" inquired the old maid.

"Because I want it," replied Pitou. — Pitou was full of mystery.

Mademoiselle Angélique gave him the required bag, put into it the provision of bread and cheese which was to serve for breakfast and dinner to her nephew, who set out very early for Wolf's Heath.

As to Aunt Angélique, she set to work to pick the twelve redbreasts which she had destined for her own breakfast and dinner. She carried two thrushes to the Abbé Fortier, and sold the remaining four to the host of the Golden Ball, who paid her three sous apiece for them, promising her to take as many as she would bring him at the same price.

Aunt Angélique returned home transported with joy. The blessing of heaven had entered beneath her roof with Ange Pitou.

"Ah!" cried she, while eating her robin-redbreasts, which were as fat as ortolans and as delicate as beccaficos, "people are right in saying that a good deed never goes unrewarded."

In the evening Ange returned; his bag, which was magnificently rounded, he carried on his shoulders. On this occasion Aunt Angélique did not waylay him behind the door, but waited for him on the threshold, and instead of giving him a box on the ear, she received the lad with a grimace which very much resembled a smile.

"Here I am!" cried Pitou, on entering the room with all that firmness which denotes a conviction of having well employed one's time.

"You and your bag," said Aunt Angélique.

"I and my bag," said Pitou

"And what have you in your bag?" inquired Aunt Angélique, stretching forth her hand with curiosity.

"Beech-mast," said Pitou.[1]

"Beech-mast!"

"Undoubtedly; you must understand, Aunt Angélique, that if old Father La Jeunesse, the gamekeeper at the Wolf's Heath, had seen me prowling over his grounds without my bag, he would have said to me, 'What do you come here after, you little vagabond?' And this without calculating that he might have suspected something; while having my bag, were he to ask me what I was doing there, I should say to him, 'why I am come to gather mast; is it forbidden to gather mast?' 'No.' 'Well, then, if it is not forbidden, you have nothing to say.' And indeed, should he say anything, Father La Jeunesse would be in the wrong."

[1] Beech-mast, we must inform our readers who are less acquainted with forest terms than we are, is the fruit of the beech-tree. This fruit, of which a very good sort of oil is made, is, to the poor, a species of manna, which during two months of the year falls for them from heaven.

[Dumas should also have told his readers that beech-mast is excellent for pigs, and that pheasants, and indeed most kinds of game, are very fond of it. — TRANSLATOR.]

"Then you have spent your whole day in gathering mast instead of laying your wires, you idle fellow!" exclaimed Aunt Angélique angrily, who, amidst all the cunning of her nephew, thought that the rabbits were escaping her.

"On the contrary, I laid my snares while he saw me at work gathering the mast."

"And did he say nothing to you?"

"Oh yes, he said to me, you will present my compliments to your aunt, Pitou. Hey! Is not Father La Jeunesse a kind, good man?"

"But the rabbits?" again repeated the old devotee, whom nothing could divert from her fixed idea.

"The rabbits? Why, the moon will rise at midnight, and at one o'clock I will go and see if there are any caught."

"Where?"

"In the woods."

"How! would you go into the woods at one o'clock in the morning?"

"To be sure."

"And without being afraid?"

"Afraid! of what?"

Angélique was as much astounded at Pitou's courage as she had been astonished at his calculations.

The fact is, that Pitou, as simple as a child of nature, knew nothing of those factitious dangers which terrify children born in cities.

Therefore at midnight he went his way, walking along the churchyard wall without once looking back. The innocent youth who had never offended, at least according to his ideas of independence, either God or man, feared not the dead more than he did the living.

There was only one person of whom he felt any sort of apprehension, and this was Father La Jeunesse; and therefore did he take the precaution to go somewhat out of his way to pass by his house. As the doors and shutters were all closed, and there was no light to be perceived, Pitou, in order to assure himself that the keeper was really at home and not upon the watch, began to imitate the barking of a dog, and so perfectly that Ronflot, the keeper's terrier, was deceived by it, and answered it by giving tongue with all his might, and by sniffing the air under the door.

From that moment Pitou was perfectly reassured; as Ronflot was at home, Father La Jeunesse must be there also. Ronflot and Father La Jeunesse were inseparable; and at the moment the one was seen, it was certain that the other would soon make his appearance.

Pitou, being perfectly satisfied of this fact, went on towards the Wolf's Heath. The snares had done their work; two rabbits had been caught and strangled.

Pitou put them into the capacious pocket of that coat, which, then too long for him, was destined within a year to become too short, and then returned to his aunt's house.

The old maid had gone to bed, but her cupidity had kept her awake; like Perrette, she had been calculating what her rabbit-skins might produce, and this calculation had led her on so far, that she had not been able to close her eyes; and therefore was it with nervous tremulation that she asked the boy what success he had had.

"A couple," said he. "Ah! the deuce! Aunt Angélique, it is not my fault that I have not brought more, but it appears that Father Jeunesse's rabbits are of a cunning sort."

The hopes of Aunt Angélique were fulfilled, and even more. She seized, trembling with joy, the two unlucky quadrupeds and examined their skins, which had remained intact, and locked them up in her meat-safe, which never had seen such provisions as those it had contained since Pitou had hit upon the idea of supplying it.

Then, in a very honeyed tone, she advised Pitou to go to bed, which the lad, who was much fatigued, did instantly, and that without even asking for his supper, which raised him greatly in the opinion of his aunt.

Two days after this Pitou renewed his attempts, and on this occasion was more fortunate than the first. He brought home three rabbits. Two of them took the road to the Golden Ball, and the third that of the presbytery. Aunt Angélique was very attentive to the Abbé Fortier, who on his side strongly recommended her to the pious souls of the parish.

Things went on in this manner during three or four months. Aunt Angélique was enchanted, and Pitou found his position somewhat supportable. In fact, with the exception of the tender cares of his mother, Pitou led nearly the same life at Villers-Cotterets which he had done at Haramont. But an unexpected circumstance, which, however, might have been foreseen, at once dashed to the ground the milk-pitcher of the aunt and put a stop to the excursions of the nephew.

A letter had been received from Doctor Gilbert, dated from New York. On placing his foot on the soil of the United States the philosophic traveller had not forgotten his protégé. He had written to Master Niguet, the notary, to inquire whether his instructions had been carried into effect, and to claim the execution of the agreement if they had not been, or to cancel it altogether if the old aunt would not abide by her engagements.

The case was a serious one; the responsibility of the public officer was at stake; he presented himself at the house of Aunt Pitou, and with the doctor's letter in his hand called upon her to perform the promise she had made.

There was no backing out; all allegations as to ill-health were at once belied by the physical appearance of Pitou. Pitou was tall and thin. Every sapling of the forest was also thin and tall, but this did not prevent it from being in a perfectly healthy and thriving condition.

Mademoiselle Angélique asked for a delay of eight days, in order to make up her mind as to the trade or occupation in which she should place her nephew.

Pitou was quite as sorrowful as his aunt. The mode of life he led appeared to him a very excellent one, and he did not desire any other.

During these eight days there was no thought of going bird-catching or poaching; moreover, the winter had arrived, and in winter the birds find water everywhere; but some snow had fallen, and while that was on the ground Pitou did not dare go out to lay his snares. Snow retains the impression of footsteps, and Pitou possessed a pair of feet so huge that they gave Father La Jeunesse the greatest possible chance of ascertaining in four-and-twenty hours who was the skilful poacher who had depopulated his rabbit warren.

During these eight days the claws of the old maid again showed themselves. Pitou had once more found the aunt of former days, she who had caused him so much terror, and whom self-interest, the primum mobile of her whole life, had for a while rendered as smooth as velvet.

As the day for the important decision approached, the temper of the old maid became more and more crabbed, and to such a degree that, about the fifth day, Pitou sincerely desired that his aunt would immediately decide upon some trade, be it what it might, provided it should no longer be that of the scolded drudge which he had been filling in the old maid's house.

Suddenly a sublime idea struck the mind of the old woman who had been so cruelly agitated. This idea restored her equanimity, which for six days had altogether abandoned her.

This idea consisted in entreating the Abbé Fortier to receive into his school, and this without any remuneration whatever, poor Pitou, and enable him to obtain the purse for entering the seminary, founded by his highness the Duke of Orleans. This was an apprenticeship which would cost nothing to Aunt Angélique; and Monsieur Fortier, without taking into calculation the thrushes, blackbirds, and rabbits with which the old devotee had so abundantly supplied him for the last month, was bound to do something, more than for any other, for the nephew of the chair-letter of his own church. Thus kept as under a glass frame, Ange would continue to be profitable to her at the present time, and promised to be much more so in the future.

Consequently Ange was received into the Abbé Fortier's school without any charge for his education. This abbé was a worthy man, and not in any way interested, giving his knowledge to the poor in mind, and his money to the poor in body. He was, however, intractable on one single point; solecisms rendered him altogether furious, barbarisms would send him almost out of his mind; on these occasions he considered neither friends nor foes, neither poor nor rich, nor paying pupils nor gratuitous scholars; he struck all with agrarian impartiality and with Lacedemonian stoicism, and as his arm was strong, he struck severely.

This was well known to the parents, and it was for them to decide whether they would or would not send their sons to the Abbé Fortier's school; or if they did send them there, they knew they must abandon them entirely to his mercy, for when any maternal complaint was made to him, the abbé always replied to it by this device, which he had engraved on the handle of his cane and on that of his cat-o'-nine-tails, "Who loves well chastises well."

Upon the recommendation of his aunt, Ange Pitou was therefore received by the Abbé Fortier. The old devotee, quite proud of this reception, — which was much less agreeable to Pitou, whose wandering and independent mode of life it altogether destroyed, — presented herself to Master Niguet, and told him that she had not only conformed to her agreement with Doctor Gilbert, but had even gone beyond it. In fact, Doctor Gilbert had demanded for Ange Pitou an honorable means of living, and she gave him much more than this, since she gave him an excellent education. And where was it that she gave him this education? Why, in the very academy in which Sebastian Gilbert received his, and for which he paid no less than fifty livres per month.

It was indeed true that Ange Pitou received his education gratis; but there was no necessity whatever for letting Doctor Gilbert into this secret. And if he should discover it, the impartiality and the disinterestedness of the Abbé Fortier were well known; as his sublime Master, he stretched out his arms, saying, "Suffer little children to come unto me;" only the two hands affixed to these two paternal arms were armed, the one with a Latin grammar, and the other with a large birch rod; so that in the greater number of instances, instead of, like the Saviour, receiving the children weeping and sending them away consoled, the Abbé Fortier saw the children approach him with terror in their countenances and sent them away weeping.

The new scholar made his entrance into the schoolroom with an old trunk under his arm, a horn inkstand in his hand, and two or three stumps of pens stuck behind his ears. The old trunk was intended to supply, as it best might, the absence of a regular desk. The inkstand was a gift from the grocer, and Mademoiselle Angélique had picked up the stumps of pens at Monsieur Niguet, the notary's, when she had paid him a visit the evening before.

Ange Pitou was welcomed with that fraternal gentleness which is born in children and perpetuated in grown men, — that is to say, with hootings. The whole time devoted to the morning class was passed in making game of him. Two of the scholars were kept for laughing at his yellow hair, and two others for ridiculing his marvellous knees, of which we have already slightly made mention. The two latter had said that each of Pitou's legs looked like a well-rope in which a knot had been tied. This jest was attended with great success, had gone round the room and excited general hilarity, and consequently the susceptibility of the Abbé Fortier.

Therefore, the account being made up at noon when about to leave the school, — that is to say, after having remained four hours in class, — Pitou, without having addressed a single word to any one, without having done anything but gape behind his trunk, Pitou had made six enemies in the school; six enemies, so much the more inveterate that he had not inflicted any wrong upon them, and therefore did they over the fire-stove, which in the schoolroom represented the altar of their country, swear a solemn oath, some to tear out his yellow hair, others to punch out his earthenware blue eyes, and the remainder to straighten his crooked knees.

Pitou was altogether ignorant of these hostile intentions. As he was going out he asked a boy near him why six of their comrades remained in school, when all the rest were leaving it.

The boy looked askance at Pitou, called him a shabby tale-bearer, and went away, unwilling to enter into conversation with him.

Pitou asked himself how it could have happened that he, not having uttered a single word during the whole time, could be called a shabby tale-bearer. But while the class had lasted he had heard so many things said, either by the pupils or by the Abbé Fortier, which he could in no way comprehend, that he classed this accusation of his schoolfellow with those things which were too elevated for him to understand.

On seeing Pitou return at noon, Aunt Angélique, with great ardor for the success of an education for which it was generally understood she made great sacrifices, inquired of him what he had learned.

Pitou replied that he had learned to remain silent. The answer was worthy of a Pythagorean; only a Pythagorean would have made it by a sign.

The new scholar returned to school at one o'clock without too much repugnance. The hours of study in the morning had been passed by the pupils in examining the physical appearance of Pitou; those of the afternoon were employed by the professor in examining his moral capabilities. This examination being made, the Abbé Fortier remained convinced that Pitou had every possible disposition to become a Robinson Crusoe, but very little chance of ever becoming a Fontenelle or a Bossuet.

During the whole time that the class lasted, and which was much more fatiguing to the future seminarist than that of the morning, the scholars who had been punished on account of him repeatedly held up their fists to him. In all countries, whether blessed with civilization or not, this demonstration is considered as a sign of threat. Pitou therefore determined to be on his guard.

Our hero was not mistaken. On leaving, or rather when he had left, and got clear away from all the dependencies of the collegiate house, it was notified to Pitou by the six scholars who had been kept in the morning, that he would have to pay for the two hours of arbitrary detention, with damages, interest and capital.

Pitou at once understood that he would have to fight a pugilistic duel. Although he was far from having studied the fifth book of the Æneid, in which young Dares and the old Entellus give proofs of their great skill in this manly exercise before the loudly applauding Trojan fugitives, he knew something of this species of recreation, to which the country people in his village were not altogether strangers. He therefore declared that he was ready to enter the lists with either of his adversaries who might wish to begin, and to combat successively with all his six enemies. This demonstration began to raise the last comer in the consideration of his schoolfellows.

The conditions were agreed on as Pitou had proposed. A circle was soon formed round the place of combat, and the champions, the one having thrown off his jacket, the other his coat, advanced towards each other.

We have already spoken of Pitou's hands. These hands, which were by no means agreeable to look at, were still less agreeable to feel. Pitou at the end of each arm whirled round a fist equal in size to a child's head, and although boxing had not at that time been introduced into France, and consequently Pitou had not studied the elementary principles of the science, he managed to apply to one of the eyes of his adversary a blow so well directed that the eye he struck was instantly surrounded by a dark bistre-colored circle, so geometrically drawn that the most skilful mathematician could not have formed it more correctly with his compasses.

The second then presented himself. If Pitou had against him the fatigue occasioned by his first combat, on the other side, his adversary was visibly less powerful than his former antagonist. The battle did not last long. Pitou aimed a straightforward blow at his enemy's nose, and his formidable fist fell with such weight that instantly his opponent's two nostrils gave evidence of the validity of the blow by spouting forth a double stream of blood.

The third got off with merely a broken tooth; he received much less damage than the two former. The other three declared that they were satisfied.

Pitou then pressed through the crowd, which opened as he approached with the respect due to a conqueror, and he withdrew safe and sound to his own fireside, or rather to that of his aunt.

The next morning, when the three pupils reached the school, the one with his eye poached, the second with a fearfully lacerated nose, and the third with his lips swelled, the Abbé Fortier instituted an inquiry. But young collegians have their good points too. Not one of the wounded whispered a word against Pitou, and it was only through an indirect channel, that is to say, from a person who had been a witness of the fight, but who was altogether unconnected with the school, that the Abbe Fortier learned, the following day, that it was Pitou who had done the damage to the faces of his pupils, which had caused him so much uneasiness the day before.

And, in fact, the Abbé Fortier was responsible to the parents, not only for the morals, but for the physical state of his pupils. He had received complaints from the three families. A reparation was absolutely necessary. Pitou was kept in school three days: one day for the eye, one day for the bloody nose, and one day for the tooth.

This three days' detention suggested an ingenious idea to Mademoiselle Angélique. It was to deprive Pitou of his dinner every time that the Abbé Fortier kept him in school. This determination must necessarily have an advantageous effect on Pitou's education, since it would naturally induce him to think twice before committing a fault which would subject him to this double punishment.

Only, Pitou could never rightly comprehend why it was that he had been called a tale-bearer, when he had not opened his lips, and why it was he had been punished for beating those who had wished to beat him; but if people were to comprehend everything that happens in this world, they would lose one of the principal charms of life, — that of mystery and the unforeseen.

Pitou was therefore detained three days in school, and during those three days he contented himself with his breakfast and supper.

Contented himself is not the word, for Pitou was by no means content; but our language is so poor, and the Academy so severe, that we must content ourselves with what we have.

Only that this punishment submitted to by Pitou, without saying a word of the aggression to which he had been subjected, and to which he had only properly replied, won him the esteem of the whole school. It is true that the three majestic blows he had been seen to deliver might also have had some little influence on his schoolfellows.

From that time forward the life of Pitou was pretty nearly that of most of the scholars, with this sole difference, that from his compositions being more defective than those of any of the rest, he was kept twice as often as any of his condisciples.

But it must be said there was one thing in Pitou's nature which arose from the primary education he had received, or rather from that which he had not received, — a thing which is necessary to consider as contributing at least a third to the numerous keepings he underwent; and this was his natural inclination for animals.

The famous trunk which his Aunt Angélique had dignified with the name of desk, had become, thanks to its vastness, and the numerous compartments with which Pitou had decorated its interior, a sort of Noah's ark, containing a couple of every species of climbing, crawling, or flying reptiles. There were lizards, adders, ant-eaters, beetles, and frogs, which reptiles became so much dearer to Pitou from their being the cause of his being subjected to punishment more or less severe.

It was in his walks during the week that Pitou made collections for his menagerie. He had wished for salamanders, which were very popular at Villers-Cotterets, being the crest of François I., who had them sculptured on every chimney-piece in the chateau. He had succeeded in obtaining them; only one thing had strongly preoccupied his mind, and he ended by placing this thing among the number of those which were beyond his intelligence; it was, that he had constantly found in the water these reptiles which poets have pretended exist only in fire. This circumstance had given to Pitou, who was a lad of precise mind, a profound contempt for poets.

Pitou, being the proprietor of two salamanders, set to work to find a chameleon; but this time his search was altogether vain, and success did not attend his labors. Pitou at last concluded, from these unfruitful researches, that the chameleon did not exist, or at all events that it existed in some other latitude.

This point being settled, Pitou did not obstinately continue his search for the chameleon.

The two other thirds of Pitou's keepings-in were occasioned by those accursed solecisms and those confounded barbarisms, which sprang up in the themes written by Pitou as tares do in a field of wheat.

As to Sundays and Thursdays, days when there was no attendance at school, he had continued to employ them in laying his lime-twigs or in poaching; only, as Pitou was still growing taller, as he was already five feet six, and sixteen years of age, a circumstance occurred which somewhat withdrew Pitou's attention from his favorite occupations.

Upon the road to the Wolf's Heath is situated the village of Pisseleu, the same perhaps which gave a name to the beautiful Anne d'Heilly, the mistress of François I.

Near this village stood the farm-house of Father Billot, as he was called throughout the neighborhood, and at the door of this farm-house was standing, no doubt by chance, but almost every time when Pitou passed and repassed, a pretty girl from seventeen to eighteen years of age, fresh-colored, lively, jovial, and who was called by her baptismal name, Catherine, but still more frequently after her father's name, La Billote.

Pitou began by bowing to La Billote; afterwards he by degrees became emboldened, and smiled while he was bowing; then at last one fine day, after having bowed, after having smiled, he stopped, and although blushing deeply, ventured to stammer out the following words, which he considered as great audacity on his part:

"Good-day, Mademoiselle Catherine."

Catherine was a good, kind-hearted girl, and she welcomed Pitou as an old acquaintance. He was in point of fact an old acquaintance, for during two or three years she had seen him passing and repassing before the farm-gate at least once a week; only that Catherine saw Pitou, and Pitou did not see Catherine. The reason was, that at first when Pitou used to pass by the farm in this manner Catherine was sixteen years old and Pitou but fourteen. We have just seen what happened when Pitou in his turn had attained his sixteenth year.

By degrees Catherine had learned to appreciate the talents of Pitou, for Pitou had given her evidence of his talents by offering to her his finest birds and his fattest rabbits. The result of this was that Catherine complimented him upon these talents, and that Pitou, who was the more sensible to compliments from his being so little habituated to receive them, allowed the charm of novelty to influence him, and instead of going on straightforward, as heretofore, to the Wolf's Heath, he would stop half way, and instead of employing the whole of his day in picking up beech-mast and in laying his wires, he would lose his time in sauntering round Father Billot's farm, in the hope of seeing Catherine, were it only for a moment.

The result of this was a very sensible diminution in the produce of rabbit-skins, and a complete scarcity of robin-redbreasts and thrushes.

Aunt Angélique complained of this. Pitou represented to her that the rabbits had become mistrustful, and that the birds, who had found out the secret of his lime-twigs, now drank out of hollows of trees, or out of leaves that retained the water.

There was one consideration which consoled Aunt Angélique for this increase in the intelligence of the rabbits and the cunning of the birds, which she attributed to the progress of philosophy, and this was that her nephew would obtain the purse, enter the seminary, pass three years there, and on leaving it would be an abbé. Now, being housekeeper to an abbé had been the constant aim of Mademoiselle Angélique's ambition.

This ambition could not fail of being gratified for Ange Pitou, having once become an abbé, could not do otherwise than take his aunt for housekeeper, and above all, after what his aunt had done for him.

The only thing which disturbed the golden dreams of the old maid was, when speaking of this hope to the Abbé Fortier, the latter replied, shaking his head :—

"My dear Demoiselle Pitou, in order to become an abbé, your nephew should give himself up less to the study of natural history, and much more to De viris illustribus, or to the Selectæ è profanis scriptoribus."

"And which means?" said Mademoiselle Angélique, inquiringly.

"That he makes too many barbarisms and infinitely too many solecisms," replied the Abbé Fortier.

An answer which left Mademoiselle Angélique in the most afflicting state of vagueness and uncertainty.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE INFLUENCE WHICH A BARBARISM AND SEVEN SOLECISMS MAY HAVE UPON THE WHOLE LIFE OF A MAN.

THESE details were indispensable to the reader, whatever be the degree of intelligence we suppose him to possess, in order that he might comprehend the whole horror of the position in which Pitou found himself on being finally expelled from the school.

With one arm hanging down, the other maintaining the equilibrium of the trunk upon his head, his ears still ringing with the furious vituperations of the Abbé Fortier, he slowly directed his steps towards Pleux, in a state of meditation which was nothing more than stupor carried to the highest possible degree.

At last an idea presented itself to his imagination, and four words, which composed his whole thought, escaped his lips : —

"O Lord ! my aunt !"

And indeed what would Mademoiselle Angélique Pitou say to this complete overthrow of all her hopes ?

However, Ange Pitou knew nothing of the projects of the old maid, excepting as a faithful dog surmises the intentions of his master, that is to say, by an inspection of his physiognomy. Instinct is a most valuable guide, — it seldom deceives ; while reason, on the contrary, may be led astray by the imagination.

The result of these reflections on the part of Ange Pitou, and which had given birth to the doleful exclamation we have given above, was the apprehension of the violent outbreak of discontent to which the old maid would give way on receiving the fatal news. Now, he knew from sad experience the result of discontent in Mademoiselle Angélique. Only upon this occasion the cause of discontent arising from an incalculably important event, the result would attain a degree altogether incalculable.

It was under these terrific impressions that Pitou entered Pleux. He had taken a quarter of an hour to traverse the distance between the great gate at the Abbé Fortier's and the entrance to this street, and yet it was scarcely three hundred yards.

At that moment the church clock struck one; he then perceived that his final conversation with the Abbé Fortier and the slowness with which he had walked had delayed him in all sixty minutes, and that consequently he was half an hour later than the time at which no more dinner was to be had in Aunt Angélique's abode.

We have already said that such was the salutary restraint which Aunt Angélique had added to his being kept in school, and on the wild ramblings of her nephew; it was thus that in the course of a year she managed to economize some sixty dinners at the expense of her poor nephew's stomach.

But this time, that which rendered more uneasy the retarded schoolboy was not the loss of his aunt's meagre dinner, although his breakfast had been meagre enough, for his heart was too full to allow him to perceive the emptiness of his stomach.

There is a frightful torment, well known to a student, however perverse he may be, and this is the illegitimate hiding in some retired corner, after being expelled from college; it is the definitive and compelled holiday which he is constrained to take advantage of, while his fellow-students pass by him with their books and writings under their arm, proceeding to their daily task. That college, formerly so hated, then assumes a most desirable form; the scholar occupies his mind with the great affairs of themes and exercises, to which he before so little directed his attention, and which are being proceeded with in his absence. There is a great similarity between a pupil so expelled by his professor and a man who has been excommunicated for his impiety, and who no longer has a right to enter the church, although burning with desire to hear a mass.

And this was why, the nearer he approached his aunt's house, his residence in that house appeared the more frightful to poor Pitou. And this was why, for the first time in his life, his imagination pictured to him the school as a terrestrial paradise, from which the Abbé Fortier, as the exterminating angel, had driven him forth, with his cat-o'-nine-tails wielded as a flaming sword.

But yet, slowly as he walked, and although he halted at every ten steps, — halts which became still longer as he approached nearer, — he could not avoid at last reaching the threshold of that most formidable house. Pitou then reached the threshold with shuffling feet, and mechanically rubbing his hand on the seam of his nether garment.

"Ah, Aunt Angélique, I am really very sick," said he, in order to stop her raillery or her reproaches, and perhaps also to induce her to pity him, poor boy.

"Good!" said Angélique. "I well know what your sickness is; and it would be cured at once by putting back the hands of the clock an hour and a half."

"Oh, good heavens, no!" cried Pitou; "for I am not hungry."

Aunt Angélique was surprised and almost anxious. Sickness equally alarms affectionate mothers and crabbed stepmothers, — affectionate mothers from the dangers caused by sickness, and stepmothers from the heavy pulls it makes upon their purse.

"Well, what is the matter? Come, now, speak out at once," said the old maid.

On hearing these words, which were, however, pronounced without any very tender sympathy, Ange Pitou burst into tears; and it must be acknowledged that the wry faces he made when proceeding from complaints to tears were the most terrifically ugly wry faces that could be seen.

"Oh, my good Aunt," cried he, sobbing, "a great misfortune has happened to me!"

"And what is it?" asked the old maid.

"The Abbé Fortier has sent me away," replied Ange, sobbing so violently that he was scarcely intelligible.

"Sent you away?" repeated Mademoiselle Angélique, as if she had not perfectly comprehended what he said.

"Yes, Aunt."

"And from where has he sent you!"

"From the school."

And Pitou's sobs redoubled.

"From the school?"

"Yes, Aunt."

"What! altogether?"

"Yes, Aunt."

"So there is to be no examination, no competition, no purse, no seminary?"

Pitou's sobs were changed into perfect howlings.

Mademoiselle Angélique looked at him, as if she would read the very heart of her nephew to ascertain the cause of his dismissal.

"I will wager that you have again been among the bushes instead of going to school. I would wager that you have again been prowling about Father Billot's farm. Oh, fie! and a future abbé!"

Ange shook his head.

"You are lying," cried the old maid, whose anger augmented in proportion as she acquired the certainty that the state of matters was very serious. "You are lying. Only last Sunday you were seen in the Lane of Sighs with La Billote."

It was Mademoiselle Angélique who was lying. But devotees have, in all ages, considered themselves authorized to lie, in virtue of that Jesuitical axiom, "It is permitted to assert that which is false, in order to discover that which is true."

"No one could have seen me in the Lane of Sighs," replied Pitou; "that is impossible, for we were walking near the orangery."

"Ah, wretch! you see that you were with her."

"But, Aunt," rejoined Pitou, blushing, "Mademoiselle Billot has nothing to do with this affair."

"Yes, call her mademoiselle, in order to conceal your impure conduct. But I will let this minx's confessor know all about it."

"But, Aunt, I swear to you that Mademoiselle Billot is not a minx."

"Ah! you defend her, when it is you that stand in need of being excused. Oh, yes; you understand each other better and better. What are we coming to, good heaven! and children only sixteen years old."

"Aunt, so far from there being any understanding between me and Catherine, it is Catherine who always drives me away from her."

"Ah! you see you are cutting your own throat; for now you call her Catherine, right out. Yes, she drives you away from her, hypocrite, when people are looking at you."

"Ho! ho!" said Pitou to himself, illuminated by this idea. "Well, that is true. I had never thought of that."

"Ah, there again!" said the old maid, taking advantage of the ingenuous exclamation of her nephew to prove his connivance with La Billote; "but let me manage it. I will soon put all this to rights again. Monsieur Fortier is her confessor. I will beg him to have you shut up in prison, and order you to live on bread and water for a fortnight; as to Mademoiselle Catherine, if she requires a convent to moderate her passion for you, well, she shall have a taste of it. We will send her to St. Remy."

The old maid uttered these last words with such authority, and with such conviction of her power, that they made Pitou tremble.

"My good aunt," cried he, clasping his hands, "you are mistaken, I swear to you, if you believe that Mademoiselle Billot has anything to do with the misfortune that has befallen me."

"Impurity is the mother of all vices," sententiously rejoined Mademoiselle Angélique.

"Aunt, I again tell you that the Abbé Fortier did not send me away because I was impure; but he has dismissed me because I make too many barbarisms, mingled with solecisms, which every now and then escape me, and which deprive me, as he says, of all chance of obtaining the purse for the seminary."

"All chance, say you? Then you will not have that purse; then you will not be an abbé; then I shall not be your housekeeper?"

"Ah, good heaven, no! dear Aunt."

"And what is to become of you, then?" cried the old maid, in a savage tone.

"I know not," cried Pitou, piteously, raising his eyes to heaven. "Whatever it may please Providence to order," he added.

"Ah! Providence, you say. I see how it is," exclaimed Mademoiselle Angélique. "Some one has been exciting his brain. Some one has been talking to him of these new ideas; some one has been endeavoring to fill him with these principles of philosophy."

"It cannot be that, Aunt; because no one gets into philosophy before having gone through his rhetoric, and I have never yet been able to get even so far as that."

"Oh, yes!—jest—jest! It is not of that philosophy that I am speaking. I speak of the philosophy of the philosophers, you wretch. I speak of the philosophy of Monsieur Arouet; I speak of the philosophy of Monsieur Jean Jacques; of the philosophy of Monsieur Diderot, who wrote 'La Religieuse.'"

Mademoiselle Angélique crossed herself.

"'La Religieuse!'" cried Pitou; "what is that, Aunt?"

"You have read it, wretch!"

"I swear to you, Aunt, that I have not."

"And this is the reason why you will not go into the church."

"Aunt, Aunt, you are mistaken. It is the church that will not admit me."

"Why, decidedly, this child is a perfect serpent. He even dares to retort."

"No, Aunt; I answer, and that is all."

"Oh, he is lost!" exclaimed Mademoiselle Angélique, with all the signs of most profound discouragement, and falling into her favorite arm-chair.

In fact, "He is lost!" merely signified, "I am lost!"

The danger was imminent; Aunt Angélique formed an extreme resolve. She rose as if some secret spring had forced her to her feet, and ran off to the Abbé Fortier to ask him for an explanation, and above all to make a last effort to get him to change his determination.

Pitou followed his aunt with his eyes till she had reached the door, and when she had disappeared, he went to the threshold and watched her walking with extraordinary rapidity towards the Rue de Soissons. He was surprised at the quickness of her movements; but he had no longer any doubt as to the intentions of Mademoiselle Angélique, and was convinced that she was going to his professor's house.

He could therefore calculate on at least a quarter of an hour's tranquillity. Pitou thought of making a good use of this quarter of an hour which Providence had granted to him. He snatched up the remainder of his aunt's dinner to feed his lizards, caught two or three flies for his ants and frogs, then, opening successively a hutch and a cupboard, he set about feeding himself; for with solitude his appetite had returned to him.

Having arranged all these matters, he returned to watch at the door, that he might not be surprised by the return of his second mother.

Mademoiselle Angélique had given herself the title of Pitou's second mother.

While he was watching, a handsome young girl passed at the end of the Pleux, going along a narrow lane which led from the end of the Rue de Soissons to that of the Rue de Lormet. She was seated on a pillion on the back of a horse loaded with two panniers, the one full of fowls, the other of pigeons. It was Catherine. On perceiving Pitou standing at his door, she stopped.

Pitou, according to custom, blushed, then remained with his mouth wide open, looking at, that is to say, admiring, — for Mademoiselle Billot was in his eyes the most heavenly sample of human beauty.

The young girl darted a glancé into the street, saluted Pitou with a little graceful nod, and continued on her way.

Pitou replied to it, trembling with satisfaction.

This little scene lasted just time enough to occupy the tall scholar's attention, who was quite lost in his contemplation, and continued eagerly gazing at the spot where Mademoiselle Catherine had appeared, so as to prevent him from perceiving his aunt when she returned from the Abbé Fortier, who suddenly seized his hand, turning pale with anger.

Ange being thus startlingly awakened from his sweet dream by that electrical shock which the touch of Mademoiselle Angélique always communicated to him, turned round, and seeing that the enraged looks of his aunt were fixed upon his hand, cast his own eyes down upon it, and saw with horror that it was holding the half of a large round of bread upon which he had apparently spread a too generous layer of butter, with a corresponding slice of cheese.

Mademoiselle Angélique uttered a cry of terror, and Pitou a groan of alarm; Angélique raised her bony hand, Pitou bobbed down his head; Angélique seized a broom-handle which unluckily was but too near her, Pitou let fall his slice of bread-and-butter, and took to his heels without further explanation.

These two hearts now understood each other, and felt that henceforth there could be no communion between them.

Mademoiselle Angélique went into her house and double-locked the door. Pitou, whom the grating noise alarmed as a continuation of the storm, ran on still faster.

From this scene resulted an effect which Mademoiselle Angélique was very far from foreseeing, and which certainly Pitou in no way expected.

CHAPTER V.

A PHILOSOPHICAL FARMER.

PITOU ran as if all the demons of the infernal regions were at his heels, and in a few seconds he was outside the town.

On turning round the corner of the cemetery, he very nearly ran his head against the hind part of a horse.

"Why, good Lord!" cried a sweet voice well known to Pitou, "where are you running to at this rate, Monsieur Ange? You have very nearly made Cadet run away with me, you frightened us both so much."

"Ah, Mademoiselle Catherine!" cried Pitou, replying rather to his own thoughts than to the question of the young girl. "Ah, Mademoiselle Catherine, what a misfortune! great God, what a misfortune!"

"Oh, you quite terrify me!" said the young girl, pulling up her horse in the middle of the road. "What, then, has happened, Monsieur Ange?"

"What has happened!" said Pitou; and then, lowering his voice as if about to reveal some mysterious iniquity, "why, it is, that I am not to be an abbé, Mademoiselle."

But instead of receiving the fatal intelligence with all those signs of commiseration which Pitou had expected, Mademoiselle Billot gave way to a long burst of laughter.

"You are not to be an abbé?" asked Catherine.

"No," replied Pitou, in perfect consternation; "it appears that it is impossible."

"Well, then, you can be a soldier," said Catherine.

"A soldier?"

"Undoubtedly. You should not be in despair for such a trifle. Good Lord! I at first thought that you had come to announce to me the sudden death of your aunt."

"Oh," said Pitou, feelingly, "it is precisely the same thing to me as if she were dead indeed, since she has driven me out of her house."

"I beg your pardon," said Catherine, laughing; "you have not now the satisfaction of weeping for her."

And Catherine began to laugh more heartily than before, which scandalized poor Pitou more than ever.

"But did you not hear that she has turned me out of doors?" rejoined the student, in despair.

"Well, so much the better," she replied.

"You are very happy in being able to laugh in that manner, Mademoiselle Billot; and it proves that you have a most agreeable disposition, since the sorrows of others make so little impression upon you."

"And who has told you, then, that, should a real misfortune happen to you, I would not pity you, Monsieur Ange?"

"You would pity me if a real misfortune should befall me! But do you not, then, know that I have no other resource?"

"So much the better again!" cried Catherine.

Pitou was perplexed.

"But one must eat!" said he; "one cannot live without eating! and I, above all, for I am always hungry."

"You do not wish to work, then, Monsieur Pitou?"

"Work, and at what? Monsieur Fortier and my Aunt Angélique have told me more than a hundred times that I was fit for nothing. Ah! if they had only apprenticed me to a carpenter or a blacksmith, instead of wanting to make an abbé of me! Decidedly, now, Mademoiselle Catherine," said Pitou, with a gesture of despair, "decidedly there is a curse upon me."

"Alas!" said the young girl, compassionately, for she knew, as did all the neighborhood, Pitou's lamentable story. "There is some truth in what you have just now said, my dear Monsieur Ange; but why do you not do one thing?"

"What is it?" cried Pitou, eagerly clinging to the proposal which Mademoiselle Billot was about to make, as a drowning man clings to a willow branch. "What is it; tell me?"

"You had a protector; at least, I think I have heard so."

"Doctor Gilbert."

"You were the schoolfellow of his son, since he was educated, as you have been, by the Abbé Fortier."

"I believe I was indeed, and I have more than once saved him from being thrashed."

"Well, then, why do you not write to his father? He will not abandon you."

"Why, I would certainly do so, did I know what had become of him; but your father perhaps knows this, Mademoiselle Billot, since Doctor Gilbert is his landlord."

"I know that he sends part of the produce of the farm to him in America, and pays the remainder to a notary at Paris."

"Ah!" said Pitou, sighing, "in America; that is very far."

"You would go to America, — you?" cried the young girl, almost terrified at Pitou's resolution.

"Who, I, Mademoiselle Catherine! Never, never! If

I knew where to go, and how to procure food, I should be very happy in France."

"Very happy!" repeated Mademoiselle Billot.

Pitou cast down his eyes. The young girl remained silent. This silence lasted some time. Pitou was plunged in meditations which would have greatly surprised the Abbé Fortier, with all his logic.

These meditations, though rising from an obscure point, had become lucid; then they again became confused, though brilliant, like the lightning whose origin is concealed, whose source is lost.

During this time Cadet had again moved on, though at a walk, and Pitou walked at Cadet's side, with one hand leaning on one of the panniers. As to Mademoiselle Catherine, who had also become full of thought, she allowed her reins to fall upon her courser's neck, without fearing that he would run away with her. Moreover, there were no monsters on the road, and Cadet was of a race which had no sort of relation to the steeds of Hippolytus.

Pitou stopped mechanically when the horse stopped. They had arrived at the farm.

"Well, now, is it you, Pitou?" cried a broad-shouldered man, standing somewhat proudly by the side of a pond to which he had led his horse to drink.

"Eh! good Lord! Yes, Monsieur Billot, it is myself."

"Another misfortune has befallen this poor Pitou," said the young girl, jumping off her horse, without feeling at all uneasy as to whether her petticoat hitched or not, to show the color of her garters; "his aunt has turned him out of doors."

"And what has he done to the old bigot?" said the farmer.

"It appears that I am not strong enough in Greek."

He was boasting, the puppy. He ought to have said in Latin.

"Not strong enough in Greek!" exclaimed the broad-shouldered man. "And why should you wish to be strong in Greek?"

"To construe Theocritus and read the Iliad."

"And of what use would it be to you to construe Theocritus and read the Iliad?"

"It would be of use in making me an abbé."

"Bah!" ejaculated Monsieur Billot, "and do I know Greek? do I know Latin? do I know even French? do I know how to read? do I know how to write? That does not hinder me from sowing, from reaping, and getting my harvest into the granary."

"Yes, but you, Monsieur Billot, you are not an abbé; you are a cultivator of the earth, agricola, as Virgil says. O fortunatos nimium —"

"Well, and do you then believe that a cultivator is not equal to a black-cap; say, then, you shabby chorister you, is he not so, particularly when this cultivator has sixty acres of good land in the sunshine, and a thousand louis in the shade?"

"I had been always told that to be an abbé was the best thing in the world. It is true," added Pitou, smiling with his most agreeable smile, "that I did not always listen to what was told me."

"And I give you joy, my boy. You see that I can rhyme like any one else when I set to work. It appears to me that there is stuff in you to make something better than an abbé, and that it is a lucky thing for you not to take to that trade, particularly as times now go. Do you see now, as a farmer I know something of the weather, and the weather just now is bad for abbés."

"Bah!" exclaimed Pitou.

"Yes, we shall have a storm," rejoined the farmer, "and that ere long, believe me. You are honest, you are learned —"

Pitou bowed, much honored at being called learned, for the first time in his life.

"You can therefore gain a livelihood without that."

Mademoiselle Billot, while taking the fowls and pigeons out of the panniers, was listening with much interest to the dialogue between Pitou and her father.

"Gain a livelihood," rejoined Pitou; "that appears a difficult matter to me."

"What can you do?"

"Do! why, I can lay lime-twigs, and set wires for rabbits. I can imitate, and tolerably well, the notes of birds, can I not, Mademoiselle Catherine?"

"Oh, that is true enough!" she replied. "He can whistle like a blackbird."

"Yes, but all this is not a trade, a profession," observed Father Billot.

"And that is what I say, by heaven!"

"You swear, — that is already something."

"How, did I swear?" said Pitou. "I beg your pardon for having done so, Monsieur Billot."

"Oh, there is no occasion, none at all," said the farmer; "it happens also to me sometimes. Eh! thunder of heaven!" cried he, turning to his horse, "will you be quiet, hey? These devils of Perch horses, they must be always neighing and fidgeting about. But now, tell me," said he, again addressing Pitou, "are you lazy?"

"I do not know. I have never done anything but Latin and Greek, and —"

"And what?"

"And I must admit that I did not take to them very readily."

"So much the better," cried Billot; "that proves you are not so stupid as I thought you."

Pitou opened his eyes to an almost terrific width; it was the first time he had ever heard such an order of things advocated, and which was completely subversive of all the theories which up to that time he had been taught.

"I ask you," said Billot, "if you are so lazy as to be afraid of fatigue."

"Oh, with regard to fatigue, that is quite another thing," replied Pitou; "no, no, no; I could go ten leagues without being fatigued."

"Good! that's something, at all events," rejoined Billot; "by getting a few pounds of flesh more off your bones, you could set up for a runner."

"A few pounds more!" cried Pitou, looking at his own lanky form, his long arms and his legs, which had much the appearance of stilts; "it seems to me, Monsieur Billot, that I am thin enough as it is."

"Upon my word, my friend," cried Billot, laughing very heartily, "you are a perfect treasure."

It was also the first time that Pitou had been estimated at so high a price, and therefore was he advancing from surprise to surprise.

"Listen to me," said the farmer; "I ask you whether you are lazy in respect to work?"

"What sort of work?"

"Why, work in general."

"I do not know, not I; for I have never worked."

Catherine also began to laugh, but this time Père Billot took the matter in a serious point of view.

"Those rascally priests!" said he, holding his clenched fist towards the town; "and this is the way they bring up lads, in idleness and uselessness. In what way, I ask you, can this great stripling here be of service to his brethren?"

"Ah! not of much use, certainly; that I know full well," replied Pitou; "fortunately I have no brothers."

"By brethren I mean men in general," observed Billot. "Would you, perchance, insist that all men are not brothers?"

"Oh, that I acknowledge; moreover, it is so said in the gospel."

"And equals," continued the farmer.

"Ah! as to that," said Pitou, "that is quite another affair. If I had been the equal of Monsieur Fortier, he would not so often have thrashed me with his cat-o'-nine-tails and his cane; and if I had been the equal of my aunt, she would not have turned me out of doors."

"I tell you that all men are equal," rejoined the farmer, "and we will very soon prove it to the tyrants."

"Tyrannis," added Pitou.

"And the proof of this is, that I will take you into my house."

"You will take me into your house, my dear Monsieur Billot?" cried Pitou, amazed. "Is it not to make game of me that you say this?"

"No; come now, tell me, what would you require to live?"

"Zounds! about three pounds of bread daily."

"And with your bread?"

"A little butter or cheese."

"Well, well," said the farmer; "I see it will not be very expensive to keep you in food. My lad, you shall be fed."

"Monsieur Pitou," said Catherine, "had you not something to ask my father?"

"Who? I, Mademoiselle! Oh, good Lord, no!"

"And why was it that you came here, then?"

"Because you were coming here."

"Ah!" cried Catherine, "that is really very gallant; but I accept compliments only at their true value. You came, Monsieur Pitou, to ask my father if he had any news of your protector."

"Ah, that is true!" replied Pitou. "Well, now, how very droll! I had forgotten that altogether."

"You are speaking of our worthy Monsieur Gilbert?" said the farmer, in a tone which evinced the very high consideration he felt for his landlord.

"Precisely," said Pitou. "But I have no longer any need of him; and since Monsieur Billot takes me into his house, I can tranquilly wait his return from America."

"In that case, my friend, you will not have to wait long, for he has returned."

"Really!" cried Pitou; "and when did he arrive?"

"I do not know exactly; but what I know is, that he was at Havre a week ago; for I have in my holsters a packet which comes from him, which he sent to me as soon as he arrived, and which was delivered to me this very morning at Villers-Cotterets; and in proof of that, here it is."

"Who was it told you that it was from him, Father?" said Catherine.

"Why, zounds! since there is a letter in the packet —"

"Excuse me, Father," said Catherine, smiling, "but I thought that you could not read. I only say this, Father, because you make a boast of not knowing how to read."

"Yes, I do boast of it. I wish that people should say, 'Father Billot owes nothing to any man, — not even a schoolmaster. Father Billot made his fortune himself.' That is what I wish people to say. It was not, therefore, I who read the letter. It was the quartermaster of the gendarmerie, whom I happened to meet."

"And what did this letter tell you, Father? He is always well satisfied with us, is he not?"

"Judge for yourself."

And the farmer drew from his leather wallet a letter, which he handed to his daughter. Catherine read as follows: —

My dear Monsieur Billot, — I have arrived from America, where I found a people richer, greater, and happier than the people of our country. This arises from their being free, which we are not. But we are also advanced toward a new era. Every one should labor to hasten the day when the light shall shine. I know your principles, Monsieur Billot. I know your influence over your brother farmers, and over the whole of that worthy population of workmen and laborers whom you order, not as a king, but as a father. Inculcate in them principles of self-devotedness and fraternity, which I have observed that you possess. Philosophy is universal: all men ought to read their duties by the light of its torch. I send you a small book, in which all these duties and all these rights are set forth. This little book was written by me, although my name does not appear upon the titlepage. Propagate the principles it contains, which are those of universal equality. Let it be read aloud in the long winter evenings. Reading is the pasture of the mind, as bread is the food of the body.

One of these days I shall go to see you, and propose to you a new system of farm-letting, which is much in use in America. It consists in dividing the produce of the land between the farmer and landlord. This appears to me more in conformity with the laws of primitive society, and above all more in accordance with the goodness of God. Health and fraternity.

Honoré Gilbert,
Citizen of Philadelphia.

"Oh! oh!" cried Pitou; "this is a well-written letter."

"Is it not?" said Billot, delighted.

"Yes, my dear father," observed Catherine; "but I doubt whether the quartermaster of the gendarmerie is of your opinion."

"And why do you think so?"

"Because it appears to me that this letter may not only bring the doctor into trouble, but you also, my dear father."

"Pshaw!" said Billot; "you are always afraid. But that matters not. Here is the pamphlet; and here is employment ready found for you, Pitou. In the evenings you shall read it."

"And in the daytime?"

"In the daytime you will take care of the sheep and cows. In the mean time, there is your pamphlet."

And the farmer took from one of his holsters one of those small pamphlets with a red cover of which so great a number were published in those days, either with or without permission of the authorities.

Only, in the latter case, the author ran the risk of of being sent to the galleys.

"Read me the title of that book, Pitou, that I may always speak of the title until I shall be able to speak of the work itself. You shall read the remainder to me another time."

Pitou read on the first page these words, which habit has since rendered very vague and very insignificant, but which at that period struck to the very fibres of all hearts:

"Of the Independence of Man, and the Liberty of Nations."

"What do you say to that, Pitou?" inquired the farmer.

"I say that it appears to me, Monsieur Billot, that independence and liberty are the same thing. My protector would be turned out of Monsieur Fortier's class for being guilty of a pleonasm."

"Pleonasm or not," cried the farmer, "that book is the book of a man."

"That matters not, Father," said Catherine, with woman's admirable instinct. "Hide it, I entreat you! It will bring you into trouble. As to myself, I know that I am trembling even at the sight of it."

"And why would you have it injure me, since it has not injured its author?"

"And how can you tell that, Father? It is eight days since that letter was written; and it could not have taken eight days for the parcel to have come from Havre. I also have received a letter this morning."

"And from whom?"

"From Sebastian Gilbert, who has written to make inquiries. He desires me, even, to remember him to his foster-brother, Pitou. I had forgotten to deliver his message."

"Well!"

"Well! he says that for three days he had been expecting his father's arrival in Paris, and that he had not arrived."

"Mademoiselle is right," said Pitou. "It seems to me that this non-arrival is disquieting."

"Hold your tongue, you timid fellow, and read the doctor's treatise," said the farmer; "then you will become not only learned, but a man."

It was thus people spoke in those days; for they were at the preface of that great Grecian and Roman history which the French nation imitated, during ten years, in all its phases, devotedness, proscriptions, victories, and slavery.

Pitou put the book under his arm with so solemn a gesture that he completely gained the farmer's heart.

"And now," said Billot, "have you dined?"

"No, sir," replied Pitou, maintaining the semi-religious, semi-heroic attitude he had assumed since the book had been intrusted to his care.

"He was just going to get his dinner, when he was driven out of doors," said the young girl.

"Well, then," said Billot, "go in and ask my wife for the usual farm fare, and to-morrow you shall enter on your functions."

Pitou, with an eloquent look, thanked Monsieur Billot, and, led by Catherine, entered the kitchen, — a domain placed under the absolute direction of Madame Billot.

CHAPTER VI.

PASTORAL SCENES.

MADAME BILLOT was a stout, buxom mamma, between thirty-five and thirty-six years old, round as a ball, fresh-colored, smooth-skinned, and cordial in her manners. She trotted continually from the fowl-house to the dove-cote, from the sheep-pens to the cow-stable. She inspected the simmering of her soup, the stoves on which her fricassees and ragouts were cooking, and the spit on which the joint was roasting, as does a general when surveying his cantonments, judging by a mere glance whether everything was in its right place, and by their very odor, whether the thyme and laurel-leaves were distributed in due proportions in the stewpans. She scolded from habit, but without the slightest intention that her scolding should be disagreeable; and her husband, whom she honored as she would the greatest potentate of the earth, did not escape. Her daughter also got her share, though she loved her more than Madame de Sevigné loved Madame de Grignan; and neither were her work-people overlooked, though she fed them better than any farmer in a circuit of ten leagues fed his. Therefore was it, that when a vacancy occurred in her household, there was great competition to obtain the place. But, as in heaven, unfortunately there were many applicants and comparatively but few chosen.

We have seen that Pitou, without having been an applicant, had been elected. This was a happiness that he appreciated at its just value, especially when he saw the well-browned loaf which was placed at his left hand, the pot of cider which was on his right, and the piece of pickled pork on a plate before him. Since the moment that he lost his poor mother, and that was about five years since, Pitou had not, even on great festival days, partaken of such fare.

Therefore Pitou, full of gratitude, felt, as by degrees he bolted the bread which he devoured, and as he washed down the pork with large draughts of the cider, — therefore Pitou felt a vast augmentation of respect for the farmer, of admiration for his wife, and of love for his daughter. There was only one thing which disquieted him, and that was the humiliating function he would have to fulfil, during the day, of herding the sheep and cows, — a function so little in harmony with that which awaited him each evening, and the object of which was to instruct humanity in the most elevated principles of sociality and humanity.

It was on this subject that Pitou was meditating immediately after his dinner. But even in this reverie the influence of that excellent dinner was sensibly manifested. He began to consider things in a very different point of view from that which he had taken of them when fasting. The functions of a shepherd and a cow-driver, which he considered as so far beneath him, had been fulfilled by gods and demi-gods.

Apollo, in a situation very similar to his own, that is to say, driven from Olympus by Jupiter, as he, Pitou, had been driven from Pleux by his aunt, had become a shepherd, and tended the flocks of Admettus. It is true that Admettus was a shepherd-king; but then, Apollo was a god!

Hercules had been a cow-keeper, or something very like it, since — as we are told by mythology — he seized the cows of Geryon by the tail; for whether a man leads a cow by the tail or by the head depends entirely on the difference of custom of those who take care of them, and that is all; and this would not in any way change the fact itself that he was a cow-leader, that is to say, a cow-keeper.

And moreover, Tityrus, reclining at the foot of a beech-tree, of whom Virgil speaks, and who congratulates himself, in such beautiful verses, on the repose which Augustus has granted to him, — he also was a shepherd. And, finally, Melibæus was a shepherd, who so poetically bewails his having left his domestic hearth.

Certainly, all these persons spoke Latin well enough to have been abbés, and yet they preferred seeing their goats browse on the bitter cytisus to saying mass or to chanting vespers. Therefore, taking everything into consideration, the calling of a shepherd had its charms. Moreover, what was to prevent Pitou from restoring to it the poetry and the dignity it had lost? who could prevent Pitou from proposing trials of skill in singing, to the Menalcas and the Palemons of the neighboring villages? No one, undoubtedly. Pitou had more than once sung in the choir; and but for his having once been caught drinking the wine out of the Abbé Fortier's cruet, who, with his usual rigor, had on the instant dismissed the singing boy, this talent might have become transcendent. He could not play upon the pipe, 't is true, but he could imitate the note of every bird, which is very nearly the same thing. He could not make himself a lute with pipes of unequal thickness, as did the lover of Syrinx; but from the linden-tree or the chestnut he could cut whistles whose perfection had more than once produced the enthusiastic applause of his companions. Pitou therefore, could become a shepherd without great derogation of his dignity. He did not lower himself to this profession, so ill appreciated in modern days; he elevated the profession to his own standard.

Besides which, the sheepfolds were placed under the special direction of Mademoiselle Billot, and receiving orders from her lips was not receiving orders.

But, on her part, Catherine watched over the dignity of Pitou.

In the evening, when the young man approached her, and asked her at what hour he ought to go out to rejoin the shepherds, she said, smiling, —

"You will not go out at all."

"And why so?" said Pitou, with astonishment.

"I have made my father comprehend that the education you have received places you above the functions which he had allotted to you. You will remain at the farm."

"Ah! so much the better," said Pitou. "In this way, I shall not leave you."

The exclamation had escaped the ingenuous Pitou. But he had no sooner uttered it, than he blushed to his very ears; while Catherine, on her part, held down her head and smiled.

"Ah! forgive me, Mademoiselle. It came from my heart in spite of me. You must not be angry with me on that account," said Pitou.

"I am not angry with you, Monsieur Pitou," said Catherine; "and it is no fault of yours if you feel pleasure in remaining with me."

There was a silence of some moments. This was not at all astonishing, the poor children had said so much to each other in so few words.

"But," said Pitou, "I cannot remain at the farm doing nothing. What am I to do at the farm?"

"You will do what I used to do. You will keep the books, the accounts with the work-people, and of our receipts and expenses. You know how to reckon, do you not?"

"I know my four rules," proudly replied Pitou.

"That is one more than ever I knew," said Catherine. "I never was able to get farther than the third. You see, therefore, that my father will be a gainer by having you for his accountant; and as I also shall gain, and you yourself will gain by it, everybody will be a gainer."

"And in what way will you gain by it, Mademoiselle?" inquired Pitou.

"I shall gain time by it, and in that time I will make myself caps, that I may look prettier."

"Ah!" cried Pitou, "I think you quite pretty enough without caps."

"That is possible; but it is only your own individual taste," said the young girl, laughing. "Moreover, I cannot go and dance on a Sunday at Villers-Cotterets, without having some sort of a cap upon my head. That is all very well for your great ladies, who have the right of wearing powder and going bareheaded."

"I think your hair more beautiful as it is, than if it were powdered," said Pitou.

"Come, come, now; I see you are bent on paying me compliments."

"No, Mademoiselle, I do not know how to make them. We did not learn that at the Abbé Fortier's."

"And did you learn to dance there?"

"To dance?" inquired Pitou, greatly astonished.

"Yes — to dance?"

"To dance, and at the Abbé Fortier's? Good Lord, Mademoiselle! — oh! learn to dance, indeed!"

"Then, you do not know how to dance?"

"No," said Pitou.

"Well, then, you shall go with me to the ball on Sunday, and you will look at Monsieur de Charny while he is dancing. He is the best dancer of all the young men in the neighborhood."

"And who is this Monsieur de Charny?" demanded Pitou.

"He is the proprietor of the Château de Boursonne."

"And he will dance on Sunday?"

"Undoubtedly."

"And with whom?"

"With me."

Pitou's heart sank within him, without his being able to ascertain a reason for it.

"Then," said he, "it is in order to dance with him that you wish to dress yourself so finely."

"To dance with him — with others — with everybody."

"Excepting with me."

"And why not with you?"

"Because I do not know how to dance."

"You will learn."

"Ah! if you would but teach me, — you, Mademoiselle Catherine. I should learn much better than by seeing Monsieur de Charny, I can assure you."

"We shall see as to that," said Catherine. "In the mean time, it is bedtime. Good-night, Pitou."

"Good-night, Mademoiselle Catherine."

There was something both agreeable and disagreeable in what Mademoiselle Catherine had said to Pitou. The agreeable was, that he had been promoted from the rank of a cow-keeper and shepherd to that of book-keeper. The disagreeable was, that he did not know how to dance, and that Monsieur de Charny did know. According to what Catherine had said, he was the best dancer in the whole neighborhood.

Pitou was dreaming all night that he saw Monsieur de Charny dancing, and that he danced very badly.

The next day Pitou entered upon his new office, under the direction of Catherine. Then one thing struck him, and it was that, under some masters, study is altogether delightful. In the space of about two hours he completely understood the duties he had to perform.

"Ah, Mademoiselle!" exclaimed he, "if you had but taught me Latin, instead of that Abbé Fortier, I believe I never should have committed any barbarisms."

"And you would have become an abbé?"

"And I should have been an abbé," replied Pitou.

"So, then, you would have shut yourself up in a seminary, in which no woman would have entered."

"Well, now," cried Pitou, "I really had never thought of that, Mademoiselle Catherine. I would much rather, then, not be an abbé."

The good man Billot returned home at nine o'clock. He had gone out before Pitou was up. Every morning the farmer rose at three o'clock, to see to the sending out of his horses and his wagoners. Then he went over his fields until nine o'clock, to see that every one was at his post, and that all his laborers were doing their duty. At nine o'clock he returned to the house to breakfast, and went out again at ten. One o'clock was the dinner-hour; and the afternoon was, like the morning, spent in looking after the workmen. Thus the affairs of worthy Billot were prospering marvellously. As he had said, he possessed sixty acres in the sunshine, and a thousand louis in the shade; and it was even probable that, had the calculation been correctly made — had Pitou made up the account, and had not been too much agitated by the presence or remembrance of Mademoiselle Catherine, some few acres of land, and some few hundred louis more, would have been found than the worthy farmer had himself admitted.

At breakfast, Billot informed Pitou that the first reading of Dr. Gilbert's new book was to take place in the barn, two days after, at ten in the morning.

Pitou then timidly observed that ten o'clock was the hour for attending mass. But the farmer said that he had specially selected that hour to try his workmen.

We have already said that Father Billot was a philosopher.

He detested the priests, whom he considered as the apostles of tyranny; and finding an opportunity for raising an altar against an altar, he eagerly took advantage of it.

Madame Billot and Catherine ventured to offer some observations; but the farmer replied that the women might, if they chose, go to mass, seeing that religion had been made expressly for women; but as to the men, they should attend the reading of the doctor's work, or they should leave his service.

Billot, the philosopher, was very despotic in his own house. Catherine alone had the privilege of raising her voice against his decrees. But if these decrees were so tenaciously determined upon that he knitted his brows when replying to her, Catherine became as silent as the rest.

Catherine, however, thought of taking advantage of the circumstance to benefit Pitou. On rising from table she observed to her father that, in order to read all the magnificent phrases he would have to read on the Sunday morning, Pitou was but miserably clad; that he was about to play the part of a master, since he was to instruct others; and that the master ought not to be placed in a position to blush in the presence of his disciples.

Billot authorized his daughter to make an arrangement with Monsieur Dulauroy, the tailor at Villers-Cotterets, for a new suit of clothes for Pitou.

Catherine was right; for new garments were not merely a matter of taste with regard to Pitou. The breeches which he wore were the same which Dr. Gilbert had, five years before, ordered for him. At that time they were too long, but since then had become much too short. We are compelled to acknowledge, however, that, through the care of Mademoiselle Angélique, they had been elongated at least two inches every year. As to the coat and waistcoat, they had both disappeared for upwards of two years, and had been replaced by the serge gown in which our hero first presented himself to the observation of our readers.

Pitou had never paid any attention to his toilet. A looking-glass was an unknown piece of furniture in the abode of Mademoiselle Angélique; and not having, like the handsome Narcissus, any violent tendency to fall in love with himself, Pitou had never thought of looking at himself in the transparent rivulets near which he set his bird-snares.

But from the moment that Mademoiselle Catherine had spoken to him of accompanying her to the ball, from the moment the elegant cavalier, Monsieur de Charny's name had been mentioned, since the conversation about caps, on which the young girl calculated to increase her attractions, Pitou had looked at himself in a mirror, and, being rendered melancholy by the very dilapidated condition of his garments, had asked himself in what way he also could make any addition to his natural advantages.

Unfortunately, Pitou was not able to find any solution to this question. The dilapidation of his clothes was positive. Now, in order to have new clothes made, it was necessary to have ready cash ; and during the whole course of his existence Pitou had never possessed a single penny.

Pitou had undoubtedly read that, when shepherds were contending for the prize in music or in poetry, they decorated themselves with roses. But he thought, and with great reason, that although such a wreath might well assort with his expressive features, it would only place in stronger relief the miserable state of his habiliments.

Pitou was, therefore, most agreeably surprised when, on the Sunday morning, at eight o'clock, and at the moment he was racking his brains for some means of embellishing his person, Monsieur Dulauroy entered his room and placed upon a chair a coat and breeches of sky-blue cloth, and a large white waistcoat with red stripes.

At the same instant a sempstress came in, and laid upon another chair, opposite to the above-mentioned one, a new shirt and a cravat. If the shirt fitted well, she had orders to complete the half-dozen.

It was a moment teeming with surprise. Behind the sempstress appeared the hat-maker. He had brought with him a small cocked hat of the very latest fashion and of most elegant shape, and which had been fabricated by Monsieur Cornu, the first hat-maker in Villers-Cotterets.

A shoemaker had also been ordered to bring shoes for Pitou ; and he had with him a pair with handsome silver buckles made expressly for him.

Pitou could not recover his amazement ; he could not in any way comprehend that all these riches were for him.

In his most exaggerated dreams he could not even have dared to wish for so sumptuous a wardrobe. Tears of gratitude gushed from his eyelids, and he could only murmur out these words: —

"Oh! Mademoiselle Catherine! Mademoiselle Catherine! never will I forget what you have done for me."

Everything fitted remarkably well, and as if Pitou had been actually measured for them, with the sole exception of the shoes, which were too small by half. Monsieur Lauderau, the shoemaker, had taken measure by the foot of his son, who was four years Pitou's senior.

This superiority over young Lauderau gave a momentary feeling of pride to our hero; but this feeling of pride was soon checked by the reflection that he would either be obliged to go to the dance in his old shoes, or in no shoes at all, which would not be in accordance with the remainder of his costume. But this uneasiness was not of long duration. A pair of shoes which had been sent home at the same time to Farmer Billot fitted him exactly. It fortunately happened that Billot's feet and Pitou's were of the same dimensions, which was carefully concealed from Billot, for fear that so alarming a fact might annoy him.

While Pitou was busied in arraying himself in these sumptuous habiliments, the hairdresser came in and divided Pitou's hair into three compartments. One, and the most voluminous, was destined to fall over the collar of his coat, in the form of a tail; the two others were destined to ornament the temples, by the strange and unpoetical name of dog's-ears, — ridiculous enough, but that was the name given to them in those days.

And now there is one thing we must acknowledge, — and that is, that when Pitou, thus combed and frizzled, dressed in his sky-blue coat and breeches, with his rose-striped waistcoat and his frilled shirt, with his tail and his dog's-ear curls, looked at himself in the glass, he found great difficulty in recognizing himself, and twisted himself about to see whether Adonis in person had not redescended on the earth.

He was alone. He smiled graciously at himself; and with head erect, his thumbs thrust into his waistcoat pockets, he said, raising himself upon his toes: —

"We shall see this Monsieur de Charny!"

It is true that Ange Pitou in his new costume resembled, as one pea does another, not one of Virgil's shepherds, but one of those so admirably painted by Watteau.

Consequently, the first step which Pitou made on entering the farm-kitchen was a perfect triumph.

"Oh, mamma, only see," cried Catherine, "how well Pitou looks now!"

"The fact is, that one would hardly know him again," replied Madame Billot.

Unfortunately, after the first general survey which had so much struck the young girl, she entered into a more minute examination of the details, and found Pitou less good-looking in the detailed than in the general view.

"Oh, how singular!" cried Catherine! "what great hands you have!"

"Yes," said Pitou, proudly, "I have famous hands, have I not?"

"And what thick knees!"

"That is a proof that I shall grow taller."

"Why, it appears to me that you are tall enough already, Monsieur Pitou," observed Catherine.

"That does not matter; I shall grow taller still," said Pitou. "I am only seventeen and a half years old."

"And no calves!"

"Ah, yes, that is true, — none at all; but they will grow soon."

"That is to be hoped," said Catherine, "but no matter, you are very well as you are."

Pitou made a bow.

"Oh! oh!" exclaimed Billot, coming in at that moment, and also struck with Pitou's appearance. "How fine you are, my lad! How I wish your Aunt Angélique could see you now."

"And so do I," said Pitou.

"I wonder what she would say?"

"She would not say a word, she would be in a perfect fury."

"But, Father," said Catherine, with a certain degree of uneasiness, "would she not have the right to take him back again?"

"Why, she turned him out of doors."

"And, besides," said Pitou, "the five years have gone by."

"What five years?" inquired Catherine.

"The five years for which Doctor Gilbert left a thousand francs."

"Had he then left a thousand francs with your aunt?"

"Yes, yes, yes: to get me into a good apprenticeship."

"That is a man!" exclaimed the farmer. "When one thinks that I hear something of the same kind related of him every day. Therefore — for him," he added, stretching out his hands with a gesture of admiration, "will I be devoted in life and death."

"He wished that I should learn some trade," said Pitou.

"And he was right. And this is the way in which good intentions are thwarted. A man leaves a thousand francs that a child may be taught a trade, and instead of having him taught a trade, he is placed under the tuition of a bigoted priest who destines him for the seminary! And how much did she pay to your Abbé Fortier?"

"Who?"

"Your aunt."

"She never paid him anything."

"What? Did she pocket the two hundred livres a year, which that good Monsieur Gilbert paid!"

"Probably."

"Listen to me, for I have a bit of advice to give you, Pitou; whenever your bigoted old aunt shall walk off, take care to examine minutely every cupboard, every mattress, every pickle-jar —"

"And for what?" asked Pitou.

"Because, do you see, you will find some hidden treasure, some good old louis, in some old stocking-foot. Why, it must undoubtedly be so, for she could never have found a purse large enough to contain all her savings."

"Do you think so?"

"Most assuredly. But we will speak of this at a more proper time and place. To-day we must take a little walk. Have you Doctor Gilbert's book?"

"I have it here, in my pocket."

"Father," said Catherine, "have you well reflected upon this?"

"There is no need for reflection," replied the farmer, "when one is about to do a good thing, my child. The doctor told me to have the book read, and to propagate the principles which it contains; the book shall therefore be read, and the principles shall be propagated."

"And," said Catherine, timidly, "may my mother and I, then, go to attend mass?"

"Go to mass, my child; go with your mother," replied Billot. "You are women; we, who are men, have other things to think of. Come, Pitou, we must be off, for we are waited for."

Pitou bowed majestically to Madame Billot and Mademoiselle Catherine; then with head erect he followed the worthy farmer, proud of having been thus, for the first time, called a man.

CHAPTER VII.

IN WHICH IT IS DEMONSTRATED THAT ALTHOUGH LONG LEGS MAY BE SOMEWHAT UNGRACEFUL IN DANCING, THEY ARE VERY USEFUL IN RUNNING.

THERE was a numerous assemblage in the barn. Billot, as we have said, was much respected by his laborers, inasmuch as, though he scolded them unscrupulously, he fed and paid them well.

Consequently every one of them had hastened eagerly to accept his invitation.

Moreover, at this period the people had been seized with that extraordinary fever which pervades nations when nations are about to set themselves to work to produce some great change. Strange, new words, which until then had scarcely ever been uttered, issued from mouths which had never before pronounced them. They were the words, Liberty, Independence, Emancipation; and, strange to say, it was not only among the people that these words were heard; no, these words had been pronounced in the first place by the nobility, and the voice which responded to them was but an echo.

It was in the west that had first shone forth this light, which was destined to illuminate until it seared. It was in America that arose this sun, which, in accomplishing its course, was to make France one vast conflagration, by the light of which the affrighted nations were to read the word Republic traced in vivid characters of blood.

But notwithstanding this, meetings in which political affairs were discussed were less frequent than one would imagine. Men who had sprung up no one knew from where, apostles of an invisible deity, had traversed town and country, disseminating everywhere words in praise of liberty. The government, blinded heretofore, began at length to open its eyes. Those who were at the head of the immense machine denominated the "state," felt that some of its wheels were paralyzed, without being able to comprehend whence the obstacle proceeded. The opposition existed in all minds, if it had not yet instilled itself into all hands and arms; invisible, though present, though sensible, though threatening, and still more threatening from being like ghosts intangible, and from being divined although it could not be clutched.

Twenty or twenty-five husbandmen, all in the employment of Billot, had assembled in the barn.

Billot entered it, followed by Pitou. All heads were instantly uncovered, and they waved their hats to welcome their loved master. It was plainly visible that all these men were ready to meet death, should he but give the signal.

The farmer explained to the country-people that the pamphlet which Pitou was about to read to them was the work of Doctor Gilbert. The doctor was well known throughout the whole district, in which he was the proprietor of several farms, the one rented by Billot being the most considerable.

A cask had been prepared for the reader. Pitou ascended this extempore forum, and at once began.

It is to be remarked that people of the lower class, and I might almost venture to say, men in general, listen with most attention to that which they understand the least. It was evident that the general sense of the pamphlet escaped the perceptions of the most enlightened among this rustic auditory, and even of Billot himself. But in the midst of that obscure phraseology from time to time flashed, like lightnings in a dark sky charged with electricity, the luminous words, Independence, Liberty, Equality. Nothing more was necessary; shouts of applause burst forth; cries of "Long live Doctor Gilbert!" resounded on every side. Not more than one third of the pamphlet had been read; it was decided that the remainder should be delivered on the two following Sundays.

The auditors were therefore invited for the next Sunday, and every one of them promised to attend.

Pitou had well performed his part; he had read energetically and well. Nothing succeeds so well as success. The reader had taken his share of the plaudits which had been addressed to the work, and, submitting to the influence of this relative science, Billot himself felt growing within him a certain degree of consideration for the pupil of the Abbé Fortier. Pitou, already a giant in his physical proportions, had morally grown ten inches in the opinion of Billot.

But there was one thing wanting to Pitou's happiness; Mademoiselle Catherine had not been present at his triumph.

But Father Billot, enchanted with the effect produced by the doctor's pamphlet, hastened to communicate its success to his wife and daughter. Madame Billot made no reply; she was a short-sighted woman.

Mademoiselle Catherine smiled sorrowfully.

"Well, what is the matter with you now?" said the farmer.

"Father! my dear father!" cried Catherine, "I fear that you are running into danger."

"There, now; are you going to play the bird of ill omen? You are well aware that I like the lark better than the owl."

"Father, I have already been told to warn you that eyes are watching you."

"And who was it that told you this, if you please?"

"A friend."

"A friend? All advice is deserving of thanks. You must tell me the name of this friend. Who is he? Come, now, let us hear."

"A man who ought to be well informed upon such matters."

"But who is it?"

"Monsieur Isidore de Charny."

"What business has that fop to meddle in such matters? Does he pretend to give me advice upon my way of thinking? Do I give him advice upon his mode of dressing? It appears to me that as much might be said on one subject as the other."

"My dear father, I do not tell you this to vex you. The advice he gave me was well intended."

"Well, then, in return, I will give him my counsel, which you can on my behalf transmit to him."

"And what is that?"

"It is that he and his fellows take good care what they are about. They shake these noble gentlemen about very nicely in the National Assembly, and more than once a great deal has been said of court favorites, male and female. Let him forewarn his brother, Monsieur Oliver de Charny, who is out yonder, to look to himself, for it is said he is not on bad terms with the Austrian woman."

"Father," said Catherine, "you have more experience than we have; act according to your pleasure."

"Yes, indeed," murmured Pitou, whose success had given him great confidence, "what business has your Monsieur Isidore to make and meddle?"

Catherine either did not hear him, or pretended not to hear him, and the conversation dropped.

The dinner was got through as usual. Never did dinner appear so long to Pitou. He was feverishly impatient to show himself abroad with Mademoiselle Catherine leaning on his arm. This Sunday was a momentous day to him, and he resolved that the date, the 12th of July, should ever remain engraved upon his memory.

They left the farm at last at about three o'clock. Catherine was positively charming. She was a pretty, fair-haired girl, with black eyes, slight and flexible as the willows that shaded the small spring from which the farm was supplied with water. She was, moreover, dressed with that natural coquetry which enhances the attractions of every woman, and her pretty little fantastic cap, made with her own hands, as she had told Pitou, became her admirably.

The ball did not in general commence till six o'clock. Four village minstrels, mounted upon a small stage formed of planks, did the honors of this ball-room in the open air, on receiving a contribution of six shillings for every country dance.

While waiting for the opening of the dance, the company walked in the celebrated Lane of Sighs, of which Aunt Angélique had spoken, to see the young gentlemen of the town and the neighborhood play at tennis, under the direction of Master Farollet, tennis-master-in-chief to his Highness the Duke of Orleans. Master Farollet was considered a perfect oracle, and his decision in matters of chasse and passe, and service, was as irrevocable as were the laws of the Medes and Persians.

Pitou, without knowing why, would have very much desired to remain in the Lane of Sighs; but it was not for the purpose of remaining concealed beneath the shade of this double row of beech-trees that Catherine had attired herself in the becoming dress which had so much astonished Pitou.

Women are like the flowers which chance has brought forth in the shade: their tendency is always towards the light; and one way or the other they must expand their fresh and perfumed petals in the sunshine, though it withers and destroys them.

The violet alone, as is asserted by the poets, has the modesty to remain concealed; but then she is arrayed in mourning, as if deploring her useless, because unnoticed, charms.

Catherine, therefore, dragged away at Pitou's arm, and so successfully, that they took the path to the tennis-court. We must, however, hasten to acknowledge that Pitou did not go very unwillingly. He also was as anxious to display his sky-blue suit and his cocked hat, as Catherine was to show her Galatea cap and her shining short silk bodice.

One thing above all flattered our hero, and gave him a momentary advantage over Catherine. As no one recognized him, Pitou never having been seen in such sumptuous habiliments, they took him for some young stranger arrived in the town, some nephew or cousin of the Billot family; some even asserted that he was Catherine's intended. But Pitou felt too great an interest in proving his own identity, to allow the error to be of long continuance.

He gave so many nods to his friends, he so frequently took off his hat to his acquaintance, that at last the unworthy pupil of the Abbé Fortier was recognized in the spruce young countryman.

A sort of buzzing murmur quickly ran through the throng, and many of his former companions exclaimed, "Why, really, it is Pitou!" "Only look at Pitou!" "Did you see Ange Pitou?"

This clamor at length reached the ears of Mademoiselle Angélique; but as this clamor informed her that the good-looking youth pointed out by it was her nephew, walking with his toes turned out and his elbows gracefully curved, the old maid, who had always seen Pitou walk with his toes turned in and his elbows stuck to his ribs, shook her head incredulously, and merely said, —

"You are mistaken; that is not my pitiful nephew."

The two young people reached the tennis-court. On that day there happened to be a match between the players of Soissons and those of Villers-Cotterets, so that the game was very animated. Catherine and Pitou placed themselves close to the rope stretched to prevent the crowd from interfering with the players; it was Catherine who had selected this place as being the best.

In about a minute the voice of Master Farollet was heard, calling out, —

"Two in — go over."

The players effectually changed places; that is to say, they each went to defend their quarters and attack those of their adversaries. One of the players, on passing by, bowed to Catherine with a smile; Catherine replied by a courtesy, and blushed. At the same moment Pitou felt a nervous trembling shoot through Catherine's arm, which was leaning on his.

An unknown anguish shot through Pitou's heart.

"That is Monsieur de Charny," said he, looking at his companion.

"Yes," replied Catherine. "Ah! you know him, then?"

"I do not know him," replied Pitou, "but I guessed that it was he."

And, in fact, Pitou had readily conceived this young man to be Monsieur de Charny, from what Catherine had said to him the previous evening.

The person who had bowed to the young girl was an elegant gentleman, who might be twenty-three or twenty-four years of age; he was handsome, of good stature, well formed, and graceful in his movements, as are all those who have had an aristocratic education from their very cradle. All those manly exercises in which perfection can only be attained on the condition of their being studied from childhood, Monsieur Isidore de Charny executed with remarkable perfection; besides, he was one of those whose costume always harmonizes with the pursuit in which they are engaged. His hunting-dresses were quoted for their perfect taste; his attire in the fencing-room might have served as a pattern to Saint-Georges himself; and his riding-coats were — or rather appeared to be, thanks to his manner of wearing them — of a particularly elegant shape.

On the present occasion Monsieur de Charny, a younger brother of our old acquaintance the Count de Charny, was attired in tight-fitting pantaloons of a light color, which set off to great advantage the shape of his finely formed and muscular limbs; his hair was negligently dressed, as for the morning; elegant tennis sandals for the moment were substituted for the red-heeled shoe or the top-boots; his waistcoat was of white marsella, fitting as closely to his waist as if he had worn stays; and to sum up all, his servant was waiting upon the slope with a green coat embroidered with gold lace, for his master to put on when the match was ended.

The animation of the game communicated to his features all the charm and freshness of youth, notwithstanding his twenty-three years, the nightly excesses he had committed, and the gambling parties he had attended, which frequently the rising sun had illumined with its rays; all this had made sad havoc with his constitution.

None of these personal advantages, which doubtless the young girl had remarked, had escaped the jealous eyes of Pitou. On observing the small hands and feet of Monsieur de Charny, he began to feel less proud of that prodigality of nature which had given him the victory over the shoemaker's son, and he reflected that nature might have distributed in a more skilful manner over every part of his frame the elements of which it was composed.

In fact, with what there was too much in the hands, the feet, and the knees of Pitou, nature might have furnished him with a handsome, well-formed leg. Only, things were not in their right place: where a certain delicacy of proportion was required, there was an unnatural thickness; where a certain sleekness and rotundity would have been advantageous, there was an utter void.

Pitou looked at his legs with the same expression as the stag did of whom we have read in the fable.

"What is the matter with you, Monsieur Pitou?" said Catherine, who had observed his discontented looks.

Pitou did not reply: he could not explain his feelings; he therefore only sighed.

The game had terminated. The Viscount de Charny took advantage of the interval between the game just finished and the one about to commence, to come over to speak to Catherine. As he approached them, Pitou observed the color heightening in the young girl's cheeks, and felt her arm become more and more trembling.

The Viscount gave a nod to Pitou, and then, with that familiar politeness which the nobility of that period knew how to adopt with the citizens' daughters and grisettes, he inquired of Catherine as to the state of her health, and asked her to be his partner in the first dance. Catherine accepted. A smile conveyed the thanks of the young nobleman. The game was about to begin, and he was called for. He bowed to Catherine, and then left her with the same elegant ease with which he had approached her.

Pitou felt all the superiority which the man possessed over him, who could speak, smile, approach, and take leave in such a manner.

A month's study, employed in endeavoring to imitate the simple though elegant movements of Monsieur de Charny, would only have produced a ridiculous parody, and this Pitou himself acknowledged.

If Pitou had been capable of entertaining a feeling of hatred, he would from that moment have detested the Viscount de Charny.

Catherine remained looking at the tennis-players until the moment when they called their servants to bring their coats to them. She then directed her steps towards the place set apart for dancing, to Pitou's great despair, who on that day appeared to be destined to go everywhere but where he wished.

Monsieur de Charny did not allow Catherine to wait long for him. A slight change in his dress had converted him from a tennis-player into an elegant dancer.

The violins gave the signal, and he at once presented his hand to Catherine, reminding her of the promise she had made to dance with him.

That which Pitou experienced when he felt Catherine withdrawing her arm from within his, and saw the young girl blushing deeply as she advanced with her cavalier into the circle, was one of the most disagreeable sensations of his whole life. A cold perspiration stood upon his brow; a cloud passed over his eyes; he stretched out his hand and caught hold of the balustrade for support, for he felt that his knees, strongly constituted as they were, were giving way.

As to Catherine, she did not appear to have, and very probably even had not, any idea of what was passing in poor Pitou's heart. She was at once happy and proud, — happy at being about to dance, and proud of dancing with the handsomest cavalier of the whole neighborhood.

If Pitou had been constrained to admire Monsieur de Charny as a tennis-player, he was no less compelled to do him justice as a dancer. In those days the fashion had not yet sprung up of walking instead of dancing. Dancing was an art which formed a necessary part of the education of every one. Without citing the case of Monsieur de Lauzun, who had owed his fortune to the manner in which he had danced his first steps in the king's quadrille, more than one nobleman owed the favor he had enjoyed at court to the manner in which he had extended his legs or pointed the extremity of his toe. In this respect the Viscount was a model of grace and perfection, and he might, like Louis XIV., have danced in a theatre with the chance of being applauded, although he was neither a king nor an actor.

For the second time Pitou looked at his own legs, and was obliged to acknowledge that unless some great metamorphosis should take place in that portion of his individuality, he must altogether renounce any attempt to succeed in vying with Monsieur de Charny in the particular art which he was displaying at that moment.

The country dance having ended, — for Catherine it had scarcely lasted a few seconds, but to Pitou it had appeared a century, — she returned to resume the arm of her cavalier, and could not avoid observing the change which had taken place in his countenance. He was pale; the perspiration stood in beads upon his forehead, and a tear, half dried up by jealousy, shone in his humid eye.

"Ah! good heaven!" she exclaimed, "what is the matter with you, Pitou?"

"The matter is," replied the poor youth, "that I shall never dare to dance with you, after having seen you dance with Monsieur de Charny."

"Pshaw!" said Catherine, "you must not allow yourself to be cast down in this way; you will dance as well as you are able, and I shall not feel the less pleasure in dancing with you."

"Ah!" cried Pitou, "you say that, Mademoiselle, to console me; but I know myself, and I feel assured that you will always feel more pleasure in dancing with this young nobleman than with me."

Catherine made no reply, for she would not utter a falsehood, only, as she was an excellent creature, and had begun to perceive that something extraordinary was passing in the heart of the poor youth, she treated him very kindly; but this kindness could not restore to him his lost joy and peace of mind. Father Billot had spoken truly: Pitou was beginning to be a man, — he was suffering.

Catherine danced five or six country dances after this, one of which was with Monsieur de Charny. This time, without suffering less in reality than before, Pitou was, in appearance, much more calm. He followed with eager eyes each movement of Catherine and her cavalier. He endeavored from the motion of their lips to divine what they were saying to each other, and when, during the figures of the dance, their hands were joined, he tried to discern whether their hands merely touched or pressed each other when thus they came in contact.

Doubtless it was the second dance with De Charny that Catherine had been awaiting, for it was scarcely ended when the young girl proposed to Pitou to return to the farm. Never was proposal acceded to with more alacrity; but the blow was struck, and Pitou, while taking long strides which Catherine from time to time was obliged to restrain, remained perfectly silent.

"What is the matter with you?" at length said Catherine to him, "and why is it that you do not speak to me?"

"I do not speak to you, Mademoiselle," said Pitou, "because I do not know how to speak as Monsieur de Charny does. What would you have me say to you, after all the fine things which he whispered to you while dancing with you?"

"Only see how unjust you are, Monsieur Ange; why, we were speaking of you."

"Of me, Mademoiselle, and how so?"

"Why, Monsieur Pitou, if your protector should not return, you must have another found to supply his place."

"I am then no longer capable of keeping the farm accounts?" inquired Pitou, with a sigh.

"On the contrary, Monsieur Ange, it is the farm accounts which are no longer worthy of being kept by you. With the education that you have received, you can find some more fitting occupation."

"I do not know what I may be fit for, but this I know, that I will not accept anything better if I am to obtain it through the Viscount de Charny."

"And why should you refuse his protection? His brother, the Count de Charny, is, it would appear, in high favor at court, and has married an intimate friend of the Queen. He told me that if it would be agreeable to me he could obtain for you a place in the custom-house."

"Much obliged, Mademoiselle; but I have already told you that I am well satisfied to remain as I am, and unless, indeed, your father wishes to send me away, I will remain at the farm."

"And why in the Devil's name should I send you away?" cried a gruff voice, which Catherine tremblingly recognized to be that of her father.

"My dear Pitou," said Catherine in a whisper, "do not say a word of Monsieur Isidore, I beg of you."

"Well! why don't you answer?"

"Why, really, I don't know," said Pitou, much confused; "perhaps you do not think me sufficiently well informed to be useful to you?"

"Not sufficiently well informed, when you calculate as well as Barême, and when you read well enough to teach our schoolmaster, who notwithstanding thinks himself a great scholar? No, Pitou, it is God who brings to my house the people who enter it, and when once they are in it they shall remain there as long as God pleases."

Pitou returned to the farm on this assurance; but although this was something, it was not enough. A great change had taken place in his mind between the time of his going out and returning: he had lost a thing which, once lost, is never recovered; this was confidence in himself, and therefore Pitou, contrary to his usual custom, slept very badly. In his waking moments he recalled to mind Doctor Gilbert's book; this book was written principally against the nobility, against the abuses committed by the privileged classes, against the cowardice of those who submitted to them; it appeared to Pitou that he only then began to comprehend all the fine ideas which he had read that morning, and he promised himself, as soon as it should be daylight, to read again for his own satisfaction, and to himself, the masterpiece which he had read aloud and to everybody,

But as Pitou had slept badly he awoke late. He did not, however, the less determine on carrying into effect his project of reading the book. It was seven o'clock; the farmer would not return until nine; besides, were he to return earlier, he could not but approve an occupation which he had himself recommended.

He descended by a small staircase, and seated himself on a low bench which happened to be under Catherine's window. Was it accident that had led Pitou to seat himself precisely in that spot, or did he know the relative positions of that window and that bench?

Be that as it may, Pitou was attired in his old every-day clothes, which there had not yet been time to get replaced, and which were composed of his black breeches, his green cassock, and his rusty-looking shoes. He drew the pamphlet from his pocket and began to read.

We would not venture to say that on beginning to read, the eyes of Pitou were not, from time to time, turned from his book to the window; but as the window did not exhibit the fair face of the young girl in its framework of nasturtiums and convolvuli, Pitou's eyes at length fixed themselves intently on his book.

It is true that as his hand neglected to turn over the leaves, and that the more fixed his attention appeared to be, the less did his hand move, it might be believed that his mind was fixed upon some other object, and that he was meditating instead of reading.

Suddenly it apppeared to Pitou that a shade was thrown over the pages of the pamphlet, until then illuminated by the morning sun. This shadow, too dense to be that of a cloud, could therefore only be produced by some opaque body. Now, there are opaque bodies which are so delightful to look upon, that Pitou quickly turned round to ascertain what it was that thus intercepted his sunshine.

Pitou's hopes were, however, delusive. There was in fact an opaque body which robbed him of the daylight and heat which Diogenes desired Alexander not to deprive him of. But this opaque body, instead of being delightful, presented to his view a sufficiently disagreeable appearance.

It was that of a man about forty-five years old, who was taller and thinner than Pitou himself, dressed in a coat almost as threadbare as his own, and who was leaning his head over his shoulder, and appeared to be reading the pamphlet with a curiosity equal to Pitou's absence of mind.

Pitou was very much astonished; a gracious smile was playing round the lips of the dark-looking gentleman, exhibiting a mouth which had only retained four teeth, two in the upper and two in the lower jaw, crossing and sharpening themselves against each other, like the tusks of the wild boar.

"An American edition," said the man, with a strong nasal twang; "an octavo: 'On the Liberty of Man and the Independence of Nations, Boston, 1788.'"

While the black man was talking, Pitou opened his eyes with progressively increasing astonishment, so that when the man ceased speaking, Pitou's eyes had attained the greatest possible development of which they were capable.

"Boston, 1788. That is right, sir," replied Pitou.

"It is the treatise of Doctor Gilbert," said the gentleman in black.

"Yes, sir," politely replied Pitou, rising from his seat, for he had been told that it was uncivil to remain sitting when speaking to a superior; and in the still ingenuous mind of Pitou this man had the right to claim superiority over him.

But on getting up, Pitou observed something of a rosy color moving towards the window, and which gave him a significant glance. This rosy something was Mademoiselle Catherine. The young girl looked at him with an extraordinary expression, and made strange signs to him.

"Sir, if it is not being indiscreet," said the gentleman in black, who, having his back turned towards the window, was altogether ignorant of what was passing, "may I ask to whom this book belongs?"

And he pointed with his finger to the pamphlet which Pitou held in his hand.

Pitou was about to say that the book belonged to Monsieur Billot, when he heard the following words uttered in an almost supplicating tone: —

"Say that it is your own."

The gentleman in black, who was at that moment all eyes, did not hear these words.

"Sir," replied Pitou majestically, "this book belongs to me."

The gentleman in black raised his head, for he began to remark that the amazed looks of Pitou were from time to time diverted from him, to fix themselves on one particular spot. He saw the window, but Catherine had divined the movement of the gentleman in black, and, rapid as a bird, she had disappeared.

"What are you looking at, up yonder?" inquired the gentleman in black.

"Well, now," replied Pitou, smiling, "permit me to observe to you that you are very inquisitive, — curiosus, or rather avidus cognoscendi, as the Abbé Fortier, my preceptor, used to say."

"You say, then," rejoined the interrogator, without appearing in the slightest degree intimidated by the proof of learning which Pitou had just given, with the intention of affording the gentleman in black a higher idea of his acquirements than he had before entertained, — "you say, then, that this book is yours?"

Pitou gave his eyes a furtive glance, so that the window came within the scope of his visual organs. Catherine's head again appeared at it, and made him an affirmative sign.

"Yes, sir," replied Pitou. "You are, perhaps, anxious to read it, — Avidus legendi libri, or legendæ historiæ."

"Sir," said the gentleman in black, "you appear to be much above the position which your attire would indicate. Non dives vesitu sed ingenio. Consequently, I arrest you."

"How! you arrest me?" cried Pitou, completely astounded.

"Yes, sir; follow me, I beg of you."

Pitou no longer looked up in the air, but around him, and perceived two police sergeants who were awaiting the orders of the gentleman in black. The two sergeants seemed to him to have sprung up from beneath the ground.

"Let us draw up our report, gentlemen," said the gentleman in black.

The sergeants tied Pitou's hands together with a rope, while they took care to secure Doctor Gilbert's book.

Then they fastened Pitou himself to a ring which was in the wall under the window.

Pitou was about to exclaim against this treatment, but he heard the low voice which had so much influence over him, saying, "Let them do what they please."

Pitou therefore allowed them to do as they pleased, with a docility which perfectly enchanted the sergeants, and above all the gentleman in black; so that without the slightest mistrust they entered the farm-house, the two sergeants to fetch a table, the gentleman in black to — but this we shall learn by-and-by.

The sergeants and the gentleman in black had scarcely entered the house when the soft voice was again heard.

"Hold up your hands," said the voice.

Pitou not only held up his hands but his head, and he perceived the pale and terrified face of Catherine; she had a knife in her hand.

"Higher! higher!" said she.

Pitou raised himself on tiptoe.

Catherine leaned out of the window, the knife touched the rope, and Pitou recovered the liberty of his hands.

"Take the knife," said Catherine, "and in your turn cut the rope which fastens you to the ring."

It was not necessary to repeat this to Pitou. He cut the cord, and was then completely free.

"And now," said Catherine, "here is a double louis. You have good legs; make your escape. Go to Paris and acquaint the doctor —"

She could not complete the sentence. The two sergeants reappeared, and the double louis fell at Pitou's feet.

Pitou quickly snatched it up. The sergeants were on the threshold of the door, where they remained for a moment or two, astonished at seeing the man at liberty, whom so short a time before they had so securely tied up. On seeing them, Pitou's hair stood on end, and he confusedly remembered the in crinibus angues of the Eumenides.

The two sergeants and Pitou remained for a short time in the position of two pointer dogs and a hare, — motionless, and looking at each other. But as at the slightest movement of the dogs the hare springs off, at the first movement of the sergeants Pitou gave a prodigious bound, and leaped over a high hedge.

The sergeants uttered a cry which made the exempt rush out of the house, who had a small casket under his arm. The exempt did not lose any time in parleying, but instantly ran after Pitou ; the two sergeants imitated his example; but they were not active enough to jump, as he had done, over a hedge three feet and a half in height. They were therefore compelled to go round to a gate.

But when they reached the corner of the hedge, they perceived Pitou five hundred yards off in the plain, and hastening towards the forest, from which he was distant scarcely a quarter of a league, and which he would doubtless reach in some six or seven minutes.

At that moment Pitou turned round and on perceiving the sergeants, who were pursuing him rather from a desire to perform their duty than with the hope of catching him, he redoubled his speed, and soon disappeared in the skirts of the wood.

Pitou ran on at this rate for another quarter of an hour. He could have run two hours had it been necessary, for he had the wind of a stag, as well as its velocity.

But at the end of a quarter of an hour he felt instinctively that he must be out of danger. He stopped, drew breath, and listened ; and having assured himself that he had completely distanced his pursuers, he said to himself, —

"It is incredible that so many events can have been crowded into three days;" and he looked alternately at his double louis and his knife.

"Oh," said he, "I wish I had only time to change my double louis, and give two sous to Mademoiselle Catherine, for I am much afraid that this knife will cut our friendship. No matter," added he, "since she has desired me to go to Paris, let us go there."

And Pitou, having looked about him to ascertain what part of the country he had reached, and finding that he was between Bouronne and Yvors, took a narrow path which would lead him straight to Gondreville Heaths, which path was crossed by the road which led direct to Paris.

CHAPTER VIII.

SHOWING WHY THE GENTLEMAN IN BLACK HAD GONE INTO THE FARM AT THE SAME TIME WITH THE TWO SERGEANTS.

But now let us return to the farm, and relate the catastrophe of which Pitou's episode was the winding up.

At about six o'clock in the morning an agent of the Paris police, accompanied by two sergeants, arrived at Villers-Cotterets, had presented themselves to the Commissary of Police, and had requested that the residence of Farmer Billot might be pointed out to them.

When they came within about five hundred yards of the farm, the exempt perceived a laborer working in a field. He went to him and asked him whether he should find Monsieur Billot at home. The laborer replied that Monsieur Billot never returned home till nine o'clock, — that is to say, before the breakfast hour. But at that very moment, as chance would have it, the laborer raised his eyes, and pointed to a man on horseback, who was talking with a shepherd at the distance of a quarter of a league from the farm.

"And yonder," said he, "is the person you are inquiring for."

"Monsieur Billot?"

"Yes."

"That horseman?"

"Yes; that is Monsieur Billot."

"Well, then, my friend," rejoined the exempt, "do you wish to afford great pleasure to your master?"

"I should like it vastly."

"Go and tell him that a gentleman from Paris is waiting for him at the farm."

"Oh," cried the laborer, "can it be Doctor Gilbert?"

"Tell him what I say; that is all."

The countryman did not wait to have the order repeated, but ran as hard as he could across the fields, while the police-officer and the two sergeants went and concealed themselves behind a half-ruined wall which stood facing the gate of the farm-yard.

In a very few minutes the galloping of a horse was heard. It was Billot, who had hastened back.

He went into the farm-yard, jumped from his horse, threw the bridle to one of the stable-boys, and rushed into the kitchen, being convinced that the first person he should see there would be Dr. Gilbert, standing beneath the immense mantel-piece; but he only saw Madame Billot seated in the middle of the room, plucking the feathers from a duck with all the minute care which this difficult operation demands.

Catherine was in her own room, employed in making a cap for the following Sunday. As it appears, Catherine was determined to be prepared in good time; but if the women have one pleasure almost equal to that of being well-dressed, it is that of preparing the articles with which they are to adorn themselves.

Billot paused on the threshold of the kitchen, and looked around inquiringly.

"Who, then, was it sent for me?" said he.

"It was I," replied a flute-like voice behind him.

Billot turned round, and perceived the gentleman in black and the two sergeants.

"Hey-day!" cried he, retreating three paces from them; "and what do you want with me?"

"Oh, good heavens! almost nothing, my dear Monsieur Billot," said the man with the flute-like voice; "only to make a perquisition in your farm, that is all."

"A perquisition?" exclaimed the astonished Billot.

"A perquisition," repeated the exempt.

Billot cast a glance at his fowling-piece, which was hanging over the chimney.

"Since we have a National Assembly," said he, "I thought that citizens were no longer exposed to such vexations, which belong to another age, and which appertain to a bygone state of things. What do you want with me? I am a peaceable and loyal man."

The agents of every police in the world have one habit which is common to them all, — that of never replying to the questions of their victims; but while they are searching their pockets, while they are arresting them, or tying their hands behind, some appear to be moved by pity. These tender-hearted ones are the most dangerous, inasmuch as they appear to be the most kind-hearted.

The one who was exercising his functions in the house of Farmer Billot was of the true Tapin and Desgrés school, made up of sweets, having always a tear for those whom they are persecuting, but who nevertheless do not use their hands to wipe their eyes.

The one in question, although heaving a deep sigh, made a sign with his hand to the two sergeants, who approached Billot. The worthy farmer sprang backward, and stretched out his hand to seize his gun; but it was diverted from the weapon, — a doubly-dangerous act at such a moment, as it might not only have killed the person about to use it, but the one against whom it was to be pointed. His hand was seized and imprisoned between two little hands, rendered strong by terror and powerful by supplication.

It was Catherine, who had run downstairs on hearing the noise, and had arrived in time to save her father from committing the crime of rebelling against the constituted authorities.

The first moment of anger having passed by, Billot no longer offered any resistance. The exempt ordered that he should be confined in a room on the ground floor, and Catherine in a room on the first story. As to Madame Billot, she was considered so inoffensive that no attention was paid to her, and she was allowed to remain in the kitchen. After this, finding himself master of the place, the exempt began to search the secretaries, wardrobes, and chests-of-drawers.

Billot, on finding himself alone, wished to make his escape. But, like most of the rooms on the ground floor of the farm-house, the windows of the one in which he was imprisoned were secured by iron bars. The gentleman in black had at a glance observed these bars, while Billot, who had had them placed there, had forgotten them.

Then, peeping through the key-hole, he perceived the exempt and his two acolytes, who were ransacking everything throughout the house.

"Hilloa!" cried he; "what is the meaning of all this? What are you doing there?"

"You can very plainly see that, my dear Monsieur Billot," said the exempt. "We are seeking for something which we have not yet found."

"But perhaps you are banditti, villains, regular thieves. Who knows?"

"Oh, sir!" replied the exempt, through the door, "you do us wrong. We are honest people, as you are; only that we are in the pay of his Majesty, and consequently compelled to obey his orders."

"His Majesty's orders!" exclaimed Billot. "The king, Louis XVI., has ordered you to search my secretary, to turn everything topsy-turvy in my closets and my wardrobes?"

"Yes."

"His Majesty," rejoined Billot, "who last year, when there was such a frightful famine that we were thinking of eating our horses, — his Majesty, who two years ago, when the hail-storm of the 13th of July destroyed our whole harvest, did not then deign to feel any anxiety about us, — what has he now to do with my farm, which he never saw, or with me, whom he does not know?"

"You will pardon me, sir," said the exempt, opening the door a little, but with great precaution, and exhibiting his order, signed by the lieutenant of police, which, according to the usual form, was headed with these words, "In the king's name," — "his Majesty has heard you spoken of, although he may not be personally acquainted with you; therefore, do not refuse the honor which he does you, and receive in a fitting manner those who present themselves to you in his name."

And the exempt, with a polite bow, and a friendly wink of the eye, closed the door again; after which the search was resumed.

Billot said not a word more, but crossed his arms and paced up and down the room, like a lion in a cage. He felt that he was caught, and in the power of these men.

The investigation was silently continued. These men appeared to have dropped from the clouds. No one had seen them, but the laborer who had been sent to fetch Billot. The dogs even in the yards had not barked on their approach. Assuredly the chief of this expedition must have been considered a skilful man, even by his own fraternity. It was evidently not his first enterprise of this nature.

Billot heard the moanings of his daughter, shut up in the room above his own, and he remembered her prophetic words; for there could not be a doubt that the persecution to which the farmer had been subjected had for its cause the doctor's book.

At length the clock struck nine, and Billot through his grated window could count his laborers as they returned to the farm-house to get their breakfast. On seeing this, he reflected that, in case of any conflict, might, if not right, was not on his side. This conviction made the blood boil in his veins. He had no longer the fortitude to restrain his feelings; and seizing the door with both hands, he shook it so violently, that with two or three efforts of the same nature he would have burst the lock.

The police-agents immediately opened the door, and they saw the farmer standing close by it, with threatening looks. All was confusion in the house.

"But finally," cried Billot, "what is it you are seeking for in my house? Tell me, or, zounds! I will make you tell me."

The successive return of the laborers had not escaped the experienced eye of such a man as the exempt. He had counted the farm-servants, and had admitted to himself that in case of any combat he would not be able to retain possession of the field of battle. He therefore approached Billot with a demeanor more honeyed even than before, and bowing almost to the ground, said: —

"I will tell you what it is, dear Monsieur Billot, although it is against our custom. What we are seeking for in your house is a subversive book, an incendiary pamphlet, placed under ban by our royal censors."

"A book! — and in the house of a farmer who cannot read?"

"What is there astonishing in that, if you are a friend of the author, and he has sent it to you?"

"I am not the friend of Doctor Gilbert; I am merely his humble servant. The friend of the doctor, indeed! — that would be too great an honor for a poor farmer like me."

This inconsiderate outbreak, in which Billot betrayed himself by acknowledging that he not only knew the author, which was natural enough, he being his landlord, but that he knew the book, insured the agent's victory. The latter drew himself up, assumed his most amiable air, and touching Billot's arm, said, with a smile which appeared to distend transversely over his face: —

"'T is thou hast named him.' Do you know that verse, my dear Monsieur Billot?"

"I know no verses."

"It is by Racine, a very great poet."

"Well, what is the meaning of that line?" cried Billot.

"It means that you have betrayed yourself."

"Who — I?"

"Yourself."

"And how so?"

"By being the first to mention Monsieur Gilbert, whom we had the discretion not to name."

"That is true," said Billot.

"You acknowledge it, then?"

"I will do more than that."

"My dear Monsieur Billot, you overwhelm us with kindness: what is it you will do?"

"If it is that book you are hunting after, and I tell you where that book is," rejoined the farmer, with an uneasiness which he could not altogether control, "you will leave off turning everything topsy-turvy here, will you not?"

The exempt made a sign to his two assistants.

"Most assuredly," replied the exempt, "since it is that book which is the object of our perquisition. Only," continued he, with his smiling grimace, "you may perhaps acknowledge one copy of it when you may have ten in your possession."

"I have only one, and that I swear to you."

"But it is this we are obliged to ascertain by a most careful search, dear Monsieur Billot," rejoined the exempt. "Have patience, therefore; in five minutes it will be concluded. We are only poor sergeants obeying the orders of the authorities, and you would not surely prevent men of honor, — there are men of honor in every station of life, dear Monsieur Billot, — you would not throw any impediment in the way of men of honor when they are doing their duty."

The gentleman in black had adopted the right mode: this was the proper course for persuading Billot.

"Well, do it then," replied the farmer, "but do it quickly."

And he turned his back upon them.

The exempt then very gently closed the door, and more gently still turned the key in the lock, at which Billot shrugged his shoulders in disdain, being certain of pulling open the door whenever he might please.

On his side the gentleman in black made a sign to the sergeants, who resumed their investigation, and they set to work much more actively than before. Books, papers, linen, were all opened, examined, unfolded.

Suddenly, at the bottom of a wardrobe which had been completely emptied, they perceived a small oaken casket bound with iron. The exempt darted upon it as a vulture on his prey. At the mere sight, the scent, the handling of this object, he undoubtedly at once recognized that which he was in search of, for he quickly concealed the casket beneath his threadbare coat, and made a sign to the two sergeants that his mission was effected.

Billot was again becoming impatient; he stopped before the locked door.

"Why, I tell you again that you will not find it unless I tell you where it is," he cried; "it is not worth the while to tumble and destroy all my things for nothing. I am not a conspirator. In the Devil's name listen to me. Do you not hear what I am saying? Answer me, or I will set off for Paris, and will complain to the king, to the National Assembly, to everybody."

In those days the king was always mentioned before the people.

"Yes, my dear Monsieur Billot, we hear you, and we are quite ready to do justice to your excellent reasoning. Come, now, tell us where is this book? And as we are now convinced that you have only that single copy, we will take it, and then we will withdraw, and all will be over."

"Well," replied Billot, "the book is in the possession of an honest lad to whom I have given it with the charge of carrying it to a friend."

"And what is the name of this honest lad?" asked the gentleman in black, in an insinuating tone.

"Ange Pitou; he is a poor orphan whom I have taken into my house from charity, and who does not even know the subject of this book."

"Thanks, dear Monsieur Billot," said the exempt.

They threw the linen back into the wardrobe, and locked it up again, but the casket was not there.

"And where is this amiable youth to be found?"

"I think I saw him as I returned, somewhere near the bed of scarlet-runners, close to the arbor. Go, take the book from him; but take care not to do him any injury."

"Injury! Oh, my dear Monsieur Billot, how little you know us! We would not harm even a fly."

And they went towards the indicated spot. When they got near the scarlet-runners they perceived Pitou, whose tall stature made him appear more formidable than he was in reality. Thinking that the two sergeants would stand in need of his assistance to master the young giant, the exempt had taken off his cloak, had rolled the casket in it, and had hid the whole in a secret corner, but where he could easily regain possession of it.

But Catherine, who had been listening with her ear glued, as it were, to the door, had vaguely heard the words Book, Doctor, and Pitou. Therefore, finding the storm she had predicted had burst upon them, she had formed the idea of attenuating its effects. It was then that she prompted Pitou to say that he was the owner of the book.

We have related what then passed regarding it: how Pitou, bound and handcuffed by the exempt and his acolytes, had been restored to liberty by Catherine, who had taken advantage of the moment when the two sergeants went into the house to fetch a table to write upon, and the gentleman in black to take his cloak and casket.

We have stated how Pitou made his escape by jumping over a hedge; but that which we did not state is, that, like a man of talent, the exempt had taken advantage of this flight.

And, in fact, the twofold mission intrusted to the exempt having been accomplished, the flight of Pitou afforded an excellent opportunity to the exempt and his two men to make their escape also.

The gentleman in black, although he knew he had not the slightest chance of catching the fugitive, excited the two sergeants by his vociferations and his example to such a degree, that on seeing them racing through the clover, the wheat, and Spanish trefoil fields, one would have imagined that they were the most inveterate enemies of Pitou, whose long legs they were most cordially blessing in their hearts.

But Pitou had scarcely gained the covert of the wood, when the confederates, who had not even passed the skirts of it, halted behind a bush. During their race they had been joined by two other sergeants, who had kept themselves concealed in the neighborhood of the farm, and who had been instructed not to show themselves unless summoned by their chief.

"Upon my word," said the exempt, "it is very well that our gallant young fellow had not the casket instead of the book, for we should have been obliged to hire post-horses to catch him. By Jupiter! those legs of his are not men's legs, but those of a stag."

"Yes," replied one of the sergeants, "but he has not got it, has he, Monsieur Wolfsfoot? for, on the contrary, 't is you who have it."

"Undoubtedly, my friend, and here it is," replied the exempt, whose name we have now given for the first time, or we should rather say the nickname which had been given to him on account of the lightness of his step and the stealthiness of his walk.

"Then we are entitled to the reward which was promised us," observed one of the sergeants.

"Here it is," said the exempt, taking from his pocket four golden louis, which he divided among his four sergeants, without any distinction as to those who had been actively engaged in the perquisition or those who had merely remained concealed.

"Long live the lieutenant of police!" cried the sergeants.

"There is no harm in crying 'Long live the lieutenant!'" said Wolfsfoot; "but every time you utter such exclamations you should do it with discernment. It is not the lieutenant who pays."

"Who is it, then?"

"Some gentleman or lady friend of his, I know not which, but who desires that his or her name may not be mentioned in the business."

"I would wager that it is the person who wishes for the casket," said one of the sergeants.

"Hear now, Rigold, my friend," said the gentleman in black; "I have always affirmed that you are a lad replete with perspicacity, but until the day when this perspicacity shall produce its fruits by being amply recompensed, I advise you to be silent. What we have now to do is to make the best of our way on foot out of this neighborhood. That damned farmer has not the appearance of being conciliatory, and as soon as he discovers that the casket is missing, he will despatch all his farm laborers in pursuit of us, and they are fellows who can aim a gun as truly as any of his Majesty's Swiss guards."

This opinion was doubtless that of the majority of the party, for they all five set off at once, and, continuing to remain within the border of the forest, which concealed them from all eyes, they rapidly pursued their way, until, after walking three quarters of a league, they came out upon the public road.

This precaution was not a useless one, for Catherine had scarcely seen the gentleman in black and his two attendants disappear in pursuit of Pitou, than, full of confidence in the agility of him whom they pursued, who, unless some accident happened to him, would lead them a long dance, she called the husbandmen, who were well aware that something strange was going on, although they were ignorant of the positive facts, to tell them to open her door for her.

The laborers instantly obeyed her, and Catherine, again free, hastened to set her father at liberty.

Billot appeared to be in a dream. Instead of at once rushing out of the room, he seemed to walk mistrustfully, and returned from the door into the middle of the apartment. It might have been imagined that he did not dare to remain in the same spot, and yet that he was afraid of casting his eyes upon the articles of furniture which had been broken open and emptied by the sergeants.

"But," cried he on seeing his daughter, "tell me, did they take the book from him?"

"I believe so, Father," she replied, "but they did not take him."

"Whom do you mean?"

"Pitou; he has escaped from them, and they are still running after him. They must already have got to Cayolles or Vauciennes."

"So much the better! Poor fellow! It is I who have brought this upon him."

"Oh, Father, do not feel uneasy about him, but think only of what we have to do! Pitou, you may rest assured, will get out of this scrape. But what disorder! good heaven! only look, mother."

"Oh, my linen wardrobe!" cried Madame Billot;

"they have not even respected my linen wardrobe! What villains they must be!"

"They have searched the wardrobe where the linen was kept!" exclaimed Billot.

And he rushed towards the wardrobe, which the exempt, as we have before stated, had carefully closed again, and plunged his hands into piles of towels and table napkins, all confusedly huddled together.

"Oh," cried he, "it cannot be possible!"

"What are you looking for, Father?" inquired Catherine.

Billot gazed around him as if completely bewildered.

"Search, — search if you can see it anywhere! But no; not in that chest-of-drawers, — not in that secretary. Besides, it was there, — there; it was I myself who put it there. I saw it there only yesterday. It was not the book they were seeking for, — the wretches! — but the casket!"

"What casket?" asked Catherine.

"Why, you know well enough."

"What! Doctor Gilbert's casket?" inquired Madame Billot, who always, in matters of transcendent importance, allowed others to speak and act.

"Yes, Doctor Gilbert's casket!" cried Billot, plunging his fingers into his thick hair; "that casket which was so precious to him."

"You terrify me, my dear father," said Catherine.

"Unfortunate man that I am!" cried Billot, with furious anger; "and I, who had not in the slightest imagined such a thing, — I, who did not even for a moment think of that casket! Oh, what will the doctor say? What will he think of me? That I am a traitor, a coward, a miserable wretch!"

"But, good heaven! what did this casket contain, Father?"

"I do not know; but this I know, that I had engaged, even at the hazard of my life, to keep it safe; and I ought to have allowed myself to be killed in order to defend it."

And Billot made a gesture of such despair, that his wife and daughter started back with terror.

"Oh God! oh God! are you losing your reason, my poor father?" said Catherine.

And she burst into tears.

"Answer me, then," she cried; "for the love of Heaven, answer me!"

"Pierre, my friend," said Madame Billot, "answer your daughter; answer your wife."

"My horse! my horse!" cried the farmer; "bring out my horse!"

"Where are you going, Father?"

"To let the doctor know. The doctor must be informed of this."

"But where will you find him?"

"At Paris. Did you not read in the letter he wrote to us that he was going to Paris? He must be there by this time. I will go to Paris. My horse! my horse!"

"And you will leave us thus, my dear father? You will leave us in such a moment as this? You will leave us full of anxiety and anguish?"

"It must be so, my child; it must be so," said the farmer, taking his daughter's face between his hands and convulsively fixing his lips upon it. "'If ever you should lose this casket,' said the doctor to me, 'or rather, should it ever be surreptitiously taken from you, the instant you discover the robbery, set off at once, Billot, and inform me of it, wherever I may be. Let nothing stop you, not even the life of a man.'"

"Good Lord! what can this casket contain?"

"Of that I know nothing; all that I know is, that it was placed under my care, and that I have allowed it to be taken from me. Ah, here is my horse! From the son, who is at college, I shall learn where to find the father."

And kissing his wife and daughter for the last time, the farmer jumped into his saddle, and galloped across the country, in the direction of the high-road to Paris.

CHAPTER IX.

THE ROAD TO PARIS.

Let us return to Pitou.

Pitou was urged onwards by the two most powerful stimulants known in this great world, — Fear and Love.

Fear whispered to him in direct terms : —

"You may be either arrested or beaten ; take care of yourself, Pitou !"

And that sufficed to make him run as swiftly as a roebuck.

Love had said to him, in the voice of Catherine : —

"Escape quickly, my dear Pitou !"

And Pitou had escaped.

These two stimulants combined, as we have said, had such an effect upon him, that Pitou did not merely run : Pitou absolutely flew.

How useful did Pitou's long legs, which appeared to be knotted to him, and his enormous knees, which looked so ungainly in a ballroom, prove to him in the open country, when his heart, enlarged with terror, beat three pulsations in a second.

Monsieur de Charny, with his small feet, his elegantly formed knees, and his symmetrically shaped calves, could not have run at such a rate as that.

Pitou recalled to his mind that pretty fable, in which a stag is represented weeping over his slim shanks, reflected in a fountain ; and although he did not bear on his forehead the ornament which the quadruped deemed some compensation for his slender legs, he reproached himself for having so much despised his stilts.

For such was the appellation which Madame Billot gave to Pitou's legs when Pitou looked at them standing before a looking-glass.

Pitou, therefore, continued making his way through the wood, leaving Cayolles on his right and Yvors on his left, turning round at every corner of a bush, to see, or rather to listen; for it was long since he had seen anything of his persecutors, who had been distanced at the outset by the brilliant proof of swiftness Pitou had given, in placing a space of at least a thousand yards between them and himself, — a distance which he was increasing every moment.

Why was Atalanta married? Pitou would have entered the lists with her; and to have excelled Hippomenes he would not assuredly have needed to employ, as he did, the subterfuge of the three golden apples.

It is true, as we have already said, that Monsieur Wolfsfoot's agents, delighted at having possession of their booty, cared not a fig as to what became of Pitou; but Pitou knew not this.

Ceasing to be pursued by the reality, he continued to be pursued by the shadows.

As to the black-clothed gentlemen, they had that confidence in themselves which renders human beings lazy.

"Run! run!" cried they, thrusting their hands into their pockets, and making the reward which Monsieur Wolfsfoot had given them jingle in them: "run, good fellow, run; we can always find you again, should we want you."

Which, we may say in passing, far from being a vain boast, was the precise truth.

And Pitou continued to run as if he had heard the aside of Monsieur Wolfsfoot's agents.

When he had, by scientifically altering his course, and turning and twisting as do the wild denizens of the forest to throw the hounds off scent, when he had doubled and turned so as to form such a maze that Nimrod himself would not have been able to unravel it, he at once made up his mind as to his route, and taking a sharp turn to the right, went in a direct line to the high road which leads from Villers-Cotterets to Paris, from the hill near Gondreville Heaths.

Having formed this resolution, he bounded through the copse, and after running for a little more than a quarter of an hour, he perceived the road enclosed by its yellow sand and bordered with its green trees.

An hour after his departure from the farm he was on the king's highway.

He had run about four leagues and a half during that hour; as much as any rider could expect from an active horse, going a good round trot.

He cast a glance behind him. There was nothing on the road.

He cast a glance before him. There were two women upon asses.

Pitou had got hold of a small work on mythology, with engravings, belonging to young Gilbert; mythology was much studied in those days.

The history of the gods and goddesses of the Grecian Olympus formed part of the education of young persons. By dint of looking at the engravings Pitou had become acquainted with mythology. He had seen Jupiter metamorphose himself into a bull, to carry off Europa; into a swan, that he might approach and make love to the daughter of King Tyndarus. He had, in short, seen other gods transforming themselves into forms more or less picturesque; but that one of his Majesty's police-officers should have transformed himself into an ass had never come within the scope of his erudition. King Midas himself had never had anything of the animal but the ears, — and he was a king, — he made gold at will, — he had therefore money enough to purchase the whole skin of the quadruped.

Somewhat reassured by what he saw, or rather by what he did not see, Pitou threw himself down on the grassy bank of the roadside, wiped with his sleeve his broad red face, and thus luxuriously reclining on the fresh clover, he yielded himself up to the voluptuousness of perspiring in tranquillity.

But the sweet emanations from the clover and marjoram could not make Pitou forget the pickled pork made by Madame Billot, and the quarter of a six-pound loaf which Catherine allotted to him at every meal, — that is to say, three times a day.

This bread at that time cost four sous and a half a pound, a most exorbitant price, equivalent at least to nine sous in our days, and was so scarce throughout France that when it was eatable, it passed for the fabulous brioche,[1] which the Duchess of Polignac advised the Parisians to feed upon when flour should altogether fail them.

Pitou therefore said to himself philosophically that Mademoiselle Catherine was the most generous princess in the world, and that Father Billot's farm was the most sumptuous palace in the universe.

Then, as the Israelites on the banks of the Jordan, he turned a dying eye towards the east, that is to say,

[1] A sort of dry cake made of flour, eggs, and saffron, which the Parisians eat with their coffee and milk. — TRANSLATOR.

in the direction of that thrice happy farm, and sighed heavily.

But sighing is not so disagreeable an operation to a man who stands in need of taking breath after a violent race.

Pitou breathed more freely when sighing, and he felt his ideas, which for a time had been much confused and agitated, return to him gradually with his breath.

"Why is it," reasoned he with himself, "that so many extraordinary events have happened to me in so short a space of time? Why should I have met with more accidents within the last three days than during the whole course of my previous life?

"It is because I dreamed of a cat that wanted to fly at me," continued Pitou.

And he made a gesture signifying that the source of all his misfortunes had been thus already pointed out to him.

"Yes," added he, after a moment's reflection, "but this is not the logic of my venerable friend the Abbé Fortier. It is not because I dreamed of an irritated cat that all these adventures have happened to me. Dreams are only given to a man as a sort of warning, and this is why an author said, 'Thou hast been dreaming, beware! — Cave, somniasti!'

"Somniasti," said Pitou, doubtingly, and with somewhat of alarm; "am I then again committing a barbarism? Oh, no; I am only making an elision; it was somniavisti which I should have said, in grammatical language.

"It is astonishing," cried Pitou, considering himself admiringly, "how well I understand Latin since I no longer study it!"

And after this glorification of himself, Pitou resumed his journey.

Pitou walked on very quickly, though he was much tranquillized. His pace was somewhere about two leagues an hour.

The result of this was that two hours after he had recommenced his walk Pitou had got beyond Nanteuil, and was getting on towards Dammartin.

Suddenly the ears of Pitou, as acute as those of an Osage Indian, were struck with the distant sound of a horse's feet upon the paved road.

"Oh," cried Pitou, scanning the celebrated verse of Virgil, —

"'Quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum.'"

And he looked behind him.

But he saw nothing.

Could it be the asses which he had passed at Levignon, and which had now come on at a gallop? No: for the iron hoof, as the poet calls it, rang upon the paved road; and Pitou, whether at Haramont or at Villers-Cotterets, had never known an ass, excepting that of Mother Sabot, that was shod, and even this was because Mother Sabot performed the duty of letter-carrier between Villers-Cotterets and Crespy.

He therefore momentarily forgot the noise he had heard, to return to his reflections.

Who could these men in black be who had questioned him about Doctor Gilbert, who had tied his hands, who had pursued him, and whom he had at length so completely distanced?

Where could these men have sprung from, for they were altogether unknown in the district?

What could they have in particular to do with Pitou, — he who had never seen them, and who, consequently, did not know them?

How then was it, as he did not know them, that they had known him? Why had Mademoiselle Catherine told him to set off for Paris; and why, in order to facilitate his journey, had she given him a louis of forty-eight francs, — that is to say, two hundred and forty pounds of bread, at four sous a pound. Why, it was enough to supply him with food for eighty days, or three months, if he would stint his rations somewhat.

Could Mademoiselle Catherine suppose that Pitou was to remain eighty days absent from the farm?

Pitou suddenly started.

"Oh! oh!" he exclaimed, "again that horse's hoofs."

"This time," said Pitou, all on the alert, "I am not mistaken. The noise I hear is positively that of a horse galloping. I shall see it when he gets to the top of yon hill."

Pitou had scarcely spoken when a horse appeared at the top of a hill he had just left behind him, that is to say, at the distance of about four hundred yards from the spot on which he stood.

Pitou, who would not allow that a police agent could have transmogrified himself into an ass, admitted at once that he might have got on horseback to regain the prey that had escaped him.

Terror, from which he had been for some time relieved, again seized on Pitou, and immediately his legs became even longer and more intrepid than when he had made such marvellous good use of them some two hours previously.

Therefore, without reflecting, without looking behind, without even endeavoring to conceal his flight, calculating on the excellence of his steel-like sinews, Pitou, with a tremendous leap, sprang across the ditch which ran by the roadside, and began a rapid course across the country in the direction of Ermenonville. Pitou did not know anything of Ermenonville, he only saw upon the horizon the summits of some tall trees, and he said to himself, —

"If I reach those trees, which are undoubtedly on the border of some forest, I am saved."

And he ran toward Ermenonville.

On this occasion he had to outvie a horse in running. Pitou had no longer legs, but wings.

And his rapidity was increased after having run some hundred yards, for Pitou had cast a glance behind him, and had seen the horseman oblige his horse to take the same immense leap which he had taken over the ditch on the roadside.

From that moment there could be no longer a doubt in the mind of the fugitive that the horseman was, in reality, in pursuit of him, and consequently the fugitive had increased his speed, never again turning his head, for fear of losing time. What most urged him on at that moment was not the clattering on the paved road, — that noise was deadened by the clover and the fallow fields; what most urged him on was a sort of cry which pursued him, the last syllable of his name pronounced by the horseman, a sort of hou ! hou ! which appeared to be uttered angrily, and which reached him on the wings of the wind, which he was endeavoring to outstrip.
